IN ITS programs of this month the Boston Symphony Orchestra included George Gershwin's well advertised "Second Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra, with the composer officiating at the keyboard. Mr. Gershwin had made himself somewhat of a reputation in the field of serious music by his "Rhapsody in Blue," widely heralded some years ago as the apotheosis of jazz. Well-made and decidedly melodious, this piece enjoyed a not undeserved vogue which is now, however, somewhat on the wane owing, partly, to a certain lack of musical solidity,—partly, also, to the fact that jazz, as a rhythm, is showing signs of losing its hold, except for dance purposes. From the purely musical viewpoint, the germs of its decay lie in its inherent monotony and lack of variety; its narrow possibilities have now probably been well-nigh exhausted.

Mr. Gershwin's new Rhapsody must be termed disappointing in all respects. Almost totally devoid of ingratiating melodic material, it offers us nothing but rhythms now grown trite, and a reasonably clever though blatant orchestration in which old combinations are warmed over with only a fair degree of success. Imbued with the desire to be in the modernistic "swim," Mr. Gershwin has inevitably had recourse to the "mechanistic age" ju-ju, which constitutes the idol and heart's darling of the modern gentlemen who indulge in what they are pleased to call "composition." So he begins with a "rivet" motive, consisting of the percussive iteration of a single note. This "motive," while possibly reminiscent of a riveting machine, does not, unhappily, share the constructive capabilities of its original. There is, nevertheless, a moment in the piece when a melodious phrase shows its head, swimming desperately in the swirling current of syncopation, in which it is all too speedily submerged. Otherwise the Rhapsody is a mere hash of conventional jazz rhythms and harmonies. Mr. Gershwin played the piano in humdrum style,—with the accent on the last syllable.

The old-timers were given much real enjoyment by Mr. Milton Aborn's revival of Reginald de Koven's Robin Hood. The writer spent an altogether delightful evening, and was glad to observe that few of the younger generation seemed indifferent to the genuine charm of this almost unique American contribution to the literature of fine light opera. The Serenade of Victor Herbert,—the nearest approach to it,—has not shown nearly as great a vitality. The libretto of Robin Hood still remains a good one. The music has a light touch, variety and melodic material of real distinction, and—a very rare quality—it creates an atmosphere entirely appropriate to its subject. O Promise Me, once the most hackneyed of all ballads, seemed a gem of loveliness when compared with the "torch songs" which are being ground out in thousands by the music factories of today.

The work was excellently sung, mostly by young singers agreeable to contemplate and vocally well-equipped, who gave a performance of satisfying freshness and gusto.

Let us note that the audience took full advantage of the opportunity to register its sentiments with regard to the "Noble Experiment," by compelling four encores of that old favorite, Brown October Ale.

Mr. Aborn deserves the highest praise for the discrimination and quality of his revivals in a field of music meriting a much greater popularity with modern audiences. It is pleasant to chronicle that the attendance at these performances has been good.

ACCORDING to announcements, March and April will each be notable for a significant musical event. In March the Oratorio Society is to perform Edward Elgar's oratorio, The Dream of Gerontius. This great choral masterpiece has suffered from many years of inexcusable neglect. In April the Philadelphia Orchestra and the League of Composers will sponsor the American première of Schönberg's monumental Gurre-Lieder, a dramatic cantata for soli, chorus and orchestra, to be led by Mr. Stokowski. Taxing to the utmost the immense vocal and orchestral resources required for its rendition, this work is in Schönberg's earlier style: composed immediately after his fine sextet, Verklärte Nacht; that is to say, before he had abandoned music for mathematics. Despite the probable sneers of our self-appointed elect, the work will bring its message to many of us who are following a broader artistic creed.

MARSHALL KERNOCHAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

MAR 16 1932

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated [illegible]rsary two years ago with a composition shower. From all over the world came works from eminent composers, written in honor of the Bostonians' birthday party. So many were there, in fact, that Mr. Koussevitzky and his men must have been sitting up nights ever since trying to get them all played off. Only a week or so ago did the band complete the list with a Symphonic Ode by Aaron Copland.

At least Mr. Koussevitzky is not selfish. He lets other conductors play with his birthday presents. For instance, Mr. Molinari and the Philadelphia Orchestra recently presented a work by Ottorino Respighi that had been custom-made for the Back Bay Semicentennial.

It is called Metamorphoseon modi XII—a super-elegant way of saying "theme with twelve variations." The main theme, stated almost without preliminaries, and curiously akin to the Shepherd's tune at the opening of the last act of Tristan, pursues a stormy and adventurous career that taxes the resources of an augmented modern orchestra, including a pipe organ.

* * *

THE trouble with variations is that they are, unless heavily disguised, too small a form for the use to which they are usually put. Played on a piano, or by a chamber ensemble, a set of variations may be absorbingly interesting; the comparative monotony of one color is relieved by the variety of shapes in which the main theme appears. But when a set of ten, twelve, or fourteen variations is assigned to a symphony orchestra, the constant shifting of color, as well as the permutations and transmutations of the material, is too much. The variations have got to be short, unless the piece is to last all night; and the result is an inevitable impression of scrappiness. The composer is made to sound short-breathed and tentative.

One has the impression of hearing a salesman offering samples of his wares: "Now, here's something you might like; simple, but good (24 bars; full stop). Or perhaps you'd like something a trifle more elaborate (32 bars; full stop). No? Well, try this one (28 bars; full stop); or this (16 bars; full stop)—and so on. No sooner has the musical thought begun to develop than it is cut off, in the bloom of its youth, to make room for another idea.

* * *

STRAUSS solves the problem most successfully in Don Quixote, where he avoids jerkiness by leaving out the full stops—a simple device, but an effective one. His variations take their place as parts of what is practically a continuous and carefully structured development of a single theme.

Respighi tries another plan. His first two variations are enough alike, in mood and development, to correspond roughly to the first movement of a symphony. The next two form, approximately, a slow movement, and the fifth and sixth are equivalent to a scherzo. After that, however, he lets nature take its course, sometimes running one variation into another so that it is hard to tell when the one leaves off and the other begins. Except to those in whose veins runs a strain of detective blood this is, of course, of no consequence.

Even so, the Metamorphoseon lack something of the cohesiveness that one instinctively expects in a major work for grand orchestra. Which did not prevent my enjoying them exceedingly, and looking forward to hearing them again.

* * *

THIS heretical pleasure derives, I suppose, from the fact that I like Respighi's ideas. In music, as in people, one may love what one does not unreservedly admire. A may be a fine fellow and a credit to his country, deserving of respect and veneration—and may, none the less, bore you to death; while B, who is a bit of a wastrel and a scofflaw, and whose family life is deplorable, may be one of the joys of your life.

So with Respighi, so far as I am concerned. I admit all his faults—his tendency to long-windedness, his fondness for climaxes more notable for decibels than for eloquence, the occasional literalness and lack of imagination with which he develops his material. None the less, I like his music. It has a speaking quality, a sort of aliveness, that is not frequent in modern musical utterance. Whatever use he may make of his themes, they have dignity, and plasticity, and, at their best, a mournful beauty that I find immensely moving.

His harmony has warmth and color, and is neither hackneyed nor consciously bizarre; and his orchestration is distinctive and always effective. He may, upon occasion, make one wish that he could have said his say somewhat otherwise; but his fundamental ideas are almost invariably worth hearing. He is every inch a composer.

* * *

MR. RESPIGHI was present to hear his piece played, acknowledging the applause it occasioned by bowing from his place in a first-tier box on the right (thereby causing numerous persons in the dress circle and balcony seats on the right to come perilously near to breaking their necks). He had to bow three times. I suspect New York of liking him as well as his music.

For the other offerings of the evening Mr. Molinari went to not too conventional sources. There was no symphony, the Respighi work taking its place. The concert began with a lovely Corelli suite, transcribed for strings by Pinelli, and ended with Debussy's La Mer and Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel. A good program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAR 16 1932

Will Include Russian Work

Dr. Kussevitsky Makes Announcement Relative to Boston Symphony Concert.

Because of the fondness of local music lovers for Russian music as interpreted by the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as a compliment to the local Russians who idolize their compatriot, Dr. Koussevitzky has been asked to make one change in the program as originally announced for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium Wednesday evening, April 6, under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra by including one typical Russian number.

Dr. Koussevitsky has graciously complied with the request and will include a modern Russian work in the place of the American composition "Prairie" by Sowerby. The work chosen is a suite of tone pictures by Tcherepnin which Dr. Koussevitzky is playing for the first time in this country this season and with great success.

With an old Italian overture, a typical Russian number and the brilliant Ravel composition, concluding with the superb Beethoven symphony "Eroica" the directors of the local orchestra believe this concert will be one of the greatest concerts the famous Boston orchestra has ever given in Springfield. The revised program is as follows:

Suite, Corelli
Saraband—Gigue—Badinerie
Eight Miniatures, N. Tcherepnin
"After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet."
1. Arab Boy
2. Egypt
3. Baba-jaga
4. Stars
5. "Mama"
6. General
7. The Forest
8. The Tsarina
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ravel
Ballet, Second Suite.
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Beethoven
"Eroica," Op. 55.
1. Allegro con brio,
2. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai,
3. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio,
4. Finale: Allegro molto.

The sale of single tickets for this notable concert will open at Steinert's Music House Monday, March 28, and orders are now being filled by Edward H. Marsh, secretary, 422 Besse Building.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 19 1932

CHOICE PROGRAM FOR CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The great concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Auditorium, April 6, will bring to a brilliant close the present successful season of the Springfield Symphony orchestra. The Boston orchestra was engaged to celebrate the 10th season of the local orchestra and the directors feel that the experiment has been amply justified for they attribute to the inclusion of the Boston orchestra in the series the largely increased subscriptions of this season, and they already have assurance that the concert, April 6 will be greeted by one of the largest audiences of the season.

It is so long since Springfield has heard the Boston orchestra that symphony patrons have been keen to know what program Dr Koussevitzky would choose. From lovers ~~of modern~~ music there has been an insistent demand for the works of present-day composers and the lovers of the classics have been equally insistent that the program include time-honored works of the composers of the past. Dr Koussevitzky was advised of these requests and he submitted a program aimed to delight everyone. It was an ideal program but it disappointed some of the orchestra directors because it included no Russian works and local admirers of Dr Koussevitzky think his rendering of modern Russian works among the most brilliant interpretations of his great orchestra. Contrary to all Symphony hall traditions Dr Koussevitzky was asked to change the Springfield program and include one typical Russian number.

The distinguished conductor of the Boston orchestra graciously acquiesced and in the place of a little known American composition he has put a brilliant Russian number which will not only delight the lovers of modern Russian music but afford a remarkably representative program including old Italian, modern Russian and French compositions, as well as a great classic symphony.

The program will open with a lovely old Italian suite by Corelli. Then will come the brilliant Russian number, Eight Miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" by Tcherepnin, said to be a wonderfully colorful number. Then the beautiful ballet "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel will be given, considered one of the most brilliant interpretations of this famous French composer by Dr Koussevitzky and his orchestra. The symphony will be the magnificent Beethoven "Eroica" generally conceded to be one of the greatest symphonies ever written. The program is as follows:—

Suite ....Corelli
Saraband
Gigue
Badinerie
Eight miniatures:
"After a Russian illustrated Alphabet" ....N. Tcherepnin
"Arab-bou," "Egypt," "Baba-jaga," "Stars," "Mama," "General," "The Forest," "The Tsarina"
"Daphnis et Chloe" ....Ravel
Ballet. Second suite:
Lever du Jour,
Pantomime,
Danse Generale
Intermission
Symphony No 3 in E flat major,
"Eroica," opus 55:
Allegro con brio,
Marcia funebre, adagio assai,
Scherzo, Allegro vivace; trio
Finale, Allegro molto

Many out-of-town orders for tickets have already been received and there is evidence of more interest in the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra than has been shown in any musical attraction in years. The tickets will go on sale at Steinert's music house, Monday, March 28, and advance orders are now being filled by the secretary, Edward H. Marsh, 42 Besse building.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OUTLOOK
MAR - 1932

▶▶ Notable Music ◀◀

Gershwin's "Second Rhapsody" and "Robin Hood"

IN ITS programs of this month the Boston Symphony Orchestra included George Gershwin's well advertised "Second Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra, with the composer officiating at the keyboard. Mr. Gershwin had made himself somewhat of a reputation in the field of serious music by his "Rhapsody in Blue," widely heralded some years ago as the apotheosis of jazz. Well-made and decidedly melodious, this piece enjoyed a not undeserved vogue which is now, however, somewhat on the wane owing, partly, to a certain lack of musical solidity,—partly, also, to the fact that jazz, as a rhythm, is showing signs of losing its hold, except for dance purposes. From the purely musical viewpoint, the germs of its decay lie in its inherent monotony and lack of variety; its narrow possibilities have now probably been well-nigh exhausted.

Mr. Gershwin's new Rhapsody must be termed disappointing in all respects. Almost totally devoid of ingratiating melodic material, it offers us nothing but rhythms now grown trite, and a reasonably clever though blatant orchestration in which old combinations are warmed over with only a fair degree of success. Imbued with the desire to be in the modernistic "swim," Mr. Gershwin has inevitably had recourse to the "mechanistic age" ju-ju, which constitutes the idol and heart's darling of the modern gentlemen who indulge in what they are pleased to call "composition." So he begins with a "rivet" motive, consisting of the percussive iteration of a single note. This "motive," while possibly reminiscent of a riveting machine, does not, unhappily, share the constructive capabilities of its original. There is, nevertheless, a moment in the piece when a melodious phrase shows its head, swimming desperately in the swirling current of syncopation, in which it is all too speedily submerged. Otherwise the Rhapsody is a mere hash of conventional jazz rhythms and harmonies. Mr. Gershwin played the piano in humdrum style,—with the accent on the last syllable.

The old-timers were given much real enjoyment by Mr. Milton Aborn's revival of Reginald de Koven's Robin Hood. The writer spent an altogether delightful evening, and was glad to observe that few of the younger generation seemed indifferent to the genuine charm of this almost unique American contribution to the literature of fine light opera. The Serenade of Victor Herbert,—the nearest approach to it,—has not shown nearly as great a vitality. The libretto of Robin Hood still remains a good one. The music has a light touch, variety and melodic material of real distinction, and—a very rare quality—it creates an atmosphere entirely appropriate to its subject. O Promise Me, once the most hackneyed of all ballads, seemed a gem of loveliness when compared with the "torch songs" which are being ground out in thousands by the music factories of today.

The work was excellently sung, mostly by young singers agreeable to contemplate and vocally well-equipped, who gave a performance of satisfying freshness and gusto.

Let us note that the audience took full advantage of the opportunity to register its sentiments with regard to the "Noble Experiment," by compelling four encores of that old favorite, Brown October Ale.

Mr. Aborn deserves the highest praise for the discrimination and quality of his revivals in a field of music meriting a much greater popularity with modern audiences. It is pleasant to chronicle that the attendance at these performances has been good.

ACCORDING to announcements, March and April will each be notable for a significant musical event. In March the Oratorio Society is to perform Edward Elgar's oratorio, The Dream of Gerontius. This great choral masterpiece has suffered from many years of inexcusable neglect. In April the Philadelphia Orchestra and the League of Composers will sponsor the American première of Schönberg's monumental Gurre-Lieder, a dramatic cantata for soli, chorus and orchestra, to be led by Mr. Stokowski. Taxing to the utmost the immense vocal and orchestral resources required for its rendition, this work is in Schönberg's earlier style: composed immediately after his fine sextet, Verklärte Nacht; that is to say, before he had abandoned music for mathematics. Despite the probable sneers of our self-appointed elect, the work will bring its message to many of us who are following a broader artistic creed.

MARSHALL KERNOCHAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

20 1932

GOETHE, "FAUST", AND SOME MUSIC-MAKERS

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

ON a certain glum and sodden London day in the early part of this century, when English music critics had little to do but chant hymns to Sir Edward Elgar and wrangle amiably over the esthetics of program music (the wild men of the Polytonal Age were still in their cradles), the indispensable Ernest Newman laid out before him on his desk for purposes of comparative study and appraisal the scores of all the musical settings of Goethe's "Faust." He found that they numbered, in one form or another, something like thirty or thirty-five. "Faust," he declared, "is perhaps the most popular of all subjects with musicians, far outdistancing in favor the Hamlets and Othellos and Romeo and Juliets and all the other lay figures which composers are fond of using to show off their own garments."

He then proceeded to these general observations: "It cannot be said that they have added very much, on the whole, to our comprehension of the drama; indeed, with half a dozen exceptions, the Faust symphonies and Faust operas and Faust scenes have quite failed to justify their existence. One of the main difficulties in the way of the musician—even supposing him to have the brain capacity to rise to the height of the psychology of the thing—is the enormous range and wealth of material of the drama itself. The First Part of Goethe's work alone, or the Second Part, is quite sufficient to tax the constructive capacity of any composer to the uttermost; but to reshape the whole of 'Faust' in music is a desperate undertaking. Since Goethe's day, we are bound to see the Faust picture through his eyes; any harking back to earlier forms of it is quite out of the question. And Goethe, while he has enormously extended and deepened the spiritual elements of the story, has by this very means set the musician a problem of discouraging difficulty. No musical version of the play, in the first place, can be adequate unless it embraces Goethe's Second Part as well as the First. Due opportunity, again, must be given for the exposition of all the essential motives of the drama, and they are many, indeed.

* * *

A Large Order

"THE composer is thus on the horns of a dilemma. If he wants his work to stand in the same gallery with Goethe's, he has to run a line through Faust's soul long enough and sinuous enough to touch upon all its secret places; but any one who tries to do this soon perceives how hard it is to focus so vast a scene and to keep the picture within one frame of reasonable size. An opera or a symphony that should attempt to cover all the psychological ground of the drama would take at least ten or twelve hours in performance. Apparently the only rational course for the future composer who may think of setting the Faust subject is to take two or three evenings over it, after the manner of Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung'; and, until this is done, we shall have to rest satisfied with the more or less inadequate versions we have at present. The cosmic quality of the subject, one would think, should have attracted more of the first rank men, considering how many of the second and third rank it has tempted."

And then the astringent Mr. Newman pays his respects to that setting of Goethe's drama "which has given to so many honest but uninstructed people their first, perhaps their only, idea of 'Faust'": he means, of course, the opera of Gounod. "This banal thing," as he calls it—"this cheap vulgarization of Goethe, this blend of the pantomime, the novelette, and the Christmas card—still represents 'Faust' in the minds of nine musical amateurs out of ten! . . . The most pleasing elements in Gounod's work, the really lovely if not always profound love-music, are precisely those that withdraw it farthest from Goethe, for here it is clearly not Faust speaking to Marguerite, but any man to any woman, any Edwin to any Angelina."

* * *

Mahler and "Faust"

MR. NEWMAN said nothing of the use made by Gustav Mahler of the second part of "Faust" in his Eighth Symphony—which is scarcely to be wondered at, in view of the fact that Mahler's Symphony was not at that time composed. Mr. Newman's brilliant and suggestive study dates from 1905, and Mahler's Symphony (a setting for voices and orchestra of the Final Scene of "Faust," prefaced by an elaborate setting of the Latin hymn, Veni Creator Spiritus), was not produced until 1910.

Mahler in this work sought to plumb the bottomless spiritual philosophy of the "Faust" Epilogue, and he achieved an impressive commentary upon Goethe's marvelous essay in cosmic symbolism, as will be remembered by those who heard the performances of Mahler's gigantic score by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski in the spring of 1916.

Whether Mr. Newman, if he could have added to his penetrating "Faust" study a discussion of Mahler's prodigious score, would have felt that any of the spiritual quality of Goethe's conception had found its way into Mahler's imagination and thence into his symphony, is not for me to guess at. Mahler undertook a task that would have taxed the genius of a Beethoven or a Wagner. Bayard Taylor reminds us that in Goethe's poem are "circles within circles, forms which beckon and then disappear: and when we seem to have reached the bottom of the author's meaning, we suspect that there is still something beyond." How, indeed, shall any music, save the greatest, convey to us, without numerous haltings and lapses and futilities, Goethe's transcendent imaging of "the victorious vitality of God and the omnipotence of Divine Love"?—the unique ecstasy, the mystical passion, the otherworldliness, the ineffable serenity and tenderness, the rapturous exaltation of the original? It is curious that Bayard Taylor, writing half a century ago, should have spoken of the closing scene of "Faust" as "a symphony"—"an ever-rising and ever-swelling symphony, with its one theme of the accordance of Human and Divine Love"; as, again, "this mystic Symphony of Love." It almost seems as if he had previsioned the tonal possibilities of Goethe's poem.

* * *

Boston's Example

MR. NEWMAN passed in review the settings of "Faust" by Boito, Wagner, Rubinstein, Henry Litolff, Henri-Hugo Pierson, Berlioz, Schumann and Liszt (he did not then know, of course, the operatic Faust of Busoni)—settings in various forms, through various musical instrumentalities. It is the conclusion of Mr. Newman, who is happily able to discuss music without either a hardening of the heart or a softening of the brain, that "every purely orchestral setting of the subject pales before the magnificence of Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony. And this brings us to a depressing coda, yet one which should be traversed: Why is it that whereas Mr Koussevitzky in Boston has appropriately observed the approach of the centenary of Goethe's death (March 22) by a performance of the greatest of all musical settings of Goethe's masterpiece, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, we in New York—the musical capital of America—are apparently planning no symphonic or choral tribute whatever to the poet without whom the art of music would have worn a different face?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAYTON, O.
NEWS

MAR 20 1932

Observance of Anniversary Of Boston Symphony Brings Delight To Musical World

BY W. J. HENDERSON
Special to The Dayton Daily News

NEW YORK, March 19.—There have been many observances of anniversaries, but music has enjoyed none of such prolonged delight as that of the fiftieth year of the Boston Sympony orchestra. The date of the semicentennial fell in 1931; we are still listening to the compositions prepared for the festival. Three of them have fallen upon our ears within a week. These were Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass, both presented by the Boston musicians, and Ottorino Respighi's "Metamorphosen," performed by the Philadelphia orchestra.

All three of the compositions proved to be well worth hearing, but it can hardly be doubted that the palm must be awarded to Mr. Copeland. The music of the gifted German was perhaps more disputable in its proclamation, while the Italian master's score gave the impression of hard work and a grand marshaling of methods with a modicum of spontaneity. However, it may sound better the next time we hear it. And there will be a next time, for so long as Italian conductors visit our orchestral platforms we shall surely enjoy repetitions of Italian novelties.

Glad news comes from Italy by way of Mr. Respighi, who has arrived to superintend the production of his mystery, "Maria Egiziaca." That will come upon us next week. Mr. Respighi has said that atonality is dead among Italian composers and that they are returning to old ways. Now there ought not to be any solid objection to atonality, which is a term made to signify the freedom of music from the domination of a ruling tonality. There can be no reasonable ground for declaring that a composer must not rove around from key to key with complete disregard of the classic relationships. The cold truth is that not more than one lay hearer in a thousand will know that he is doing it. Beginning a composition in one key and ending in another is not new, nor is it imperative.

But when the musician introduces his principal theme and we find that it lacks all melodic unity because it does not stay in any one key for more than half a measure, we find our ears unequal to the task of following it. Perhaps it is that kind of atonality that Mr. Respighi means. At any rate, we may be sure that, if it is shunned, Italian music will recover its native idiom, which it has striven to set aside in favor of northern brain products. No nation can make healthy or logical progress with its arts by trying to reconstruct them according to the models of some other nation. The fundamental difference between German and French Gothic cannot be obliterated without destroying finely drawn character. It is futile for Italians to try to make music of the rarified Persian type or the rude and aggressive German type of today. Such efforts serve only to blurr the outlines of Italian sensuous expression and replace them with the stiff drawings of the copyist. And all the Europeans become silly when they try to write jazz.

✣ ✣ ✣

Some interesting conversations followed the productions of the Copeland and Hindemith works. One gentleman, who contemplates with regret, indeed, one might say even views with alarm, the propaganda for modernistic music, voiced his sorrow that such music was performed at all. He hoped that its day was nearly over, and he will without doubt rejoice greatly when he reads what Respighi has said about the death of atonality in Italy. The distinguished Italian did not tell us whether polytonality has also met its doom. But possibly it will have to go into the silence since it is distinctly hostile to the Italian sense of beauty.

Another gentleman unhesitatingly condemned the Hindemith composite as commonplace and vulgar. That commenator was a determined modernist, and, although he went into no details, one suspected that his objection to the "Concert Music" was derived from its liberal employment of old tonalities and key relationships and its introduction of such time-worn devices as a fugue. You see, it would take an almost superhuman ingenuity to write a fugue in atonal music; in canonic composition the rule of

This traveler along the musical highways found the Hindemuth composition interesting and in moments even beautiful. Possibly the modernist who condemned it was offended by the composer's proclamation of a sustained lyric melody of the sort originated by the early fathers who dwelt in the country of the olive and the grape. Well, "de gustibus non est disputandum." Wars have been started by a difference in tastes. The modernist has theories and the basic one is that it is impossible to compose any more worthwhile music in the old manner and that therefore we must invent new methods.

This recalls an experience of John Stuart Mills set forth in his autobiography. Enjoying rapturously Weber's "Oberon," he began to be tormented about the future of music. He reflected that there were only five tones and two semi-tones in an octave and that they could be put together only in a limited number of ways of which only a few were beautiful. Most of these must have been already discovered and hence there could be no future Mozarts or Webers. "This source of anxiety," he concluded, in comforting meditation, "may perhaps be thought to resemble that of the philosophers of Laputa, who feared lest the sun should be burnt out."

✣ ✣ ✣

The writer of these rambling reflections came out of the glare of new ideas with the suspicion that the New York composer had the best of the argument. Perhaps Mr. Copeland's music lacked the technical expertness and professional routine of the other music, but it had much more of the adventurous spirit of the voyager into new territory and of the irresponsibility of unbridled enthusiasms. Or shall we descend to the speech of the byways and assert that Mr. Copland recklessly said what chanced to come into his mind and did not give a continental whether it was high art or not?

The score had juice in it, sometimes bitter, sometimes sweet, but at any rate, liquid. One gets a bit impatient with the sawdust stuff that comes out of the mills of the present gods of music. The worthlessness of the bulk of this music is the result of the inability of most of the modernists to perceive that they are impoverishing their own art by refusing to mingle the old materials with the new. They labor under the delusion that they can create an entirely new art. This something that has not yet been done in any of the fields in which man has sought for expression of his ideals of beauty. Even the modern novel has its roots in the works of Publius Ovidius Naso, and architecture owes its vitality at this moment to the Egyptians and Babylonians.

In the end, the writer confesses to a certain pleasure in discovering force in a composition written by a resident of this monstrosity of a town. Conductors live habitually with their eyes toward the east and see signs and wonders beyond the stormy waters of the North Atlantic. It is difficult for most of them to discern anything excellent in this land. To be sure, most of them come from abroad and have been brought up in the belief there is no art in the United States. Mr. Koussevitzky has been here long enough to learn at least that it is wise to be polite, and so he bestowes his august attention from time to time on American music. Thus Mr. Copland's ode obtained a performance by the Boston orchestra, and it was a good performance. That, at any rate, the work deserved. This music lover expects to hear the composition again, perhaps under the commanding direction of Leopold Stokowski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 23 1932

Boston Symphony Is at Its Zenith

Great Orchestra Has Reached New Hights Under Koussevitsky.

The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium Wednesday evening, April 6, after a long absence from Springfield will mark one of the most notable concerts in many years. The famous Boston orchestra is brought back to Springfield by the Springfield Symphony Orchestra to celebrate the conclusion of its 10th season, and it will afford a brilliant climax to its anniversary year. The Boston orchestra is now recognized as the greatest symphony orchestra in America and that probably means the world. Under the brilliant leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky it has reached new hights of artist perfection.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston orchestra celebrated the 50th anniversary of its organization last year and it is now in the zenith of its long and brilliant career. It is the largest orchestra and Dr. Koussepoint of numbers and Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his complete organization of 110 select musicians.

With great care Dr. Koussevitzky has made up a program for Springfield that will appeal to modernists as well as to lovers of the classics and the directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra believe it will prove one of the greatest symphony concerts ever given in Springfield. The program opens with a lovely old Italian suite by Corelli, followed by a colorful modern Russian number by Tcherepnin. Then comes the "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet by Ravel, one of the most brilliant interpretations of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. The program will conclude with the great Beethoven "Eroica" which the composer himself called the greatest symphony he ever wrote and which is generally accepted the masterpiece of all symphonies.

With the approach of the concert the local management has received many orders and inquiries concerning the concert, indicating a lively interest among music lovers not only in Springfield but from surrounding towns and cities. Already orders have been received from Smith, Mt. Holyoke and Amherst Colleges and the orchestra is sure to be greeted by one of the largest audiences of the season.

The sale of tickets for this concert will open at Steinert's Music House Monday morning, March 28.

PAGE 170 FOR MARCH FOREIGN COMMENTS

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians --- The Scr

A New Visitor Descends Upon Symphony Hall

Arrival and Conversation Of Ernst Toch, the Noted German Modernist

THE honored guest at the Symphony Concerts this week is the German composer and pianist, Ernst Toch. Half of the current program falls to his works. He himself will play the piano-part in his Second Piano Concerto. The orchestra will bring to performance for the first time in America his "Bunte Suite," Opus 48. Of both more in another column.

Herr Toch arrived in New York on Feb. 17 last. On the following Sunday the New York Times printed an interview picturing him as an ardent admirer and champion of all things modern; a firm believer in the theories, practice and music of Schönberg. Since that time he has toured the West, visiting such distant cities as Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle and Denver. On his return East he alighted in Boston Wednesday morning at 10.30. Before eleven he was rehearsing his Concerto with the orchestra; while at 12.20 The Transcript's interviewer was able to claim his time. His good wife, who in case of necessity acts as interpreter, expressed pleasure at an interview about music. "We have been interviewed about everything under the sun," she said. "Just imagine our surprise when in one city we read in big headlines in one paper on the morning of my husband's concert. 'Composer Eats Raw Meat.' "

The subject of Schönberg would not, however, remain out of the conversation. The interviewer desired a plain untechnical statement, as to the inherent musical quality of Schönberg's music as Toch hears it. He asked: "Will Schönberg's music in course of time, in your judgment, become as understandable to the informed musical public, say the public of our Symphony Concerts, as the music of other great composers, for example, Bach?" Herr Toch answered quickly: "Of course, it will never become 'popular,' in the sense that one will never whistle it in the street. But I confidently believe that in perhaps fifty years a public such as that of the regular attendants at your Symphony Concerts will accept the music as readily and find it as intelligible and likable as the music of Bach or any other great serious composer."

Herr Toch added, "Of course the manner of performance makes all the difference in the world." The interviewer was reluctant to interrupt, but he reminded him that great conductors have performed some of Schönberg's works and admitted after the concert that they understood as little about them as before beginning rehearsal. Quickly he replied: "Then how could they give a reading of such a work which anyone else would understand? That is exactly where the damage is done to the cause of the new music. As well pretend to read in public an unknown foreign language intelligibly as to perform this music without knowing and understanding it." One happened to think that Schönberg had complained loudly about this very obstacle to the reception of his work. One recalled that he conducts frequently in his own pieces. "Is he a good conductor?" one asked. "Yes, in his own works. Very subtle; very clear." "And," Mr. Toch added, returning to earlier questions, "Schönberg's Quartet, Opus 7, the first of his works to be considered radical, when it was written twenty years ago, was immediately thrown out of court. Now it has become a classic. It will be the same with all his works."

Continuing the discussion of performance, the composer passed to his own case: "I did not begin to study the piano until I was twenty, then studied for three years. Finally, I gave it up. But latterly I have heard such outrageous misinterpretations of my own works that I decided I must learn to play the piano in self-defence. So I started practising again. I have taken no further lessons. I just practice two or three hours a day. I have learned to play so as to make things sound in the way they should sound." Having heard him in rehearsal with the orchestra, the interviewer was able to agree with him—fully. Once upon a time, as Toch told the story he went to a concert in which his own piano-pieces were featured. He took a back seat incognito; went away without making himself known. For only by the titles on the program did he recognize some of the pieces as his own. Then, seeing Mr. Sanromá in the room, he was quick to add: "But I have an excellent interpreter here."

Herr Toch turned to methods of composition, thinking as he spoke. Both he and his wife asked for a good translation of the German term, "Der Einfall." It happens that there is no such thing as a good English equivalent. It is really that divine spark of an idea that comes to one unexpectedly, out of the blue ether, as it were spontaneously. Toch delivered himself of a paradox. "'Der Einfall' is everything; 'Der Einfall' is nothing." He explained that without this divinely sent, spontaneously received germinal idea a composer's work is as nothing, merely the unfolding of technic. On the other hand, if the composer lacks technique, the spark of inspiration is bound to die still-born. The "Einfall" and technic are both necessary, but of the two the heaven-sent idea is the more important.

Turning to his own work, Herr Toch continued: "If I do not feel the presence of some such vital germinal idea, I do not write, no matter how long I may remain without doing anything. And curiously, these ideas come to me most readily when I am out in company and the conversation becomes a little langweilig (boresome). Then I am likely to think of some inspired musical idea." At this point the composer came near getting himself into trouble with his wife. "The very best idea in my first Piano-Concerto came to me thus when I was alone with my wife." But seeing the look on her face, he added quickly: "But that was not really a very good idea after all."

"Such a germinal idea," he continued, "I then write down on any scrap of paper that is at hand. With the idea in my mind, refreshed from the little note, I take daily walks. During these I compose the music, even if it is a whole opera. When it is composed I write it out in full score. I do not make sketches which I then orchestrate. The idea comes to me in full orchestral dress. I cannot imagine myself doing good work by composing a music neutral as to color; then clothed with the timbres of the orchestra. Everything comes to me originally in exactly the orchestral colors and shades in which I put it into my score." In this process Mozart is Toch's ideal. He cannot conceive, he says, that Mozart felt his ideas other than in their final orchestral form. This faith and practice explain many things about Toch's music: why it always "sounds"; why he sometimes writes so exceedingly economical a music—no more than one or two or three melodic lines; why there is so evident an absence of "padding" in his scores; lastly, why his music makes so direct an appeal, so impresses the hearer as being made of that mysterious something which is the very quintessence of musical matter. Not many of the "modernists" can lay claim to it.

Since the conversation about Schönberg with the reporter of the New York Times has been twice mentioned in this article, it is now in order to quote a paragraph or two from it: "Schönberg is the strongest, the firmest, the most consistent of the modern composers; yet the richest in ideas of them all. He has the greatest musical morality. His path forward has not deviated once, to the right or the left, from his objective. He owes his development not to others but purely to himself. He stands in a certain definite relation to J. S. Bach. I consider these two men to have stood each at the cross-roads of great musical periods of the past and future. Like Bach Schönberg is a culmination of one age and the forerunner of another.

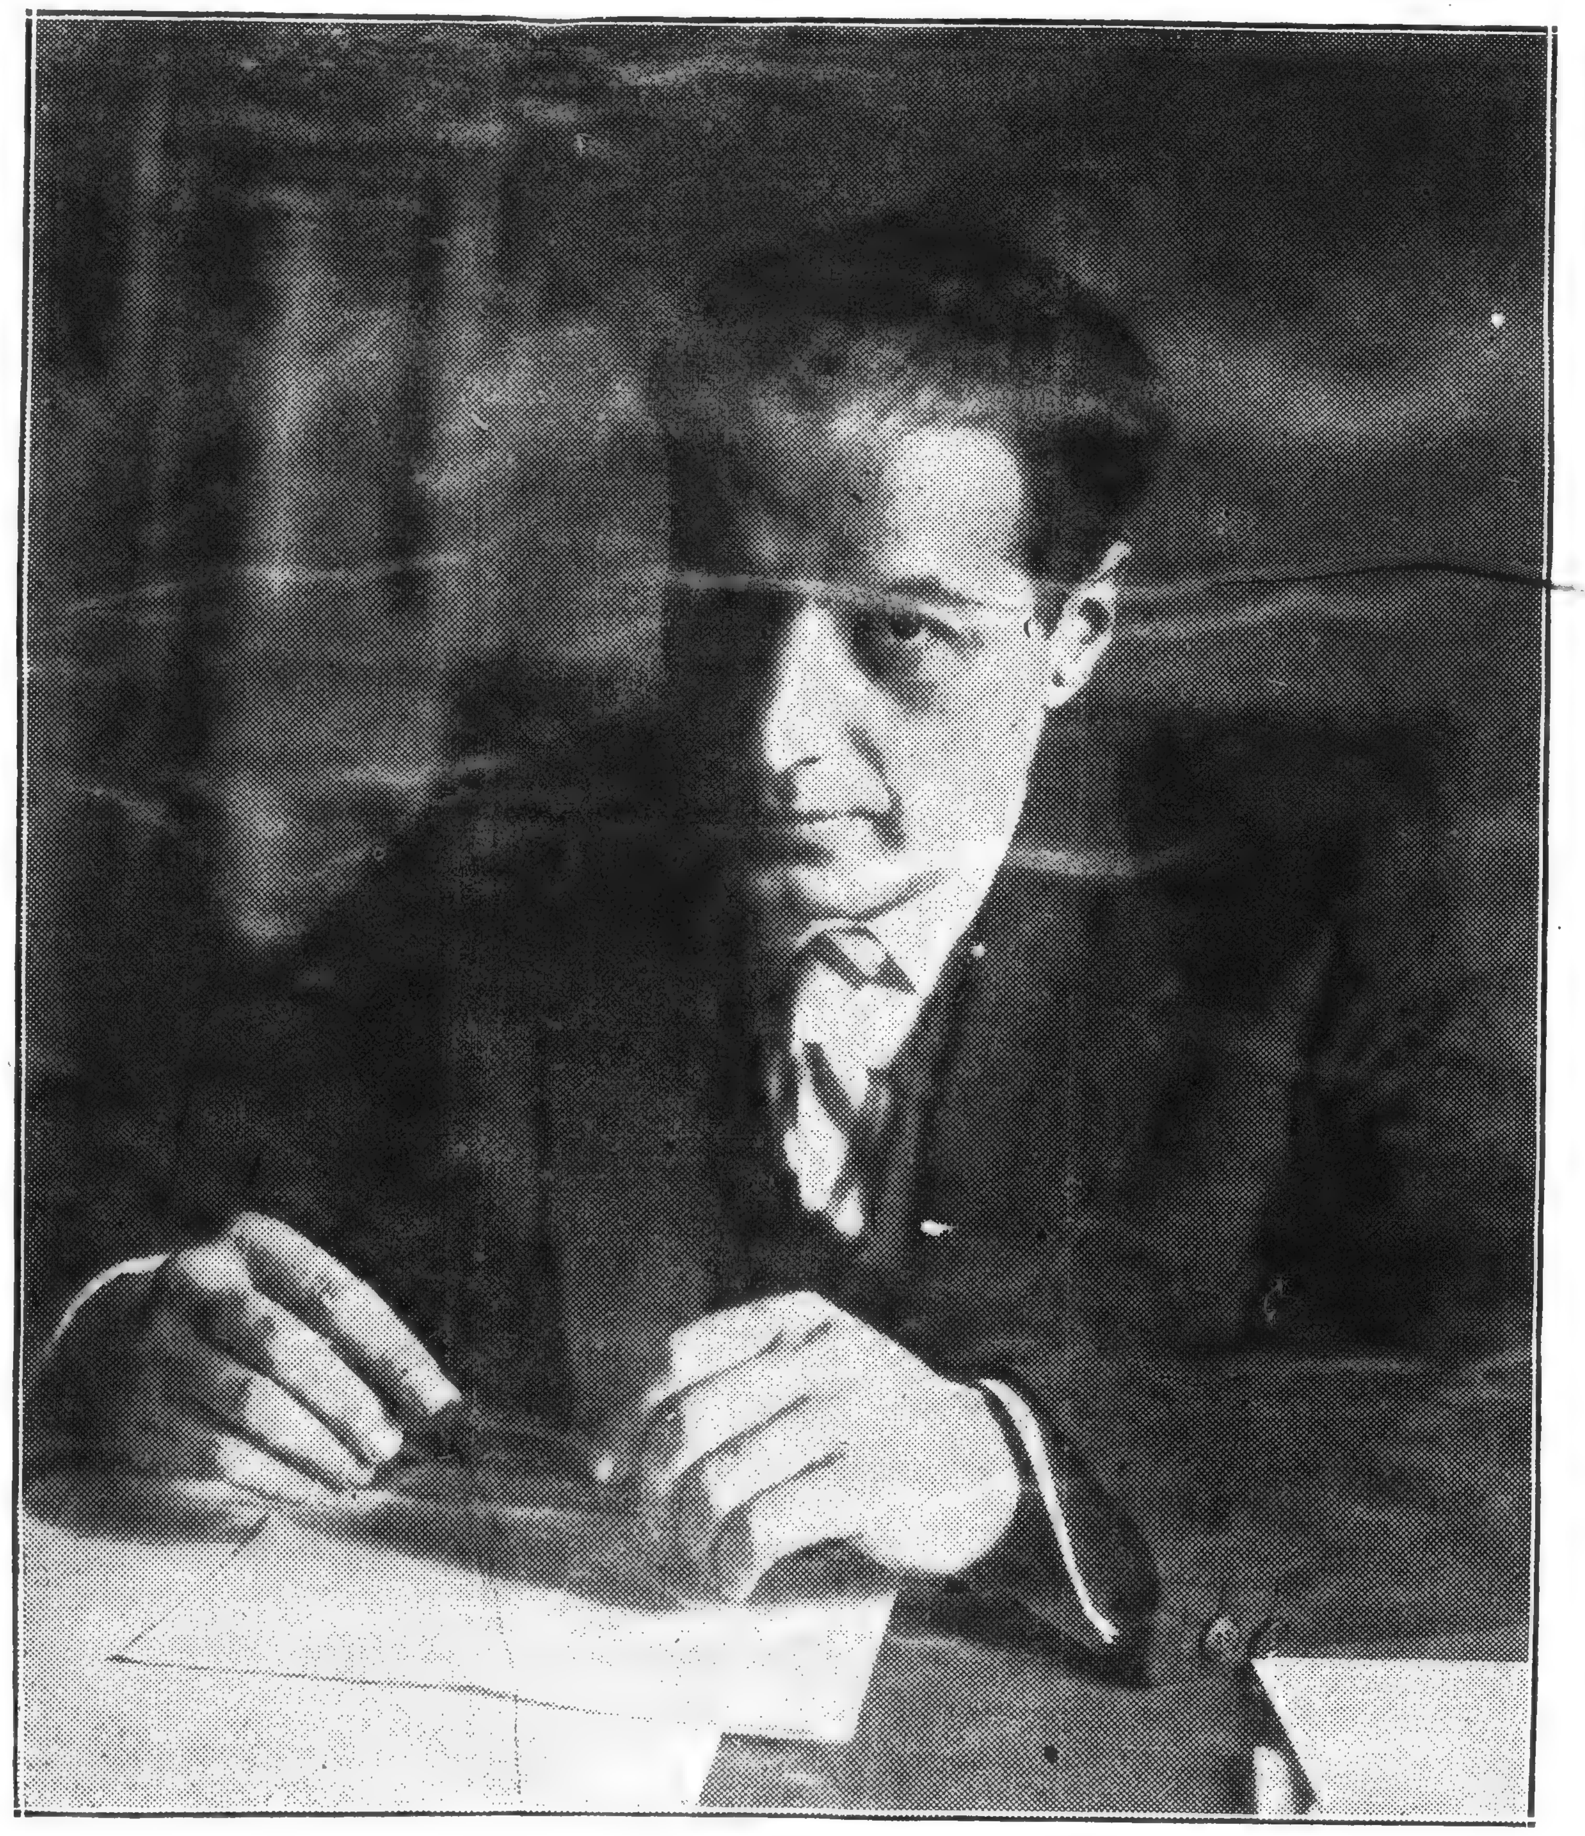
"When I hear a new work by one of the other men, I may be greatly interested for the moment. But I am not curious to hear it again. Schönberg's music means so much that when you have heard it once it has only begun to sing in your brain. From that moment the comprehension of the idea begins to grow within you. You perceive its present significance and its future intimations. There is a richness and logic in its development which are those of a complete master. I forget other music. Schönberg's music I never forget. The vitality of the ideas, the immense significance that they possess in every measure, continue to overwhelm me.

"Schönberg's atonal theories will not seem half as important or alarming as they do at present. They will seem, in fact—these declarations, these formulae of the twelve-tone scale—a very minor affair, an idea not nearly as far divorced from the accepted laws of music, as it seems to us today. Time, you know, has that curious leveling influence. When a little time has passed it is only the figures and the ideas of the very greatest importance which stand out from the background. And even these landmarks are seen as incidental and as only small elevations in the great plain of eternity. The eye travels over them easily and perceives their harmonious relation to the landscape. Bach is one of those elevations, Schönberg another."

And finally; "Music may or may not evolve from a carefully formulated theory. One goes back of theories to find the true raison d'être, the real secret of the music. The whole aspect of Schönberg's music, apart from its formulae, is rock-bound in its foundations on the past and tremulous with prescience of the future."

A. H. M.

"All Set"



Ernst Toch

German Composer of the New Generaion, To Be Guest at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

Concert-Chronicle

For Haydn

THE two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Josef Haydn, composer of music for the concerts of Prince Esterházy in Austria, for the Concerts Spirituelles in Paris, for Salomon's fashionable concerts in London toward the end of the eighteenth century, for symphony concerts ever since, falls on the night between Wednesday and Thursday next. It will be marked at Symphony Hall on the following Friday and Saturday, April 1 and 2. Dr. Koussevitzky will then array three of Haydn's Symphonies: his very first, written briefly in his twentieth year for a small orchestra of strings; his last—Number Seven of the London Series, which was also his hundred and fourth; finally, for more music of his maturest years, his Symphony in E-flat "with the drum-roll." Between whiles Mr. Piatigorsky, summoned for the occasion, will play the solo-part in Haydn's Concerto for Violoncello. He was heard with pleasure a year ago.

From Toch's Hand Into Boston Ears

A Remembered Piano-Concerto and a Lately Written "Motley Suite"

ELSEWHERE on this page is a note about Ernst Toch himself. Here follows another about his two pieces to be heard at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday. His "Bunte Suite für Orchester," Opus 48, was composed for radio performance. It is dedicated to "The Frankfort Radio and its director, Dr. Hans Flesch." The Suite is written for an orchestra of two flutes (one interchangable with piccolo), an oboe, an English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, curiously no tenor trombone, but one bass trombone, kettle-drums, a percussive section consisting of glockenspiel, xylophone, small drum, wood-block, triangle, rattle, two canes, siren, piano, and the usual strings.

The word "bunte" is rich in connotations that are not too readily conveyed by a single English word. Sanders's German dictionary gives as the first definition the word "mehr-farbig"—literally, "many-colored"; continues with a derived meaning. "alle vermischte Elemente in sich fassend; wild und ungeordnet durcheinander"—that is to say "bearing all manner of mixed-up elements within itself; wild and confused." But Muret's German-English dictionary translates "1. Varied, variegated, vari-colored. . . . 2. Confusedly, topsy-turvy." A casual glance at the score discloses the first meaning as evidently in Mr. Toch's mind when he wrote. For there is nothing confused or topsy-turvy about the Suite, unless one wishes to apply such terms to the last number, with title, "Merry Go-Round." The second, third and fourth numbers, however, show as many different groups of orchestral timbres; or colors, thus making the Suite literally "many-colored."

I. March-tempo. for full orchestra. There are two main ideas which alternate, rondo-fashion. The second is slightly more lyrical than the first, yet both are march-like. The first is heard in clarinets and violins after two introductory measures for piano, trumpet and horn. The contrasting theme is heard first as a trumpet solo with strings pizzicati in accompaniment. It enters a bit later as a vigorous canon between unison strings in C major and unison woodwinds in G-flat major. There is considerable brilliant writing for the piano. Against the second main entry of the contrast theme (English horn, C-flat major) a violin solo sings an expressive obbligato that hardly acknowledges any considerable tonal kinship. Against the third entry of the main theme flute and piano have a decorative obbligato. After a climax with a certain degree of development and combination of the different themes the movement ends.

II.—Intermezzo. "Gently flowing" the composer writes by way of indication to a piece of expressive writing for woodwinds. There are never more than four voices (save as toward the end a glockenspiel reinforces one voice), sometimes only three. English horn, clarinet, two bassoons are the combination at the beginning. An oboe, two flutes, a piccolo later enter into the combination. Again the rondo-like alternation of two musical thoughts—the first for the keen-edged oboe-English horn-bassoon group, the second for the mellower flutes and clarinets. There is much shifting about between 2-4, 3-4, 4-4 and 5-4 meters. The Intermezzo will be omitted at the coming performances, but is included here for the sake of complete exposition of the suite.

III. Adagio espressivo. This is a movement for strings exclusive of double basses. There is a solo string quartet, concerto-wise. The movement is one of expressive charm and gentle sonorities.

IV. Marionette Dance. The composer's indication implies a march-tempo that is well rhythmed, but never angular or particularly incisive, but that always remains "grazioso," smooth-flowing and in its way gentle. As the second and third numbers have used woodwinds and strings respectively, so this movement turns to brass, piano and percussion. It begins in trumpet soli with horn and bass-trombone accompaniment; later the accompaniment passes to piano and percussion. The piano and bass trombone introduce the contrasting theme which is variously treated. There is return, somewhat expanded, to the music of the beginning, making a three-part form.

V.—Galante Passacaglia. Again the composer emphasises the need of a "grazioso" performance. The adjective "galante" gives perfect description of the mood of the whole. It is a genuine, strictly held passacaglia. A four-measure theme is announced pianissimo in violoncellos and basses. There are nineteen repetitions of this theme with various harmonizations. Near the middle of the third repetition, a change in the meter from 4-4 to 3-4 causes varied accentuation, and since no beats have been omitted, gives considerable variety of starting points for the theme. Four-four is resumed in the seventh repetition. With the eleventh repetition the double basses are silent and 'cellos take the theme legato. In the twelfth a flute joins the 'cellos, while beginning with the thirteenth the theme is heard chiefly in high woodwinds. With the sixteenth it returns to basses and 'cellos with all the rests filled in with notes in the 'cellos. Three measures of coda after the nineteenth repetition (twentieth playing) of the theme, round out the movement. All manner of combinations, from string solo-trio, violin solo, piquant wood-wind chords, to fantastic piano-solo, fugal imitations and percussive variations are used above the ground-bass.

VI.—Karussel. "Whirling," the composer writes. Two gay, rhythmically exuberant themes are successively worked. then are combined with each other. Eventually the brass introduces a third, more dynamic, against the combination. Out of the three a whirling, seething mass ensues that is indeed a "Merry Go-Round."

The Concerto

Toch's Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, in which he is to play the solo-part, was heard at Symphony Hall on Dec. 28-29, 1928, with Mr. Sanromá as pianist. It was then hailed as a work displaying individuality, imagination, and also emotion. The reception was that of an outstanding achievement in the field of the newer music. It is in three movements: Molto Pesante, Adagio, Rondo Disturbato. There is preceding the first movement an introduction growing largely out of a one-measure motif heard at the beginning. A long and brilliant cadenza leads to the main body of the movement, Allegro. Clarinets sing the main theme, which leads to a fugal exposition. "Tenderly and quietly" the piano introduces a second theme, which alternates between melodic lyricism and impish piquancy. There is a long descent through lovely sonorities, a long ascent to a breath-taking climax with which the movement ends.

The Adagio is a movement of rare delicacy and of great seriousness. The listener—or the reader—thinks now and again of a modern Bach in free flights of fancy. Save for the climaxes, the orchestra is usually of the size and style of a chamber orchestra.

The theme of the Rondo Disturbato is the theme which appears to have some relationship to the well-known tune of the barn-yard fowl. The chief contrasting theme is lyrical and sustained. The rondo moves in usual rondo-course. But during the last repetition of the songful theme, it is rudely interrupted by the saucy main theme. Toch writes over this interruption the words, "The Disturbance," whence the rondo gets its title. The lyric theme makes several timid attempts to regain its place, always interrupted by the main theme. A fourth attempt seems more successful than the preceding, but with a sickening glissando the whole collapses. "Aber ,aber" ("but, but") the composer writes into the score, tearfully, tragi-comically. After which the main theme, a cadenza and a brilliant climax end the whole.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

Those that would hear Bach's Mass in B minor on Sunday next at Symphony Hall from the Symphony Orchestra, the Cambridge choirs, the solo-singers of last year and Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor, are reminded. that their will be no further performances at present and that not too many seats remain.

Mr. Toch, who has not yet been heard in New York, will be pianist there on Sunday. April 3. in a concert arranged by the League of Composers. His numbers are his own Sonata and a set of pieces named "Capricetti."

The rumor goes about that Monsieur Ravel will revisit American cities next season to introduce his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, lately produced in Paris and London. As it was originally intended for the jubilee year of the Symphony Orchestra. it is likely to be heard first at Symphony Hall. So far. the composer has been conductor, not pianist.

s. Mar 24
TRANS.

Ernst Toch, Persuasive Modernist

TRANS— MAR 26

His Suite and Piano-Concerto Heard at Symphony Hall, Chaikovsky for Balm

HERR TOCH is a paradox among modernist composers. It was possible, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, to read him at large in the program-book—or two days before in the columns of The Transcript—discoursing warmly and gravely of Schönberg's rich and logical music. It is arguably both. Yet admittedly it taxes the listening mind; whereas Herr Toch's "Motley (Bunte) Suite," played as first number in the Symphony Concert, is immediately comprehensible. The orchestra's guest from Mannheim may not be the profoundest of the new composers; but his music, so far as it is known to Bostonians, gives instant pleasure. It is also logical, but hardly cerebral in the drier sense of that overused word when modernists are in question.

Brain-work has gone into it, as it must into all music-making worthy the name. Along with it, however, are other ingredients—say humor and wit; fancy, invention, even imagination; feeling clean-cut and clear, neither sweetened sentimentally nor softened sensuously; the free flow, from ready and effective resource, that makes musical creation seem spontaneous act; the vitalizing energy, light or forceful, that projects it upon audiences. Here in Boston we have now heard Toch's Piano-Concerto—once at the end of 1928, again yesterday; his "Little Theater Suite" last autumn; now his "Motley Suite." All three have established him as fertile and individual composer.

The new Suite—written four years ago but coming fresh into Symphony Hall—begins with a division labelled "March-Tempo," teeming with rhythmical impetus, inventive and alert in the play of two contrasting motivs, stinging with the procedures and the timbres of modernism as though for Herr Toch there was no other way to write—as indeed there is not. Throughout it is exhilarating to hear. The French have a word for it—verve. . . . Then should have ensued an Intermezzo in which two groups of wind instruments, one brighter, the other darker, toned are alternated in contrasts of color and in shifting rhythms—a stimulant of which Herr Toch is fond. It was omitted yesterday, perhaps because a long Symphony of Chaikovsky was to come. Dubious and undesirable prudence! At least once, a new work played in the presence of the composer should be set forth as he put it to music-paper. To do so is reasonable and courteous and fair. How long, besides, would it have prolonged the concert to an audience spell-bound by Chaikovsky plus Koussevitzky?

The second division of the "Motley Suite" was, therefore a low-voiced slow movement for strings, less the basses, with the first desks for outstanding quartet—in modern variant of ancient fashion—and solo-passages for the Concertmaster, played suavely by Mr. Burgin. The indication is Adagio; the mood songful; the racial instinct unmistakable. No German modernist, not even Schönberg, can always and altogether escape it, if indeed he would. Time and again Hindemith has lapsed into it as a restless, busy child sinks back into its mother's arms.

As for Herr Toch he may be all that he undoubtedly was in the first division and is to be in divisions to come. But when he sets to his slow movement and his sustaining strings, he is songful, romantic, poetizing, earnest for the lyric beauty that was, is and ever shall be. His Austro-German nature ineradicable denies him any other quest. True, he tempers his song to the spirit of the time, which is to say that he is neither sentimental, sensuous nor luxuriant. His music is spare, not cushioned, but it remains a music seeking songful expansion in songful warmths.

A Marionette-Dance ensues, harking back in theater-suggestion to the Suite of last December. The brass choir conducts it smoothly; the rhythm keeps it in light, ingratiating flow; the piano and its percussive neighbors dash in hints of puppets; now and then of grotesquerie. In sum, tonal fancies about these little people of the stage, agreeable to hear. . . . Then a passacaglia, by the label "galante" in the eighteenth-century style—the more strict the more polished, to be carried off, withal, as though the composer had a way with him. Nor in this instance does Herr Toch raise his orchestral voice above the very best of tonal good breeding. Nineteen times, as The Transcript's analyst counted them, does he repeat his basic theme. Nineteen times he also diversifies it by a surrounding web of devices, structural, harmonic, instrumental. Yes indeed: Herr Toch abounds in inventions and teems with resource—a well-furnished, quick-minded craftsman. . . . So to, "Merry-Go-Round" for whirling finale. Two contrasting motivs, sharp and shifting rhythms, insistent propulsive energy, usual and unusual modernisms—Herr Toch as child of his time after his own particular manner.

Neither applause, warm enough but scattered, nor the conductor's inquiring glances upward and around could draw the modest composer into view. Unaware of our American liking for personality, or indifferent to it, he would have his music heard without visual appeal. First glance at him came as he crossed the stage to take the piano-part in his Concerto—square-cut, sturdy figure; homely German presence with a nod from the neck for a bow; modest and unaffected, absorbed, but not obtrusively, in his task. He played as composers play, for better and for worse. He lacked the virtuoso-pianist's instinct and resource to intensify tone; fell short of the showmanship—to use the word in no offensive sense—that projects the music in hand "for all that it—and the performer—is worth." Not at all would Herr Toch force it upon his audience. On the other hand he sounded it with an understanding, feeling, persuasion, possible only to him who made it—bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh. The listener believed because Toch believed. Not often in the concert-hall does this sensation come.

In itself the Concerto confirms and enlarges the quality of the composer as the Suite first disclosed him. Treating piano and orchestra in symphonic rather than solo-concerto fashion, Herr Toch traverses at will a wide range of sonorities—dissonant and stinging, warm and rich, muted and delicate, limpid and luminous. His command of rhythm is inexhaustible, sharpening, shifting, as impulse prompts. He abounds in vitalizing and propulsive energy that can swirl upward into climaxes, though usually by similar technical means. He can ply no less, as in measures of the first movement and throughout the second, the gentle, even the delicate, hand. Again in the slow movement, the German in him courts lyric emotion and romantic beauty; without lusciousness gains it. Again through the final rondo wit, humor and surprise are in play.

Toch upbuilds his first movement as logically as his cherished Schönberg; while—if he will permit a reviewer's blasphemy—he better vitalizes it. Occasionally fancy rises into imagination; while at will and need it can flower into firework-brilliance. Always the modernist procedures—polytonality, short motivs and the rest—are his means, but not his masters; his choice but not his formulas. Out of the past of music upsprings his faith and practice in its present. A truly individual composer; as we in Boston know him an ingratiating modernist.

After intermission, for many, the concert "really" began. It then continued through forty-five minutes. At the end came an outburst of applause, unparalleled since Ravel's "Bolero" was played for the first time to the matinée public. An audience that sped away after a superlative performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony"; that next Friday will hasten from "dear old Haydn," now lingered in its place, clapped with its hands, stamped with its feet, here and there shouted with its throat, until it had recalled the conductor more than once and set him in the midst of the standing orchestra. The occasion was the annual performance of one of Chaikovsky's last three symphonies—this year the Fifth, in E minor.

Piece and playing had yielded to nine-tenths of the audience for three-quarters of an hour as perfect a felicity as they may ever know in the concert hall. The sombre Chaikovsky had begun the Symphony. From mood to mood in the first movement, he had trailed, melancholy, his singing robes. In the second he had drenched all and sundry in long-drawn super-sensuous instrumental melody. Out of the third he had sounded a fantasmal waltz. How lonely was this haunted, palpitating Chaikovsky! In the finale he had piled sonority on sonority, tumult over tumult. It had all been very obvious, very tuneful, very emotional, very exciting. A self-tortured Slav had eaten out his heart in tones because he must find such release or perish of brooding; while an audience of another time and another place had enjoyed the tonal spectacle with every nerve a-quiver.

Dr. Koussevitzky had led this audience through this music in all sincerity, with the justest poise. He had over-"interpreted" nothing. Nowhere had he been exhibitional. He had woven and finely modulated the middle grayness of the first movement. He had drawn its wandering courses into a seeming musical continuity. He had over-labored not a measure of the slow song—even when the first horn enters with the "famous" melody. He had adjusted the sonorities of the finale until it had sounded less empty and rhetorical than it really is. In these latter days the conductor has banished excess from his versions of Chaikovsky. He indulges the composer in nothing, neither for brooding nor for vehemence. He measures intensities and they prevail the more. How exciting murmur two thousand matrons and maidens and stamp with exultant feet! There are psychological as well as musical studies to be made at the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects Trans Mar 26

Dr. Koussevitzky has revised the program that will mark at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Haydn. For the Symphony "with the drum-roll"—No. 3 in E-flat—he has substituted the "Surprise" Symphony—No. 5, in G major. It will end the first part of the concert; while Haydn's last Symphony, in D major, will close the whole.

HER. MU

MAR 26

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was as follows: Toch, Bunte Suite op. 48 (first time in this country); Toch, Concerto for piano and orchestra op. 38 (Mr. Toch, pianist); Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5, E minor.

Mr. Toch wrote his suite in 1928. It was performed by a radio orchestra at Frankfort the next year. The second movement, an Adagio, is for strings, and is curiously designed, now holding the attention by a motive which while it has momentary beauty promises more for the development, but does not fulful the promise; now containing measures which by their apparent wandering without fixed purpose cause the attention to wander with them. The opening movement in march tempo, the Marionette Dance, the "Galante Passacaglia," and "Karrusel" are conspicuous for unexpected use of instruments which with certain rhythms suggest the influence of what is known to Europeans as "jazz." There are few themes of long breath, little that is emotional, little that answers any accepted definition of beauty, yet the music, even in the Adagio, too long drawn out, has a certain fascination, due chiefly to rhythm.

The concerto had been played here at a Symphony concert by Mr. Sanroma who, it was stated at the time, had studied it in Europe with the composer. As in the suite, so in the Concerto, the slow movement is the weakest. One naturally expects in an Adagio some measures at least that are either emotional or calmly meditative; one looks forward to being moved, not necessarily in the Tchaikovskian manner; or to be under the spell of pure or sensuous beauty. Let us have some glimpses of beauty, either through melody, or by choice of harmonies that are themselves hints at melodic lines, or by the ravishing blend of instrument timbres. In modern Allegros one may expect fire and fury. What does one find in Mr. Toch's? Short themes, in some instances only persistent patterns, a hammering of them into the hearing of the audience, lest otherwise their importance would not be recognized. Mr. Toch, talking with a reporter in New York, had something to say about the logic noticeable in Schoenberg's development of musical ideas. No doubt he himself could point to the "logic" in his own music; to the inevitable development of his premises.

> "Logic and sermons never convince.
> The dew of the night drives deeper into > the soul."

Given patterns, no doubt the excellent Todhunter whose treatise on logic drove college students to despair in the seventies, could have written a respectable symphony or concerto according to the modern rules. One would like to hear music by Mr. Toch in his lighter moments, when he is not sternly logical; for example, his music to the film "The Children Factory," music in which the wood instruments "adroitly imitate the constant screaming of the children." Here the screaming has a musical purpose. In the occasional instrumental screaming yesterday no purpose was apparent, not even "logic."

The dynamic force of this composer is marked. There are pages in the concerto that hurry one along in excitement. Yet one thought back to the Suite with pleasure for in it were evidences of fancy. But, men and brethren, no matter how convincingly Mr. Toch played his concerto—and liberal applause rewarded him— what would not one have given for relieving sentiment—it would be too much to ask for emotion!

Now in Tchaikovsky's symphony—it was gloriously played—emotion runs riot. He is either a Dismal Jemmy, a man in doleful dumps, or shouting, at the end, "This world is not so bad a place after all. Whoop her up, boys." It is easy to see why Brahms disliked the finale of this symphony; but is it better to shriek one's woes, or to whine about them and cower at the thought of death after the manner of Johannes Brahms? Mr. Ernest Newman thinks that Tchaikovsky wrote this symphony to a program. In his fourth symphony he gave the program to Madame Meck. Is not much of his music a revelation of his self-torturing soul? Such revelations are dangerous· a day comes when the world does not care to hear them. Yet the first three movements of Tchaikovsky's fifth will long be heard gladly—when they are interpreted and performed as they were yesterday; when there is a horn played for the beautiful solo in the Andante as Mr. Boettger played it. The ultra-moderns cannot forgive Tchaikovsky for writing tunes.

The audience was well disposed toward Mr. Toch; it was enthusiastic after the symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The concert next week will be commemorative of Haydn's birthday (March 31, 1732). His first symphony (1759); his last symphony, D major (B. & H., No. 2), 1795; also the violoncello concerto in D major played by Gregor Piatigorsky, and the symphony in E flat (B. & H. No. 1), will be on the program.

ERNST TOCH GUEST OF SYMPHONY

Post Mar 26

Austrian's "Bunte Suite" and Concerto Win High Favor

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Ernst Toch, Austrian "modernist" composer, blessed with ideas, imagination, a sense of humor, a sound musical instinct and a remarkable command of technical resource, is guest this week at the Symphony concerts.

COMPOSED FOR RADIO

The programme of yesterday afternoon and this evening, curiously divided between Mr. Toch and Tchaikovsky, embraces the distinguished visitor's highly entertaining "Bunte Suite," hitherto unheard in America, his First Pianoforte Concerto in which he himself was soloist, and the Russian's Fifth Symphony. Mr. Toch's "Motley Suite," to give the German title its nearest English equivalent, was composed four years ago for radio performance, a circumstance which may well account for the entertaining quality aforementioned.

This music, which yesterday charmed and amused, would have sufficed 50 years ago to raise doubts as to its author's sanity. As here employed, however, the modern idiom should today prove exhilarating to all but the most case-hardened conservative. If Mr. Toch in this Suite combines tones which, as the author of "Red Saunders" said of certain chemicals, "were born to live apart," he offers us at the same time such fetching tunes, such inspiriting rhythms, that the dissonance and the bizarre orchestral effects are but the spice that gives the dish its savor.

Stimulates and Excites

The Concerto, first played here in 1928 with Mr. Sanroma as the pianist, is made of sterner stuff. But, as in the later and lighter piece, Toch writes with an unmistakable zest for creation, with a propulsive energy that cannot be denied. This music stimulates and excites. In the first and third divisions the listener is swept along as by an irresistible current. The slow movement, as Mr. Dunton-Green has pointed out, while devoid of sentiment is by no means empty of feeling.

In two respects Mr. Toch himself was unconventional: he did not wear formal afternoon attire, and he played with his music before him. Although making no claim to sensational virtuosity, he performed the exceedingly difficult piano-part of his Concerto not only with musical authority but with a certain brilliance as well.

Is Warmly Received

The audience received him warmly, and at the end of both Suite and Concerto there was liberal applause. Incidentally it must not go unmentioned that the orchestral performance of both pieces was of the highest excellence.

It is not inconceivable that some future generation will know Tchaikovsky as the composer of one symphony, the "Pathetic." Its immediate predecessor is wearing thin. It begins to sound hollow, tawdry, banal and platitudinous, seems here and there awkwardly put together. Yet as played by Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra yesterday, this Symphony once more roused an audience to enthusiasm.

MUSIC

Globe Mar 26

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The distinguished Geiman composer, Ernst Toch, played the solo part in his own concerto for piano at yesterday's Symphony concert. The program also included the first performance in America of Mr Toch's "Bunte Suite," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky conducted Mr Toch's suite. At the end, though the applause was insistent if not voluminous, the composer modestly refrained from appearing. After the concerto he insisted that the conductor share the more cordial applause.

The piano concerto, opus 38, was first played here in 1928, with Mr Sanroma as soloist. It was then warmly received. Mr Toch, though not a pianist by profession, gave yesterday a remarkably brilliant performance of the solo part. He is, in fact, in large measure self taught, both as pianist and as composer. He studied medicine, and gave up its practice for music. This has not prevented him from winning a number of prize contests by his compositions, a sufficient proof of their correctness judged by academic standards. The composer whom he most admires is Schoenberg, whose works have been so unjustly neglected in America in recent years. But Toch's music does not recall that of Schoenberg.

Self Consciously Original

Its style is self consciously original. Though he cannot resist orchestral and harmonic effects calculated to annoy the sedate middle aged musician for whom music died with Grieg or, perhaps, with Brahms, Toch in the concerto, and in the slow movement of the suite heard yesterday writes music with not a little imaginative power.

Like so many men of his generation, he seems a thwarted romanticist, whose idealism and dramatic instinct have been numbed by the World War. He does not dare let himself go in frankly emotional lyricism. For lightheartedness he has substituted a too ingenious irony.

The "Bunte Suite" was written for radio performance. It is accordingly scored for orchestra that should not overtax the still limited power of the microphone to convey complex sonorities to the listener. The title means "many colored," or "diversified." The five movements are ingeniously contrasted in character. The color and texture of the music is shifting, almost evanescent. But its musical substance seemed at a first hearing slight. It lacks the imaginative power of the concerto. The performance of both concerto and suite was sedulously brilliant. Dr Koussevitzky, as always, was anxious to do his best for the distinguished visitor.

Tchaikovsky's familiar symphony was brilliantly and very sympathetically interpreted. To play Tchaikovsky well one must believe in him, vibrate in sympathy with his neurotic emotionalism, be able as well as willing to minimize his banalities of melody and rhythm. Dr Koussevitzky is almost the ideal interpreter for Tchaikovsky. How beautifully and sensitively he phrased the melodies yesterday, as in the waltz movement, for instance, which others have made sound so commonplace.

Tumultuous Finale

How intensely dramatic he made the tumultuous finale, turning its bombast to something that had almost the mood of tragedy. This is the best movement Tchaikovsky wrote, and to it more than justice was done yesterday. The only fault to be found with the performance was a monotonous and excessive loudness, for which the scoring for orchestra rather than the conducting may be blamed.

Next week's concerts commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Haydn. The program includes both the first and the last of his 104 symphonies, and for good measure another symphony, and the concerto for violoncello, in which Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist.

P. R.

Boston Symphony

Mon. Mar 26

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Mr. Ernst Toch, as guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contributed to its twentieth program his "Bunte" Suite, for its first American performance, and his Pianoforte Concerto op. 38, in which he was soloist. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony completed the list, performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 25.

To be exact, five of the six movements of the Suite were played. These tended to confirm the impression of the composer which was made by his concerto when it was introduced to Boston by Mr. J. M. Sanromá, three seasons ago. He is a writer of great facility, a master of the modern orchestra, who has been sensitive to the musical trends of his own time, both "serious" and popular. Professing filial devotion to Schönberg, he confesses, in the Adagio expressivo and the Galante Passacaglia of the Suite, to a fraternal sympathy with Alban Berg. These two movements are the most interesting musically of the five heard. They recall the gentler moments of "Wozzeck" even more than they do the "Glückliche Hand" or "Pierrot Lunaire." They hold interest by their contrapuntal texture, and they are impressive in the simple directness of their speech. The March Tempo, the Marionetten Tanz and the Karrusel, on the other hand, are amusing on a first hearing, but they are thematically barren and rhythmically monotonous. Their employment of some of the familiar devices of jazz no doubt helps the Suite on the radio, for which it was written.

Mr. Toch's piano technique was adequate to the demands of the solo part of the concerto. A second hearing brought to attention the Berg affiliation in the slow movement, and emphasized the Beethovenian scherzo methods of the Finale; but on the whole it convinced us no more than before that the work is destined to "rank among the great pianoforte concertos."

The orchestra played superbly throughout, and in the symphony the audience was stirred to stamping and shouts of approval. This symphony might have been written for Dr. Koussevitzky to play, and he has to his hand a body of musicians able to give him all he asks in tonal splendor and in flexibility. The result is one of the most exciting experiences of concertgoing.

L. A. S.

Young People Face the World

The young people who are enjoying the Sunday Supper Club at the Boston Y. W. C. A. will have as their literary guest tomorrow night, Miss Celina Lewis, who will read and comment on poetry. The hours is 5:30 and the supper is open to all young people in business who

The opening number is the Bunte Suite, played at yesterday's concert for the first time in America. The word Bunte means "motley," "vari-colored," and so forth. The five movements played yesterday are in several styles—a march, an expressive slow movement, a marionettes' dance, a passacaglia and a "carousal." It was this last movement, infectiously jazzy and exciting, which accounted for the enthusiasm of the audience, for one of the most favorable receptions a new work has received here in years.

The music was not merely entertaining, however. It was constructed with technical sureness; in the slow movement it disclosed a melodist of the first water, and all the movements, contrasted as they were, were marked by something rare in contemporary composition—a definitive personal style. More serious in subject-matter was the piano concerto which followed, introduced here three years ago by Jesus Maria Sanroma. Toch, who is largely self made as pianist, acquitted himself nobly in the excruciatingly difficult music he had set down for others to play. He had mechanical dexterity and sureness, and a touch not ordinarily associated with home-made virtuosi.

The orchestral performance of both works under Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to us notably sympathetic, though perhaps it might be more tactful to leave this to the composer. At any rate there was no questioning the brilliance of the performance of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, which ended the concert. This work has long been regarded as one of the Russian conductor's tours de force, but the audience outdid itself in its applause.

MUSIC

Globe Mar 27

SYMPHONY HALL

Bach's B Minor Mass

Johann Sebastian Bach's great Mass in B Minor was performed in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society singing the choral parts, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing the instrumental portions. Dr Koussevitzky conducted. The concert was given to increase the pension fund of the orchestra.

The soloists yesterday were the four who appeared here last year when the mass proved the culmination of the Boston Symphony's Bach Festival: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

The Harvard singers had been trained by Dr Archibald T. Davison; the Radcliffe young women by G. Wallace Woodworth.

Bach's mass is not a setting of the Roman Catholic liturgy for ritualistic use. Bach was a Lutheran, in whose churches at that time the Kyrie Eleison and Gloria in Excelsis were sung in Latin as part of the office of communion, which the Lutherans held to be the most important feature of their main Sunday services. This ritual was called the "Missa" or Mass. The term, however, was ambiguous and limited, and had no reference whatever to the complete Roman mass.

Bach did not write his Mass in a burst of creative inspiration. It was composed over a period of years; the Kyrie and Gloria were written first, the Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei being added later. Indeed, portions of the Sanctus and the entire Agnus Dei were not written for the Mass, but were taken from other of Bach's church music.

The proportions of the work as it stands do not make for ritualistic use, for the Mass requires nearly three hours to perform, and demands a huge chorus, a good-sized orchestra and four expert soloists. Yesterday, as last year, it was performed in two parts; the first beginning at 4:30 in the afternoon, the second at 8:30 in the evening.

As an expression of devout worship and spiritual ardor, clothed in music of indescribable beauty and utterly amazing genius, this Mass stands out a peak over the terrain of musical art. It carries the listener beyond the condition of excited laudatory eloquence to the more meaningful state of silent wonder at its sublimity.

The forceful "Cum sancto spiritu," the ineffably soft and lovely "Et incarnatus est" and "Crucifixus," the poignant "Agnus dei" have perhaps a wholly unique sway over one's emotions. One also can but marvel at the great faith which Bach had in his work, realizing as he must that he never would hear it performed as he heard it sound in his brain.

But little need be said about the performance. The Mass was superbly sung and played, intensified by the fervor of youthful singers, and graced by the infinite subtleties of phrasing and delicacy of nuance which Dr Koussevitzky imparted.

The soloists all sang well, though Mme Matzenauer alone achieved the distinction of singing with a personal emotional intensity and a really grand style. As usual, she had memorized her part, and did not carry a score.

Only a portion of the audience probably realized fully the staggering amount of work and the enormous difficulties involved in preparing the Mass. But all seemed to realize that singers, players, and conductor had accomplished something extraordinary, for at the end of the performance there occurred one of the noisiest demonstrations one ever has heard in Symphony Hall. Handclapping, and stamping of feet for choruses, soloists, and especially Dr Koussevitzky, swelled to cheering when the conductor brought to the front of the platform Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth, the two men who had done the fundamental hard, uphill work of preparing the choral parts.

Herald

MUSIC

Mar 27

BACH'S B-MINOR MASS

Yesterday afternoon's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, being devoted to a performance of Bach's monumental B-minor Mass, was divided into two sessions—beginning at 4:30 P. M. and 8:30 P. M., respectively, and separated by an intermission of two hours and a half. The work was presented in similar fashion last year, during Dr. Koussevitzky's Bach festival. Yesterday the orchestra was again assisted by the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society; and once more the soloists were Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. The instrumental solos, for violin, flute, oboe d'amore and horn, were performed by Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Speyer, Devergie and Boettcher, of the orchestra. Albert Snow was organist.

It seems clear that the B-minor Mass has never been used as a whole for ritual purposes, and that it was not even intended for such use. It is neither a Lutheran "Missa," in the restricted sense (Kyrie and Gloria) in which Bach habitually and legitimately used the term, nor, despite its Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei, is it truly a Roman Catholic High Mass (as C. P. E. Bach not unnaturally termed it), for it has peculiarities, both in its text and in other respects, that unfit it for use in connection with the Roman ritual. Terry regards it as an expression of Bach's Christian idealism, neither Protestant nor Catholic, and in its unusual structure he sees a characteristic impulse to complete a design.'

But in appreciating the work and the manner of its performance it is hardly necessary to have come to a decision as to its origin, nor to lay stress upon the well known fact that several of its movements were borrowed and adapted by Bach from his cantatas. Though there are portions of the Mass which are, to modern ears, inexpressive and undistinguished musically, and achieve a certain force only through the richness and solidity of their contrapuntal texture, yet its finest sections, from the poignantly tragic Kyrie Eleison, Qui Tollis, and Crucifixus to the brilliant and jubilant Gloria, Sanctus, or Osanna, have an emotional power which is by turns moving and exhilarating, and a purely musical beauty, nobility, or sheer ingenuity that excites wonder.

The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, admirably trained by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, were superbly adequate to their difficult task. Here and there, as in the opening Kyrie, were passages too ploddingly intoned, but in general the choral work was of remarkable verve and precision, and often of very great beauty—as in the marvelous Crucifixus, with its infinitely quiet close.

The soloists, too, acquitted themselves, on the whole, excellently. Mme. Evans' voice, which, though strained and brittle in its higher register, is inherently of fine quality, traversed easily enough her florid music. Mme. Matzenauer, her ample voice in fine fettle, set an admirable example of accomplished, smooth, expressive singing, both in her beautiful solos Qui Sedes and Agnus Dei, and in her duets with the soprano. Mr. Crooks used his fine voice with restraint, reserving his full tones for special occasions, and even then using them with moderation. His Benedictus was sung expressively with tenderly beautiful tone. Mr. Gange, though occasionally hampered by low notes which are not of great volume, sang with his usual intelligence and conviction.

The orchestra's accompaniment was finely done; its soloists played excellently. For all the performers, and for Dr. Koussevitzky, who directed them with inspired energy and sense of effect, there was most enthusiastic and prolonged applause. Soloists and conductor were compelled to return to the platform repeatedly. Orchestra and chorus were brought to their feet.

There was a very large audience.

S. S.

BACH'S MASS FOR FUND

Post Mar 27

Work Given in Two Sections at Symphony Hall

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The performance of Bach's Mass in B minor at the hands of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which formed the climax of last season's Bach Festival at Symphony Hall, was repeated yesterday at the orchestra's second concert in aid of its pension fund. The soloists on this second occasion were those of the other performance: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Five members of the orchestra also had their names listed on the programme as solo performers: Mr. Burgin and Mr. Boettcher, who respectively provided violin and horn obbligati; Mr. Speyer and Mr. Debergie, who played solo parts for the oboe d'amore, and Mr. Snow, the organist. Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted and inspired the whole.

As before, the Mass was given in two portions, from 4:30 until 6 in the afternoon and from 8:30 until 10 in the evening. It so happens that the Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei, which made the second part, are on the whole more sustained in inspiration and interest, more grateful to the performers, than the Kyrie and Gloria that made the first. In the evening one or the other of the solo singers was heard to better advantage than in the afternoon, and the chorus, which had already seemed more secure in its task than was the case a year ago, quite outdid itself in the evening. Despite the unevenness of the Mass, an unevenness that lies chiefly in the general superiority of the choral passages to the solo parts, the net impression is of an exalted music.

Until Dr. Koussevitzky revived it a year ago the work had gone long unheard in Boston, surely a situation to be deplored, and the repetition of it yesterday was thrice welcome.

At the end of the afternoon session and again at the close of the evening diversion there was enthusiastic applause for all concerned from the audience which filled the hall, and it was gratifying again to behold the evidence of appreciation and affection on the part of the Radcliffe chorus and the Harvard Glee Club for their respective conductors, Mr. Woodworth and Dr. Davison, when Dr. Koussevitzky personally escorted them to the platform to receive their share of the plaudits.

MUSIC

Globe Mar 26

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The distinguished German composer, Ernst Toch, played the solo part in his own concerto for piano at yesterday's Symphony concert. The program also included the first performance in America of Mr Toch's "Bunte Suite," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky conducted Mr Toch's suite. At the end, though the applause was insistent if not voluminous, the composer modestly refrained from appearing. After the concerto he insisted that the conductor share the more cordial applause.

The piano concerto, opus 38, was first played here in 1928, wuih Mr Sanroma as soloist. It was then warmly received. Mr Toch, though not a pianist by profession, gave yesterday a remarkably brilliant performance of the solo part. He is, in fact, in large measure self taught, both as pianist and as composer. He studied medicine, and gave up its practice for music. This has not prevented him from winning a number of prize contests by his compositions, a sufficient proof of their correctness judged by academic standards. The composer whom he most admires is Schoenberg, whose works have been so unjustly neglected in America in recent years. But Toch's music does not recall that of Schoenberg.

Self Consciously Original

Its style is self consciously original. Though he cannot resist orchestral and harmonic effects calculated to annoy the sedate middle aged musician for whom music died with Grieg or, perhaps, with Brahms, Toch in the concerto, and in the slow movement of the suite heard yesterday writes music with not a little imaginative power.

Like so many men of his generation, he seems a thwarted romanticist, whose idealism and dramatic instinct have been numbed by the World War. He does not dare let himself go in frankly emotional lyricism. For lightheartedness he has substituted a too ingenious irony.

The "Bunte Suite" was written for radio performance. It is accordingly scored for orchestra that should not overtax the still limited power of the microphone to convey complex sonorities to the listener. The title means "many colored," or "diversified." The five movements are ingeniously contrasted in character. The color and texture of the music is shifting, almost evanescent. But its musical substance seemed at a first hearing slight. It lacks the imaginative power of the concerto. The performance of both concerto and suite was sedulously brilliant. Dr Koussevitzky, as always, was anxious to do his best for the distinguished visitor.

Tchaikovsky's familiar symphony was brilliantly and very sympathetically interpreted. To play Tchaikovsky well one must believe in him, vibrate in sympathy with his neurotic emotionalism, be able as well as willing to minimize his banalities of melody and rhythm. Dr Koussevitzky is almost the ideal interpreter for Tchaikovsky. How beautifully and sensitively he phrased the melodies yesterday, as in the waltz movement, for instance, which others have made sound so commonplace.

Tumultuous Finale

How intensely dramatic he made the tumultuous finale, turning its bombast to something that had almost the mood of tragedy. This is the best movement Tchaikovsky wrote, and to it more than justice was done yesterday. The only fault to be found with the performance was a monotonous and excessive loudness, for which the scoring for orchestra rather than the conducting may be blamed.

Next week's concerts commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Haydn. The program includes both the first and the last of his 104 symphonies, and for good measure another symphony, and the concerto for violoncello, in which Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist. P. R.

Boston Symphony

Mon - Mar 26

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Mr. Ernst Toch, as guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contributed to its twentieth program his "Bunte" Suite, for its first American performance, and his Pianoforte Concerto op. 38, in which he was soloist. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony completed the list, performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 25.

To be exact, five of the six movements of the Suite were played. These tended to confirm the impression of the composer which was made by his concerto when it was introduced to Boston by Mr. J. M. Sanromá, three seasons ago. He is a writer of great facility, a master of the modern orchestra, who has been sensitive to the musical trends of his own time, both "serious" and popular. Professing filial devotion to Schönberg, he confesses, in the Adagio expressivo and the Galante Passacaglia of the Suite, to a fraternal sympathy with Alban Berg. These two movements are the most interesting musically of the five heard. They recall the gentler moments of "Wozzeck" even more than they do the "Glückliche Hand" or "Pierrot Lunaire." They hold interest by their contrapuntal texture, and they are impressive in the simple directness of their speech. The March Tempo, the Marionetten Tanz and the Karrusel, on the other hand, are amusing on a first hearing, but they are thematically barren and rhythmically monotonous. Their employment of some of the familiar devices of jazz no doubt helps the Suite on the radio, for which it was written.

Mr. Toch's piano technique was adequate to the demands of the solo part of the concerto. A second hearing brought to attention the Berg affiliation in the slow movement, and emphasized the Beethovenian scherzo methods of the Finale; but on the whole it convinced us no more than before that the work is destined to "rank among the great pianoforte concertos."

The orchestra played superbly throughout, and in the symphony the audience was stirred to stamping and shouts of approval. This symphony might have been written for Dr. Koussevitzky to play, and he has to his hand a body of musicians able to give him all he asks in tonal splendor and in flexibility. The result is one of the most exciting experiences of concertgoing.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Globe Mar 27

SYMPHONY HALL

Bach's B Minor Mass

Johann Sebastian Bach's great Mass in B Minor was performed in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society singing the choral parts, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing the instrumental portions. Dr Koussevitzky conducted. The concert was given to increase the pension fund of the orchestra.

The soloists yesterday were the four who appeared here last year when the mass proved the culmination of the Boston Symphony's Bach Festival: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

The Harvard singers had been trained by Dr Archibald T. Davison; the Radcliffe young women by G. Wallace Woodworth.

Bach's mass is not a setting of the Roman Catholic liturgy for ritualistic use. Bach was a Lutheran, in whose churches at that time the Kyrie Eleison and Gloria in Excelsis were sung in Latin as part of the office of communion, which the Lutherans held to be the most important feature of their main Sunday services. This ritual was called the "Missa" or Mass. The term, however, was ambiguous and limited, and had no reference whatever to the complete Roman mass.

Bach did not write his Mass in a burst of creative inspiration. It was composed over a period of years; the Kyrie and Gloria were written first, the Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei being added later. Indeed, portions of the Sanctus and the entire Agnus Dei were not written for the Mass, but were taken from other of Bach's church music.

The proportions of the work as it stands do not make for ritualistic use, for the Mass requires nearly three hours to perform, and demands a huge chorus, a good-sized orchestra and four expert soloists. Yesterday, as last year, it was performed in two parts; the first beginning at 4:30 in the afternoon, the second at 8:30 in the evening.

As an expression of devout worship and spiritual ardor, clothed in music of indescribable beauty and utterly amazing genius, this Mass stands out a peak over the terrain of musical art. It carries the listener beyond the condition of excited laudatory eloquence to the more meaningful state of silent wonder at its sublimity.

The forceful "Cum sancto spiritu," the ineffably soft and lovely "Et incarnatus est" and "Crucifixus," the poignant "Agnus dei" have perhaps a wholly unique sway over one's emo-

her part, and did not carry a score.

Only a portion of the audience probably realized fully the staggering amount of work and the enormous difficulties involved in preparing the Mass. But all seemed to realize that singers, players, and conductor had accomplished something extraordinary, for at the end of the performance there occurred one of the noisiest demonstrations one ever has heard in Symphony Hall. Handclapping, and stamping of feet for choruses, soloists, and especially Dr Koussevitzky, swelled to cheering when the conductor brought to the front of the platform Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth, the two men who had done the fundamental hard, uphill work of preparing the choral parts.

Ernest Toch Is Guest Artist With Symphony Orchestra

Mar 26

By MOSES SMITH

Amer

Ernest Toch, ultra-modern German composer, who has been for many people one of the hardest nuts to crack, is the guest at this week's Boston Symphony Concerts, where two of his recent works are performed, with the composer himself as piano soloist in one of them.

The opening number is the Bunte Suite, played at yesterday's concert for the first time in America. The word Bunte means "motley," "vari-colored," and so forth. The five movements played yesterday are in several styles—a march, an expressive slow movement, a marionettes' dance, a passacaglia and a "carousal." It was this last movement, infectiously jazzy and exciting, which accounted for the enthusiasm of the audience, for one of the most favorable receptions a new work has received here in years.

The music was not merely entertaining, however. It was constructed with technical sureness; in the slow movement it disclosed a melodist of the first water, and all the movements, contrasted as they were, were marked by something rare in contemporary composition—a definitive personal style. More serious in subject-matter was the piano concerto which followed, introduced here three years ago by Jesus Maria Sanromá. Toch, who is largely self made as pianist, acquitted himself nobly in the excruciatingly difficult music he had set down for others to play. He had mechanical dexterity and sureness, and a touch not ordinarily associated with home-made virtuosi.

The orchestral performance of both works under Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to us notably sympathetic, though perhaps it might be more tactful to leave this to the composer. At any rate there was no questioning the brilliance of the performance of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, which ended the concert. This work has long been regarded as one of the Russian conductor's tours de force, but the audience outdid itself in its applause.

Herald MUSIC Mar 27

BACH'S B-MINOR MASS

Yesterday afternoon's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, being devoted to a performance of Bach's monumental B-minor Mass, was divided into two sessions—beginning at 4:30 P. M. and 8:30 P. M., respectively, and separated by an intermission of two hours and a half. The work was presented in similar fashion last year, during Dr. Koussevitzky's Bach festival. Yesterday the orchestra was again assisted by the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society; and once more the soloists were Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. The instrumental solos, for violin, flute, oboe d'amore and horn, were performed by Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Speyer, Devergie and Boettcher, of the orchestra. Albert Snow was organist.

It seems clear that the B-minor Mass has never been used as a whole for ritual purposes, and that it was not even intended for such use. It is neither a Lutheran "Missa," in the restricted sense (Kyrie and Gloria) in which Bach habitually and legitimately used the term, nor, despite its Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei, is it truly a Roman Catholic High Mass (as C. P. E. Bach not unnaturally termed it), for it has peculiarities, both in its text and in other respects, that unfit it for use in connection with the Roman ritual. Terry regards it as an expression of Bach's Christian idealism, neither Protestant nor Catholic, and in its unusual structure he sees a characteristic impulse to complete a design.'

But in appreciating the work and the manner of its performance it is hardly necessary to have come to a decision as to its origin, nor to lay stress upon the well known fact that several of its movements were borrowed and adapted by Bach from his cantatas. Though there are portions of the Mass which are, to modern ears, inexpressive and undistinguished musically, and achieve a certain force only through the richness and solidity of their contrapuntal texture, yet its finest sections, from the poignantly tragic Kyrie Eleison, Qui Tollis, and Crucifixus to the brilliant and jubilant Gloria, Sanctus, or Osanna, have an emotional power which is by turns moving and exhilarating, and a purely musical beauty, nobility, or sheer ingenuity that excites wonder.

The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, admirably trained by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, were superbly adequate to their difficult task. Here and there, as in the opening Kyrie, were passages too ploddingly intoned, but in general the choral work was of remarkable verve and precision, and often of very great beauty—as in the marvelous Crucifixus, with its infinitely quiet close.

The soloists, too, acquitted themselves, on the whole, excellently. Mme. Evans' voice, which, though strained and brittle in its higher register, is inherently of fine quality, traversed easily enough her florid music. Mme. Matzenauer, her ample voice in fine fettle, set an admirable example of accomplished, smooth, expressive singing, both in her beautiful solos Qui Sedes and Agnus Dei, and in her duets with the soprano. Mr. Crooks used his fine voice with restraint, reserving his full tones for special occasions, and even then using them with moderation. His Benedictus was sung expressively with tenderly beautiful tone. Mr. Gange, though occasionally hampered by low notes which are not of great volume, sang with his usual intelligence and conviction.

The orchestra's accompaniment was finely done; its soloists played excellently. For all the performers, and for Dr. Koussevitzky, who directed them with inspired energy and sense of effect, there was most enthusiastic and prolonged applause. Soloists and conductor were compelled to return to the platform repeatedly. Orchestra and chorus were brought to their feet.

There was a very large audience.

S. S.

BACH'S MASS FOR FUND

Post - Mar 27

Work Given in Two Sections at Symphony Hall

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The performance of Bach's Mass in B minor at the hands of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which formed the climax of last season's Bach Festival at Symphony Hall, was repeated yesterday at the orchestra's second concert in aid of its pension fund. The soloists on this second occasion were those of the other performance: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Five members of the orchestra also had their names listed on the programme as solo performers: Mr. Burgin and Mr. Boettcher, who respectively provided violin and horn obbligati; Mr. Speyer and Mr. Debergie, who played solo parts for the oboe d'amore, and Mr. Snow, the organist. Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted and inspired the whole.

As before, the Mass was given in two portions, from 4:30 until 6 in the afternoon and from 8:30 until 10 in the evening. It so happens that the Credo, Sanctus and Agnus Dei, which made the second part, are on the whole more sustained in inspiration and interest, more grateful to the performers, than the Kyrie and Gloria that made the first. In the evening one or the other of the solo singers was heard to better advantage than in the afternoon, and the chorus, which had already seemed more secure in its task than was the case a year ago, quite outdid itself in the evening. Despite the unevenness of the Mass, an unevenness that lies chiefly in the general superiority of the choral passages to the solo parts, the net impression is of an exalted music.

Until Dr. Koussevitzky revived it a year ago the work had gone long unheard in Boston, surely a situation to be deplored, and the repetition of it yesterday was thrice welcome.

At the end of the afternoon session and again at the close of the evening diversion there was enthusiastic applause for all concerned from the audience which filled the hall, and it was gratifying again to behold the evidence of appreciation and affection on the part of the Radcliffe chorus and the Harvard Glee Club for their respective conductors, Mr. Woodworth and Dr. Davison, when Dr. Koussevitzky personally escorted them to the platform to receive their share of the plaudits.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

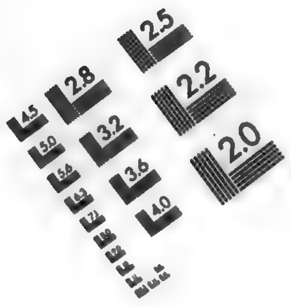
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

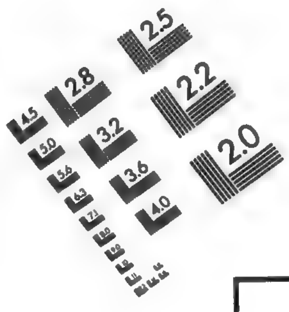
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890



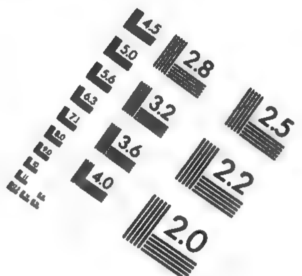
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0

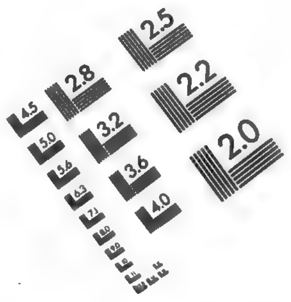
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



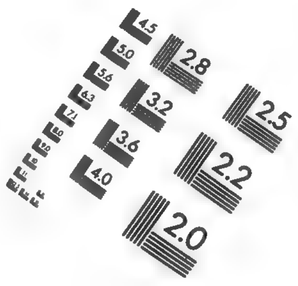
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

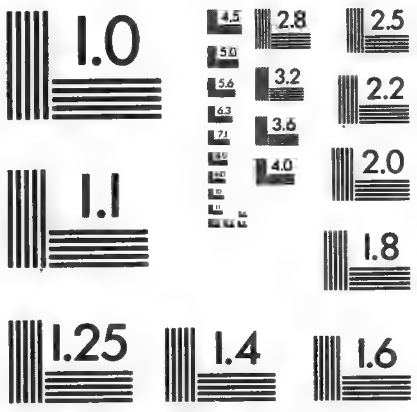


2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
2.0
4.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
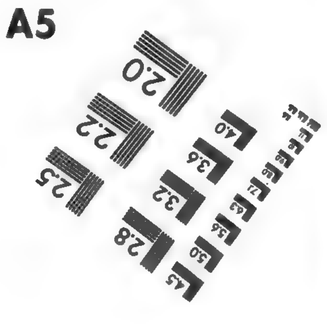
2.5 mm

A5

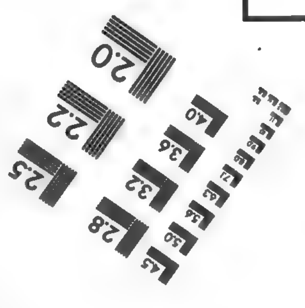


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8

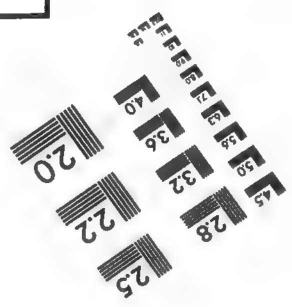
4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



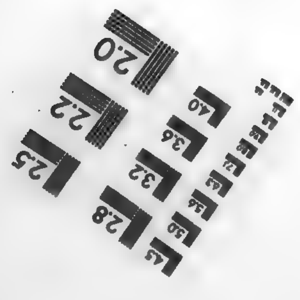
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8



4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8

4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Two Centuries Gathered on the Head of the First Master of the Classic Symphony

The Music-Master in a Prince's House Whom a Wider World Discovered And Acclaimed

FOR several months the centers of music in Europe have been busy with plans for celebrating the second centenary of the birth of Franz Joseph Haydn. In Vienna, in Berlin, in London, they will render homage to the man who may justly be called the creator of the string quartet and the symphony.

Haydn played a tremendous part in the history of music. Even in his own lifetime he had aroused the admiration of all Europe. The most illustrious of his contemporaries sought his advice. Mozart made him his friend, his guide, and, so to speak, his inspiration. Beethoven submitted patiently to his lessons. Joseph Haydn has only too many claims upon our gratitude.

The composer who caused such a stir in his own time that kings and princes were proud to have his acquaintance, was the son of a wheelwright and a cook. The second of twelve children, Franz Joseph Haydn was born March 31, 1732, at Rohrau, a little village in Lower Austria near the Hungarian frontier. His two young brothers, Johann Michael and Johann Evangelist, devoted themselves to music also, but without success. One of his sisters, Anna Maria, married a blacksmith named Philipp Fröhlich and the other a musketeer by the name of Naeher.

* * *

From his tenderest years Franz Joseph revealed such a musical bent that his cousin, Johann Matthias Frankh, a tutor and kapellmeister, wished to keep the boy with him. He took him to Hainburg and, although he was himself unschooled, took charge of the lad's education. By a stroke of luck, Johann George Reuter the younger, composer to the imperial court and choirmaster of the Cathedral of St. Stephen at Vienna, chanced to pass through Hainburg. His interest was aroused by the "feeble but agreeable" voice of Franz Joseph.

Engaged as a choir boy in the service of the Cathedral of Vienna, Haydn left for the Austrian capital. Reuter soon turned the boy over to the care of his assistant choirmaster, Adam Gegenbauer, and a tenor, Ignaz Finsterbusch. These two taught him the first principles of singing and of the clavecin and the violin. For a number of years the young Haydn was able to study at his leisure the sacred compositions of George Reuter, Fux, Caldaro, Matteo Palotta, and Giuseppe Bonno, which he was performing. To gain a little spending money he gave concerts with his comrades in the public square or served as an "extra" at court banquets where a symphony orchestra was called for. When his voice began to change, he was obliged to leave the service of St. Stephen's. He was without resources. A summer spent as a strolling musician did not lighten his misery. He even dreamed of taking holy orders "to make certain of having something to eat every day."

Already Haydn was composing minuets for wind orchestras. In spite of everything, he stuck to his musical vocation. He fought off poverty. A lace-maker with whom he was acquainted lent him one day a hundred and fifty florins. He was saved. Installed in the garret of a house in which Metastasio and Porpora were then living, he wrote at the age of twenty the music for a comedy, "The New Devil-upon-Two-Sticks." Fortune did not smile upon him at once. The play by Josef Kurz was forbidden by the censor after the first performance.

While he studied the treatises of Fux and Mattheson, as well as the new sonatas of Philipp Emmanuel Bach, Haydn taught music to children. By this means he gained entrance to the house of his celebrated neighbor Metastasio, where he became acquainted with Porpora. It was his ambition to be initiated into "the veritable principles of musical science" by the Neapolitan professor. In her story of "Consuelo" George Sand has told how poor Haydn turned lackey to Porpora so as to get his lessons.

Fortune began to smile upon him. Recommended by Fürnberg, for whom he had composed his first eighteen string quartets, Haydn entered the household of the Count Morzin in the capacity of "composer and director of music," at the annual stipend of two hundred florins. His "kapell" included a dozen or fifteen musicians to whom he confided the execution of divertisements and of little symphonies of his own composing. Dismissed by Count Morzin, he was finally called under the title of vice-kapellmeister, to the service of Prince Paul Antoine Esterhazy at the Château of Eisenstadt, a few miles outside of Vienna. Like the domestic servants, Haydn was obliged to take livery and to wait in attendance in the antechamber before and after meals in order to receive the orders of the master. He was to remain in the service of the Esterhazy family until he had reached the age of fifty-eight years.

* * *

While he was still music-director for Count Morzin, Haydn had given clavecin lessons to two daughters of a wigmaker by the name of Keller. He fell in love with the younger and decided to marry her. Unhappily the young girl had resolved to enter a nunnery. Like Mozart with the Webers, Haydn fell back upon the older sister who was not altogether to his liking. On November 26, 1760, he was united to Anna Maria Keller. She was three years older than he. Her sour disposition troubled the musician's whole life. Through more than twenty years he bore without a murmur the tirades of this shrew. In 1779 he became acquainted with the singer Luigia Polzelli. They promised each other marriage in writing, as soon as they should both be free. The Polzelli's husband died at the end of ten years. Haydn did not cease to correspond with the widow and to respond favorably to her demands for money. In 1800 Haydn's wife, in turn, disappeared. The Polzelli chose to marry a singer, Luigi Franchi. So far as his biographers are aware, this is the only love episode—and a somewhat derisory one at that—in the whole of Haydn's life.

But as a matter of fact the composer, purely ingenuous by nature, extremely simple in his mode of living, was impassioned only by his art. Knowledge of other branches of study, of other means of artistic expression, was entirely lacking in him. Life during the long sojourns which he had under the roof of his masters passed in one unvarying rhythm. Haydn wrote out his scores in the morning. He rehearsed them in the afternoon, and in the evening he performed them. In this way he quietly accumulated pieces of chamber music, religious compositions, symphonies, scores for opera-bouffes and serious operas. Isolated works—all of them—familiar in style, written behind closed doors, domestic music, so to speak, music for the study. The performers, captivated by the good nature of the Kapellmeister, never called him anything but Papa Haydn. Yet his fame, local at first, grew and spread. Young musicians used to come to Esterhazy to receive instruction from the good man. Georges Distler, Niemecz Ignace Pleyel, Anton Rosetti, Paul Wranitzky were the first disciples of the Austrian master. Later on the title of "pupil of Haydn' was eagerly sought. Beethoven, Lessel, Neukomm, Seyfried, J. B. Kolb and G. A. Walter aspired in turn to obtain the cachet which would constitute a sort of guaranty with connoisseurs and the public.

Haydn succeeded only rarely in escaping from the domain where he was held prisoner. Each year he spent a scant two or three months at Vienna. During this short time he was able at least to familiarize himself with the principal new compositions of his fellow-composers and to measure the reputation which he had himself acquired. On the occasion of the celebration given in honor of the Grand Duke Paul of Russia, Mozart and Haydn entered into close partnership. Mozart had studied deeply the works of his elder. In 1785 he dedicated six quartets to Haydn. Apparently the two great composers themselves interpreted them. At the house of the composer, Storace, Haydn, Mozart, Dittersdorf and Wanhal played in a quartet in which Mozart took the viola part and Haydn the second violin. Here was an unparalleled moment in the history of music, and one which all lovers of the art might well wish to have shared.

* * *

Beyond quetion, . Haydn influenced Mozart. On the other hand, Mozart, throughout his life, and especially after his death, exercised a sort of sway over the mind of Haydn. The old master had divined the genius of Mozart. In 1787 he had written to Roth, a prominent functionary at Prague, where "Don Juan" had just been presented: "It would be difficult for anyone- no matter what his talent, to place himself beside Mozart. That is why I should like to be able to impress the value of Mozart's inimitable works of art upon all amateurs—and especially all patrons—of music. Soon nations will be disputing for the possession of such a treasure. Prague should hold on to so precious a man. Prague should reward him; for without reward the life of a great genius is a sad one and gives little encouragement to posterity to carry on his work." Everyone knows the generous welcome which Prague gave to Mozart. It is certain that such forceful and lucid recommendations as Haydn's played their part in evoking the tribute of admiration which the people of Prague heaped upon the composer of "Don Juan."

It has been claimed that Haydn's scores were issued for the first time by a French publisher. But the works of the master of Rohrau circulated publicly in manuscript for many years. In 1781 Le Gros, an intelligent concert manager, conceived the notion of linking in a single program at Paris the "Stabat Mater" of Haydn with that of Pergolesi. The success of the first, apparently, was hardly less striking than that of the second. Paris was, at that time, the leading musical capital of the world. Even Vienna was of no more than second importance.

In 1787 Haydn was invited by King Ferdinand IV to come to Naples. He could not make up his mind to accept. In 1790, after the death of Prince Nicolas Esterhazy, Haydn, then sixty-eight years old, set out for London. He had signed a contract with the violinist-impresario Salomon. His fame had preceded him to the British capital. Esteemed as guest of great importance, Haydn was received at court and in the houses of the great. He was invited to preside at the meetings of all the principal musical societies. The concerts which he gave were attended with enthusiasm. London heard the first performance of his "Seven Words of Christ." Although he came into conflict with his not altogether loyal pupil, Ignace Pleyel, Haydn on this occasion received the homage he merited.

By a long and gradual ascent, he was attaining his honors at last. Three illustrious painters vied with each other to paint his portrait. Poems were dedicated to him. Wreaths and gifts showered upon him. Moreover, he could hear in London the great oratorios of Handel which had a profound effect on his own works. In his supreme productions, "The Creation" and "The Seasons," it is evident that Handel's influence had seized hold on him. In 1794, the aging master was to make a second and no less happy visit to London. But he refused offers made to him to move to the capital of the United Kingdom. He returned finally to Vienna.

* * *

Mozart and Gluck had just passed on. Beethoven, at the age of thirty, was as yet misunderstood. Haydn by himself was the incarnation of the musical glory of all Germany. He was sought out by the most notable of his contemporaries. Upon his return from London they had erected to him, in his own lifetime, a public statue not far from his natal village. His renown had finally made itself felt on the French public, too. On Dec. 24, 1800, "The Creation" was performed at the Opéra in the presence of the first consul, Bonaparte. A commemorative medal in Haydn's likeness was struck for this occasion and sent to the great Austrian composer. They played his works in all the capitals of Europe. Simple and direct by nature, Haydn at last came into a sense of his real importance. He passed his last years surrounded by marks of the admiration of the world. But he was not too much lifted up; he preserved an air of good-natured patriarchy.

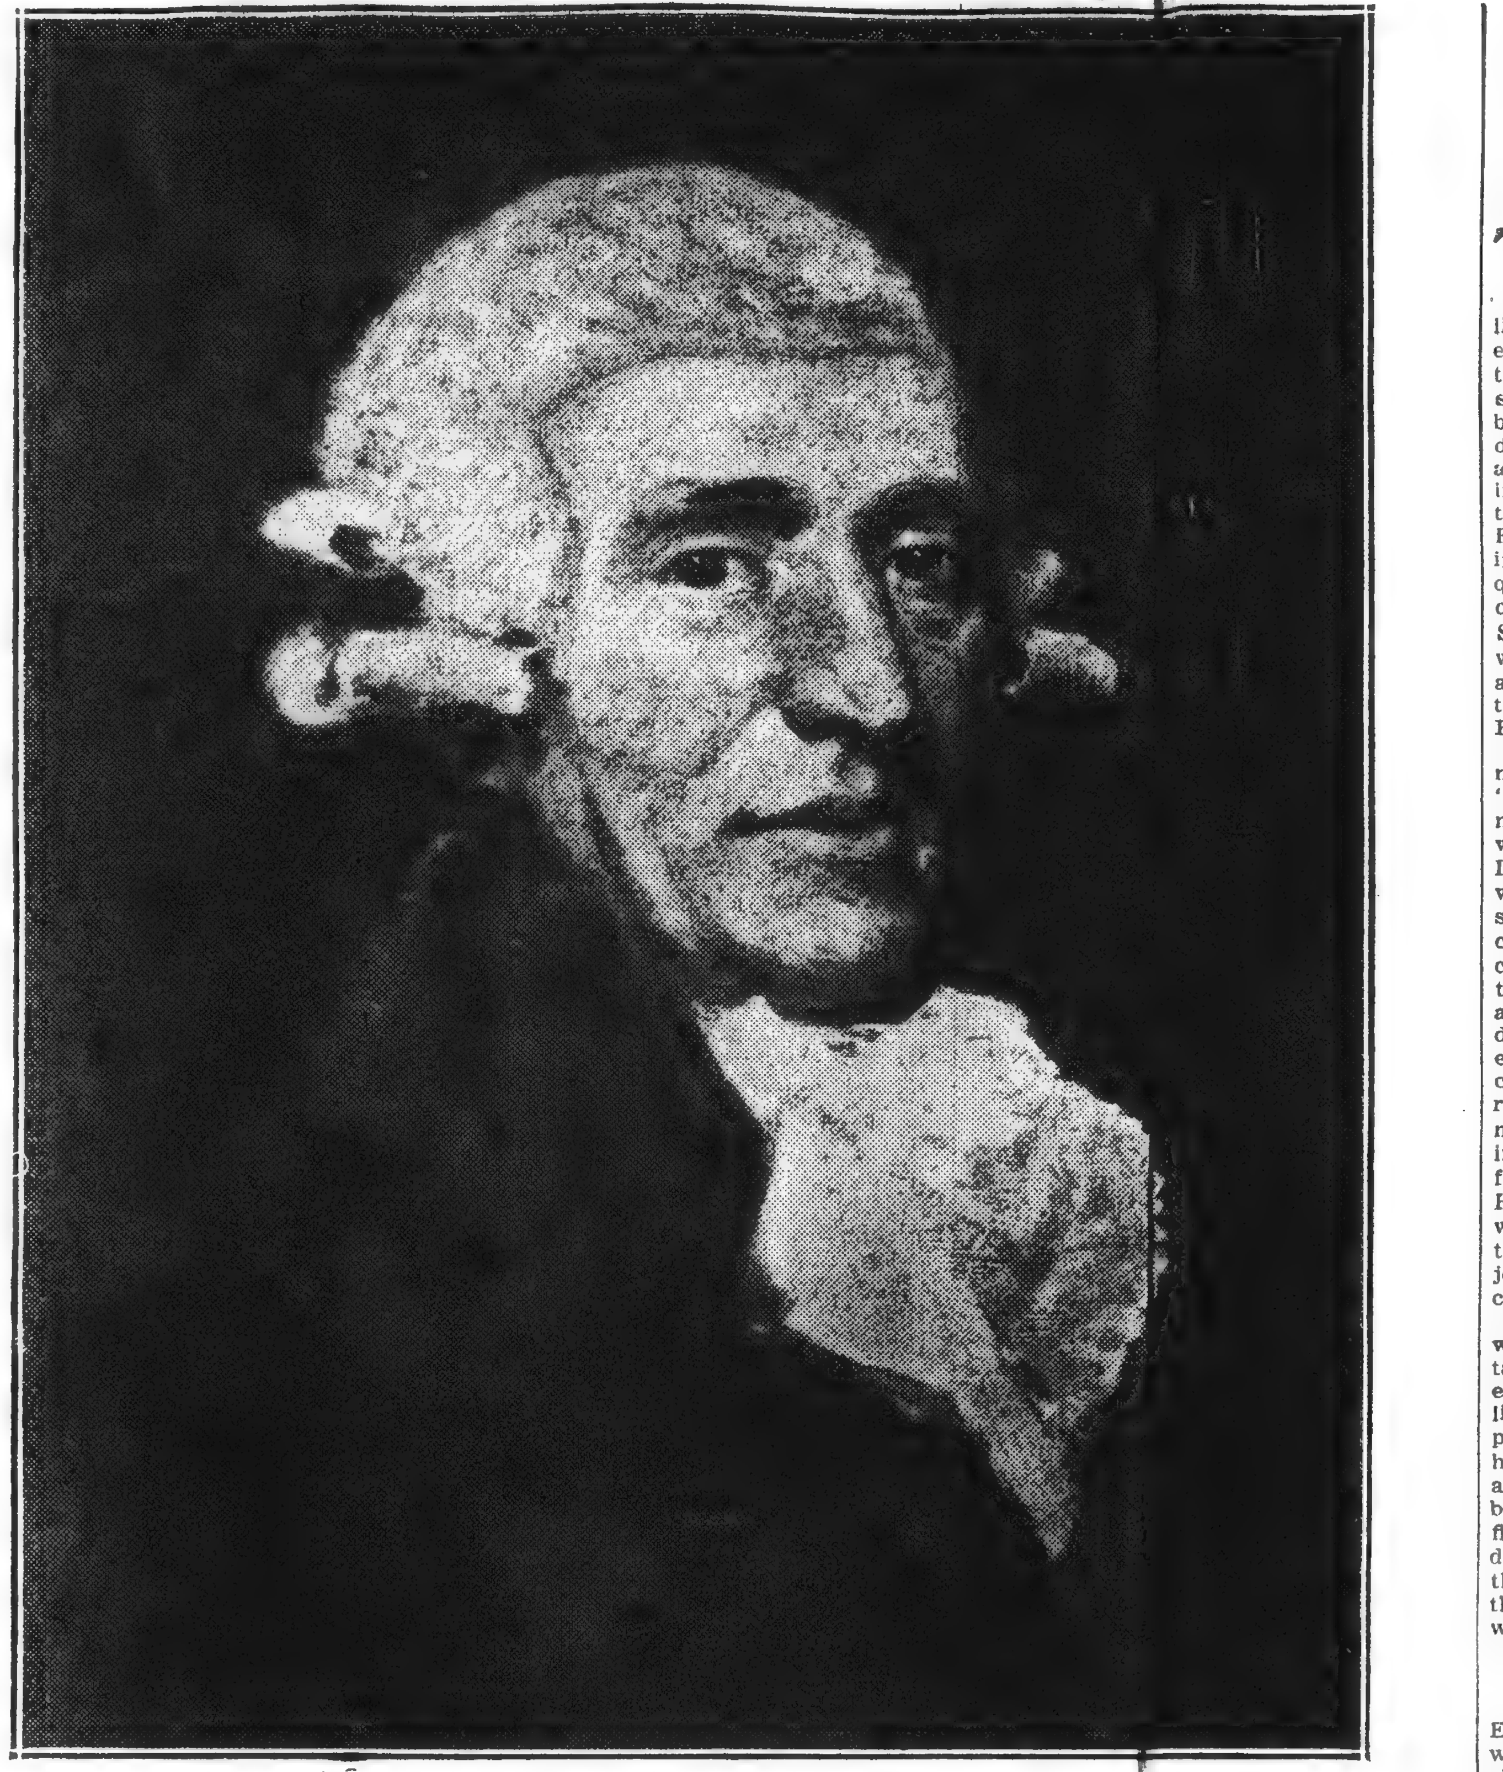
On May 10, 1809, a victorious French army entered Vienna. Haydn was confined to his bed. An officer of the Napoleonic forces came to pay him a visit of respect. The officer even sat down at the piano and sang to the wondering old man Uriel's aria from "The Creation." Haydn, touched to tears, embraced the French soldier who, even in those terrible days, could thus show the degree of civilization of which his country was capable. A few days later, on May 31, 1809, Joseph Haydn died. He had earned the reward of his constancy.

The work of Haydn is so considerable that it it is really impossible to cover all its extent or to study it in detail or even to outline it briefly. As many as 149 symphonies have been atributed to him although we have preserved for us only 104 authentic examples. In the long list of Haydn's compositions we also find 77 string quartets, 38 piano trios, 30 string trios, 15 trios for wind instruments, 52 piano sonatas, four sonatas for piano and violin, 50 concertos and symphonic pieces for divers instruments, 80 dance compositions for orchestra, a score or so of operas and operettas, several pieces for marionettes, innumerable religious pieces, seven oratorios, and nobody knows how many lesser compositions worth cataloguing. It is difficult to estimate justly all the teeming output. At any rate, music has gained by so vast an effort. But we cannot let ourselves be carried away into a study of all the individual works to which Joseph Haydn devoted his life.

The soul of moderation, judicious, discriminating and clear-minded, always alert, he carried to new heights one of the noblest forms of human recreation. In a vein less pure than that of Mozart, less impassioned than that of Beethoven, he injected even into his lighter compositions his own flavor, his balanced and sustained technic, his high spirits, his clear and penetrating inspiration, and his liveliness of impression, as well as a mysterious feeling for the sublime. Beset by qualms, he aspired secretly to grandeur in some of his work. Despite his humility and despite the fact that he was devoted to an habitual type of beauty, he was in truth a forerunner; he opened large perspectives on the future of music. To the symphony, a form for which he set definite laws and the language of which he improved, he brought circumstantial reforms. He introduced into it his love of nature, his genius for description. All composers who have followed have walked in his footsteps. We may say that he spoke as by instinct the language of music. By virtue of his lively and somewhat naive erudition, his probity, his frankness, and his serenity of mind and soul, he revealed in his works a really moral atmosphere. We may describe his lyrical landscapes by the same words which Taine applied to the poetic landscapes of Milton: They are both equally "schools of virtue." His spirit endures and increases.

HENRY MALHERBE

[Translated from Le Temps by D. W. B.]



Franz Joseph Haydn

From the Portrait by Hoppner, Painted During the Composer's Stay in London. For the Print and for Other Assistance in the Preparation of This Page, The Transcript Is Indebted to the Brown Music-Room of the Public Library, R. G. Appel, Assistant in Charge.

"Matchless Haydn"

Dr. Burney's Laurel Leaf for the Composer's Brow

THE admirable and matchless Haydn!" wrote Dr. Burney, while the composer was yet alive, "from whose productions I have received more pleasure in my life, when tired of most other music, than I have ever received in the most ignorant and rapturous part of my youth, when everything was new and the disposition to be pleased undiminished by criticism or satiety. There is a general cheerfulness and good humor in Haydn's Allegros, which exhilarate every hearer. But his Adagios are sublime in ideas and the harmony in which they are clad, that though played by inarticulate instruments, they have a more pathetic effect on my feeling than the finest opera air united with the most exquisite poetry."

Haydn's Days and Nights in London

HAYDN was an honored composer in England long before he became a visitor; but his two stays among us greatly increased his popularity, and also gave it a personal touch that is not without effect even today. Haydn in the seclusion of Esterhaz, doing his job as professional composer with a diligence and fecundity that remind us of Bach, is an attractive but somewhat remote figure. Haydn in Hanover Square is one of ourselves. The personal touch counts for a lot, no matter how high our brow:

> Ah, did you once see Shelley plain,
> And did he stop and speak to you?
> And did you speak to him again?
> How strange it seems, and new!

And it is pleasant to reflect that one's great-grandfather may have been among the audience at Hanover Square Rooms during those six consecutive Friday evenings in the spring of 1791, when "Mr. Haydn" was "at the Harpsichord," having "composed for every night a new piece of music." The link is slight and fanciful, but it counts.

Most composers of the past who have visited England have done so in their youth—naturally, for the journey from the Continent a century ago was apt to intimidate such of the elderly as were sensitive in nerves or stomach. For a Haydn, nearing his sixtieth year, who had spent the greater part of his life within the radius of a few miles, it was a project so formidable as to cause a head-shaking among his friends. Mozart specially made no bones about expressing his concern.

It is easy to understand Haydn's desire to come to England. Prince Nicholas Esterházy had died a few months before, and Haydn was now his own master, after having been for twenty-eight years in the position of a superior kind of domestic servant.

* * *

The financial bait was substantial, too. When a stranger turned up early in December, 1790, and said to Haydn, "I am Salomon of London: I have come to fetch you," and proceeded to offer a fee of three hundred pounds for an opera, three hundred pounds for six symphonies, two hundred pounds for twenty shorter pieces, a guarantee of two hundred pounds for a benefit concert (actually the concert produced three hundred and fifty pounds), with a fat deposit as a security and an advance for traveling expenses, the matter was soon settled.

Haydn and Salomon left Vienna on Dec. 15, 1790, and crossed the Channel on New Year's day. Does any reader possess a copy of a picture of Haydn on board? It is mentioned in Michael Brenet's "Haydn: His Life," as being by a painter unnamed, but described as "modern" (i. e., not contemporary with Haydn); and it depicts the composer in "strange garments and in a theatrical attitude on deck"; a number of women are shown terror-struck while a storm rages, and thick clouds are riven with lightning. The actual facts are that there was no storm; and, indeed, there was so little wind that the boat lost time at the start. The journey was done in nine hours, with no terrors, and probably with the minimum of internal upheavals.

It is odd that no English poet seems to have burst into a song of welcome. But

Light Record of His Heyday Of Work, Honor, Wealth And Vogue

poets generally have been more concerned with music in a vague sort of way than with musicians. (Think of Dr. Johnson's queestions concerning John Christian Bach: "Pray, sir, who is this Bach? Is he a piper?") It was left for a musician to turn poet for the occasion, Burney achieving the following:

> Welcome, great master, to our favour'd Isle,
> Already partial to thy name and style;
> Long may thy fountain of invention run
> In streams as rapid as it first begun;
> While skill for each fantastic whim privides,
> And certain science ev'ry current guides!
> Oh, may thy days, from human sufferings free,
> Be blest with glory and felicity!
> With full fruition to a distant hour,
> Of all thy magic and creative pow'r!
> Blest in thyself, with rectitude of mind,
> And blessing, with thy talents, all mankind!

which is neither better nor worse than such things are wont to be, even when written by real poets.

* * *

Old programs have an interest of their own; here is that of the opening concert of the six for which Haydn was engaged:

PART FIRST

Overture—Rosetti.
Song, Signor Tajana.
Concerto Oboe, Mr. Harrington.
Song, Signora Storace.
Concerto Violin, Madame Gautherot.
Recitative e Aria, Signor David.

PART SECOND

New Grand Overture—Haydn.
Recitative e Aria, Signora Storace.
Concertante Pedal Harp and Piano Forte,
Mad. Krumpholtz and Mr. Dusseck.
Rondo, Signor David.
Full Piece—Kozeluch.

Mr. Haydn will be at the Harpsichord.
Leader of the Band, Mr. Salomon.

Tickets transferable, as usual, Ladies to Ladies, and Gentlemen to Gentlemen only. The Ladies' tickets are Green, the Gentlemen's Black.

The Door in the Square is for Chairs only.

"New Grand Overture," meant the Symphony written for the occasion—No. 1 of the "Salomon" Set.

The Morning Chronicle of the next day ends its eulogy with a hint that later took definite shape: "We are happy to see the concert so well attended the first night; for we cannot suppress our very anxious hopes, that the first musical genius of the age may be induced, by our liberal welcome, to take up his residence in England."

Having quoted from the notice of the opening concert of Haydn's first visit, I pass to the second series, in order to give one of the oddest examples of musical criticism ever written. It appeared (appropriately) in The Oracle of Feb. 11, 1794, under the caption "Salomon's Concert": Opening Night:

> We must of necessity be brief. And after all it may be best, when the chef d'oeuvre of the great Haydn is the subject.
>
> "Come then, expressive SILENCE, muse his praise."
>
> Viotti gave a concerto, simple and affecting, like his genius. Mara sang c'est assez dire.

A good way out of the difficulty, when one is hard up for something to say!

This same journal distinguished itself during Haydn's former visit by suggesting a new "programme" for the "Surprise" Symphony: "Act 2d opened with a first performance of the Grand Overture composed by Haydn for this evening. The second movement was equal to the happiest of this great Master's conceptions. The surprise might not be unaptly likened to the situation of a beautiful Shepherdess, who, lulled to slumber by the murmur of a distant Waterfall, starts alarmed by the unexpected firing of a Fowling-piece. The flute obbligato was delicious."

* * *

One point that will strike those of us who read more complete accounts of Haydn's English visits than can be given here, is the realization of the composer's greatness by the English musical public of that day. Haydn had not yet been nicknamed "Papa," and it was still possible to write of him without dragging in are word "genial." Both labels are perhaps responsible for the modern tendency to regard one of the most profoundly accomplished of composers as merely a kind of amiable old buffer. The easy flow and certainty of touch that seem so unpremeditated came from hard work. For years he ground away with the severest of textbooks — Marpurg, Fux, and the rest of the contrapuntists who managed to be of service to the greatest composers of a great period.

Another reason for our doing less justice to Haydn than was done him by Londoners of a century ago is inevitable. His reputation was made before Mozart burst upon the scene; and Beethoven was still a lad. Today Haydn is too often regarded casually on the one hand as an inferior kind of Mozart and on the other as a mere forerunner of Beethoven. And now that the critics have discovered that Mozart was "daimonic" (evidences of which they find in all sorts of mild passages) Haydn has suffered still further. It is to be hoped that the bicentenary will give us an opportunity of forming a fairer estimate than has been general during recent years.

FESTE

[Reprinted from The Musical Times, London]

For Haydn

The Memorial Program Next Week at the Symphony Concerts

Symphony, No. 1, in D major: Haydn's First Symphony, composed in 1759.

Symphony, No. 104, in D major: Haydn's Last Symphony, composed in 1795.

Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra.

(Violoncellist: Mr. Piatigorsky)

Symphony, No. 103, in E-flat minor: The Symphony "with the drum-roll."

The Composer Joining the Past of the Bachs to the Present of Mozart And Beethoven

THE genius of Franz Joseph Haydn had long been smouldering before the death of Bach and Handel; it burst into flame during the lifetime of Mozart, and attained its fullest expression before Beethoven had written his first symphony. That Haydn's seventy-seven years should have embraced portions of these great lives, indeed the whole of one of them, is itself a dubious merit, but for those who are interested in his more worthy distinctions, the fact is of peculiar significance. For the "father of instrumental music," if that appellation still holds without question, though living contemporaneously for eighteen years with Johann Sebasian, and for twenty-seven years with the composer of "The Messiah," appointed himself disciple of neither of these figures, but of Philipp Emanuel Bach, the third son of Johann Sebastian.

Haydn's admiration for his chosen master is expressed in his own words,—"I did not leave the clavier till I had mastered all his six sonatas, and those who know me well must be aware that I owe very much to Emanuel Bach, whose works I understand and have thoroughly studied. Emanuel Bach himself once complimented me on this fact." His choice has been explained as being due to the type of music which Haydn learned and loved as a child. He had heard dance music and popular songs since his earliest days, and these he wished to cultivate, to embody in the complex and refined art of symphonic and quartet music. P. E. Bach had already advanced in this direction, and he, rather than his father, is the immediate precursor of Haydn. The older Bach, like Handel, was concerned essentially with the contrapuntal treatment of these musical subjects within the massive proportions of choral and organ music.

It is fruitless to speculate on the course which instrumental music would have taken had Haydn preferred to continue entirely along the lines of a well-established choral counterpoint and of polyphonic music in general. As it was, his influence on Beethoven, and hence on all succeeding instrumental music, was basic and profound; with Mozart, the influence was reciprocal,—intensified, no doubt, by the cordial sympathy which the two men felt toward each other until their intimate and affectionate friendship was ended by Mozart's early death.

* * *

The functions of kapellmeister at the Esterhazy estates were as varied as they were difficult to perform, since they included not only the directing of all musical performances, and sole control of the whole musical establishment, but in addition the further obligation of composing music at the command of his serene highness to whose employment alone the compositions should be available. Frequent performances of every sort demanded orchestral, operatic and chamber rehearsals daily, notwithstanding the further duties of maintaining a choir for the private chapel, and training a chorus for concerts and operas. Haydn's ability to play on several instruments was put to good use by instructing his subordinates individually. That such accommodations expected of him should fail to promote the realization of his highest aspirations as a composer needs hardly to be mentioned, and yet it was not by the excess duties of kapellmeister that Haydn's fullest development was hindered. Substantially, the circumstances in which he found himself for a period of over thirty years were favorable to the exigencies of his creativeness. Not only was he living in comfort at the palace, but he was in possession of a very good orchestra which he used materially for his own advantage as a composer. "I not only had the encouragement of constant approval," he said, "but as conductor of an orchestra I could make experiments, observe what produced an effect and what weakened it, and was thus in a condition to improve, alter, make additions and omissions, and be as bold as I pleased."

Yet the symphonies which he produced during this period are much inferior to those written later during his two visits to London. His natural endowments and his expressive powers were obstructed by the limited tastes of his Esterhazy audience. The guests of his noble patron were selected only from the aristocracy, and their judgments, though exerting a refining influence on his style, undoubtedly checked what would otherwise have been a spontaneous outflow of his originality. When Salomon, late in 1790, arranged for him to visit London, where he was twice engaged to write new symphonies and other compositions, Haydn was freed from the limitations of his illustrious audience, and received fresh stimulation from the wider perceptions of his English public. The change was entirely profitable. Twelve of his finest symphonies, numbering over a hundred in all, were composed during his London engagements, the popular "Surprise," "Clock," and "Military" symphonies being among them.

* * *

It should be remembered that many of what are now considered Haydn's greatest achievements were not the direct product of inspiration, the effluence of creative impulse finding inevitable expression irrespective of time and circumstance, but were composed and performed solely under contract, frequently for specific occasions. This method of production was not unusual at that period, though today it would probably be condemned as "selling" one's art. Among his quantities of compositions Haydn apparently realized great discrepancies in value, for, as the story goes, he answered George III who said to him, "Doctor Haydn, you have composed much," by remarking modestly, "Yes, Sire, a little more than was wise." He did not, in fact, write with such rapidity as it generally attributed to him, nor was he more lacking in self criticism than in discrimination. Whereas Handel, as is said, wrote "The Messiah" in twenty-four days, Haydn spent nearly eighteen months on "The Creation," and in later years he intimated that he was never completely satisfied with it. In 1799 he wrote to his publishers—"As for myself, now an old man, I hope the critics may not handle my "Creation" with too great severity and be too hard on it. They may perhaps find the musical orthography faulty in various passages and perhaps other things also which I have for so many years been accustomed to consider as minor points; but the genuine connoisseur will see the real cause as well as I do, and will willingly cast aside such stumbling blocks."

Haydn's sincerity, his ardent enthusiasm and his definite opinions on musical subjects, directed him toward the paths which he eventually pursued. In spite of his superfluous production of seemingly uninspired music, he was zealous in carrying out his own ideas, in developing those aspects of music which appealed to him above all as being beautiful or capable of becoming so through his treatment. His fondness for melody is explicit in nearly all he has written and this fact may be more responsible than we imagine for the change which took place in music at the end of the eighteenth century, viz., a gradual surplanting of the older polyphonic style of instrumental music by a more essentially melodic and harmonic form. Melody was indeed coming into its own and Haydn was one of the first to realize the simple beauty which it contains. "It is the air which is the charm of music," he said, "and it is that which is most difficult to produce. The invention of a fine melody is a work of genius." Beauty perceived, Haydn, inevitably held before him as his solitary criterion. He disregarded arbitrary rules wherever they interfered with what seemed to him to be beautiful, for "the educated ear is the sole authority" in these things.

Yet Haydn had his own method of composing according to rule, and he criticized those who in their easiness failed to accomplish unified and symmetrical results. "I was never a quick writer," he says of himself, "that is where so many young composers fail: they string together a number of fragments; they break off almost as soon as they have begun, and so at the end, the listener carries away no definite impression." Music, he felt, never achieves its purpose if no impression is made on the listener, and Haydn as a listener was aware of his own violent reactions. Of his susceptibility to the disturbing effects of his own compositions, Haydn reports one instance—"I was cold as ice one moment and seemed on fire the next." At a performance of "The Messiah" in Westminster Abbey, at which he sat near the king's box, the whole audience rose when the "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung, and Haydn wept like a child, declaring "Handel is the master of us all!" Haydn was indeed as gifted in imaginative power as he was in artistic ability, and if his music today appears to be sometimes merely pleasant, or even trivial, it must not be forgotten that he paved the way for perhaps greater geniuses, making possible by his own achievements the more subtle and profound expression of their immense ideas. Here the true service of Haydn is revealed.

* * *

To call Haydn the "father of instrumental music" seems hardly a stretch of the truth. At least his symphonies have eclipsed those of his predecessors, and have reached a degree of preciseness in form probably never equalled after his death. His constant avoidance of thematic material strung along in piece-meal fashion, or connected by empty transitions and feeble phrases indicates the severity with which he regarded those of his contemporaries and predecessors who were more neglectful in prudence and less rigorous in self-criticism than he. His compositions as a whole are clear, exhilarated, finished productions, wealthy in melodic and harmonic content and unified in design. Though Haydn's symphonies were not the first to be written in "sonata form," since this form itself was the outcome of a long preceding development, in them this pre-existing scheme was modified and perfected. Previously it had been used more or less mechanically, without discrimination or delicacy of taste; Haydn found in it the possibility for artistic expression, the form in which progressing sounds could be molded into a figured unity.

Mozart, whose symphonies and quartets are superior in many ways to those of Haydn, was the man who, more than any other, determined the culmination of Haydn's successes as a composer of instrumental music. The fact is that Haydn's greatest compositions were written after Mozart's death. Yet the influence was certainly a mutual one. Haydn, twenty-four years Mozart's senior, born of peasant stock, and deficient in musical training, was a natural lover of folksongs, and a self-appointed student of Philipp Emanuel Bach. Mozart, whose parents were themselves professional musicians, was carefully reared in aristocratic and musical circles, received the best of instruction, followed the Italian rather than the Teutonic style of contemporary music, and wrote under the prevailing shadow of John Christian Bach. Mozart's precocity was the more outstanding, for he composed his first symphony at the age of eight. Not until his resources had achieved their utmost expression, before 1790, did Haydn begin seriously to feel his influence, and the London symphonies were all composed after his last farewell to Mozart, who died a year later.

* * *

It can be said with assurance that Mozart, writing in his prime, was affected by the early Haydn, and that Haydn's maturest productions in turn were created under the influence of his young master. Haydn was indeed the pioneer both of symphonic and quartet writing, but his own environment and gradual development were in part responsible for results characteristically different from those of Mozart. In their quartets, both men reached a degree of technical perfection which probably has never again been attained; by their treatment, the orchestra was not only enlarged by the rapid development of symphonies and concertos, but was transformed to meet the requirements which their imaginative and artistic natures demanded. The crudity of instrumental music disappeared in their hands, and though neither composer eliminated completely the existing tendency to treat wind instruments as a rather indefinite means of holding given harmonies throughout the disturbing figures of other instruments, their use of the strings became more highly organized than ever before in the history of instrumental music.

Mozart's symphonies undoubtedly have much more popular appeal today than Haydn's. His minuets are certainly more crystalline, more precise in quality, and lack the rustic savor which is so characteristic of Haydn. The delicacy and refinement of Italian instrumental music finds embodiment once more in the expressions of Mozart's genius, but the true Teutonic spirit, united with the Croatian traditions of Austria-Hungary becomes incarnate in the musical productions of Joseph Haydn.

JAMES H. FASSETT

Haydn Speaks

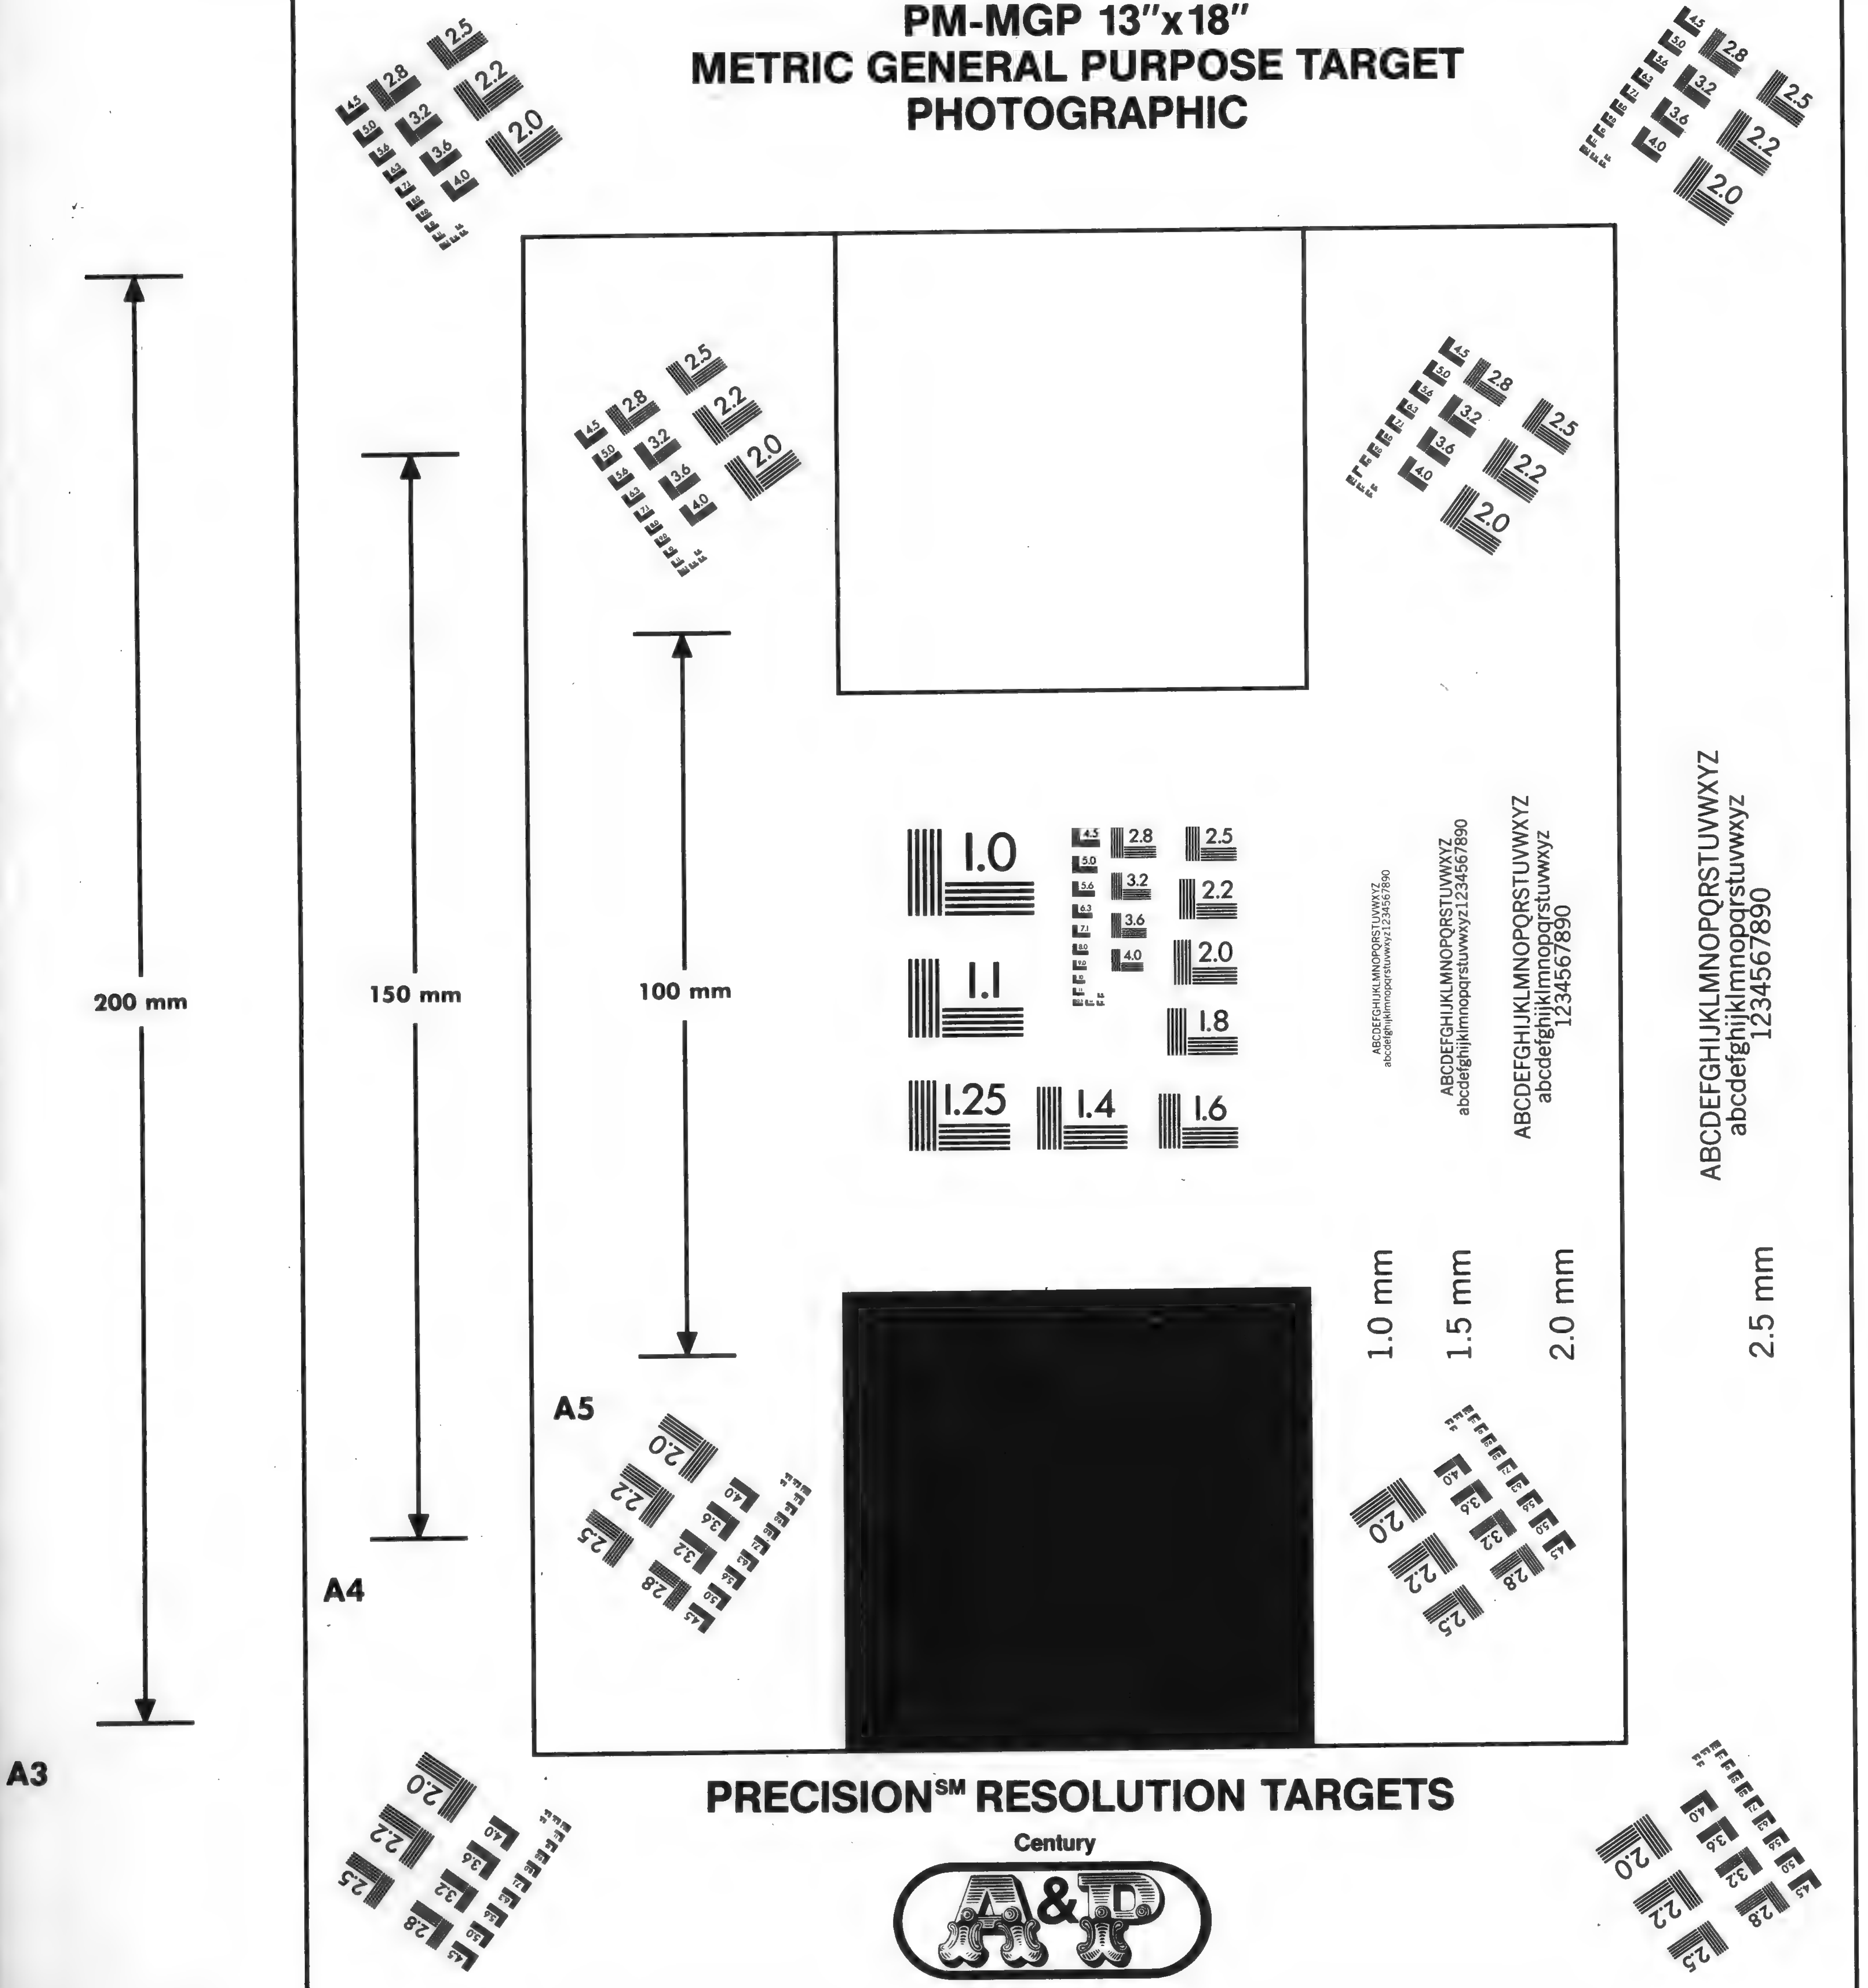
Self-Judgment and a Highly Modernistic Opinion

SOME of my children are well-bred; some ill-bred; while here and there is a changeling among them . . . I know that God has bestowed a talent upon me, and I thank Him for it. I think I have done my duty and been of use in my generation. Let others do the same.

WHAT is the good of rules? Art is free and should be fettered by no mechanical regulations. The educated ear is the sole authority, and I think I have as much right to lay down the law as anyone. This trifling about consecutive Fourths is absurd. I wish instead that some one would compose a new minuet.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

166

Two Centuries Gathered on the Head of the First Master of the Classic S

The Music-Master in a Prince's House Whom a Wider World Discovered And Acclaimed

FOR several months the centers of music in Europe have been busy with plans for celebrating the second centenary of the birth of Franz Joseph Haydn. In Vienna, in Berlin, in London, they will render homage to the man who may justly be called the creator of the string quartet and the symphony.

Haydn played a tremendous part in the history of music. Even in his own lifetime he had aroused the admiration of all Europe. The most illustrious of his contemporaries sought his advice. Mozart made him his friend, his guide, and, so to speak, his inspiration. Beethoven submitted patiently to his lessons. Joseph Haydn has only too many claims upon our gratitude.

The composer who caused such a stir in his own time that kings and princes were proud to have his acquaintance, was the son of a wheelwright and a cook. The second of twelve children, Franz Joseph Haydn was born March 31, 1732, at Rohrau, a little village in Lower Austria near the Hungarian frontier. His two young brothers, Johann Michael and Johann Evangelist, devoted themselves to music also, but without success. One of his sisters, Anna Maria, married a blacksmith named Philipp Fröhlich and the other a musketeer by the name of Naeher.

From his tenderest years Franz Joseph revealed such a musical bent that his cousin, Johann Matthias Frankh, a tutor and kapellmeister, wished to keep the boy with him. He took him to Hainburg and, although he was himself unschooled, took charge of the lad's education. By a stroke of luck, Johann George Reuter the younger, composer to the imperial court and choirmaster of the Cathedral of St. Stephen at Vienna, chanced to pass through Hainburg. His interest was aroused by the "feeble but agreeable" voice of Franz Joseph.

Engaged as a choir boy in the service of the Cathedral of Vienna, Haydn left for the Austrian capital. Reuter soon turned the boy over to the care of his assistant choirmaster, Adam Gegenbauer, and a tenor, Ignaz Finsterbusch. These two taught him the first principles of singing and of the clavecin and the violin. For a number of years the young Haydn was able to study at his leisure the sacred compositions of George Reuter, Fux, Caldaro, Matteo Palotta, and Giuseppe Bonno, which he was performing. To gain a little spending money he gave concerts with his comrades in the public square or served as an "extra" at court banquets where a symphony orchestra was called for. When his voice began to change, he was obliged to leave the service of St. Stephen's. He was without resources. A summer spent as a strolling musician did not lighten his misery. He even dreamed of taking holy orders "to make certain of having something to eat every day."

Already Haydn was composing minuets for wind orchestras. In spite of everything, he stuck to his musical vocation. He fought off poverty. A lace-maker with whom he was acquainted lent him one day a hundred and fifty florins. He was saved. Installed in the garret of a house in which Metastasio and Porpora were then living, he wrote at the age of twenty the music for a comedy, "The New Devil-upon-Two-Sticks." Fortune did not smile upon him at once. The play by Josef Kurz was forbidden by the censor after the first performance.

While he studied the treatises of Fux and Mattheson, as well as the new sonatas of Philipp Emmanuel Bach, Haydn taught music to children. By this means he gained entrance to the house of his celebrated neighbor Metastasio, where he became acquainted with Porpora. It was his ambition to be initiated into "the veritable principles of musical science" by the Neapolitan professor. In her story of "Consuelo" George Sand has told how poor Haydn turned lackey to Porpora so as to get his lessons.

Fortune began to smile upon him. Recommended by Fürnberg, for whom he had composed his first eighteen string quartets, Haydn entered the household of the Count Morzin in the capacity of "composer and director of music," at the annual stipend of two hundred florins. His "kapell" included a dozen or fifteen musicians to whom he confided the execution of divertisements and of little symphonies of his own composing. Dismissed by Count Morzin, he was finally called under the title of vice-kapellmeister, to the service of Prince Paul Antoine Esterhazy at the Château of Eisenstadt, a few miles outside of Vienna. Like the domestic servants, Haydn was obliged to take livery and to wait in attendance in the antechamber before and after meals in order to receive the orders of the master. He was to remain in the service of the Esterhazy family until he had reached the age of fifty-eight years.

While he was still music-director for Count Morzin, Haydn had given clavecin lessons to two daughters of a wigmaker by the name of Keller. He fell in love with the younger and decided to marry her. Unhappily the young girl had resolved to enter a nunnery. Like Mozart with the Webers, Haydn fell back upon the older sister who was not altogether to his liking. On November 26, 1760, he was united to Anna Maria Keller. She was three years older than he. Her sour disposition troubled the musician's whole life. Through more than twenty years he bore without a murmur the tirades of this shrew. In 1779 he became acquainted with the singer Luigia Polzelli. They promised each other marriage in writing, as soon as they should both be free. The Polzelli's husband died at the end of ten years. Haydn did not cease to correspond with the widow and to respond favorably to her demands for money. In 1800 Haydn's wife, in turn, disappeared. The Polzelli chose to marry a singer, Luigi Franchi. So far as his biographers are aware, this is the only love episode—and a somewhat derisory one at that—in the whole of Haydn's life.

But as a matter of fact the composer, purely ingenuous by nature, extremely simple in his mode of living, was impassioned only by his art. Knowledge of other branches of study, of other means of artistic expression, was entirely lacking in him. Life during the long sojourns which he had under the roof of his masters passed in one unvarying rhythm. Haydn wrote out his scores in the morning. He rehearsed them in the afternoon, and in the evening he performed them. In this way he quietly accumulated pieces of chamber music, religious compositions, symphonies, scores for opera-bouffes and serious operas. Isolated works—all of them—familiar in style, written behind closed doors, domestic music, so to speak, music for the study. The performers, captivated by the good nature of the Kapellmeister, never called him anything but Papa Haydn. Yet his fame, local at first, grew and spread. Young musicians used to come to Esterhazy to receive instruction from the good man. Georges Distler, Niemecz Ignace Pleyel, Anton Rosetti, Paul Wranitzky were the first disciples of the Austrian master. Later on the title of "pupil of Haydn' was eagerly sought. Beethoven, Lessel, Neukomm, Seyfried, J. B. Kolb and G. A. Walter aspired in turn to obtain the cachet which would constitute a sort of guaranty with connoisseurs and the public.

Haydn succeeded only rarely in escaping from the domain where he was held prisoner. Each year he spent a scant two or three months at Vienna. During this short time he was able at least to familiarize himself with the principal new compositions of his fellow-composers and to measure the reputation which he had himself acquired. On the occasion of the celebration given in honor of the Grand Duke Paul of Russia, Mozart and Haydn entered into close partnership. Mozart had studied deeply the works of his elder. In 1785 he dedicated six quartets to Haydn. Apparently the two great composers themselves interpreted them. At the house of the composer, Storace, Haydn, Mozart, Dittersdorf and Wanhal played in a quartet in which Mozart took the viola part and Haydn the second violin. Here was an unparalleled moment in the history of music, and one which all lovers of the art might well wish to have shared.

Beyond quetion, . Haydn influenced Mozart. On the other hand, Mozart, throughout his life, and especially after his death, exercised a sort of sway over the mind of Haydn. The old master had divined the genius of Mozart. In 1787 he had written to Roth, a prominent functionary at Prague, where "Don Juan" had just been presented: "It would be difficult for anyone- no matter what his talent, to place himself beside Mozart. That is why I should like to be able to impress the value of Mozart's inimitable works of art upon all amateurs—and especially all patrons—of music. Soon nations will be disputing for the possession of such a treasure. Prague should hold on to so precious a man. Prague should reward him; for without reward the life of a great genius is a sad one and gives little encouragement to posterity to carry on his work." Everyone knows the generous welcome which Prague gave to Mozart. It is certain that such forceful and lucid recommendations as Haydn's played their part in evoking the tribute of admiration which the people of Prague heaped upon the composer of "Don Juan."

It has been claimed that Haydn's scores were issued for the first time by a French publisher. But the works of the master of Rohrau circulated publicly in manuscript for many years. In 1781 Le Gros, an intelligent concert manager, conceived the notion of linking in a single program at Paris the "Stabat Mater" of Haydn with that of Pergolesi. The success of the first, apparently, was hardly less striking than that of the second. Paris was, at that time, the leading musical capital of the world. Even Vienna was of no more than second importance.

In 1787 Haydn was invited by King Ferdinand IV to come to Naples. He could not make up his mind to accept. In 1790, after the death of Prince Nicolas Esterhazy, Haydn, then sixty-eight years old, set out for London. He had signed a contract with the violinist-impresario Salomon. His fame had preceded him to the British capital. Esteemed as guest of great importance, Haydn was received at court and in the houses of the great. He was invited to preside at the meetings of all the principal musical societies. The concerts which he gave were attended with enthusiasm. London heard the first performance of his "Seven Words of Christ." Although he came into conflict with his not altogether loyal pupil, Ignace Pleyel, Haydn on this occasion received the homage he merited.

By a long and gradual ascent, he was attaining his honors at last. Three illustrious painters vied with each other to paint his portrait. Poems were dedicated to him. Wreaths and gifts showered upon him. Moreover, he could hear in London the great oratorios of Handel which had a profound effect on his own works. In his supreme productions, "The Creation" and "The Seasons," it is evident that Handel's influence had seized hold on him. In 1794, the aging master was to make a second and no less happy visit to London. But he refused offers made to him to move to the capital of the United Kingdom. He returned finally to Vienna.

Mozart and Gluck had just passed on. Beethoven, at the age of thirty, was as yet misunderstood. Haydn by himself was the incarnation of the musical glory of all Germany. He was sought out by the most notable of his contemporaries. Upon his return from London they had erected to him, in his own lifetime, a public statue not far from his natal village. His renown had finally made itself felt on the French public, too. On Dec. 24, 1800, "The Creation" was performed at the Opéra in the presence of the first consul, Bonaparte. A commemorative medal in Haydn's likeness was struck for this occasion and sent to the great Austrian composer. They played his works in all the capitals of Europe. Simple and direct by nature, Haydn at last came into a sense of his real importance. He passed his last years surrounded by marks of the admiration of the world. But he was not too much lifted up; he preserved an air of good-natured patriarchy.

On May 10, 1809, a victorious French army entered Vienna. Haydn was confined to his bed. An officer of the Napoleonic forces came to pay him a visit of respect. The officer even sat down at the piano and sang to the wondering old man Uriel's aria from "The Creation." Haydn, touched to tears, embraced the French soldier who, even in those terrible days, could thus show the degree of civilization of which his country was capable. A few days later, on May 31, 1809, Joseph Haydn died. He had earned the reward of his constancy.

The work of Haydn is so considerable that it it is really impossible to cover all its extent or to study it in detail or even to outline it briefly. As many as 149 symphonies have been atributed to him although we have preserved for us only 104 authentic examples. In the long list of Haydn's compositions we also find 77 string quartets, 38 piano trios, 30 string trios, 15 trios for wind instruments, 52 piano sonatas, four sonatas for piano and violin, 50 concertos and symphonic pieces for divers instruments, 80 dance compositions for orchestra, a score or so of operas and operettas, several pieces for marionettes, innumerable religious pieces, seven oratorios, and nobody knows how many lesser compositions worth cataloguing. It is difficult to estimate justly all the teeming output. At any rate, music has gained by so vast an effort. But we cannot let ourselves be carried away into a study of all the individual works to which Joseph Haydn devoted his life.

The soul of moderation, judicious, discriminating and clear-minded, always alert, he carried to new heights one of the noblest forms of human recreation. In a vein less pure than that of Mozart, less impassioned than that of Beethoven, he injected even into his lighter compositions his own flavor, his balanced and sustained technic, his high spirits, his clear and penetrating inspiration, and his liveliness of impression, as well as a mysterious feeling for the sublime. Beset by qualms, he aspired secretly to grandeur in some of his work. Despite his humility and despite the fact that he was devoted to an habitual type of beauty, he was in truth a forerunner; he opened large perspectives on the future of music. To the symphony, a form for which he set definite laws and the language of which he improved, he brought circumstantial reforms. He introduced into it his love of nature, his genius for description. All composers who have followed have walked in his footsteps. We may say that he spoke as by instinct the language of music. By virtue of his lively and somewhat naive erudition, his probity, his frankness, and his serenity of mind and soul, he revealed in his works a really moral atmosphere. We may describe his lyrical landscapes by the same words which Taine applied to the poetic landscapes of Milton: They are both equally "schools of virtue." His spirit endures and increases.

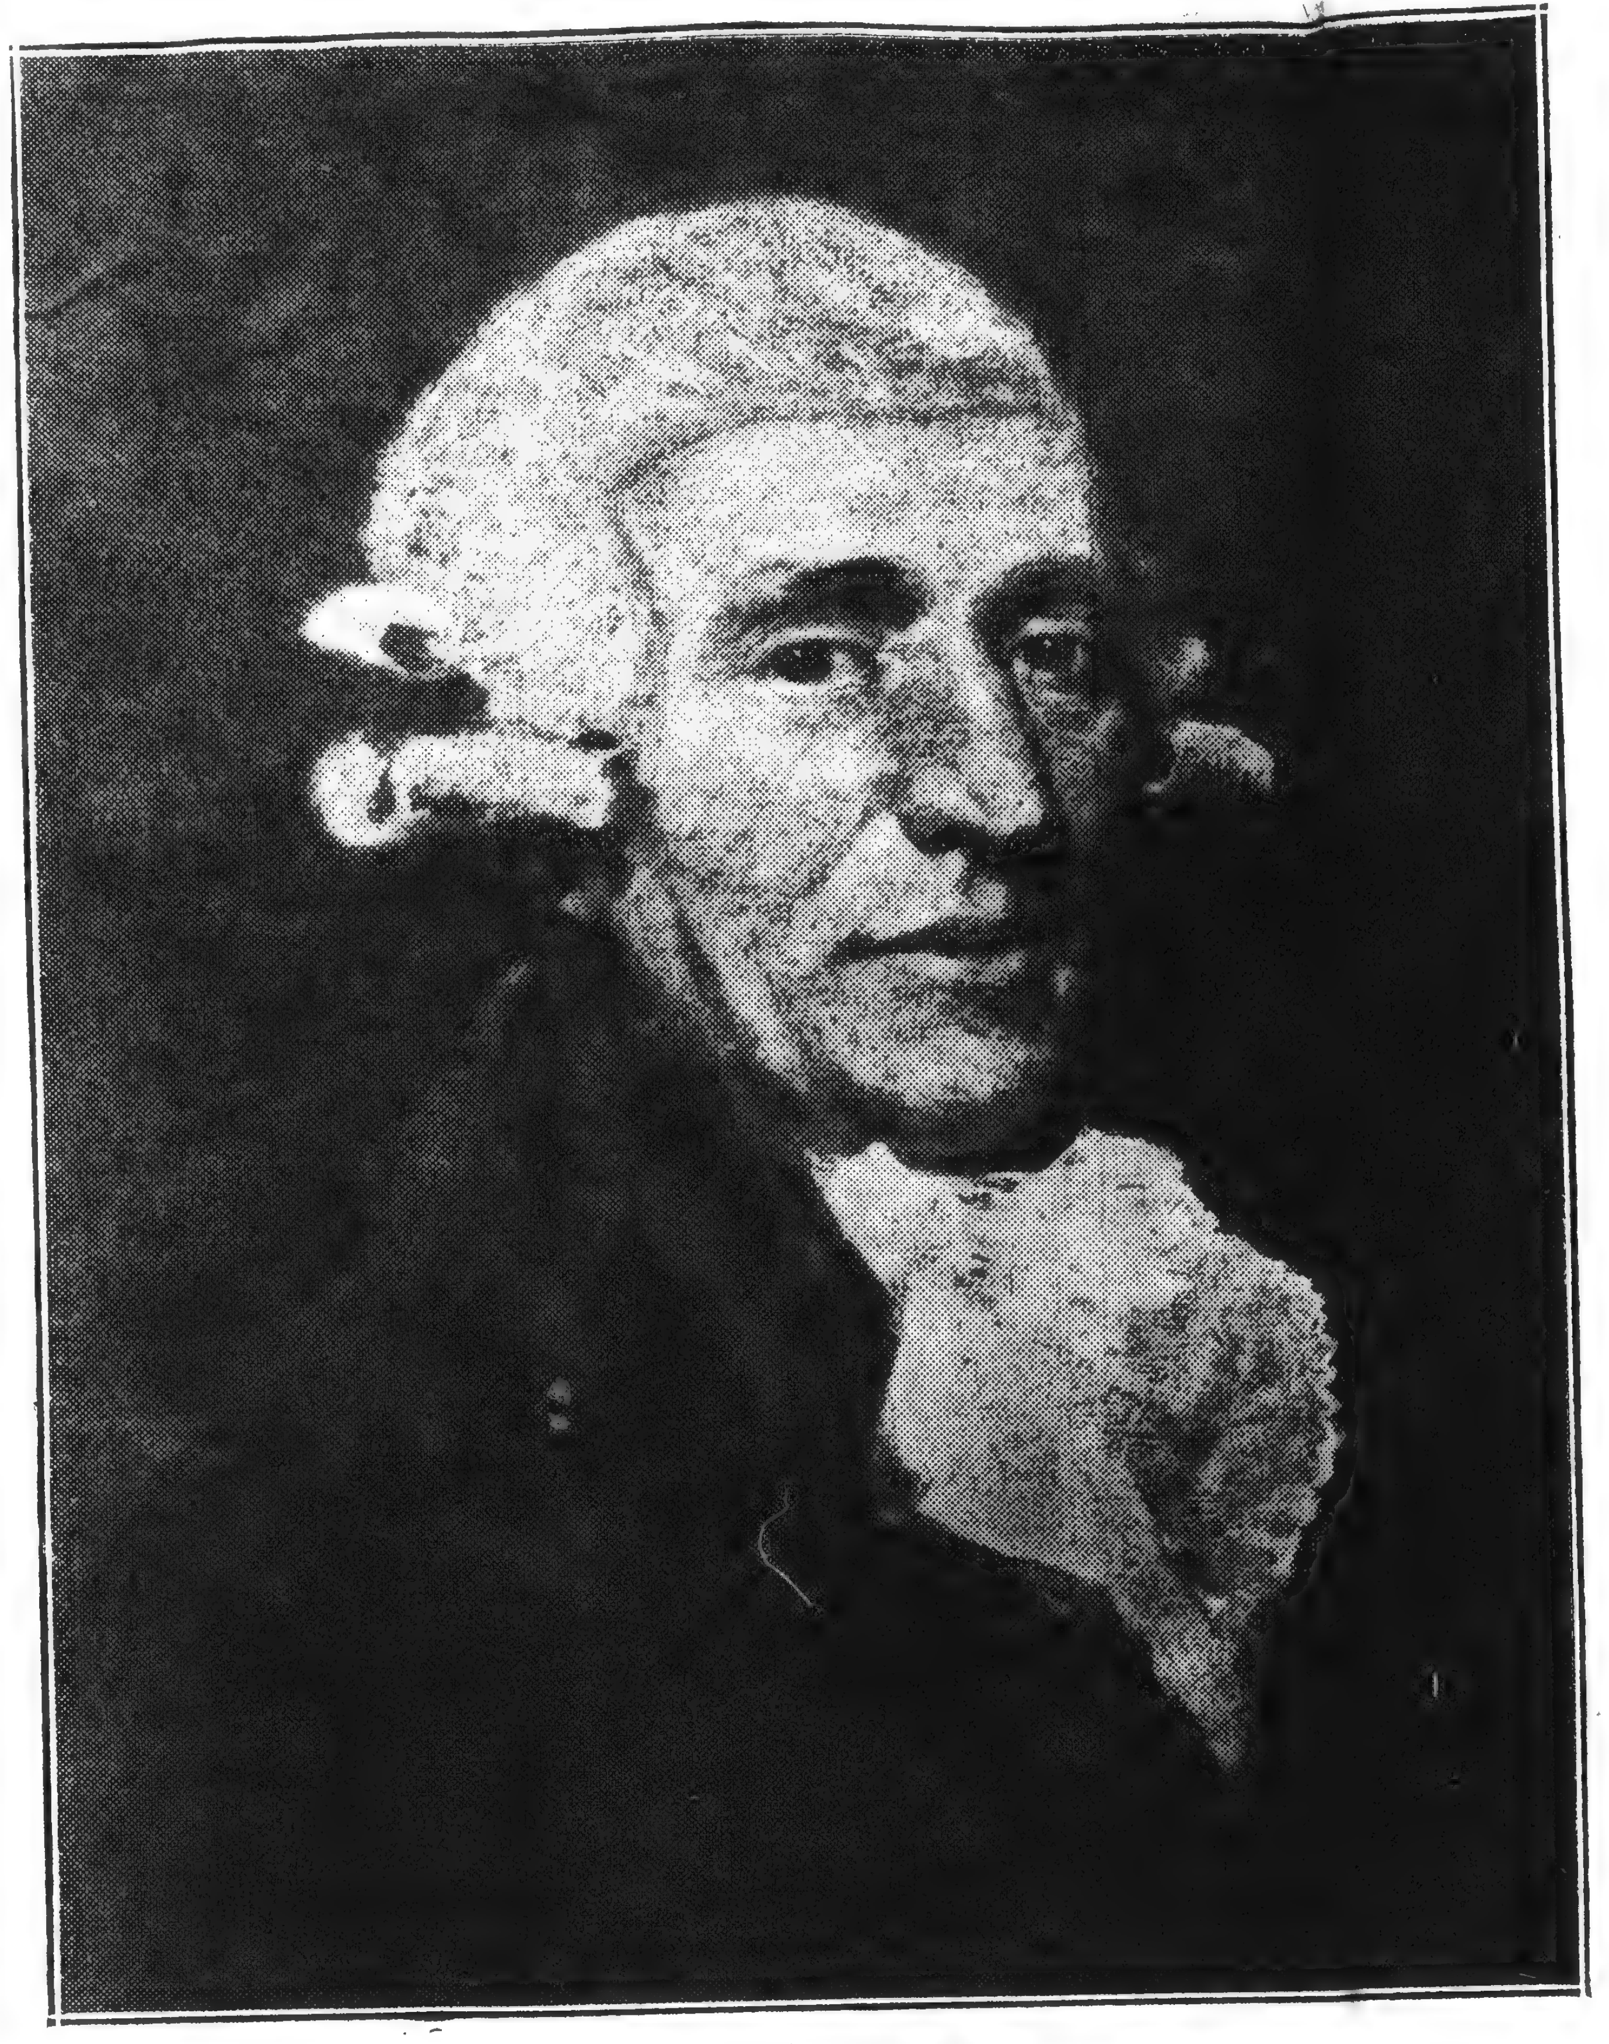
HENRY MALHERBE

[Translated from Le Temps by D. W. B.]

"Matchless Haydn"

Dr. Burney's Laurel Leaf for the Composer's Brow

THE admirable and matchless Haydn!" wrote Dr. Burney, while the composer was yet alive, "from whose productions I have received more pleasure in my life, when tired of most other music, than I have ever received in the most ignorant and rapturous part of my youth, when everything was new and the disposition to be pleased undiminished by criticism or satiety. There is a general cheerfulness and good humor in Haydn's Allegros, which exhilarate every hearer. But his Adagios are sublime in ideas and the harmony in which they are clad, that though played by inarticulate instruments, they have a more pathetic effect on my feeling than the finest opera air united with the most exquisite poetry."



Franz Joseph Haydn

From the Portrait by Hoppner, Painted During the Composer's Stay in London. For the Print and for Other Assistance in the Preparation of This Page, The Transcript Is Indebted to the Brown Music-Room of the Public Library, R. G. Appel, Assistant in Charge.

The Composer Joining Bachs to the Prese And Beetho

THE genius of Franz Joseph Haydn had long been smouldering before the death of Bach and Handel; it burst into flame during the lifetime of Mozart, and attained its fullest expression before Beethoven had written his first symphony. That Haydn's seventy-seven years should have embraced portions of these great lives, indeed the whole of one of them, is itself a dubious merit, but for those who are interested in his more worthy distinctions, the fact is of peculiar significance. For the "father of instrumental music," if that appellation still holds without question, though living contemporaneously for eighteen years with Johann Sebasian, and for twenty-seven years with the composer of "The Messiah," appointed himself disciple of neither of these figures, but of Philipp Emanuel Bach, the third son of Johann Sebastian.

Haydn's admiration for his chosen master is expressed in his own words,—"I did not leave the clavier till I had mastered all his six sonatas, and those who know me well must be aware that I owe very much to Emanuel Bach, whose works I understand and have thoroughly studied. Emanuel Bach himself once complimented me on this fact." His choice has been explained as being due to the type of music which Haydn learned and loved as a child. He had heard dance music and popular songs since his earliest days, and these he wished to cultivate, to embody in the complex and refined art of symphonic and quartet music. P. E. Bach had already advanced in this direction, and he, rather than his father, is the immediate precursor of Haydn. The older Bach, like Handel, was concerned essentially with the contrapuntal treatment of these musical subjects within the massive proportions of choral and organ music.

It is fruitless to speculate on the course which instrumental music would have taken had Haydn preferred to continue entirely along the lines of a well-established choral counterpoint and of polyphonic music in general. As it was, his influence on Beethoven, and hence on all succeeding instrumental music, was basic and profound; with Mozart, the influence was reciprocal,—intensified, no doubt, by the cordial sympathy which the two men felt toward each other until their intimate and affectionate friendship was ended by Mozart's early death.

The functions of kapellmeister at the Esterhazy estates were as varied as they were difficult to perform, since they included not only the directing of all musical performances, and sole control of the whole musical establishment, but in addition the further obligation of composing music at the command of his serene highness to whose employment alone the compositions should be available. Frequent performances of every sort demanded orchestral, operatic and chamber rehearsals daily, notwithstanding the further duties of maintaining a choir for the private chapel, and training a chorus for concerts and operas. Haydn's ability to play on several instruments was put to good use by instructing his subordinates individually. That such accommodations expected of him should fail to promote the realization of his highest aspirations as a composer needs hardly to be mentioned, and yet it was not by the excess duties of kapellmeister that Haydn's fullest development was hindered. Substantially, the circumstances in which he found himself for a period of over thirty years were favorable to the exigencies of his creativeness. Not only was he living in comfort at the palace, but he was in possession of a very good orchestra which he used materially for his own advantage as a composer. "I not only had the encouragement of constant approval," he said, "but as conductor of an orchestra I could make experiments, observe what produced an effect and what weakened it, and was thus in a condition to improve, alter, make additions and omissions, and be as bold as I pleased."

Yet the symphonies which he produced during this period are much inferior to those written later during his two visits to London. His natural endowments and his expressive powers were obstructed by the limited tastes of his Esterhazy audience. The guests of his noble patron were selected only from the aristocracy, and their judgments, though exerting a refining influence on his style, undoubtedly checked what would otherwise have been a spontaneous outflow of his originality. When Salomon, late in 1790, arranged for him to visit London, where he was twice engaged to write new symphonies and other compositions, Haydn was freed from the limitations of his illustrious audience, and received fresh stimulation from the wider perceptions of his English public. The change was entirely profitable. Twelve of his finest symphonies, numbering over a hundred in all, were composed during his London engagements, the popular "Surprise," "Clock," and "Military" symphonies being among them.

It should be remembered that many of what are now considered Haydn's greatest achievements were not the direct product of inspiration, the effluence of creative impulse finding inevitable expression irrespective of time and circumstance, but were composed and performed solely under contract, frequently for specific occasions. This method of production was not unusual at that period, though today it would probably be condemned as "selling" one's art. Among his quantities of compositions Haydn apparently realized great discrepancies in value, for, as the story goes, he answered George III who said to him, "Doctor Haydn, you have composed much," by remarking modestly, "Yes, Sire, a little more than was wise." He did not, in fact, write with such rapidity as it generally attributed to him, nor was he more lacking in self criticism than in discrimination. Whereas Handel, as is said, wrote "The Messiah" in twenty-four days, Haydn spent nearly eighteen months on "The Creation," and in later years he intimated that he was never completely satisfied with it. In 1799 he wrote to his publishers—"As for myself, now an old man, I hope the critics may not handle my "Creation" with too great severity and be too hard on it. They may perhaps find the musical orthography faulty in various passages and perhaps other things also which I have for so many years been accustomed to consider as minor points; but the genuine connoisseur will see the real cause as well as I do, and will willingly cast aside such stumbling blocks."

Haydn's sincerity, his ardent enthusiasm and his definite opinions on musical subjects, directed him toward the paths which he eventually pursued. In spite of his superfluous production of seemingly uninspired music, he was zealous in carrying out his own ideas, in developing those aspects of music which appealed to him above all as being beautiful or capable of becoming so through his treatment. His fondness for melody is explicit in nearly all he has written and this fact may be more responsible than we imagine for the change which took place in music at the end of the eighteenth century, viz., a gradual surplanting of the older polyphonic style of instrumental music by a more essentially

Haydn's Days and Nights in London

HAYDN was an honored composer in England long before he became a visitor; but his two stays among us greatly increased his popularity, and also gave it a personal touch that is not without effect even today. Haydn in the seclusion of Esterhaz, doing his job as professional composer with a diligence and fecundity that remind us of Bach, is an attractive but somewhat remote figure. Haydn in Hanover Square is one of ourselves. The personal touch counts for a lot, no matter how high our brow:

> Ah, did you once see Shelley plain,
> And did he stop and speak to you?
> And did you speak to him again?
> How strange it seems, and new!

And it is pleasant to reflect that one's great-grandfather may have been among the audience at Hanover Square Rooms during those six consecutive Friday evenings in the spring of 1791, when "Mr. Haydn" was "at the Harpsichord," having "composed for every night a new piece of music." The link is slight and fanciful, but it counts.

Most composers of the past who have visited England have done so in their youth—naturally, for the journey from the Continent a century ago was apt to intimidate such of the elderly as were sensitive in nerves or stomach. For a Haydn, nearing his sixtieth year, who had spent the greater part of his life within the radius of a few miles, it was a project so formidable as to cause a head-shaking among his friends. Mozart specially made no bones about expressing his concern.

It is easy to understand Haydn's desire to come to England. Prince Nicholas Esterházy had died a few months before, and Haydn was now his own master, after having been for twenty-eight years in the position of a superior kind of domestic servant.

The financial bait was substantial, too. When a stranger turned up early in December, 1790, and said to Haydn, "I am Salomon of London: I have come to fetch you," and proceeded to offer a fee of three hundred pounds for an opera, three hundred pounds for six symphonies, two hundred pounds for twenty shorter pieces, a guarantee of two hundred pounds for a benefit concert (actually the concert produced three hundred and fifty pounds), with a fat deposit as a security and an advance for traveling expenses, the matter was soon settled.

Haydn and Salomon left Vienna on Dec. 15, 1790, and crossed the Channel on New Year's day. Does any reader possess a copy of a picture of Haydn on board? It is mentioned in Michael Brenet's "Haydn: His Life," as being by a painter unnamed, but described as "modern" (i. e., not contemporary with Haydn); and it depicts the composer in "strange garments and in a theatrical attitude on deck"; a number of women are shown terror-struck while a storm rages, and thick clouds are riven with lightning. The actual facts are that there was no storm; and, indeed, there was so little wind that the boat lost time at the start. The journey was done in nine hours, with no terrors, and probably with the minimum of internal upheavals.

It is odd that no English poet seems to have burst into a song of welcome. But

Light Record of His Heyday Of Work, Honor, Wealth And Vogue

poets generally have been more concerned with music in a vague sort of way than with musicians. (Think of Dr. Johnson's queestions concerning John Christian Bach: "Pray, sir, who is this Bach? Is he a piper?") It was left for a musician to turn poet for the occasion, Burney achieving the following:

> Welcome, great master, to our favour'd Isle,
> Already partial to thy name and style;
> Long may thy fountain of invention run
> In streams as rapid as it first begun;
> While skill for each fantastic whim privides,
> And certain science ev'ry current guides!
> Oh, may thy days, from human sufferings free,
> Be blest with glory and felicity!
> With full fruition to a distant hour,
> Of all thy magic and creative pow'r!
> Blest in thyself, with rectitude of mind,
> And blessing, with thy talents, all mankind!

which is neither better nor worse than such things are wont to be, even when written by real poets.

Old programs have an interest of their own; here is that of the opening concert of the six for which Haydn was engaged:

PART FIRST

Overture—Rosetti.
Song, Signor Tajana.
Concerto Oboe, Mr. Harrington.
Song, Signora Storace.
Concerto Violin, Madame Gautherot.
Recitative e Aria, Signor David.

PART SECOND

New Grand Overture—Haydn.
Recitative e Aria, Signora Storace.
Concertante Pedal Harp and Piano Forte, Mad. Krumpholtz and Mr. Dusseck.
Rondo, Signor David.
Full Piece—Kozeluch.

Mr. Haydn will be at the Harpsichord.
Leader of the Band, Mr. Salomon.

Tickets transferable, as usual, Ladies to Ladies, and Gentlemen to Gentlemen only. The Ladies' tickets are Green, the Gentlemen's Black.

The Door in the Square is for Chairs only.

"New Grand Overture," meant the Symphony written for the occasion—No. 1 of the "Salomon" Set.

The Morning Chronicle of the next day ends its eulogy with a hint that later took definite shape: "We are happy to see the concert so well attended the first night; for we cannot suppress our very anxious hopes, that the first musical genius of the age may be induced, by our liberal welcome, to take up his residence in England."

Having quoted from the notice of the opening concert of Haydn's first visit, I pass to the second series, in order to give one of the oddest examples of musical criticism ever written. It appeared (appropriately) in The Oracle of Feb. 11, 1794, under the caption "Salomon's Concert": Opening Night:

> We must of necessity be brief. And after all it may be best, when the chef d'oeuvre of the great Haydn is the subject.
>
> "Come then, expressive SILENCE, muse his praise. Viotti [illegible] concerto, simple and affecting, like his genius. Mara sang c'est assez dire.

A good way out of the difficulty, when one is hard up for something to say!

This same journal distinguished itself during Haydn's former visit by suggesting a new "programme" for the "Surprise" Symphony: "Act 2d opened with a first performance of the Grand Overture composed by Haydn for this evening. The second movement was equal to the happiest of this great Master's conceptions. The surprise might not be unaptly likened to the situation of a beautiful Shepherdess, who, lulled to slumber by the murmur of a distant Waterfall, starts alarmed by the unexpected firing of a Fowling-piece. The flute obbligato was delicious."

One point that will strike those of us who read more complete accounts of Haydn's English visits than can be given here, is the realization of the composer's greatness by the English musical public of that day. Haydn had not yet been nicknamed "Papa," and it was still possible to write of him without dragging in are word "genial." Both labels are perhaps responsible for the modern tendency to regard one of the most profoundly accomplished of composers as merely a kind of amiable old buffer. The easy flow and certainty of touch that seem so unpremeditated came from hard work. For years he ground away with the severest of textbooks—Marpurg, Fux, and the rest of the contrapuntists who managed to be of service to the greatest composers of a great period.

Another reason for our doing less justice to Haydn than was done him by Londoners of a century ago is inevitable. His reputation was made before Mozart burst upon the scene; and Beethoven was still a lad. Today Haydn is too often regarded casually on the one hand as an inferior kind of Mozart and on the other as a mere forerunner of Beethoven. And now that the critics have discovered that Mozart was "daimonic" (evidences of which they find in all sorts of mild passages) Haydn has suffered still further. It is to be hoped that the bicentenary will give us an opportunity of forming a fairer estimate than has been general during recent years.

FESTE

[Reprinted from The Musical Times, London]

For Haydn

The Memorial Program Next Week at the Symphony Concerts

Symphony, No. 1, in D major: Haydn's First Symphony, composed in 1759.

Symphony, No. 104, in D major: Haydn's Last Symphony, composed in 1795.

Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra.
(Violoncellist: Mr. Piatigorsky)

Symphony, No. 103, in E-flat minor: The Symphony "with the drum-roll."

o Centuries Gathered on the Head of the First Master of the Classic Symphony

Music-Master in a Prince's House hom a Wider World Discovered And Acclaimed veral months the centers of in Europe have been busy ians for celebrating the secntenary of the birth of Franz

n. In Vienna, in Berlin, in will render homage to the justly be called the creator quartet and the symphony, ed a tremendous part in the usic. Even in his own life-aroused the admiration of all most illustrious of his con-sought his advice. Mozart s friend, his guide, and, so inspiration. Beethoven subtly to his lessons. Joseph nly too many claims upon ser who caused such a stir ime that kings and princes have his acquaintance, was a wheelwright and a cook.

f twelve children, Franz Jo-was born March 31, 1732, at tle village in Lower Austria ngarian frontier. His two ers, Johann Michael and ugelist, devoted themselves
, but without success. One s, Anna Maria, married a named Philipp Fröhlich and musketeer by the name of enderest years Franz Joseph h a musical bent that his nn Matthias Frankh, a tutor neister, wished to keep the n. He took him to Hainburg h he was himself unschooled, of the lad's education. By luck, Johann George Reuter

, composer to the imperial hoirmaster of the Cathedral n at Vienna, chanced to pass ainburg. His interest was the "feeble but agreeable" nz Joseph.
s a choir boy in the service
edral of Vienna, Haydn left strian capital. Reuter soon boy over to the care of his oirmaster, Adam Gegenbauer, Ignaz Finsterbusch. These him the first principles of
of the clavecin and the violin.
er of years the young Haydn study at his leisure the positions of George Reuter,
, Matteo Palotta, and Giu-
, which he was performing.
ttle spending money he gave h his comrades in the public rved as an "extra" at court here a symphony orchestra
r. When his voice began to vas obliged to leave the serv-Stephen's. He was without summer spent as a strolling not lighten his misery. He d of taking holy orders "to of having something to eat

aydn was composing minuets chestras. In spite of everyuck to his musical vocation.
f poverty. A lace-maker with as acquainted lent him one ed and fifty florins. He was lled in the garret of a house etastasio and Porpora were he wrote at the age of twenty r a comedy, "The New Devilicks." Fortune did not smile t once. The play by Josef orbidden by the censor after rformance.
studied the treatises of Fux on, as well as the new sonatas Emmanuel Bach, Haydn to children. By this means ntrance to the house of his eighbor Metastasio, where he ainted with Porpora. It was to be initiated into "the verples of musical science" by an professor. In her story
" George Sand has told how turned lackey to Porpora so lessons.
egan to smile upon him. Rec-by Fürnberg, for whom he ed his first eighteen string aydn entered the household t Morzin in the capacity of nd director of music," at the end of two hundred florins.
" included a dozen or fifteen whom he confided the execurtisements and of little sym-his own composing. Dis-Count Morzin, he was finally the title of vice-kapellmeister, ice of Prince Paul Antoine
t the Château of Eisenstadt, outside of Vienna. Like the rvants, Haydn was obliged to and to wait in attendance in mber before and after meals receive the orders of the mass to remain in the service of zy family until he had reached ifty-eight years.

was still music-director for n, Haydn had given clavecin wo daughters of a wigmaker of Keller. He fell in love unger and decided to marry ppily the young girl had reter a nunnery. Like Mozart bers, Haydn fell back upon ler who was not altogether to
On November 26, 1760, he to Anna Maria Keller. She ars older than he. Her sour roubled the musician's whole gh more than twenty years out a murmur the tirades of n 1779 he became acquainted nger Luigia Polzelli. They h other marriage in writing, hey should both be free. The band died at the end of ten ydn did not cease to corre-the widow and to respond her demands for money. In wife, in turn, disappeared.
chose to marry a singer,
t. So far as his biographers his is the only love episode—what derisory one at that—of Haydn's life.
natter of fact the composer,
nuous by nature, extremely simple in his mode of living, was impassioned only by his art. Knowledge of other branches of study, of other means of artistic expression, was entirely lacking in him. Life during the long sojourns which he had under the roof of his masters passed in one unvarying rhythm. Haydn wrote out his scores in the morning. He rehearsed them in the afternoon, and in the evening he performed them. In this way he quietly accumulated pieces of chamber music, religious compositions, symphonies, scores for opera-bouffes and serious operas. Isolated works—all of them—familiar in style, written behind closed doors, domestic music, so to speak, music for the study. The performers, captivated by the good nature of the Kapellmeister, never called him anything but Papa Haydn. Yet his fame, local at first, grew and spread. Young musicians used to come to Esterhazy to receive instruction from the good man. Georges Distler, Niemecz Ignace Pleyel, Anton Rosetti, Paul Wranitzky were the first disciples of the Austrian master. Later on the title of "pupil of Haydn' was eagerly sought. Beethoven, Lessel, Neukomm, Seyfried, J. B. Kolb and G. A. Walter aspired in turn to obtain the cachet which would constitute a sort of guaranty with connoisseurs and the public.

Haydn succeeded only rarely in escaping from the domain where he was held prisoner. Each year he spent a scant two or three months at Vienna. During this short time he was able at least to familiarize himself with the principal new compositions of his fellow-composers and to measure the reputation which he had himself acquired. On the occasion of the celebration given in honor of the Grand Duke Paul of Russia, Mozart and Haydn entered into close partnership. Mozart had studied deeply the works of his elder. In 1785 he dedicated six quartets to Haydn. Apparently the two great composers themselves interpreted them. At the house of the composer, Storace, Haydn, Mozart, Dittersdorf and Wanhal played in a quartet in which Mozart took the viola part and Haydn the second violin. Here was an unparalleled moment in the history of music, and one which all lovers of the art might well wish to have shared.

atchless Haydn"

ey's Laurel Leaf for the Composer's Brow

dmirable and matchless n!" wrote Dr. Burney, composer was yet alive,
hose productions I have more pleasure in my life,
ed of most other music, ave ever received in the orant and rapturous part youth, when everything and the disposition to be undiminished by criticism
ty. There is a general ness and good humor in Allegros, which exhilarate arer. But his Adagios are in ideas and the harmony h they are clad, that played by inarticulate in-ts, they have a more paffect on my feeling than st opera air united with t exquisite poetry."

Beyond quetion, , Haydn influenced Mozart. On the other hand, Mozart, throughout his life, and especially after his death, exercised a sort of sway over the mind of Haydn. The old master had divined the genius of Mozart. In 1787 he had written to Roth, a prominent functionary at Prague, where "Don Juan" had just been presented: "It would be difficult for anyone- no matter what his talent, to place himself beside Mozart. That is why I should like to be able to impress the value of Mozart's inimitable works of art upon all amateurs—and especially all patrons—of music. Soon nations will be disputing for the possession of such a treasure. Prague should hold on to so precious a man. Prague should reward him; for without reward the life of a great genius is a sad one and gives little encouragement to posterity to carry on his work." Everyone knows the generous welcome which Prague gave to Mozart. It is certain that such forceful and lucid recommendations as Haydn's played their part in evoking the tribute of admiration which the people of Prague heaped upon the composer of "Don Juan."

It has been claimed that Haydn's scores were issued for the first time by a French publisher. But the works of the master of Rohrau circulated publicly in manuscript for many years. In 1781 Le Gros, an intelligent concert manager, conceived the notion of linking in a single program at Paris the "Stabat Mater" of Haydn with that of Pergolesi. The success of the first, apparently, was hardly less striking than that of the second. Paris was, at that time, the leading musical capital of the world. Even Vienna was of no more than second importance.

In 1787 Haydn was invited by King Ferdinand IV to come to Naples. He could not make up his mind to accept. In 1790, after the death of Prince Nicolas Esterhazy, Haydn, then sixty-eight years old, set out for London. He had signed a contract with the violinist-impresario Salomon. His fame had preceded him to the British capital. Esteemed as guest of great importance, Haydn was received at court and in the houses of the great. He was invited to preside at the meetings of all the principal musical societies. The concerts which he gave were attended with enthusiasm. London heard the first performance of his "Seven Words of Christ." Although he came into conflict with his not altogether loyal pupil, Ignace Pleyel, Haydn on this occasion received the homage he merited.

By a long and gradual ascent, he was attaining his honors at last. Three illustrious painters vied with each other to paint his portrait. Poems were dedicated to him. Wreaths and gifts showered upon him. Moreover, he could hear in London the great oratorios of Handel which had a profound effect on his own works. In his supreme productions, "The Creation" and "The Seasons," it is evident that Handel's influence had seized hold on him. In 1794, the aging master was to make a second and no less happy visit to London. But he refused offers made to him to move to the capital of the United Kingdom. He returned finally to Vienna.

Mozart and Gluck had just passed on. Beethoven, at the age of thirty, was as yet misunderstood. Haydn by himself was the incarnation of the musical glory of all Germany. He was sought out by the most notable of his contemporaries. Upon his return from London they had erected to him, in his own lifetime, a public statue not far from his natal village. His renown had finally made itself felt on the French public, too. On Dec. 24, 1800, "The Creation" was performed at the Opéra in the presence of the first consul, Bonaparte. A commemorative medal in Haydn's likeness was struck for this occasion and sent to the great Austrian composer. They played his works in all the capitals of Europe. Simple and direct by nature, Haydn at last came into a sense of his real importance. He passed his last years surrounded by marks of the admiration of the world. But he was not too much lifted up; he preserved an air of good-natured patriarchy.

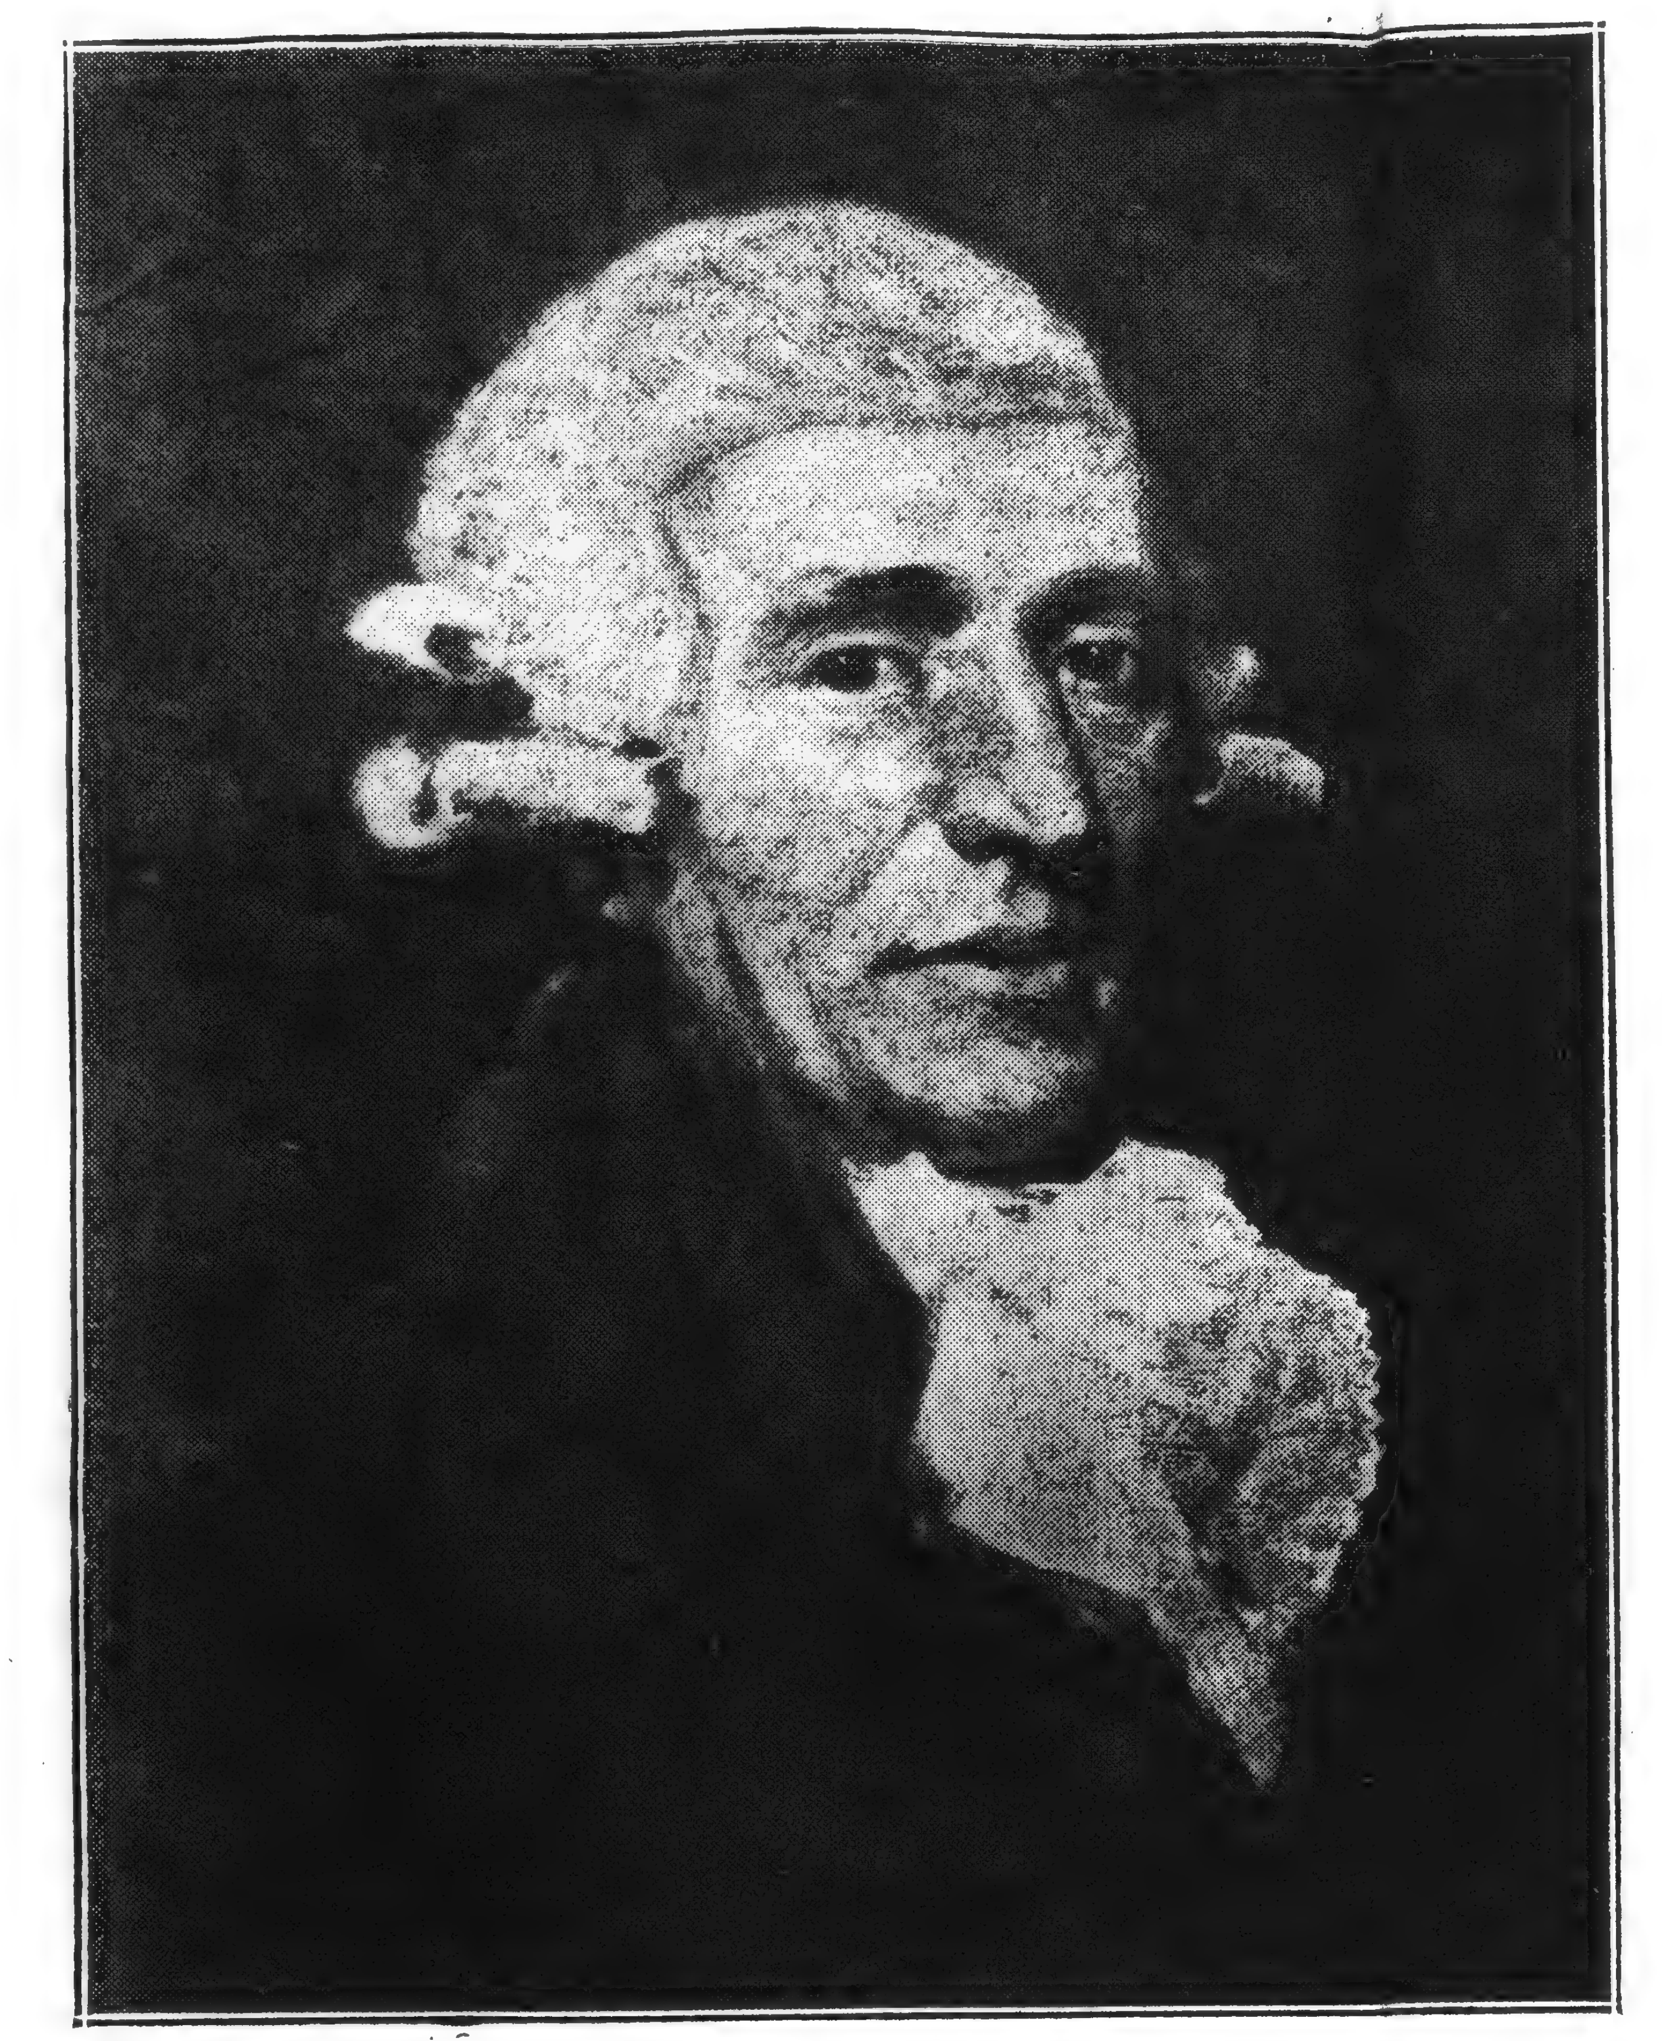
On May 10, 1809, a victorious French army entered Vienna. Haydn was confined to his bed. An officer of the Napoleonic forces came to pay him a visit of respect. The officer even sat down at the piano and sang to the wondering old man Uriel's aria from "The Creation." Haydn, touched to tears, embraced the French soldier who, even in those terrible days, could thus show the degree of civilization of which his country was capable. A few days later, on May 31, 1809, Joseph Haydn died. He had earned the reward of his constancy.

The work of Haydn is so considerable that it it is really impossible to cover all its extent or to study it in detail or even to outline it briefly. As many as 149 symphonies have been atributed to him although we have preserved for us only 104 authentic examples. In the long list of Haydn's compositions we also find 77 string quartets, 38 piano trios, 30 string trios, 15 trios for wind instruments, 52 piano sonatas, four sonatas for piano and violin, 50 concertos and symphonic pieces for divers instruments, 80 dance compositions for orchestra, a score or so of operas and operettas, several pieces for marionettes, innumerable religious pieces, seven oratorios, and nobody knows how many lesser compositions worth cataloguing. It is difficult to estimate justly all the teeming output. At any rate, music has gained by so vast an effort. But we cannot let ourselves be carried away into a study of all the individual works to which Joseph Haydn devoted his life.

The soul of moderation, judicious, discriminating and clear-minded, always alert, he carried to new heights one of the noblest forms of human recreation. In a vein less pure than that of Mozart, less impassioned than that of Beethoven, he injected even into his lighter compositions his own flavor, his balanced and sustained technic, his high spirits, his clear and penetrating inspiration, and his liveliness of impression, as well as a mysterious feeling for the sublime. Beset by qualms, he aspired secretly to grandeur in some of his work. Despite his humility and despite the fact that he was devoted to an habitual type of beauty, he was in truth a forerunner; he opened large perspectives on the future of music. To the symphony, a form for which he set definite laws and the language of which he improved, he brought circumstantial reforms. He introduced into it his love of nature, his genius for description. All composers who have followed have walked in his footsteps. We may say that he spoke as by instinct the language of music. By virtue of his lively and somewhat naive erudition, his probity, his frankness, and his serenity of mind and soul, he revealed in his works a really moral atmosphere. We may describe his lyrical landscapes by the same words which Taine applied to the poetic landscapes of Milton: They are both equally "schools of virtue." His spirit endures and increases.

HENRY MALHERBE

[Translated from Le Temps by D. W. B.]



Franz Joseph Haydn

From the Portrait by Hoppner, Painted During the Composer's Stay in London. For the Print and for Other Assistance in the Preparation of This Page, The Transcript Is Indebted to the Brown Music-Room of the Public Library, R. G. Appel, Assistant in Charge.

Haydn's Days and Nights in London

Light Record of His Heyday Of Work, Honor, Wealth And Vogue

HAYDN was an honored composer in England long before he became a visitor; but his two stays among us greatly increased his popularity, and also gave it a personal touch that is not without effect even today. Haydn in the seclusion of Esterhaz, doing his job as professional composer with a diligence and fecundity that remind us of Bach, is an attractive but somewhat remote figure. Haydn in Hanover Square is one of ourselves. The personal touch counts for a lot, no matter how high our brow:

> Ah, did you once see Shelley plain,
> And did he stop and speak to you?
> And did you speak to him again?
> How strange it seems, and new!

And it is pleasant to reflect that one's great-grandfather may have been among the audience at Hanover Square Rooms during those six consecutive Friday evenings in the spring of 1791, when "Mr. Haydn" was "at the Harpsichord," having "composed for every night a new piece of music." The link is slight and fanciful, but it counts.

Most composers of the past who have visited England have done so in their youth—naturally, for the journey from the Continent a century ago was apt to intimidate such of the elderly as were sensitive in nerves or stomach. For a Haydn, nearing his sixtieth year, who had spent the greater part of his life within the radius of a few miles, it was a project so formidable as to cause a head-shaking among his friends. Mozart specially made no bones about expressing his concern.

It is easy to understand Haydn's desire to come to England. Prince Nicholas Esterházy had died a few months before, and Haydn was now his own master, after having been for twenty-eight years in the position of a superior kind of domestic servant.

The financial bait was substantial, too. When a stranger turned up early in December, 1790, and said to Haydn, "I am Salomon of London: I have come to fetch you," and proceeded to offer a fee of three hundred pounds for an opera, three hundred pounds for six symphonies, two hundred pounds for twenty shorter pieces, a guarantee of two hundred pounds for a benefit concert (actually the concert produced three hundred and fifty pounds), with a fat deposit as a security and an advance for traveling expenses, the matter was soon settled.

Haydn and Salomon left Vienna on Dec. 15, 1790, and crossed the Channel on New Year's day. Does any reader possess a copy of a picture of Haydn on board? It is mentioned in Michael Brenet's "Haydn: His Life," as being by a painter unnamed, but described as "modern" (i. e., not contemporary with Haydn); and it depicts the composer in "strange garments and in a theatrical attitude on deck"; a number of women are shown terror-struck while a storm rages, and thick clouds are riven with lightning. The actual facts are that there was no storm; and, indeed, there was so little wind that the boat lost time at the start. The journey was done in nine hours, with no terrors, and probably with the minimum of internal upheavals.

It is odd that no English poet seems to have burst into a song of welcome. But poets generally have been more concerned with music in a vague sort of way than with musicians. (Think of Dr. Johnson's queestions concerning John Christian Bach: "Pray, sir, who is this Bach? Is he a piper?") It was left for a musician to turn poet for the occasion, Burney achieving the following:

> Welcome, great master, to our favour'd Isle,
> Already partial to thy name and style;
> Long may thy fountain of invention run
> In streams as rapid as it first begun;
> While skill for each fantastic whim privides,
> And certain science ev'ry current guides!
> Oh, may thy days, from human sufferings free,
> Be blest with glory and felicity!
> With full fruition to a distant hour,
> Of all thy magic and creative pow'r!
> Blest in thyself, with rectitude of mind,
> And blessing, with thy talents, all mankind!

which is neither better nor worse than such things are wont to be, even when written by real poets.

Old programs have an interest of their own; here is that of the opening concert of the six for which Haydn was engaged:

PART FIRST

Overture—Rosetti.
Song, Signor Tajana.
Concerto Oboe, Mr. Harrington.
Song, Signora Storace.
Concerto Violin, Madame Gautherot.
Recitative e Aria, Signor David.

PART SECOND

New Grand Overture—Haydn.
Recitative e Aria, Signora Storace.
Concertante Pedal Harp and Piano Forte, Mad. Krumpholtz and Mr. Dusseck.
Rondo, Signor David.
Full Piece—Kozeluch.

Mr. Haydn will be at the Harpsichord.
Leader of the Band, Mr. Salomon.

Tickets transferable, as usual. Ladies to Ladies, and Gentlemen to Gentlemen only. The Ladies' tickets are Green, the Gentlemen's Black.

The Door in the Square is for Chairs only.

"New Grand Overture," meant the Symphony written for the occasion—No. 1 of the "Salomon" Set.

The Morning Chronicle of the next day ends its eulogy with a hint that later took definite shape: "We are happy to see the concert so well attended the first night; for we cannot suppress our very anxious hopes, that the first musical genius of the age may be induced, by our liberal welcome, to take up his residence in England."

Having quoted from the notice of the opening concert of Haydn's first visit, I pass to the second series, in order to give one of the oddest examples of musical criticism ever written. It appeared (appropriately) in The Oracle of Feb. 11, 1794, under the caption "Salomon's Concert": Opening Night:

> We must of necessity be brief. And after all it may be best, when the chef d'oeuvre of the great Haydn is the subject.
>
> "Come then, expressive SILENCE, muse his praise. Viotti gave a concerto, simple and affecting, like his genius. Mara sang c'est assez dire.

A good way out of the difficulty, when one is hard up for something to say!

This same journal distinguished itself during Haydn's former visit by suggesting a new "programme" for the "Surprise" Symphony: "Act 2d opened with a first performance of the Grand Overture composed by Haydn for this evening. The second movement was equal to the happiest of this great Master's conceptions. The surprise might not be unaptly likened to the situation of a beautiful Shepherdess, who, lulled to slumber by the murmur of a distant Waterfall, starts alarmed by the unexpected firing of a Fowling-piece. The flute obbligato was delicious."

One point that will strike those of us who read more complete accounts of Haydn's English visits than can be given here, is the realization of the composer's greatness by the English musical public of that day. Haydn had not yet been nicknamed "Papa," and it was still possible to write of him without dragging in are word "genial." Both labels are perhaps responsible for the modern tendency to regard one of the most profoundly accomplished of composers as merely a kind of amiable old buffer. The easy flow and certainty of touch that seem so unpremeditated came from hard work. For years he ground away with the severest of textbooks — Marpurg, Fux, and the rest of the contrapuntists who managed to be of service to the greatest composers of a great period.

Another reason for our doing less justice to Haydn than was done him by Londoners of a century ago is inevitable. His reputation was made before Mozart burst upon the scene; and Beethoven was still a lad. Today Haydn is too often regarded casually on the one hand as an inferior kind of Mozart and on the other as a mere forerunner of Beethoven. And now that the critics have discovered that Mozart was "daimonic" (evidences of which they find in all sorts of mild passages) Haydn has suffered still further. It is to be hoped that the bicentenary will give us an opportunity of forming a fairer estimate than has been general during recent years.

FESTE

[Reprinted from The Musical Times, London]

For Haydn

The Memorial Program Next Week at the Symphony Concerts

Symphony, No. 1, in D major: Haydn's First Symphony, composed in 1759.

Symphony, No. 104, in D major: Haydn's Last Symphony, composed in 1795.

Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra.
(Violoncellist: Mr. Piatigorsky)

Symphony, No. 103, in E-flat minor: The Symphony "with the drum-roll."

The Composer Joining the Past of the Bachs to the Present of Mozart And Beethoven

THE genius of Franz Joseph Haydn had long been smouldering before the death of Bach and Handel; it burst into flame during the lifetime of Mozart, and attained its fullest expression before Beethoven had written his first symphony. That Haydn's seventy-seven years should have embraced portions of these great lives, indeed the whole of one of them, is itself a dubious merit, but for those who are interested in his more worthy distinctions, the fact is of peculiar significance. For the "father of instrumental music," if that appellation still holds without question, though living contemporaneously for eighteen years with Johann Sebasian, and for twenty-seven years with the composer of "The Messiah," appointed himself disciple of neither of these figures, but of Philipp Emanuel Bach, the third son of Johann Sebastian.

Haydn's admiration, for his chosen master is expressed in his own words,—"I did not leave the clavier till I had mastered all his six sonatas, and those who know me well must be aware that I owe very much to Emanuel Bach, whose works I understand and have thoroughly studied. Emanuel Bach himself once complimented me on this fact." His choice has been explained as being due to the type of music which Haydn learned and loved as a child. He had heard dance music and popular songs since his earliest days, and these he wished to cultivate, to embody in the complex and refined art of symphonic and quartet music. P. E. Bach had already advanced in this direction, and he, rather than his father, is the immediate precursor of Haydn. The older Bach, like Handel, was concerned essentially with the contrapuntal treatment of these musical subjects within the massive proportions of choral and organ music.

It is fruitless to speculate on the course which instrumental music would have taken had Haydn preferred to continue entirely along the lines of a well-established choral counterpoint and of polyphonic music in general. As it was, his influence on Beethoven, and hence on all succeeding instrumental music, was basic and profound; with Mozart, the influence was reciprocal,—intensified, no doubt, by the cordial sympathy which the two men felt toward each other until their intimate and affectionate friendship was ended by Mozart's early death.

The functions of kapellmeister at the Esterhazy estates were as varied as they were difficult to perform, since they included not only the directing of all musical performances, and sole control of the whole musical establishment, but in addition the further obligation of composing music at the command of his serene highness to whose employment alone the compositions should be available. Frequent performances of every sort demanded orchestral, operatic and chamber rehearsals daily, notwithstanding the further duties of maintaining a choir for the private chapel, and training a chorus for concerts and operas. Haydn's ability to play on several instruments was put to good use by instructing his subordinates individually. That such accommodations expected of him should fail to promote the realization of his highest aspirations as a composer needs hardly to be mentioned, and yet it was not by the excess duties of kapellmeister that Haydn's fullest development was hindered. Substantially, the circumstances in which he found himself for a period of over thirty years were favorable to the exigencies of his creativeness. Not only was he living in comfort at the palace, but he was in possession of a very good orchestra which he used materially for his own advantage as a composer. "I not only had the encouragement of constant approval," he said, "but as conductor of an orchestra I could make experiments, observe what produced an effect and what weakened it, and was thus in a condition to improve, alter, make additions and omissions, and be as bold as I pleased."

Yet the symphonies which he produced during this period are much inferior to those written later during his two visits to London. His natural endowments and his expressive powers were obstructed by the limited tastes of his Esterhazy audience. The guests of his noble patron were selected only from the aristocracy, and their judgments, though exerting a refining influence on his style, undoubtedly checked what would otherwise have been a spontaneous outflow of his originality. When Salomon, late in 1790, arranged for him to visit London, where he was twice engaged to write new symphonies and other compositions, Haydn was freed from the limitations of his illustrious audience, and received fresh stimulation from the wider perceptions of his English public. The change was entirely profitable. Twelve of his finest symphonies, numbering over a hundred in all, were composed during his London engagements, the popular "Surprise," "Clock," and "Military" symphonies being among them.

It should be remembered that many of what are now considered Haydn's greatest achievements were not the direct product of inspiration, the effluence of creative impulse finding inevitable expression irrespective of time and circumstance, but were composed and performed solely under contract, frequently for specific occasions. This method of production was not unusual at that period, though today it would probably be condemned as "selling" one's art. Among his quantities of compositions Haydn apparently realized great discrepancies in value, for, as the story goes, he answered George III who said to him, "Doctor Haydn, you have composed much," by remarking modestly, "Yes, Sire, a little more than was wise." He did not, in fact, write with such rapidity as it generally attributed to him, nor was he more lacking in self criticism than in discrimination. Whereas Handel, as is said, wrote "The Messiah" in twenty-four days, Haydn spent nearly eighteen months on "The Creation," and in later years he intimated that he was never completely satisfied with it. In 1799 he wrote to his publishers—"As for myself, now an old man, I hope the critics may not handle my "Creation" with too great severity and be too hard on it. They may perhaps find the musical orthography faulty in various passages and perhaps other things also which I have for so many years been accustomed to consider as minor points; but the genuine connoisseur will see the real cause as well as I do, and will willingly cast aside such stumbling blocks."

Haydn's sincerity, his ardent enthusiasm and his definite opinions on musical subjects, directed him toward the paths which he eventually pursued. In spite of his superfluous production of seemingly uninspired music, he was zealous in carrying out his own ideas, in developing those aspects of music which appealed to him above all as being beautiful or capable of becoming so through his treatment. His fondness for melody is explicit in nearly all he has written and this fact may be more responsible than we imagine for the change which took place in music at the end of the eighteenth century, viz., a gradual surplanting of the older polyphonic style of instrumental music by a more essentially melodic and harmonic form. Melody was indeed coming into its own and Haydn was one of the first to realize the simple beauty which it contains. "It is the air which is the charm of music," he said, "and it is that which is most difficult to produce. The invention of a fine melody is a work of genius." Beauty perceived, Haydn, inevitably held before him as his solitary criterion. He disregarded arbitrary rules wherever they interfered with what seemed to him to be beautiful, for "the educated ear is the sole authority" in these things.

Yet Haydn had his own method of composing according to rule, and he criticized those who in their easiness failed to accomplish unified and symmetrical results. "I was never a quick writer," he says of himself, "that is where so many young composers fail; they string together a number of fragments; they break off almost as soon as they have begun, and so at the end, the listener carries away no definite impression." Music, he felt, never achieves its purpose if no impression is made on the listener, and Haydn as a listener was aware of his own violent reactions. Of his susceptibility to the disturbing effects of his own compositions, Haydn reports one instance—"I was cold as ice one moment and seemed on fire the next." At a performance of "The Messiah" in Westminster Abbey, at which he sat near the king's box, the whole audience rose when the "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung, and Haydn wept like a child, declaring "Handel is the master of us all!" Haydn was indeed as gifted in imaginative power as he was in artistic abilty, and if his music today appears to be sometimes merely pleasant, or even trivial, it must not be forgotten that he paved the way for perhaps greater geniuses, making possible by his own achievements the more subtle and profound expression of their immense ideas. Here the true service of Haydn is revealed.

To call Haydn the "father of instrumental music" seems hardly a stretch of the truth. At least his symphonies have eclipsed those of his predecessors, and have reached a degree of preciseness in form probably never equalled after his death. His constant avoidance of thematic material strung along in piece-meal fashion, or connected by empty transitions and feeble phrases indicates the severity with which he regarded those of his contemporaries and predecessors who were more neglectful in prudence and less rigorous in self-criticism than he. His compositions as a whole are clear, exhilarated, finished productions, wealthy in melodic and harmonic content and unified in design. Though Haydn's symphonies were not the first to be written in "sonata form," since this form itself was the outcome of a long preceding development, in them this pre-existing scheme was modified and perfected. Previously it had been used more or less mechanically, without discrimination or delicacy of taste; Haydn found in it the possibility for artistic expression, the form in which progressing sounds could be molded into a figured unity.

Mozart, whose symphonies and quartets are superior in many ways to those of Haydn, was the man who, more than any other, determined the culmination of Haydn's successes as a composer of instrumental music. The fact is that Haydn's greatest compositions were written after Mozart's death, Yet the influence was certainly a mutual one. Haydn, twenty-four years Mozart's senior, born of peasant stock, and deficient in musical training, was a natural lover of folk-songs, and a self-appointed student of Philipp Emanuel Bach. Mozart, whose parents were themselves professional musicians, was carefully reared in aristocratic and musical circles, received the best of instruction, followed the Italian rather than the Teutonic style of contemporary music, and wrote under the prevailing shadow of John Christian Bach. Mozart's precocity was the more outstanding, for he composed his first symphony at the age of eight. Not until his resources had achieved their utmost expression, before 1790, did Haydn begin seriously to feel his influence, and the London symphonies were all composed after his last farewell to Mozart, who died a year later.

It can be said with assurance that Mozart, writing in his prime, was affected by the early Haydn, and that Haydn's maturest productions in turn were created under the influence of his young master. Haydn was indeed the pioneer both of symphonic and quartet writing, but his own environment and gradual development were in part responsible for results characteristically different from those of Mozart. In their quartets, both men reached a degree of technical perfection which probably has never again been attained; by their treatment, the orchestra was not only enlarged by the rapid development of symphonies and concertos, but was transformed to meet the requirements which their imaginative and artistic natures demanded. The crudity of instrumental music disappeared in their hands, and though neither composer eliminated completely the existing tendency to treat wind instruments as a rather indefinite means of holding given harmonies throughout the disturbing figures of other instruments, their use of the strings became more highly organized than ever before in the history of instrumental music.

Mozart's symphonies undoubtedly have much more popular appeal today than Haydn's. His minuets are certainly more crystalline, more precise in quality, and lack the rustic savor which is so characteristic of Haydn. The delicacy and refinement of Italian instrumental music finds embodiment once more in the expressions of Mozart's genius, but the true Teutonic spirit, united with the Croatian traditions of Austria-Hungary becomes incarnate in the musical productions of Joseph Haydn.

JAMES H. FASSETT

Haydn Speaks

Self-Judgment and a Highly Modernistic Opinion

SOME of my children are well-bred; some ill-bred; while here and there is a changeling among them . . . I know that God has bestowed a talent upon me, and I thank Him for it. I think I have done my duty and been of use in my generation. Let others do the same.

WHAT is the good of rules? Art is free and should be fettered by no mechanical regulations. The educated ear is the sole authority, and I think I have as much right to lay down the law as anyone. This trifling about consecutive Fourths is absurd. I wish instead that some one would compose a new minuet.

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

Bach's Mass Heard Again, Full-Voiced

Conductor, Orchestra, Chorus, Outdo the Performances Of Last Year

IT MAY truly be said that Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth and their Cambridge choirs, have together restored Bach's Mass in B minor to the place it should have in every capital of music. A place, that is to say, permitting recurrent performance before an assured audience. A spring ago when they revived the Mass after years of neglect, to be beginning and end of a Bach Festival, audiences filled Symphony Hall and spared not either in stirred listening or rewarding applause. When the Mass was repeated yesterday, as numerous a company attended both "sessions"; while the response was yet more signal. As an assembly it was notable for an aspect of youth—auspicious sign for the present and the future of "serious" music in Boston. Once more the listening was rapt, seldom disturbed by the bronchial dissonances that are unfailing sign of the so-called New-England spring.

Applause, moreover, swelled above that of last March. At the end of the "first part" which terminates in the climax of the Gloria, the audience rose to clap conductor, chorus, orchestra and solo-singers until they in turn were also standing; until it was certain that Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation might not draw the Cambridge choir-leaders from over-modest hiding. At the end of the whole Mass in the evening, the clapping was still longer, louder and more insistent, interspersed withal by stamping and shouts. Soon it drew Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth to the edge of the stage, whereupon their choirs redoubled plaudits. Finally, by a happy impulse among the other participants, Dr. Koussevitzky was left alone with chorus and orchestra. Then indeed the applause, whatever its kind, rose fullest. Already the conductor had shaken the collective hand of theorchestra in the flesh of the Concertmaster, and the individual hands of the players of the instrumental solos. It was pleasure also to see their names arrayed on the program; Mr. Burgin for the violin; Mr. Böttcher for the horn; Mr. Speyer and Mr. Devergie for the oboi d'amore.

In another respect these plaudits were desirable. They signified that through afternoon and evening the audience had been listening to a concert of music and properly regarded it as such. In some quarters there is tendency to count the singing and playing of the Mass in B minor as churchly rite to be heard accordingly; whereas it has never been sung as part of the Roman liturgy and is never likely to be. Indeed, it is doubtful whether Bach, as he wrote, gave a thought to such usage. Others again prefer a vaguer word and regard performance as a "service." Now it is quite true that Bach composed to the text of the Roman office—because it lay ready to his purpose. It is as true that in the Mass he sets forth the petitions, the praise, the beliefs and the mysteries of Christian faith. He sounds them, however, as music that shall so express his own devout, mystical, trusting and proclaiming spirit; sounds them so exaltedly and penetratingly that what was individual has become universal down the centuries. Jew and Greek, as St. Paul has it, atheist and pagan as we might now add, may hardly hear the Mass in B minor without answering emotion, if an ear and a soul for music are within him. Though Bach himself may have been unwitting, what was meant for humankind may not warrantably be identified with the church.

Though the quality of available voices, musical intelligence and "teachability"—if there is such a word—inevitably alters from year to year at Harvard and Radcliffe, the performance of Sunday was more thoroughgoing, irradiating and impressive than those of last spring. Dr. Koussevitzky has found and tested the true balance between chorus and orchestra, so that the choral mass never overwhelms the instrumental voices. The strings, the re-enforced woodwinds, the horns, trumpets and kettledrums all signify, each according to place in the score. The conductor, moreover, is quick to hear the dramatizing or delineative purport of many an instrumental measure; so to sound and intensify it. The obbligati in turn profit by the skill, the sense of style, the "musicality" of the players. As he proved with Chaikovsky on Friday and Saturday, with Bach on Sunday—rather opposite poles—this generation in Boston knows no horn-player comparable with Mr. Böttcher; while Mr. Speyer and Mr. Devergie played the oboi d'amore with a sweet-toned pungency that might have been their very voice in Bach's ear.

Moreover, if Dr. Koussevitzky dramatized, neither he nor the solo-singers forgot the essentially contemplative quality of the airs and the duets. Mme. Matzenauer, for the [illegible] alto-part, descries it, feels also the mysticism that often infuses it; gives the projecting voice with the resource and the surety that—if the purists will pardon us—only the opera house may teach. In degree, Mr. Gange's sense of style with Bach gains the same end, interpenetrating the dignity and largeness of the bass airs with a measured emotion. Mr. Crooks, in the tenor part, is beginning to share the perceptions of his more experienced associates; while Mme. Evans, the soprano, kept capable company with the rest. The proof for all four is at hand. Only in these airs and duets does Bach write in an idiom of a period—his own—and in a churchly fashion then in vogue in Germany. Examples of it, as in the Passions, are sometimes hard for the twentieth-century ear to bear. But who yesterday, in these numbers, thought of tedium?

For the chorus, the reviewer as he writes, may well dread blame for extravagance of praise. As long ago as the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs joined the Symphony Orchestra in the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," some objected that these youthful voices had neither the body nor the timbres essential to the music. The reproach was renewed when they first sang Bach's Mass. It is not necessary at the moment to argue the contention so far as it applies to the musical speech of Beethoven when it darkens with the dolors of a spirit in travail or broods profoundly upon the issues of life. With the Mass in B minor, on the other hand, the loss, if any, seems offset by the gains. In Sunday's performance, to cite example, the youthful timbre of the voices lent a luster to the soprano and the tenor parts that maturity seldom gains. The singing shone like the face of Aaron when he came down from the mountain; while it is within belief that it was more transparent than was that priestly countenance. Nor were the underlying and sometimes preponderant altos and basses to be justly reproached with a tone that lacked sufficient body for the upper voices, the orchestra or the music itself.

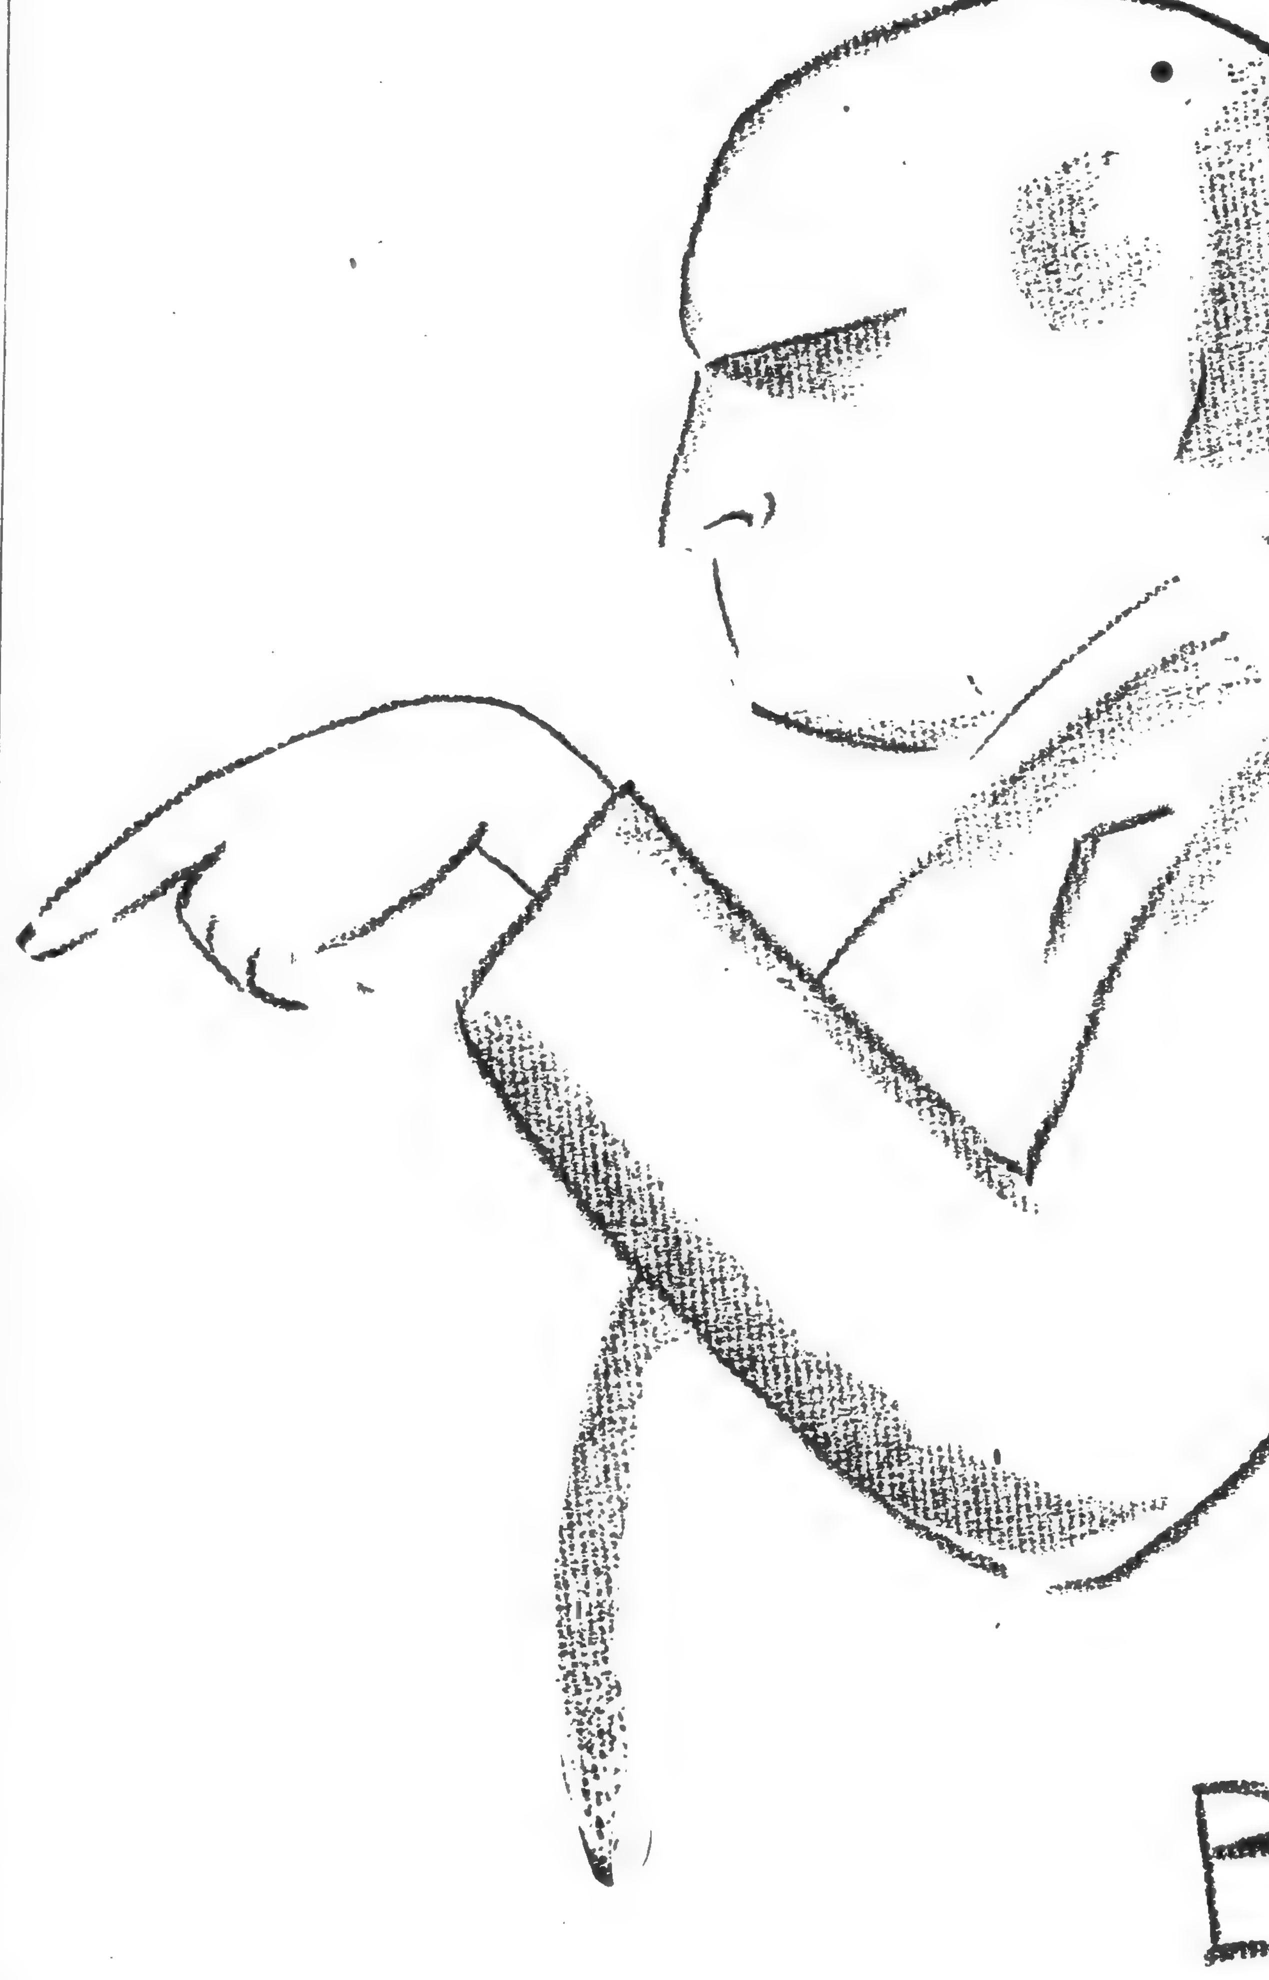
Besides, the lightness and the pliancy of these youthful voices gave Bach's florid counterpoint—as often it is—a freedom, flow and instant effect upon listening ears that for maturer tones might be difficult to gain. A chorus numbered by tens and twenties in the several parts was actually accomplishing ornaments of song. It was also singing with a perceiving sense and a transmitting command of phrase and period, balance and modulation, of part interwoven with part, possible only, as it seemed, to the young valor that dreads nothing, to the young ardor that gives with whole-hearted devotion.

To such degree made master of its task by the preceptors in Cambridge, this chorus could react to Dr. Koussevitzky's dramatizing imagination and intensifying zeal. Probably enough, Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth shared them in the preparatory work. It is hard to conceive a chorus traversing more resourcefully, graphically and dynamically the gamut of imagery and emotion that the Gloria and the Creed body forth; sounding with more exaltation the superbities of the Sanctus—only here might the ear have wished for deeper tones; intertwining yet another strand—the human cry—into the unfolding counterpoint of the Kyrie or into the simpler petition of the end. Though to some the reviewer will blaspheme, there are pages in the Mass in B minor that Bach has filled by his science of counterpoint and little enough of inspiration. The pleasure upon the ear of the choral singing in itself now made them tolerable.

Some also, who prefer "reverent" performances of Bach, meaning thereby performances that are "academic," "traditional" and all that will doubtless reproach Dr. Koussevitzky as one who over-emotionalizes and over-dramatizes the Mass in B minor. In the first place it his nature and his virtue to emotionalize and dramatize, unless the music in hand be cool, cerebral and formalized pattern-weaving. In the second place, the Mass in itself, save only on the pages over which counterpoint is a self-sufficient tonal science, invite such expression. Imagine formalizing such an outburst as "Et resurrexit!" The Gloria and the Credo are well-springs of emotion. In their counterpoint the composers of Palestrina's time and influence would disembody and rarefy it. Bach in his—and to his greater glory—would embody it and humanize it. He wrote out of his own devout spirit; but in the tones he put to music-paper, he spoke "for us men and our salvation" even to this day.

In the airs and duets Bach subdued himself to contemplation; in the choruses he gave rein to a puissant creative imagination that could not choose but emotionalize and dramatize—and in counterpoint! Any conductor, who in his turn imagines, fails not to do likewise. . . . The heavens are rolled back and out of them to answering earth sound Bach's Sanctus and Osanna. What conductor will not exhaust himself to draw from his forces every tonal splendor, every exaltation of spirit? And in the Benedictus and the Agnus Dei, it is possible to hear the homely Bach kneeling in petition before his God that he may rise strengthened in his faith and his vision. The conductor would be at fault who did not intensify such hearing. It is easy to demur, if one likes, to Dr. Koussevitzky's pace here, his phrasing there, his accents yet again. What does one or the other matter, so long as it vitalizes Bach's music. There is a tradition in Leipzig that the impatient old Cantor once cried to his trumpets: "You must sing out." So also must the Mass in B minor. And it did. H. T. P.

The Moving Finger



Archibald T. Davison

Conductor of the Harvard Glee Club, Source and Cause of Its Association—and That of the Radcliffe Choral Society—with the Symphony Orchestra in Such Concerts as That of Sunday (From a Sketch Made at Rehearsal)

piece that for its

The News About Boston Musicians

Koussevitzky, Program-Maker, New Piece by Mr. Foote, Toch Again

THERE ought to be a society for the promotion of temperance among program-makers—presided over, of course, by the, in this respect, altogether admirable Mr. Koussevitzky. To its attention I would draw the recent programs of Messrs. Beecham, Stokowski and Ross of the Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestras and the Schola Cantorum. Sir Thomas, arriving in this country, announces that we Americans are too much under the influence of jazz and do not hear enough classical music, following up his statement with such unfamiliar classics as Strauss's "Don Quixote," Brahms's Third Symphony and César Franck's in D minor—the latter unheard here since Mr. Golschmann played it, almost three long months ago. Mr. Stokowski continues to kill modern music with kindness: his latest concert was his second program this season devoted almost exclusively to first hearings of contemporary works.

It is a mistaken idea that there are two kinds of people—those that like familiar music and those that like unfamiliar—and that a concert should devote itself exclusively to one or the other. There are doubtless many who are intolerant of any unfamiliar music at all; but there are certainly few who dislike all familiar music, and fewer still who can remain alert through an entire evening of first hearings. Mr. Koussevitzky, by his judicious assortment of familiar works and novelties, makes more friends for the latter than Mr. Stokowski, with his aggressive championing of them. He also makes it possible for his auditors to listen to new works in some sort of proper setting. [Arthur Mendel in the New York Nation

Bow from The Capital

As so often happens in the musical world of the Eastern United States, we in New York shall have, in this intance [the Goethe Centenary] to depend upon the benefactions of another community. It now appears that the Boston Symphony Orchestra purposes to bring to Carnegie Hall at its next week's pair of concerts (April 7-9) the evidently remarkable exhibition of the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt which Mr. Koussevitzky lately achieved in Boston, in fit and happy commemoration of the Goethe anniversary. Our own musical organizations having one and all ignored the shining opportunity to pay adequate musical tribute to the genius who deeply influenced the imaginations of Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, Boito, Mahler (and how many other tone-poets?), one must hope that a New York repetition of the Bostonians' performance will occur as promised. [Lawrence Gilman in The Herald Tribune

Second Hearings

The touchstone of the Symphony Concerts is the audience of Saturday—practised, alert, open-minded, in applause given to speaking that mind. Therefore Mr. Toch may depart well content with his fortune in Boston. For in the evening his Suite and his Piano-Concerto—to say nothing of the composer himself—were far better received than at the matinée. The applause, indeed, for all three was genuine, general and hearty. Nor were the ardors of the audience then exhausted. At the end of the performance of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, it flocked forward in numbers to the foot of the stage to hail the conductor and the orchestra. When there is occasion for warmth Bostonian audiences are far from "cold." The notion that they are such is one of the "traditions" descended from the older Boston that the new does well to disperse.

From Symphony Hall

There is no telling what these modernists may do. At the matinée of Friday Mr. Toch even broke with sartorial precedent. Long ago the tailed coat became optional as formal garment, in the afternoon, for "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts. Hitherto, however, the working jacket replacing it has been dark blue or black, with trousers to match or in gentle contrast. Instead, a modest gray "complet," as the French call it, clothed Mr. Toch from head to foot. More than one morning-coated pianist will envy him his independence—and his comfort.

Mr. Prokofiev, no stranger to Symphony Hall, may be expected there on Dec. 30-31 next for the first performances in America of his new Concerto for piano and orchestra. The following week Dr. Koussevitzky will take it to New York.

168

The Round Of Haydn's Symphonies

Excursions Hither and Thither Along the Way to Our Centenary Concerts

MAR. 31 — TRANS.

TODAY is Haydn's birthday. Exactly two hundred years ago in the village of Rohrau in Lower Austria the genial composer came into the world. To honor the occasion Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will play tomorrow and Saturday a program assembled from his works. It will begin with a symphony which is usually described as the first on the master's long list. It will end with the last of his symphonies, thus spanning his entire lifework in this field. On the way it will include the well-known "Surprise" Symphony and the Concerto for Violoncello in D major, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

The 104

How much of Haydn's work is actually known—known not only to the concert-going public but to scholars? The facts of the composer's life are, in the main, common property of those who care to know them. A whole pageful was printed in The Transcript last Saturday. But the bulk of the composer's work is still an unknown quantity even to those who might consider themselves initiates. Who has ever heard more than a handful of his Symphonies? Or who among the curious has even seen the scores of them? Who can tell their number? Some of these questions the writer had intended to answer in this article. Others came to him in making the attempt. Surely, he thought, the resources of the Allen Brown Library would answer all questions which he could raise. It had always been so in the past. It would be so again.

What he discovered was chiefly the lack of information or of source-material in regard to the works of this two-hundred-year-old composer. The first thing to attract his attention was the diminution in the number of symphonies which can surely be attributed to Haydn. When the writer was a student he learned that Haydn had written 125 symphonies. The statement came from the two most trustworthy manuals for school use—themselves following larger authoritative works—manuals still widely studied. The new light emerged from the introduction to a complete edition of Haydn's works projected by the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, under the editorship of the late Eusebius Mandyczewski, long librarian of the Philharmonic Society in Vienna and deeply versed in the annals of Viennese music. He writes:

"The number of symphonies which Haydn wrote cannot be determined with certainty. The very name, symphony, creates difficulties, especially in regard to the older works. What is called 'symphony' in one place, can be found in others as overture, divertimento, cassation, notturno, scherzando, quartetto. Further: not all works which have appeared under Haydn's name will bear critical scrutiny as to authenticity. On the other hand, it may be taken for granted that beyond any doubt many things that Haydn wrote are irretrievably lost."

Mandyczewski examined a total of 194 works which might come under the classification of symphonies written by Haydn. He used seven catalogues for the purpose, among them (1) Haydn's own "list of all works which I can remember having composed from my eighteenth to my seventy-third year"; (2) Gottlob Immanuel Breitkopf's catalogues from 1762 to 1787, who "frequently admits and laments uncertainty of authorship" in them, and from whom it is evident that many doubtful works were attributed to Haydn; (3) the lists of Pohl, Haydn's chief biographer. Be it said, that in addition to these seven lists there is also the important catalogue of the Philharmonic Society of London. Mandyczewski's studies convinced him that the works in question should be classified as follows. 1. Authentic symphonies of Haydn, 104, dating from 1759 to 1795. 2. Overtures, 16. 3. Symphonies falsely attributed to Haydn, 38. 4. Doubtful, 36. Mandyczewski's enumeration appears to be universally accepted (with but minor qualifications) by recent writers.

Down the List

The second discovery was the non-existence as yet of any complete edition of the symphonies which would make it possible to trace the course of Haydn's symphonic progress. Breitkopf and Härtel ceased publication of the Mandyczewski edition after reaching the fortieth part. The symphonies are available only in random collections of various publishers; while even in this form not all of the 104 are accessible. Only the twelve "London Symphonies" are readily available in many editions. It will be noted that in the program book the last two symphonies are numbered in two ways.—Nos. 94 and 104 are from Mandyczewski's list, B. & H. Nos. 6 and 2 are from Breitkopf and Härtel's first publication of Haydn's work (in 1854 and thereafter), which actually began with the last of the "London Symphonies," but which did not include more than thirty numbers, according to Altmann's catalogue. At concerts of the Boston Orchestra all the "London Symphonies" have been played, also Nos. 31, 73, 82, 85, 90, 92 of Mandyczewski's list.

That list begins with the Symphony in D major which is to be played first at the concerts of Friday and Saturday. It was the first symphony composed by Haydn after he became Kapellmeister to Count Morzin in 1759. Grove's dictionary questions whether it can rightly be called the composer's first symphony. From the years 1755-59 come the composer's first instrumental works, "a series which he called by the titles of divertimento, nocturnes, cassations, and in which he adapted to a larger medium the structural lessons which he had learned from the Sonatas of C. P. E. Bach." There were eighteen in all, some of them for four strings, some of them including wind instruments. "In this quiet and unpretentious manner there came into existence his first quartet and his first symphony, the latter now erroneously included among his quartets as Op. 1, No. 5. It was scored for strings, oboes and horns." These works, according to Grove, have five movements, including two minuets. "In his Opus 3 Haydn began to establish the four-movement scheme which since his day has been the usual tradition of chamber music" and of the symphony. The symphony of the current concerts is said by Grove to be "precisely similar to that of Op. 1, No. 5, though the treatment is more genial and mature."

Nicknames and Handicaps

Many of Haydn's symphonies bear titles. Mandyczewski's list mentions twenty-seven such titles. Frederick Niecks, in his "Program Music" has this to say on the subject: "Some of these titles do not indicate a program. Nor are we able to tell which were given by the composer and which by others. The 'Maria Theresa' symphony is so-called because it was played before that empress; 'La Reine de France,' no doubt, because it pleased Queen Marie Antoinette; the 'Oxford' because it was performed there on the occasion of the composer's receiving the honorary degree of doctor of music. The 'Surprise' Symphony owes its title to the kettledrum effect in the Andante; the "Clock" Symphony to the tic-tac in the Andante; the 'Roxelane' Symphony to the utilization of the French romance of the same name in the Andante; 'l'Ours' and 'La Chasse' to the character of the last movement; the 'Military' Symphony to the character of the second. Why another symphony bears the title 'La Poule' is not known. The 'Farewell' Symphony was a musical petition to Prince Esterházy not to keep the band any longer at his palace in Hungary and away from their families. . . . Noteworthy are the three early symphonies 'Le Matin,' 'Le Midi' and 'Le Soir,' all dated 1761, and probably the first Haydn wrote for Prince Esterházy. The programs of the symphonies with the following titles are unknown: 'Laudon,' 'Schoolmaster,' 'Lamentations,' 'Il Distratto,' 'Philosopher,' etc. Niecks also gives a long program which he says Haydn pointed out measure for measure to one Carpani, but adds that later Carpani was not able to identify the symphony. Niecks concludes by giving a considerable list of titles which he cannot connect with specific works. A few of them are not on Mandyczewski's list.

It is likely that Haydn's actual work has suffered greatly by misapprehension of his position and significance. He has been too much considered a mere link—of a sort of archæological interest—between the great gods, Bach and Beethoven. He himself has said that he learned much from his orchestra in the thirty years at Esterházy, from which it is too easy to infer that he was an unformed young cub when he first entered the prince's household. As a matter of fact he was probably, even at that time, the world's ablest composer. C. P. E. Bach, his chief model, said of him that he was the only man who understood how to get full value out of his (Bach's) sonatas. The young Mozart, with the world for his teacher, probably learned more from Haydn than from any other. The fact that Haydn's twelve "London Symphonies' are his most mature work has militated too much against the early symphonies. Let it be borne in mind that eighteen works in ensemble form had actually preceded the "First Symphony"—twice as many as the entire symphonies of Beethoven and about half as many as Mozart's. Examination of these first symphonies shows that they are remarkably well formed, that they are already a long advance on the Sonatas of C. P. E. Bach—more of an advance than are Beethoven's early works upon the contemporary work of his model, the same Haydn. As in Beethoven's case, Haydn's progress consists in expansion of form and deepening of content. Early Haydn shows with surprising clearness a major source of Mozart. One could almost think it more "Mozartean" than "Haydnesque."

To the Programs

The so-called First Symphony is in three movements, scored for strings, two oboes and two horns. The first movement, Presto, is a concise, admirably balanced, sonata-form, with a short, bustling first theme, a more supple, gracefully formed second theme, a proper working-out and recapitulation. The second movement, Andante, is for strings alone, an expressive, typical Bachian two-part form. The third movement, again Presto, is very short, the instrumentation the same as the first movement, the form similar to the second. The whole radiates charm and a gentle expressiveness. Not by accident did Prince Esterházy, whose court has been said by one writer to have been second in brilliance only to that of Versailles, turn to Haydn for chief musician.

Symphony No. 104 (B. & H. No. 2) begins with an introduction, "Adagio," in D minor, which according to one writer is "as weighty and bold as anything we admire in Beethoven." The main body of this movement, "Allegro," turns to the more cheerful D major. The theme is bright and typically Haydnesque. It is repeated in the key and the usual place of the second theme, such "second theme" as there is, is of very episodical nature. There is full development of motives from the main theme, and a recapitulation that omits the "second theme" altogether. The second movement, "Andante," in G major, is in free variation form, with much graceful ornamentation. The Minuet is a particularly strong one with smoothly flowing trio. The finale is an Allegro Spiritoso, which is again in sonata-form. The first theme bears a certain kinship to the theme of the first movement. The second is a more sustained melody in half notes. Both are developed in the working-out section. The recapitulation begins with the theme in 'cellos, basses, violas, horns and bassoons. This last symphony is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two "clarini," kettle drums and string quintet.

Is any analysis of the "Surprise" symphony needed at this time? Its movements are those of No. 104: Introduction and Allegro; Andante, which is also a theme with variations and which contains the "surprise" chord; a minuet, and a Finale. Its chief "surprise" for the writer this time was the announcement on Wednesday that it was to be substituted for No. 103 (B & H. No. 1) in E-flat, "with the drumroll," as originally announced.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of April 15 and 16, with The Cecilia, prepared by Arthur Fiedler, for assisting chorus.

Exultate Deo	Daniels
Epitaph (In Memory of Serge Diaghilev)	Dukelsky
Symphony of Psalms	Stravinsky
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in D minor (Pianist: Myra Hess)	Brahms
Three Hungarian Dances	Brahms

The Psalms-Symphony, one of Stravinsky's master-works, was first heard last year as contribution to the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra. . . . Mr. Dukelsky's "Epitaph" draws text from a Russian poem by Ossip Mandelstamm intended for inscription on the tomb of Diaghilev at Venice. It celebrates the founder and sustainer of the Russian ballet as renewer of old arts and invigorator of new. The composer writes for soprano, mixed chorus, and an orchestra reduced in the brass choir but including two guitars.

Incidents and Prospects

APR. 1 TRANS.

Dr. Koussevitzky has lately received and accepted an invitation from the renowned Philharmonic Society of Vienna to be guest-conductor at a concert next June. . . . This season its regular conductors, Clemens Krauss and Richard Strauss, have followed a custom of their guest from Symphony Hall—the inclusion in nearly every program of a piece of new music.

Ferde Groffe, who has scored many a jazz piece for orchestra and written one and another on his own account, lately put to music-paper "Tabloid," a "symphonic impression" of such newspapers. He hopes for performance at The Pops this summer.

Haydn Honored by Boston Symphony

Apr ✓

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

For the twenty-first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (April 1-2) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky prepared a program made up of works by Franz Joseph Haydn, whose bicentennial year it is. The concert opened with the Symphony No. 1 in D major and closed with No. 104 in D major (B. & H. No. 2). Between them came the "Surprise" Symphony and the Cello Concerto in D, with Mr. Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

This was a concert which may well have abashed any listeners in the habit of employing a patronizing tone in referring to "Papa" Haydn. Haydn is a great composer who has been neglected by those modernists who are always going back to somebody. Perhaps he will be the goal of Mr. Stravinsky's next historical excursion. Whether he is or not, he will live, not as the man who invented the symphonic form for Mozart and Beethoven to play with, but as an original musical genius. There are more surprises in Haydn scores than the loud chord in the Andante of the G major Symphony. There are amazing rhythmic ingenuities, audacious harmonies, charming modulations, exquisite shaping of the melodic line, endless melodic invention, lively humor and an emotional power clearly foreshadowing Beethoven. Observe the introductions to the first movements of the Symphonies B. & H. Nos. 6 and 2; or the Scherzo-like Menuetto of the latter, or its stirring first Allegro.

Such works as these constitute a searching test for orchestras and for conductors, a test which on the present occasion was passed with distinction. It was possible to feel that the pace of the Finale of the "Surprise" Symphony was a shade too fast—not for the players but for the listener. Otherwise it would be difficult to propose betterments in interpretation or in performance. There was precisely the necessary limpidity for the early symphony, played by a much reduced orchestra. Thereafter there was a just crescendo to a dramatic conclusion.

The soloist was in perfect accord with the occasion and with his fellow artists. His mastery of tonal beauty and of technical requirements was devoted to a thoroughly musical homage. Mr. Piatigorsky, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were applauded with unaccustomed warmth by the Friday afternoon audience.

L. A. S.

A Well-Filled Birthday for Joseph Haydn

Three Symphonies, A Concerto, Conductor and 'Cellist, Sound His Praises

Tran Apr ✓

THE grumbling prophets were mistaken. Three symphonies and a concerto of Haydn—to disclose the full stature of the composer on the two hundredth anniversay of his birth—neither thinned nor bored the usual audience at the Symphony Concert. The upper balcony, believed by anxious dowagers to be the haunt of incorrigible young modernists, held the usual numbers; while below stairs no more places were empty than any spring-like Friday may disclose. Nor did more depart than ordinarily find a two-hour concert over-long for their attention—or their engagements. Indeed rather fewer sped early toward the doors. From the first entrance to the final exit of Dr. Koussevitzky applause was generous. Twice over the standing orchestra shared it. For the violoncellist in the Concerto, Mr. Piatigorsky, it was uncommonly hearty and persistent.

There was diversion, besides, for the eye—in the sight of the small orchestra that began the afternoon with Haydn's First Symphony, gradually expanding into the full orchestra—by the measure of the seventeen-nineties—that played his last. For the ear also came a moment of unexpected excitement. The First Symphony ended with a light-toned, gayly moving, simply patterned Presto. The following Symphony—in G major, of 1791 and full maturity—began with a grave and full-voiced Adagio. On the instant, and with a perceptible stir in the concert-room, the listeners had bridged a symphonic age. Once more Dr. Koussevitzky stood justified in his observance of anniversaries. He makes the most of such occasions. There is imagination—with a dash of showmanship—in his handling of them. A fragment from Haydn's choral music might have diversified the program. But there was no time to prepare the number from "The Seasons" that the conductor, last autumn, had in mind.

This First Symphony, written in Haydn's twenty-seventh year, was part of his first service to a nobleman. (The venerable and learned editor of the program-book had name and castle pat. Whoever he was, he preceded the later and more important Esterhazys.) It is scored for a little band of violins, violas and violoncellos, supplemented by two oboes and two horns. Supplemented rather than joined, since throughout the string quartet keeps the better part. A short Presto begins it; a shorter Presto ends it; between, for strings only, runs a brief Andante. Throughout the patterns are clear and simple; the musical ideas apt but little developed; the workmanship neat and light-fingered. The first Presto bustles amiably; the Andante sings gently; the Finale speeds gayly.

Suavities and graces, with no mood, save for a hint in the slower movement, other than desire to please. "Period music" as well, descending from the sons of Bach, but untroubled by any of the experiments in German Mannheim, uncrossed by any sure premonitions of the Haydn that at Esterház and, much more, in London was to be. Had the well-made, contented little Symphony borne any other signature, who in these nineteen-thirties—outside the omniscient archæologists—would have disagreed? Oftener the listener took thought of the cultivated taste in the Austrian princes employing such music-masters than of the music-master himself.

Then, as already noted, to the Haydn who worked in London in his sixties, in no twilight but at a belated noon. The theorists who would have every artist the product of environment, may reason as they like about the influence upon Haydn of life in a capital city in which he was honored and rewarded; of the freedom that his contract gave him; of other circumstances feeding his ambition and ripening his powers. Enough for us casual listeners that from this "Surprise" Symphony emerged the Haydn whose mature music has survived a hundred and forty years and countless fashions; bids fair to survive as many more. The Haydn who felt as well as patterned sang out of the slow introduction. The Haydn who was master-craftsman, fertile in invention, ready with resource, wrote the ensuing Vivace. No wonder that the pedants of the day, noting freedoms and artifices, counted him a dangerous modernist! Humor of a sort ran in him. By the tradition he gave it outlet in the crashing chord that interrupts the theme of the Andante. Listening Londoners heard it with amusement. Gentlemen of the press made much of it.

Perhaps we others are more pleased with the mingled fancy and craft playing through the succeeding variations; or the fine-tempered sonorities of the Minuet and Trio; even the fleet bravura of the Finale. In this anniversary program the "Surprise" Symphony may stand for the canonized Haydn—the composer who soon put by the gravities of the introduction; smiled genially out of the first movement; released a momentary humor in the second, then went on to melody, modulation and transformation, all of unfailing grace; struck off his Minuet in gallant style; with happy contrasts spiced his finale. In a word the Haydn who pleases through a Bostonian matinée in 1932 hardly a whit less than he did through a Londonian evening in 1791—and "the quality" present at both.

169

For the end of the concert Dr. Koussevitzky reserved the climax of the afternoon—the Last Symphony, in D major written and produced at London in 1795, unplayed through ten years at Symphony Hall. Now, at last, Haydn stood forth as composer of power. Not of course, as we measure it with Beethoven, for example, or even with Mozart of the final symphonies. But of power as Haydn's later audiences understood the word; as our ears also heard, prepared through the afternoon by the conductor's progressive tutelage. The introductory Adagio sounded large and bold and tense and full. The succeeding Allegro abounded in unorthodox freedoms, in strokes that looked forward to a new breed of symphonists, even, in an instance or two, as far as this day of ours.

The variations of the Andante continued these freedoms. What we call the sentiment within the grace may well have seemed to the first audiences a proper emotion. The Minuet strode full-gaited and full-charged; the trio sounded the wistful note of the deeper-touched Haydn. The final Allegro was more than fleet pattern-weaving. Vigor propelled it. Modulations struck sparks, if not fire. In sum the Haydn of a hundred symphonies whose power over matter, form and manner ran at flood in the very Symphony in which he put them all by. It ran the richer for the just warmths, vigors and clarities of conductor and orchestra. They had played the First Symphony to charm with pellucid simplicities; the "Surprise" Symphony to set clear the familiar traits. And Haydn's music, first, last and all the time, is mirror to the merits—or the shortcomings—of those that play it.

The familiar Concerto for Violoncello had been middle piece between the two mature Symphonies. Let it pass in itself for proof of Haydn's adaptability and fertility in whatever form and for whatever purpose he chose to write; as evidence also of the sensitive ear with which he had listened to the virtuoso-'cellists of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra. For the while, moreover, Mr. Piatigorsky, playing, was more interesting than Haydn composing. A year ago when he was heard with the orchestra in Schumann's Concerto, he had barely recovered from a wasting sickness. Now he returned in full fettle. He sounded songful measures in a tone that never once sentimentalized them or overdrove the voice of an instrument sensitive above most to exaggeration. It was a poised tone as well, respectful of the purities of the ancient style yet sufficiently sensuous upon the modern ear.

In the passage-work and the ornament Mr. Piatigorsky's touch upon bow and strings was light and clear, graceful and elegant. Ascending to the difficult upper range of the violoncello, he preserved the integrity of his tone, neither shrilling nor contorting. There was no thickening or rumbling when he descended to the lower depths. Sensitive master of his instrument, he was as sensitive with the Concerto before him. Nothing in it escaped him; nothing lost intrinsic quality. If a finely tempered virtuoso played, a discerning and responsive musician also read. The breed of violoncellists who are also musicians, seemed to wane with the decline of Mr. Casals. Now it stands renewed in Mr. Piatigorsky. And every frequenter of the Symphony Concerts knows what accompaniments Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra can play when a virtuoso-musician joins with them. Haydn's own orchestra at Esterház may not have served his Concerto half so well.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY GIVES DAY TO HAYDN

First, Surprise and Last of His Symphonies Performed

Post Apr 2

Yesterday afternoon for the first time in its history and, no doubt, for the last, barring this evening's repetition, the Symphony Orchestra offered an entire programme of the music of Franz Josef Haydn. The occasion was the 200th anniversary of Haydn's birth. For the "Father of the Symphony," like the "Father of his Country," was born in the Year of Grace 1732.

FIRST, SURPRISE AND LAST

Since there are 104 well-authenticated symphonies of Haydn, Dr. Koussevitsky in making this all-Haydn programme had a wide range of choice. With his usual ingenuity in such matters, he selected the first of them in D major composed in 1759, and the last, in the same key, written in 1795, while between them he placed the ever-popular symphony "with the drum stroke," known in English-speaking countries as the "Surprise," and the Concerto for Violoncello with no less a virtuoso than Gregor Piatigorsky to play the solo part.

Now that the significance of C. P. E. Bach and of the Mannheim School is well understood, Haydn's claim to the fathership of the symphony is no longer technically valid. But in the sense that he was the first considerable symphonist, the first whose works in the form have remained consistently in the repertory and, for aught that we know, may stay there for yet another hundred years, the familiar appellation may still be said to apply to him.

First Light and Short

In view of the enormous development of the symphony and of orchestral music in general since Haydn's time, we have come to look upon even his ripest and maturest efforts as tentative. Set in the midst of the usual orchestral programme, a symphony of Haydn may well make this impression, may easily seem, if not antiquated, at least old-fashioned, harmonically meagre and thinly scored. But yesterday a surprising thing occurred.

The First Symphony, with which the programme began, is in very truth a symphony of a decidedly tentative sort. Between them its three movements fill hardly more than 10 minutes; the scoring is for strings and a pair each of oboes and horns. The musical content while not without charm, is undeniably slight.

MUSIC

Globe Apr 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestr

Franz Josef Haydn was bo March 31, 1732. Accordingly the pr gram of yesterday's Symphony co cert was devoted to his music. began with what is regarded as t first of his many symphonies, one D major, written in 1750, and end with the familiar one in the same k written in 1795, and the last he co posed. Between these works sto the "Surprise" symphony and concerto for violoncello, in whi Gregor Piatigorsky was the s player. Three symphonies on a s gle program must be very nearly t record at these concerts.

Most young musicians, both amate and professional, go through a sta of being supercilious about Hadyn. H music sounds so simple, and they ide tify the simple with the obvious, wi the naive, the childish in art. Event ally most of them discover that Hay is not so simple as he sounds, a perceive that the musical texture Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff a many another far more exciting, m sonorous, more modern compose work, is much more obvious and chi ish than that of Haydn's music.

Music Amiable

Haydn's music is always amia always pleasing, never melodrama never thrilling. But it wears w Yesterday's concert was one of most delightful in recent seaso There was cordial and prolonged a plausue after every number. Ho many works once felt as melodramat and thrilling have slumped into d oblivion while Haydn's masterpiec have continued to delight listeners t world over.

The little symphony with which t concert began had more than a hi toric interest. Its beautiful lucidi of style and its freshness and vigor substance made it appealing even listeners not interested in the tec nical problem of the evolution of t symphonic form, in which Hayd played a major role.

In the concerto for violoncello, in major, written in 1783, the warm and glow of the melodic style recal Mozart. This concerto is the best ev written for solo cello. Mr Piatigorsk the young Russian cellist whose de here last season made an exceptiona ly favorable impression, again prov himself a master of his instrume The cadenzas he used (were they h own?) were extraordinarily brillia technical displays, but not in t Haydn style.

The warmth and purity of tone, t exactness of pitch save for a fe slips on harmonics, the avoidance excessive portamento effects in h playing all set Mr Piatigorsky apa from and above most cellists. It is unfair to remember that the last previous performance here of this concerto was by Pablo Casals. Mr Casals' unequaled musicianship set a standard of taste and style that was not attained by Mr Piatigorsky. But it is possible that he may attain it in time, something one could prophesy of no other living cellist.

Breadth of Style

The two familiar symphonies, both written in maturity, showed that Haydn could be more than merely amiable and pleasing. In the last one, in D major, there is a breadth of style, an intensity of mood that recalls Beethoven. In both are passages quite comparable to Mozart. It is commonly said that Haydn learned much from Mozart, who was so obviously a greater genius. But it is perhaps equally true that Mozart learned much from Haydn, who was many years his senior.

The performance of all these works was brilliant and in the main perfectly euphonious. But Dr Koussevitzky often overstressed the strong beats of the rhythm and neglected the nuances of melodic line. A lighter touch is needed to avoid the clumsiness, the peasant awkwardness that mars some of this music for devotees of Mozartean elegance.

There are no concerts in the regular series this week, as the orchestra goes to New York.

P. R.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Apr 2 Herald

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was in commemoration of Haydn's birthday, March 31, 1732. The concert began with his first symphony (1759), practically a string quartet with the addition of two oboes and two horns, which are used chiefly fo reinforcement here and there, and are silent in the andante. Then followed the symphony known as the "Surprise," his 94th and one of the Salomon series composed for London. Mr. Piatigorsky played the concerto in D major for violoncello. The concert ended with Haydn's last symphony, No. 104 (1795), one of the second series of the Salomon concerts.

It was meet and proper that the first and last symphonies of Haydn should be performed on this occasion It is always a pleasure to hear Mr. Piatigorsky. Four works by Haydn and three of them in D major? Only the brilliant performance of orchestra and soloist took away the reproach of inevitable monotony. And after all, in spite of the frequent occurrence of Haydn's name on the orchestra's programs, how little are we acquainted with his instrumental compositions! There are symphonies practically unfamiliar; some among his later ones before the Salomon set that are unknown. Arthur Nikisch allowed us to hear "The Bear" for the first time in Boston; "The Clock" and two other symphonies had only one performance; Dr. Koussevitzky delighted the audience by acquainting it with the symphony "with the horn call," but there are divertimenti by Haydn that are well worthy of performance and would display the ability and taste of the solo players. (In like manner Mozart's lesser works for a small orchestra are neglected by conductors in this country.)

Haydn's first symphony played with a reduced number of strings gave opportunity for the exquisite euphony and technic, elasticity of this section. As regards the contents, one recognized the characteristics of the later Haydn. The other symphonies chosen are so well known—were known to our maiden aunts in the 60s by four-hand arrangements for the piano—that it is hardly necessary to discuss them; yet it may be said if Aunt Lucinda and Aunt Vashti died long ago, the symphonies seem to have eternal youth, though an audience today does not find the "surprise" of the loud chord in the 94th overwhelming. As one said in the corridor yesterday, "We have had too many surprises in the contemporary works we have heard this season and last to be startled by Haydn."

Haydn wrote the violoncello concerto for his friend Anton Kraft, the capable solo violoncellist of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra. Would honest Anton have recognized the work yesterday? Several have tinkered it, adapted it to suit "modern taste," decked it with all manner of furbelows and frills to enhance the glory of the virtuoso. It would have been interesting to hear the concerto exactly as Haydn wrote it. Anton would have wondered at Mr. Piatigorsky's performance; praised his technical proficiency, admired the purity of his tone, the brilliance of his bravura, but might he not have said "This instrument, as it is played, sounds to me more like a violin than a violoncello"? and might he not have exclaimed now and then: "How sweet! Perhaps a little too sweet!"

The concert, which will be repeated tonight, gave the audience marked enjoyment. Conductor and orchestra were warmly appreciated and Mr. Piatigorsky was recalled several times.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for April 15, 16 will be as follows: Mabel Daniels, "Exultate Deo," for chorus and orchestra. Dukelsky, "Epitaph," for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra—the orchestral music was suggested by the death of Diaghilev, and then a poem was fitted to it without apparent relation to the death (first time). Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus. Brahms, piano concerto No. 1, D minor (Myra Hess, pianist), and Three Hungarian Dances. The chorus will be the Cecilia, Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

Concert-Chronicle

Why Not Here? Trans. Apr 5

AFTERMATH of the Goethe Centenary may yet restore to the concert-hall Schumann's settings of "Scenes from 'Faust.'" The English, French and German journals that come to this department have abounded in anniversary articles. One, almost invariably, has recounted Goethe's influence on music. As certainly, Schumann's "Scenes" have been mentioned as a strangely neglected work, coming closer to "Faust" than many a derivative piece far oftener heard. Said the London Daily Telegraph, for example:

> Schumann's "Scenes from 'Faust'" are never heard nowadays. The work is unequal, and by general consensus of opinion the scenes he wrote first are much superior to the episodes added later, when he was already in the grip of the disease that killed him. The best, however, will stand comparison with his finest works, and in this year of Goethe celebration the British Broadcasting Corporation might well consider the advisability of reviving music first heard publicly during the centenary festivities of 1849.

So also might the Boston Symphony Orchestra with one or two pairs of choral concerts now become items in its annual routine, with the choirs of Harvard, Radcliffe and The Cecilia ready to bear their shares. And who could better be leader in the deed than Dr. Koussevitzky? He has brought back to the repertory many an overlooked music. He excels when an orchestra and a chorus are joined together. He answers sympathetically to Schumann. True, he will have next season a Brahms centenary on his hands. But that is more likely to be marked by a separate festival then celebrated in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts.

---

tion in New England * * SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1932

VELEZ AS STAR

Haydn's Memory Honored by Boston Symphony Program

By MOSES SMITH

Serge Koussevitzky, who is fond of festivals and memorial occasions, has arranged a miniature Haydn Festival for this week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Remembering that Franz Joseph Haydn was born just 200 years ago, on March 31, 1732, Mr. Koussevitzky set down three symphonies—no less!—and a cello concerto, for which Gregor Piatigorsky was called in as soloist.

Whether by coincidence or not, three of the works—the concerto and the first and last symphonies Haydn wrote in his long career—are in the key of D major; while the other symphony, the familiar "Surprise," is in the closely related key of G major. The fact that another symphony, in E-flat, was originally scheduled in place of the "Surprise" even lends plausibility to the guess that Mr. Koussevitzky actually planned such a remarkably unified program.

All of this harangue is by way of prelude to the opinion that the almost uncompromising insistence on a single tonality inevitably increased the tendency to monotony which poor old Haydn could scarcely sustain. It is not to say that the concert of yesterday was not highly enjoyable. But this was due as much to the admirable playing of the orchestra and the equally admirable interpretations of Koussevitzky as to Haydn's music, which is charming, delightful, infectious—but you can have too much of a good thing.

As to Piatigorsky, he played as master musician and persuasive poet. Using a more grateful vehicle than the Schumann concerto, in which he made his debut here last year, he coaxed out of his instrument such sounds as some of us have believed it possessed, but which are all too rarely heard at the hands of the customary virtuoso.

The soloist was naturally received with considerable cordiality by the Friday matinee audience, which, indeed, enjoyed a sort of field day.

York only subscription audiences have heard the now celebrated performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Orchestra and a choir from the Harvard Glee Club. To open it to a wider public, it will be repeated at the last supplementary matinée of the season on Tuesday, April 19, in Symphony Hall. For this concert a certain number of seats are available at the box-office.

Contrary to expectation, Ravel's new Concerto for Piano and Orchestra will be heard this season at Symphony Hall. The composer, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Stokowski have agreed upon a two-fold production of the piece in America—at the concerts of the Boston and of the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday and Saturday, April 22 and 23. In Boston Mr. Sanromá, in Philadelphia Mr. Sylvan Levin, will be the pianist.

The Concerto was first played in Paris last January by Mlle. Marguerite Long, with the composer conducting. It is now going the round of European capitals, making no small stir wherever it is heard. Ravel intended it originally for production at Symphony Hall a year ago as tribute to Boston Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary. He failed to complete it in time.

With Toch and with Stravinsky Mr. Sanromá has proved his ability with modern and exacting piano-parts. Nor has Dr. Koussevitzky let the grass grow under his feet.

SEE Page 179 for APRIL Comments

169

For the end of the concert Dr. Koussevitzky reserved the climax of the afternoon—the Last Symphony, in D major written and produced at London in 1795, unplayed through ten years at Symphony Hall. Now, at last, Haydn stood forth as composer of power. Not of course, as we measure it with Beethoven, for example, or even with Mozart of the final symphonies. But of power as Haydn's later audiences understood the word; as our ears also heard, prepared through the afternoon by the conductor's progressive tutelage. The introductory Adagio sounded large and bold and tense and full. The succeeding Allegro abounded in unorthodox freedoms, in strokes that looked forward to a new breed of symphonists, even, in an instance or two, as far as this day of ours.

The variations of the Andante continued these freedoms. What we call the sentiment within the grace may well have seemed to the first audiences a proper emotion. The Minuet strode full-gaited and full-charged; the trio sounded the wistful note of the deeper-touched Haydn. The final Allegro was more than fleet pattern-weaving. Vigor propelled it. Modulations struck sparks, if not fire. In sum the Haydn of a hundred symphonies whose power over matter, form and manner ran at flood in the very Symphony in which he put them all by. It ran the richer for the just warmths, vigors and clarities of conductor and orchestra. They had played the First Symphony to charm with pellucid simplicities; the "Surprise" Symphony to set clear the familiar traits. And Haydn's music, first, last and all the time, is mirror to the merits—or the shortcomings—of those that play it.

The familiar Concerto for Violoncello had been middle piece between the two mature Symphonies. Let it pass in itself for proof of Haydn's adaptability and fertility in whatever form and for whatever purpose he chose to write; as evidence also of the sensitive ear with which he had listened to the virtuoso-'cellists of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra. For the while, moreover, Mr. Piatigorsky, playing, was more interesting than Haydn composing. A year ago when he was heard with the orchestra in Schumann's Concerto, he had barely recovered from a wasting sickness. Now he returned in full fettle. He sounded songful measures in a tone that never once sentimentalized them or overdrove the voice of an instrument sensitive above most to exaggeration. It was a poised tone as well, respectful of the purities of the ancient style yet sufficiently sensuous upon the modern ear.

In the passage-work and the ornament Mr. Piatigorsky's touch upon bow and strings was light and clear, graceful and elegant. Ascending to the difficult upper range of the violoncello, he preserved the integrity of his tone, neither shrilling nor contorting. There was no thickening or rumbling when he descended to the lower depths. Sensitive master of his instrument, he was as sensitive with the Concerto before him. Nothing in it escaped him; nothing lost intrinsic quality. If a finely tempered virtuoso played, a discerning and responsive musician also read. The breed of violoncellists who are also musicians, seemed to wane with the decline of Mr. Casals. Now it stands renewed in Mr. Piatigorsky. And every frequenter of the Symphony Concerts knows what accompaniments Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra can play when a virtuoso-musician joins with them. Haydn's own orchestra at Esterház may not have served his Concerto half so well.

ON EVENING AMERICAN *

Churches

Churches

PILGRIMAGE TO IRELAND IS POPULAR

Already nearly 300 Catholics have registered to leave Boston in June for the Eucharistic conference in Dublin, under the leadership of Cardinal O'Connell.

With two months yet to go, it is expected a record pilgrimage will be recorded. The steamship Samaria of the Cunard line is to transport the company, and those in charge advise all who are thinking uled in place of the "Surprise" even lends plausibility to the guess that Mr. Koussevitzky actually planned such a remarkably unified program.

---

All of this harangue is by way of prelude to the opinion that the almost uncompromising insistence on a single tonality inevitably increased the tendency to monotony which poor old Haydn could scarcely sustain. It is not to say that the concert of yesterday was not highly enjoyable. But this was due as much to the admirable playing of the orchestra and the equally admirable interpretations of Koussevitzky as to Haydn's music, which is charming, delightful, infectious—but you can have too much of a good thing.

As to Piatigorsky, he played as master musician and persuasive poet. Using a more grateful vehicle than the Schumann concerto, in which he made his debut here last year, he coaxed out

---

SYMPHONY GIVES DAY TO HAYDN

First, Surprise and Last of His Symphonies Performed

Post Apr 2

Yesterday afternoon for the first time in its history and, no doubt, for the last, barring this evening's repetition, the Symphony Orchestra offered an entire programme of the music of Franz Josef Haydn. The occasion was the 200th anniversary of Haydn's birth. For the "Father of the Symphony," like the "Father of his Country," was born in the Year of Grace 1732.

FIRST, SURPRISE AND LAST

Since there are 104 well-authenticated symphonies of Haydn, Dr. Koussevitsky in making this all-Haydn programme had a wide range of choice. With his usual ingenuity in such matters, he selected the first of them in D major composed in 1759, and the last, in the same key, written in 1795, while between them he placed the ever-popular symphony "with the drum stroke," known in English-speaking countries as the "Surprise," and the Concerto for Violoncello with no less a virtuoso than Gregor Piatigorsky to play the solo part.

Now that the significance of C. P. E. Bach and of the Mannheim School is well understood, Haydn's claim to the fathership of the symphony is no longer technically valid. But in the sense that he was the first considerable symphonist, the first whose works in the form have remained consistently in the repertory and, for aught that we know, may stay there for yet another hundred years, the familiar appellation may still be said to apply to him.

First Light and Short

In view of the enormous development of the symphony and of orchestral music in general since Haydn's time, we have come to look upon even his ripest and maturest efforts as tentative. Set in the midst of the usual orchestral programme, a symphony of Haydn may well make this impression, may easily seem, if not antiquated, at least old-fashioned, harmonically meagre and thinly scored. But yesterday a surprising thing occurred.

The First Symphony, with which the programme began, is in very truth a symphony of a decidedly tentative sort. Between them its three movements fill hardly more than 10 minutes; the scoring is for strings and a pair each of oboes and horns. The musical content while not without charm, is undeniably slight.

But upon this First Symphony followed immediately the "Surprise" Symphony of 1791, and behold the opening Adagio seemed of an almost Wagnerian richness. Beside the First Symphony the "Surprise" is a masterpiece indeed.

Full and Sonorous

With interlude of the pretty Violoncello Concerto, played by Mr. Piatiagorsky, with the expected easy mastery and fine musicianship, the concert's close brought the Symphony of 1795, aforementioned. Wisely Dr. Koussevitsky had graduated his strings, employing a mere handful in the First Symphony and a somewhat larger body in the ensuing pieces, and now in this final Symphony the complete choir sat upon the stage. Here Haydn had written for the full woodwind of his time, for horns, trumpets and kettledrums, and the effect upon the ear was of a full and sonorous music, almost Beethovenish. For the moment the susceptible listener was half willing to believe that orchestral music had, indeed, gone no farther.

By Dr. Koussevitsky yesterday's programme was offered as homage to a great man. In conducting it he effaced himself. Yet was not the performance of each of the four pieces worthy of the highest possible praise? Certainly a warm, applauding audience seemed so to believe.

Trans Apr 2

Hitherto in Boston and in New York only subscription audiences have heard the now celebrated performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" by Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Orchestra and a choir from the Harvard Glee Club. To open it to a wider public, it will be repeated at the last supplementary matinée of the season on Tuesday, April 19, in Symphony Hall. For this concert a certain number of seats are available at the box-office.

SEE Page 179

Sat APRIL COMMENTS

MUSIC

Globe Apr 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Franz Josef Haydn was born March 31, 1732. Accordingly the program of yesterday's Symphony concert was devoted to his music. It began with what is regarded as the first of his many symphonies, one in D major, written in 1750, and ended with the familiar one in the same key written in 1795, and the last he composed. Between these works stood the "Surprise" symphony and the concerto for violoncello, in which Gregor Piatigorsky was the solo player. Three symphonies on a single program must be very nearly the record at these concerts.

Most young musicians, both amateur and professional, go through a stage of being supercilious about Hadyn. His music sounds so simple, and they identify the simple with the obvious, with the naive, the childish in art. Eventually most of them discover that Haydn is not so simple as he sounds, and perceive that the musical texture of Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and many another far more exciting, more sonorous, more modern composer's work, is much more obvious and childish than that of Haydn's music.

Music Amiable

Haydn's music is always amiable always pleasing, never melodramatic, never thrilling. But it wears well. Yesterday's concert was one of the most delightful in recent seasons. There was cordial and prolonged applausue after every number. How many works once felt as melodramatic and thrilling have slumped into dull oblivion while Haydn's masterpieces have continued to delight listeners the world over.

The little symphony with which the concert began had more than a historic interest. Its beautiful lucidity of style and its freshness and vigor of substance made it appealing even to listeners not interested in the technical problem of the evolution of the symphonic form, in which Haydn played a major role.

In the concerto for violoncello, in D major, written in 1783, the warmth and glow of the melodic style recalls Mozart. This concerto is the best ever written for solo cello. Mr Piatigorsky, the young Russian cellist whose debut here last season made an exceptionally favorable impression, again proved himself a master of his instrument. The cadenzas he used (were they his own?) were extraordinarily brilliant technical displays, but not in the Haydn style.

The warmth and purity of tone, the exactness of pitch save for a few slips on harmonics, the avoidance of excessive portamento effects in his playing all set Mr Piatigorsky apart from and above most cellists. It is unfair to remember that the last previous performance here of this concerto was by Pablo Casals. Mr Casals' unequaled musicianship set a standard of taste and style that was not attained by Mr Piatigorsky. But it is possible that he may attain it in time, something one could prophesy of no other living cellist.

Breadth of Style

The two familiar symphonies, both written in maturity, showed that Haydn could be more than merely amiable and pleasing. In the last one, in D major, there is a breadth of style, an intensity of mood that recalls Beethoven. In both are passages quite comparable to Mozart. It is commonly said that Haydn learned much from Mozart, who was so obviously a greater genius. But it is perhaps equally true that Mozart learned much from Haydn, who was many years his senior.

The performance of all these works was brilliant and in the main perfectly euphonious. But Dr Koussevitzky often overstressed the strong beats of the rhythm and neglected the nuances of melodic line. A lighter touch is needed to avoid the clumsiness, the peasant awkwardness that mars some of this music for devotees of Mozartean elegance.

There are no concerts in the regular series this week, as the orchestra goes to New York. P. R.

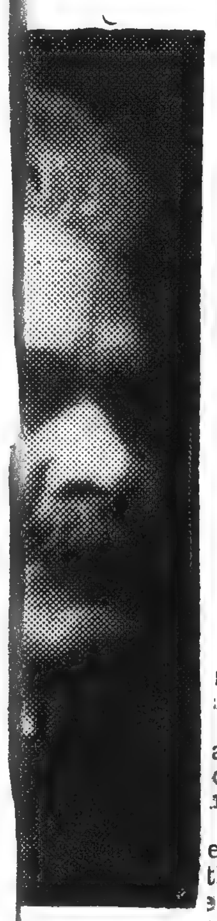
Contrary to expectation, Ravel's new Concerto for Piano and Orchestra will be heard this season at Symphony Hall. The composer, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Stokowski have agreed upon a two-fold production of the piece in America—at the concerts of the Boston and of the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday and Saturday, April 22 and 23. In Boston Mr. Sanromá, in Philadelphia Mr. Sylvan Levin, will be the pianist.

The Concerto was first played in Paris last January by Mlle. Marguerite Long, with the composer conducting. It is now going the round of European capitals, making no small stir wherever it is heard. Ravel intended it originally for production at Symphony Hall a year ago as tribute to Boston Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary. He failed to complete it in time.

With Toch and with Stravinsky Mr. Sanromá has proved his ability with modern and exacting piano-parts. Nor has Dr. Koussevitzky let the grass grow under his feet.

---

morrow



LL PERKINS

ES

CHAPEL

rroll Perkins, ill preach at norning. The 'clock and be ion.
M., Raymond her organ re-organist. On ur, the Rev.
Jr., of the will preach.
ill be the Rev.
ctor of Trin-nd the Rev.
dean of the

USIC

MPHONY CONCERT

Herald

By PHILIP HALE

ton Symussevitzky, hall yesnmemora-March 31,
h his first a string two oboes ed chiefly there, and Then folas the e of the London.
oncerto in he concert symphony, cond series

t the first dn should on It is
Mr. Piatiaydn and Only the hestra and ch of inter all, in rrence of stra's pro-acquainted mpositions!
tically un-later ones at are un-owed us to rst time in two other erformance;
the audience symphony
there are at are well would dis-of the solo Mozart's leschestra are this coun-played with trings gave ite euphony this section.

e recognized ater Haydn.
sen are so our maiden nd arrange-it is hardly yet it may and Aunt symphonies though an id the "surprise" of the loud chord in the 94th overwhelming. As one said in the corridor yesterday, "We have had too many surprises in the contemporary works we have heard this season and last to be startled by Haydn."

Haydn wrote the violoncello concerto for his friend Anton Kraft, the capable solo violoncellist of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra. Would honest Anton have recognized the work yesterday? Several have tinkered it, adapted it to suit "modern taste," decked it with all manner of furbelows and frills to enhance the glory of the virtuoso. It would have been interesting to hear the concerto exactly as Haydn wrote it. Anton would have wondered at Mr. Piatigorsky's performance; praised his technical proficiency, admired the purity of his tone, the brilliance of his bravura, but might he not have said "This instrument, as it is played, sounds to me more like a violin than a violoncello"? and might he not have exclaimed now and then: "How sweet! Perhaps a little too sweet!"

The concert, which will be repeated tonight, gave the audience marked enjoyment. Conductor and orchestra were warmly appreciated and Mr. Piatigorsky was recalled several times.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for April 15, 16 will be as follows: Mabel Daniels, "Exultate Deo," for chorus and orchestra. Dukelsky, "Epitaph," for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra—the orchestral music was suggested by the death of Diaghilev, and then a poem was fitted to it without apparent relation to the death (first time). Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus. Brahms, piano concerto No. 1, D minor (Myra Hess, pianist), and Three Hungarian Dances. The chorus will be the Cecilia, Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Apr 2

Why Not Here?

AFTERMATH of the Goethe Centenary may yet restore to the concert-hall Schumann's settings of "Scenes from 'Faust.'" The English, French and German journals that come to this department have abounded in anniversary articles. One, almost invariably, has recounted Goethe's influence on music. As certainly, Schumann's "Scenes" have been mentioned as a strangely neglected work, coming closer to "Faust" than many a derivative piece far oftener heard. Said the London Daily Telegraph, for example:

> Schumann's "Scenes from 'Faust'" are never heard nowadays. The work is unequal, and by general consensus of opinion the scenes he wrote first are much superior to the episodes added later, when he was already in the grip of the disease that killed him. The best, however, will stand comparison with his finest works, and in this year of Goethe celebration the British Broadcasting Corporation might well consider the advisability of reviving music first heard publicly during the centenary festivities of 1849.

So also might the Boston Symphony Orchestra with one or two pairs of choral concerts now become items in its annual routine, with the choirs of Harvard, Radcliffe and The Cecilia ready to bear their shares. And who could better be leader in the deed than Dr. Koussevitzky? He has brought back to the repertory many an overlooked music. He excels when an orchestra and a chorus are joined together. He answers sympathetically to Schumann. True, he will have next season a Brahms centenary on his hands. But that is more likely to be marked by a separate festival then celebrated in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts.

170

Boston Wares On New York Counters

Dr. Koussevitzky, Toch's Suite, And the Boston Orchestra, Harvard's Glee Club

THERE was only one novel number on the program that Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra proffered to the Manhattanese last Thursday evening—Toch's "Bunte Suite," heard a fortnight before at Symphony Hall. About it Mr. Henderson wrote amusing paragraphs in The Sun: "Some suites are neither diversified nor agreeable. Toch's proved to be all that its name implied. There were capers, and meditations, antics and reflections. Such are the uses of diversity. One must expect a 'Bunte Suite' to be sprung full grown from a high-brow. This one is a sample of modernist music arrayed on the side of good humor, spiced with a passing sprinkle of sentiment, and published in idiom which does not shun vulgarity.

"The first movement is entitled march tempo and is just a hustling piece of street-parade music dressed up in theatrical instrumentation. It is well made and goes to its little point with directness. Then comes an adagio expressivo, a thing of which no true modernist should be guilty. Yet here is a movement replete with delicate sentiment made known in ingenious musical phraseology. It is excellently conceived and successfully built. The marionette dance which follows is another outbreak of slatternly gayety, the sort of thing one might expect from marionettes born and brought up in the slums and bent on kicking up their heels in polite society. The 'Galante Passacaglia' is another demonstration of Toch's command of the materials of modernist art. It is delightful in melodic eccentricity, in harmonic surprise and clearness of outline.

"The finale is called 'Carousel,' and it is riotous, jolly and—like the marionette dance—something that did not originate among those present. It is just the outbreak of a holiday crowd riding the hobby-horses of tradition. The Bostonians performed this music with gusto and with a technical skill quite compelling The audience swallowed the suite with avidity and applauded it long and loudly. Toch had another public success similar to that of his Piano-Concerto."

Merit Renewed

The other items on the conductor's program were Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel"; Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. About the performance of all three The Times wrote warmly — of Debussy's piece: "Whether the performance was only equal to an earlier one given here by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men or wheher the mystery of the music itself was responsible for its new revelation, it is enough to say that no conductor or orchestra that we remember has accomplished as much with Debussy's score."

Again of the pieces from Strauss and Chaikovsky: "It is enough to record the event under consideration, and the enthusiasm of the audience, and the demonstration, again, from a different point of view than those of Toch and Debussy, of superlative qualities in leader and orchestra. Chaikovsky's symphony, of which Mr. Koussevitzky always gives an inspiring reading, opened still another perspective. The audience applauded, yelled, cheered."

Dr. Davison's Young Men

At Town Hall, last Wednesday evening, the Harvard Glee Club, "in unusual numbers," gave its annual concert in New York. Almost all the assembled pieces were those sung by the choir at its concert in Symphony Hall last December—from Beethoven, Bach and Brahms; Palestrina, Byrd and Morley; Fauré, Sullivan and English folk-song. The audience, in contrast, was "large and brilliant," such as the club has learned to expect in New York and to renounce in Boston. Writing of "the high musical quality" of the concert, H. H. in The Times said a true word about Dr. Davison's work and its influence:

"This musical quality and dignity must also have emphasized to those listeners who remembered the beginning of his régime, the magnitude of Dr. Davison's achievement, if they recalled how radical was his departure from the precedents of college singing; how strange to undergraduate lips such names as Palestrina and Lasso; and what astonished wonder (by no means entirely sympathetic at first) attended the introduction of sixteenth-century polyphony to a group of young men and alumni blithely content with far simpler matters. All that is now a tale that is told; the Harvard Glee Club has taken its place among the fine male choruses of the world. But the improvement of undergraduate programs everywhere in the last decade is probably due more to Dr. Davison's work than to any other single factor."

The Herald-Tribune printed this paragraph of detailed comment: "The performance was musicianly and expressive, marked by nicety of shading and instant responsiveness to Dr. Davison's interpretive intentions in tempo and dynamics. The tone-quality was smooth and well blended, of commendable warmth and richness; while not of an unlimited variety of color. The chorus from Beethoven had clear outline and detail, although a more vigorous and outspoken pronouncement of this hymn of praise would have been in order. But there was no lack of gusto in the singing of the selections from 'The Mikado.' In the number from Palestrina the club again showed its skill in singing polyphonic music, and the item from Brahms was one of the most laudably performed numbers on the program from the interpretive point of view."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 23 1932

Copland's Music Awarded Palm as Best of the Week

Boston Symphony's 59th Anniversary Offerings Enthrall; Italians Ban Atonality.

By W. J. HENDERSON

THERE have been many observances of anniversaries, but music has enjoyed none of such prolonged delight as that of the 50th year of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The date of the semi-centennial fell in 1931; we are still listening to the compositions prepared for the festival. Three of them have fallen upon our ears within a week. These were Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass, both presented by the Boston musicians, and Ottorino Respighi's "Metamorphosen," performed by the Philadelphia orchestra.

All three of the compositions proved to be well worth hearing, but it can hardly be doubted that the palm must be awarded to Mr. Copland. The music of the gifted German was perhaps more disputable in its proclamation, while the Italian master's score gave the impression of hard work and a grand marshaling of methods with a modicum of spontaneity. However, it may sound better the next time we hear it.

Glad news comes from Italy by way of Mr. Respighi, who has arrived to superintend the production of his mystery, "Maria Egiziaca." Mr. Respighi has said that atonality is dead among Italian composers and that they are returning to old ways. Now there ought not to be any solid objection to atonality, which is a term made to signify the freedom of music from the domination of a ruling tonality. There can be no reasonable ground for declaring that a composer must not rove around from key to key with complete disregard of the classic relationships. The cold truth is that not more than one lay hearer in a thousand will know that he is doing it. Beginning a composition in one key and ending in another is not new, nor is it imperative.

But when the musician introduces his principal theme and we find that it lacks all melodic unity because it does not stay in any one key for more than half a measure, we find our ears unequal to the task of following it. Perhaps it is that kind of atonality that Mr. Respighi means. At any rate, we may be sure that, if it is shunned, Ialian music will recover its native idiom, which it has striven to set aside in favor of northern brain products.

* * *

SOME interesting conversations followed the productions of the Copland and Hindemith works. One gentleman, who contemplates with regret, indeed, one might say even views with alarm, the propaganda for modernistic music, voiced his sorrow that such music was performed at all. He hoped that its day was nearly over, and he will without doubt rejoice greatly when he reads what Respighi has said about the death of atonality in Italy.

Another gentleman unhesitatingly condemned the Hindemith composition as commonplace and vulgar. That commentator was a determined modernist, and, although he went into no details, one suspected that his objection to the "Concert Music" was derived from its liberal employment of old tonalities and key relationships and its introduction of such time-worn devices as a fugue. You see, it would take an almost superhuman ingenuity to write a fugue in atonal music; in canonic composition the rule of the key is tyrannical.

This traveler along the musical highways found the Hindemith composition interesting and in moments even beautiful. Possibly the modernist who condemned it was offended by the composer's proclamation of a sustained lyric melody of the sort originated by the early fathers who dwelt in the country of the olive and the grape.

* * *

THE WRITER of these rambling reflections came out of the glare of new ideas with the suspicion that the New York composer had the best of the argument. Perhaps Mr. Copland's music lacked the technical expertness and professional routine of the other music, but it had much more of the adventurous spirit of the voyager into new territory and of the irresponsibility of unbridled enthusiasms. Or shall we descend to the speech of the byways and assert that Mr. Copland recklessly said what chanced to come into his mind and did not give a continental whether it was high art or not?

The score had juice in it, sometimes bitter, sometimes sweet, but at any rate, liquid. One gets a bit impatient with the sawdust stuff that comes out of the mills of the present gods of music. The worthlessness of the bulk of this music is the result of the inability of most of the modernists to perceive that they are impoverishing their own art by refusing to mingle the old materials with the new. They labor under the delusion that they can create an entirely new art. This is something that has not yet been done in any of the fields in which man has sought for expression of his ideals of beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER
MAR [illegible] 1932

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~celebrated its~~ fiftieth anniversary two years ago with a composition shower. From all over the world came works from eminent composers, written in honor of the Bostonians' birthday party. So many were there, in fact, that Koussevitzky and his men must have been sitting up nights ever since, trying to get them all played off. Only a week or so ago did the band complete the list with a Symphonic Ode by Aaron Copland.

At least Koussevitzky is not selfish. He lets other conductors play with his birthday presents. Recently in New York, for instance, Molinari and the Philadelphia Orchestra presented a work by Ottorino Respighi that had been custom-made for the Back Bay Semi-centennial.

It is called Metamorphoseon modi XII—a super-elegant way of saying "theme with twelve variations." The main theme, started almost without preliminaries and curiously akin to the Shepherd's tune at the opening of the last act of Tristan, pursues a stormy and adventurous career that taxes the resources of an augmented modern orchestra, including a pipe organ.

* * *

THE trouble with variations is that they are, unless disguised, too small a form for the use to which they are usually put. Played on a piano, or by a chamber ensemble, a set of variations may be absorbingly interesting; the comparative monotony of tone color is relieved by the variety of shapes in which the main theme appears. But when a set of ten, twelve, or fourteen variations is assigned to a symphony orchestra, the constant shifting of color, as well as the permutations and transmutations of the material, is too much. The variations have got to be short, unless the piece is to last all night; and the result is an inevitable impression of scrappiness. The composer is made to sound short-breathed and tentative.

One has the impression of hearing a salesman offering samples of his wares: "Now here's something you might like; simple, but good (24 bars; full stop). Or perhaps you'd like something a trifle more elaborate (32 bars; full stop). No? Well, try this one (28 bars; full stop); or this (16 bars; full stop)"—and so on. No sooner has the musical thought begun to develop than it is cut off, in the bloom of its youth, to make room for another idea.

* * *

STRAUSS solves the problem most successfully in Don Quixote, where he avoids jerkiness by leaving out the full stops—a simple device, but an effective one. His variations take their place as parts of what is virtually a continuous and carefully structured development of a single theme.

Respighi tries another plan. His first two variations are enough alike, in mood and development, to correspond roughly to the first movement of a symphony. The next two form, approximately, a slow movement, and the fifth and sixth are equivalent to a scherzo. After that, however, he lets nature take its course, sometimes running one variation into another so that it is hard to tell when one leaves off and the other begins. Except to those in whose veins runs a strain of detective blood this is, of course, of no consequence.

Even so, the Metamorphoseon lack something of the cohesiveness that one instinctively expects in a major work for grand orchestra. Which did not prevent my enjoying them exceedingly, and looking forward to hearing them again.

* * *

RESPIGHI was present to hear his piece played, acknowledging the applause it occasioned by bowing from his place in a first tier box on the right (thereby causing numerous persons in the dress circle and balcony seats on the right to come perilously near to breaking their necks). He had to bow three times. I suspect New York of liking him as well as his music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram
MAR 23 1932

Celebrants of Centenary Neglect Goethe in Music

"Faust Symphony," by Liszt, Among Greatest of Compositions Evoked by Poet's Work Unaccountably Neglected at Present.

By PITTS SANBORN.

WHILE the centenary of Goethe's death is being observed in various ways, commemorative music has been mainly silent, except for the performance by the Philharmonic-Symphony last autumn of the incidental music composed by Beethoven for Goethe's tragedy "Egmont." And yet Goethe inspired several composers to write works which clamor to be heard, especially at such a season.

One that has been persistently neglected by local orchestras for years and is unaccountably neglected today is the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt. To call this symphony the greatest composition that Goethe's "Faust" has begotten might be open to debate.

Vocal Ending Awkward.

Still, that it stands in the front rank of such works few would question. Moreover, it is so far from being hackneyed that a worthy performance would be welcome from any point of view.

Liszt called the work "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures (after Goethe)." The "character pictures" are, respectively, entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The symphony ends with an "andante mistico" for male chorus and tenor solo. Gretchen has become Faust's redeemer.

It is perhaps this vocal ending which is a stumbling block to more frequent performances of the symphony. However, it is sometimes omitted. Indeed, it did not exist in the original version as completed by Listz in 1854. He added it when he revised the score in 1857.

More Mindful in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston has been more mindful of the peculiar demands of Goethe's "Faust" than any of our local purveyors of music. Last week's concert by that orchestra was dedicated to the memory of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, offering as program Wagner's "A Faust overture" and Liszt's "A Faust Symphony."

The Boston orchestra will revisit New York next month. Let us hope that Mr. Koussevitzky will not fail to present this program over here. It is appropriate to the season and to the distinguished standing of the organization that he heads.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
25 1932

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony will be revived in honor of Goethe at the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season in Carnegie Hall, April 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNA
MAR 26 1932

A member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reminiscing the other day, recalled how his temperament saved him a million dollars....It was during the hectic days of 1929, when he had made enormous paper profits, especially in Nash...One day he got into a row with one of the partners of the house in which he had his account because he called Chicago. Annoyed, he ordered his account sold out. And the big thing is that he hasn't gone back into the market since...Funny about Telephone. Those bullish on it say the stock is worth $125 a share. The bears come back and say $95 is plenty...Well, the stock is nearly half way between these figures, which seems like a fair compromise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CAN.
GLOBE
MAR 26 1932

Bach's B-Minor Mass will be give in Boston tomorrow by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, the Harvar Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Chora Society, under Koussevitzky. Ther will be two sessions, beginning at 4.3 and 8.30, with a dinner interval be tween.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
MAR [illegible] 1932

Illustrious Half Century

Boston Symphony Orchestra Founded by Maj. Higginson in 1881.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world.

He engaged the finest musicians in Europe and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty.

In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows: George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serve Koussevitzky, 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
MAR 27 1932

Harvard Singers Plan Trip

Glee Club to Appear in New York Next Week During Vacation Tour

Special to the Herald Tribune

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 26.—Final plans for the spring trip of the Harvard University Glee Club will include a performance of the "Faust" symphony by Liszt, in collaboration with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in one of the New York concerts, it has been announced by Dr. Archibald Davison, conductor. The rendition of the Liszt score will close the vacation series on Saturday afternoon, April 9, in Carnegie Hall.

Other concerts now scheduled for the Harvard Glee Club during its spring recess tour will include an appearance in Town Hall, New York, April 6; in White Plains, N. Y., on April 7, and a tentative "Faust" symphony performance in Brooklyn on April 8.

170

Boston Wares On New York Counters

Dr. Koussevitzky, Toch's Suite, And the Boston Orchestra, Harvard's Glee Club

THERE was only one novel number on the program that Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra proffered to the Manhattanese last Thursday evening—Toch's "Bunte Suite," heard a fortnight before at Symphony Hall. About it Mr. Henderson wrote amusing paragraphs in The Sun: "Some suites are neither diversified nor agreeable. Toch's proved to be all that its name implied. There were capers and meditations, antics and reflections. Such are the uses of diversity. One must expect a 'Bunte Suite' to be sprung full grown from a high-brow. This one is a sample of modernist music arrayed on the side of good humor, spiced with a passing sprinkle of sentiment, and published in idiom which does not shun vulgarity.

"The first movement is entitled march tempo and is just a hustling piece of street-parade music dressed up in theatrical instrumentation. It is well made and goes to its little point with directness. Then comes an adagio expressivo, a thing of which no true modernist should be guilty. Yet here is a movement replete with delicate sentiment made known in ingenious musical phraseology. It is excellently conceived and successfully built. The marionette dance which follows is another outbreak of slatternly gayety, the sort of thing one might expect from marionettes born and brought up in the slums and bent on kicking up their heels in polite society. The 'Galante Passacaglia' is another demonstration of Toch's command of the materials of modernist art. It is delightful in melodic eccentricity, in harmonic surprise and clearness of outline.

"The finale is called 'Carousel,' and it is riotous, jolly and—like the marionette dance—something that did not originate among those present. It is just the outbreak of a holiday crowd riding the hobby-horses of tradition. The Bostonians performed this music with gusto and with a technical skill quite compelling. The audience swallowed the suite with avidity and applauded it long and loudly. Toch had another public success similar to that of his Piano-Concerto."

Merit Renewed

The other items on the conductor's program were Debussy's "Afternoon of A Faun"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel"; Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. About the performance of all three The Times wrote warmly — of Debussy's piece: "Whether the performance was only equal to an earlier one given here by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men or wheher the mystery of the music itself was responsible for its new revelation, it is enough to say that no conductor or orchestra that we remember has accomplished as much with Debussy's score."

Again of the pieces from Strauss and Chaikovsky: "It is enough to record the event under consideration, and the enthusiasm of the audience, and the demonstration, again, from a different point of view than those of Toch and Debussy, of superlative qualities in leader and orchestra. Chaikovsky's symphony, of which Mr. Koussevitzky always gives an inspiring reading, opened still another perspective. The audience applauded, yelled, cheered."

Dr. Davison's Young Men

At Town Hall, last Wednesday evening, the Harvard Glee Club, "in unusual numbers," gave its annual concert in New York. Almost all the assembled pieces were those sung by the choir at its concert in Symphony Hall last December—from Beethoven, Bach and Brahms; Palestrina, Byrd and Morley; Fauré, Sullivan and English folk-song. The audience, in contrast, was "large and brilliant," such as the club has learned to expect in New York and to renounce in Boston. Writing of "the high musical quality" of the concert, H. H. in The Times said a true word about Dr. Davison's work and its influence:

"This musical quality and dignity must also have emphasized to those listeners who remembered the beginning of his régime, the magnitude of Dr. Davison's achievement, if they recalled how radical was his departure from the precedents of college singing; how strange to undergraduate lips such names as Palestrina and Lasso; and what astonished wonder (by no means entirely sympathetic at first) attended the introduction of sixteenth-century polyphony to a group of young men and alumni blithely content with far simpler matters. All that is now a tale that is told; the Harvard Glee Club has taken its place among the fine male choruses of the world. But the improvement of undergraduate programs everywere in the last decade is probably due more to Dr. Davison's work than to any other single factor."

The Herald-Tribune printed this paragraph of detailed comment: "The performance was musicianly and expressive, marked by nicety of shading and instant responsiveness to Dr. Davison's interpretive intentions in tempo and dynamics. The tone-quality was smooth and well blended, of commendable warmth and richness; while not of an unlimited variety of color. The chorus from Beethoven had clear outline and detail, although a more vigorous and outspoken pronouncement of this hymn of praise would have been in order. But there was no lack of gusto in the singing of the selections from 'The Mikado.' In the number from Palestrina the club again showed its skill in singing polyphonic music, and the item from Brahms was one of the most laudably performed numbers on the program from the interpretive point of view."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 23 1932

Copland's Music Awarded Palm as Best of the Week

Boston Symphony's 59th Anniversary Offerings Enthrall; Italians Ban Atonality.

By W. J. HENDERSON

THERE have been many observances of anniversaries, but music has enjoyed none of such prolonged delight as that of the 50th year of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The date [illegible] semi-centennial fell in 1931; we are still listening to the compositions prepared for the festival. Three of them have fallen upon our ears within a week. These were Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass, both presented by the Boston musicians, and Ottorino Respighi's "Metamorphosen," performed by the Philadelphia orchestra.

All three of the compositions proved to be well worth hearing, but it can hardly be doubted that the palm must be awarded to Mr. Copland. The music of the gifted German was perhaps more disputable in its proclamation, while the Italian master's score gave the impression of hard work and a grand marshaling of methods with a modicum of spontaneity. However, it may sound better the next time we hear it.

Glad news comes from Italy by way of Mr. Respighi, who has arrived to superintend the production of his mystery, "Maria Egiziaca." Mr. Respighi has said that atonality is dead among Italian composers and that they are returning to old ways. Now there ought not to be any solid objection to atonality, which is a term made to signify the freedom of music from the domination of a ruling tonality. There can be no reasonable ground for declaring that a composer must not rove around from key to key with complete disregard of the classic relationships. The cold truth is that not more than one lay hearer in a thousand will know that he is doing it. Beginning a composition in one key and ending in another is not new, nor is it imperative.

But when the musician introduces his principal theme and we find that it lacks all melodic unity because it does not stay in any one key for more than half a measure, we find our ears unequal to the task of following it. Perhaps it is that kind of atonality that Mr. Respighi means. At any rate, we may be sure that, if it is shunned, Ialian music will recover its native idiom, which it has striven to set aside in favor of northern brain products.

* * *

SOME interesting conversations followed the productions of the Copland and Hindemith works. One gentleman, who contemplates with regret, indeed, one might say even views with alarm, the propaganda for modernistic music, voiced his sorrow that such music was performed at all. He hoped that its day was nearly over, and he will without doubt rejoice greatly when he reads what Respighi has said about the death of atonality in Italy.

Another gentleman unhesitatingly condemned the Hindemith composition as commonplace and vulgar. That commentator was a determined modernist, and, although he went into no details, one suspected that his objection to the "Concert Music" was derived from its liberal employment of old tonalities and key relationships and its introduction of such time-worn devices as a fugue. You see, it would take an almost superhuman ingenuity to write a fugue in atonal music; in canonic composition the rule of the key is tyrannical.

This traveler along the musical highways found the Hindemith composition interesting and in moments even beautiful. Possibly the modernist who condemned it was offended by the composer's proclamation of a sustained lyric melody of the sort originated by the early fathers who dwelt in the country of the olive and the grape.

* * *

THE WRITER of these rambling reflections came out of the glare of new ideas with the suspicion that the New York composer had the best of the argument. Perhaps Mr. Copland's music lacked the technical expertness and professional routine of the other music, but it had much more of the adventurous spirit of the voyager into new territory and of the irresponsibility of unbridled enthusiasms. Or shall we descend to the speech of the byways and assert that Mr. Copland recklessly said what chanced to come into his mind and did not give a continental whether it was high art or not?

The score had juice in it, sometimes bitter, sometimes sweet, but at any rate, liquid. One gets a bit impatient with the sawdust stuff that comes out of the mills of the present gods of music. The worthlessness of the bulk of this music is the result of the inability of most of the modernists to perceive that they are impoverishing their own art by refusing to mingle the old materials with the new. They labor under the delusion that they can create an entirely new art. This is something that has not yet been done in any of the fields in which man has sought for expression of his ideals of beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER
MAR 23 1932

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~celebrated its~~ fiftieth anniversary two years ago with a composition shower. From all over the world came works from eminent composers, written in honor of the Bostonians' birthday party. So many were there, in fact, that Koussevitzky and his men must have been sitting up nights ever since, trying to get them all played off. Only a week or so ago did the band complete the list with a Symphonic Ode by Aaron Copland.

At least Koussevitzky is not selfish. He lets other conductors play with his birthday presents. Recently in New York, for instance, Molinari and the Philadelphia Orchestra presented a work by Ottorino Respighi that had been custom-made for the Back Bay Semicentennial.

It is called Metamorphoseon modi XII—a super-elegant way of saying "theme with twelve variations." The main theme, started almost without preliminaries and curiously akin to the Shepherd's tune at the opening of the last act of Tristan, pursues a stormy and adventurous career that taxes the resources of an augmented modern orchestra, including a pipe organ.

* * *

THE trouble with variations is that they are, unless disguised, too small a form for the use to which they are usually put. Played on a piano, or by a chamber ensemble, a set of variations may be absorbingly interesting; the comparative monotony of tone color is relieved by the variety of shapes in which the main theme appears. But when a set of ten, twelve, or fourteen variations is assigned to a symphony orchestra, the constant shifting of color, as well as the permutations and transmutations of the material, is too much. The variations have got to be short, unless the piece is to last all night; and the result is an inevitable impression of scrappiness. The composer is made to sound short-breathed and tentative.

One has the impression of hearing a salesman offering samples of his wares: "Now here's something you might like; simple, but good (24 bars; full stop). Or perhaps you'd like something a trifle more elaborate (32 bars; full stop). No? Well, try this one (28 bars; full stop); or this (16 bars; full stop)"—and so on. No sooner has the musical thought begun to develop than it is cut off, in the bloom of its youth, to make room for another idea.

* * *

STRAUSS solves the problem most successfully in Don Quixote, where he avoids jerkiness by leaving out the full stops—a simple device, but an effective one. His variations take their place as parts of what is virtually a continuous and carefully structured development of a single theme.

Respighi tries another plan. His first two variations are enough alike, in mood and development, to correspond roughly to the first movement of a symphony. The next two form, approximately, a slow movement, and the fifth and sixth are equivalent to a scherzo. After that, however, he lets nature take its course, sometimes running one variation into another so that it is hard to tell when one leaves off and the other begins. Except to those in whose veins runs a strain of detective blood this is, of course, of no consequence.

Even so, the Metamorphoseon lack something of the cohesiveness that one instinctively expects in a major work for grand orchestra. Which did not prevent my enjoying them exceedingly, and looking forward to hearing them again.

* * *

RESPIGHI was present to hear his piece played, acknowledging the applause it occasioned by bowing from his place in a first tier box on the right (thereby causing numerous persons in the dress circle and balcony seats on the right to come perilously near to breaking their necks). He had to bow three times. I suspect New York of liking him as well as his music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram
MAR 23 1932

Celebrants of Centenary Neglect Goethe in Music

"Faust Symphony," by Liszt, Among Greatest of Compositions Evoked by Poet's Work Unaccountably Neglected at Present.

By PITTS SANBORN.

WHILE the centenary of Goethe's death is being observed in various ways, commemorative music has been mainly silent, except for the performance by the Philharmonic-Symphony last autumn of the incidental music composed by Beethoven for Goethe's tragedy "Egmont." And yet Goethe inspired several composers to write works which clamor to be heard, especially at such a season.

One that has been persistently neglected by local orchestras for years and is unaccountably neglected today is the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt. To call this symphony the greatest composition that Goethe's "Faust" has begotten might be open to debate.

Vocal Ending Awkward.

Still, that it stands in the front rank of such works few would question. Moreover, it is so far from being hackneyed that a worthy performance would be welcome from any point of view.

Liszt called the work "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures (after Goethe)." The "character pictures" are, respectively, entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The symphony ends with an "andante mistico" for male chorus and tenor solo. Gretchen has become Faust's redeemer.

It is perhaps this vocal ending which is a stumbling block to more frequent performances of the symphony. However, it is sometimes omitted. Indeed, it did not exist in the original version as completed by Listz in 1854. He added it when he revised the score in 1857.

More Mindful in Boston.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston has been more mindful of the peculiar demands of Goethe's "Faust" than any of our local purveyors of music. Last week's concert by that orchestra was dedicated to the memory of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, offering as program Wagner's "A Faust overture" and Liszt's "A Faust Symphony."

The Boston orchestra will revisit New York next month. Let us hope that Mr. Koussevitzky will not fail to present this program over here. It is appropriate to the season and to the distinguished standing of the organization that he heads.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
MAR 25 1932

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony will be revived in honor of Goethe at the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season in Carnegie Hall, April 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNA
MAR 26 1932

A member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reminiscing the other day, recalled how his temperament saved him a million dollars....It was during the hectic days of 1929, when he had made enormous paper profits, especially in Nash...One day he got into a row with one of the partners of the house in which he had his account because he called Chicago. Annoyed, he ordered his account sold out. And the big thing is that he hasn't gone back into the market since...Funny about Telephone. Those bullish on it say the stock is worth $125 a share. The bears come back and say $95 is plenty...Well, the stock is nearly half way between these figures, which seems like a fair compromise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TORONTO, CAN.
GLOBE
MAR 26 1932

Bach's B-Minor Mass will be give in Boston tomorrow by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, the Harvar Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Chora Society, under Koussevitzky. Ther will be two sessions, beginning at 4.3 and 8.30, with a dinner interval between.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
MAR 25 1932

Illustrious Half Century

Boston Symphony Orchestra Founded by Maj. Higginson in 1881.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world.

He engaged the finest musicians in Europe and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty.

In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. Ofter two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows: George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serve Koussevitzky, 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
MAR 27 1932

Harvard Singers Plan Trip

Glee Club to Appear in New York Next Week During Vacation Tour

Special to the Herald Tribune

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., March 26.—Final plans for the spring trip of the Harvard University Glee Club will include a performance of the "Faust" symphony by Liszt, in collaboration with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in one of its New York concerts, it has been announced by Dr. Archibald Davidson, conductor. The rendition of the Liszt score will close the vacation series on Saturday afternoon, April 9, in Carnegie Hall.

Other concerts now scheduled for the Harvard Glee Club during its spring recess tour will include an appearance in Town Hall, New York, April 6; in White Plains, N. Y., on April 7, and a tentative "Faust" symphony performance in Brooklyn on April 8.

171

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 26 1932

Musical Notes

WAGNER-LISZT FAUST SYMPHONIES

To mark the centennial of Goethe, Dr. Koussevitsky ordained for recent Boston Symphony concerts a program which consisted of Wagner's "Faust-Overture" and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.

Wagner's Overture is of interest chiefly for its forecasts of the later master of music-drama. Liszt's symphony is of interest for the same reason; but also for others. It would be difficult to overestimate the extent or the importance of Wagner's debt to Liszt. This debt included not only moral and material assistance, the influence of a great name in getting works performed and in spreading the Wagnerian gospel; it included also actual musical material and methods. In the "Faust" Symphony you may discover motifs of the "Ring" and even of "Parsifal." The generosity of Liszt was paralleled only by the ingratitude of Wagner.

It is true that Wagner did more with the material. But this "Faust" Symphony is surely the strongest evidence that can be adduced in support of the contention that Liszt is among the great composers not only historically, as a sort of artistic "angel" to Wagner, but actually by virtue of his own output.

You may prefer Wagner's characterization of Faust to Liszt's, if only because it is so much shorter; you may grow restive under the bombast of the first movement of the symphony and the garrulousness of this and of the third. But you can hardly deny that Liszt has succeeded, with the simplest means, in establishing a mood in those preluding measures of the "Faust" section; that Mephistopheles's mocking is cleverer and more amusing than that of Strauss's critics; that there is dramatic value in the return of the Gretchen idea in the third movement, and that the concluding measures of the symphony are impressive, or, above all, that the tender love music of the second movement stands isolated and unapproached.

Is not Liszt's career a tragedy? He was so much more than a virtuoso of the piano; though his showmanship in this field perhaps contains the key to a weakness in his character. One of the most gifted originative artists in the history of music, he failed to bring his possibilities to full realization. Partly, perhaps, because of his generosity; he was always busy doing things for other people. But more, we feel, because he lacked two qualities—sincerity and taste. He could not resist the temptation to show off, to astonish, to take the easy way. This easy way led him astray from the path of his highest achievement.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did themselves honor in thus doing honor to Goethe. It was keenness for the task, no doubt, that betrayed them here and there into raggedness. For on the whole, it would be difficult to imagine a more eloquent or virtuosic proclamation of Goethe's greatness. In the "Faust" Symphony, devoted and efficient assistance was rendered by a chorus from the Harvard Glee club, Dr. A. T. Davison, conductor, and by Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. The success was conspicuous.

THI' CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 26 1932

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL CLOSE ITS SEASON IN A BLAZE OF GLORY

The Springfield Symphony orchestra will celebrate the successful conclusion of its tenth season by presenting the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Auditorium, Wednesday evening, April 6, in what promises to be the greatest symphony concert ever given in Springfield. The program has been made up by Dr Koussivitzky in accordance with the expressed wishes of his Springfield admirers and they are delighted with it, for it includes two modern works which are considered among the most brilliant interpretations of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr Koussevitzky, as well as what is generally regarded as the greatest symphony ever written, Beethoven's magnificent "Eroica."

The return of the Boston Symphony orchestra to the Auditorium, April 6, marks its first appearance in an evening concert in Springfield since 1917. It is especially appropriate that the great Boston orchestra should be brought to Springfield at this time, for it celebrated the 50th anniversary of its founding a year ago and is now at the very hight of its long and brilliant career. Under Dr Koussevitzky, the orchestra has attained a new degree of artistic perfection and even the New York critics now concede it to be the world's greatest symphony orchestra.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony orchestra as a part of its regular series, together with the large capacity of the Auditorium, make possible a popular scaling of prices which will enable every lover of orchestral music to enjoy this superb orchestra at its very best. The sale of single tickets will open at Steinert's music store Monday and there are good seats left at all prices. The management reports an excellent advance sale, with orders already received from Mount Holyoke, Smith and Amherst colleges, as well as from individuals in Holyoke, Northampton, Pittsfield and Hartford, assuring one of the largest audiences of the season. The program:—

Suite: Saraband; gigue; badinerie....Corelli
Eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"..........N. Tcherepnin
1. "Arab Boy" 5. "Mama"
2. "Egypt" 6. "General"
3. "Baba-jaga" 7. "The Forest"
4. "Stars" 8. "The Tsarina"
Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," second suite, Ravel
Lever du jour; pantomime; danse generale

Symphony No 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55..................Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre; adagio assai
Scherzo; allegro vivace; trio
Finale; allegro molto

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 27 1932

TICKET SALE TOMORROW CONCERT a to Give it at Audi-ton Symphony the Auditorium

April 6, will go music store to-which is being spices of the orchestra, is on, since that ppeared in this
The program,
of the greatest hoven's "Eroi-quality.
the orchestra,
r Serge Kous-

Maj Henry L. e first dream
e by founding of European on then un-idea had come Vienna. It was r an impecuut after many fortune as a give the Bos-
a to the world.
t musicians in this country a est conductors new precedent sicians entire ts to the or-he gave entire sdom of these as each con-enius to the t of an end the world's t established three seasons

me Wilhelm

Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees.

After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr Serge Koussevitsky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:—

George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924- —.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 27 1932

Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at its closing concert of the New York series on Saturday afternoon, April 9. Today the orchestra is scheduled to perform Bach's B minor Mass in Boston, assisted by the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe. An all-Haydn program will be given Friday and Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

MAR 27 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, commemorating the centenary of Goethe's death, will give Liszt's "Faust" symphony in Carnegie Hall in its last New York concert of the season, Saturday afternoon, April 9. The Harvard Glee Club, which sang the closing chorus of this work with this orchestra in Boston, will also take part in the New York concert.

Today in Boston, Serge Koussevitsky is conducting the Boston Symphony in Bach's B minor Mass, with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses. Ernest Toch was soloist in his first piano concerto last week, when the program also included his "Bunte Suite." Next week, Dr. Koussevitsky will give an all-Haydn program including his first published symphony, in D, written when Haydn was twenty-three years old.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 29 1932

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield April 6th makes doubly interesting the volume, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931" by M. A. DeWolfe Howe. The earlier edition of this book was published in 1914, when the bitter feeling aroused by the World War nearly wiped out the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its large quota of German and Austrian players. After the war came two French conductors, and in 1924 Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor, became the leader. Under his able baton the orchestra has become known throughout the world for its brilliant technique and artistic interpretations. Koussevitzky freed the orchestra from the tradition of having soloists with each concert, soloists only being engaged when concertos are played or the score calls for a vocal part. "If there is a single trait which will encompass everything notable Dr. Koussevitzky has done, it is his tireless capacity for enthusiasm. Assimilating the music of youth and its point of view, he believes in it, for the time at least, with all his being. And he carries the same eager attitude toward that music which the world has heard too often. He can always restudy, freshly conceive, keep its emotions 'first-hand.' [Lib. No. 780.21 H83.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 27 1932

The new piano concerto of Serge Prokofieff will be introduced next season by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer at the piano. They are scheduled for New York appearance early in January, 1933.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAR 29 1932

SYMPHONY TALK

A. H. Turner to Explain Two Numbers to Be Heard at Concert.

The second of the two talks on the coming Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Municipal Auditorium April 6, will be presented tonight by Arthur H. Turner, conductor of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Lloyd Stoneman of the orchestra at the piano. Mr. Turner will speak in the Springfield Art Museum at 8.15 o'clock, and the public is invited to attend without charge.

The two numbers on the visiting orchestra's program which will be taken up tonight are Tcherepnine's "Twelve Miniature Pictures" and "Daphne and Chloe," ballet by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MA 9 1932

Symphony Talk.

The second of the two talks on the coming Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Municipal Auditorium April 6, will be presented tonight by Arthur H. Turner, conductor of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Lloyd Stoneman of the orchestra at the piano. Mr. Turner will speak in the Springfield Art Museum at 8.15 o'clock, and the public is invited to attend without charge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 31 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate tomorrow and Saturday the bicentenary of Haydn's birth by playing three of his symphonies—the first, the last and the "Surprise"—and the 'cello concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

R 27 1932

LISZT AND GOETHE

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

FUTURE commentators upon the esthetic and cultural history of New York in the first half of the twentieth century may be puzzled to account for the fact that while the rest of the civilized world was observing the centenary of the death of the incomparable poet, thinker, and philosopher whose genius so richly fertilized the art of tones, the choral and symphonic organizations of America's musical capital paid no more attention to the great occasion than if Goethe—without whom, as I remarked last week, music would have worn a different face—had been the excellent Lydia Huntley Sigourney, author of "Letters to Young Ladies."

As so often happens in the musical world of the Eastern United States, we in New York shall have, in this instance, to depend upon the benefactions of another community. It now appears that the Boston Symphony Orchestra purposes to bring to Carnegie Hall at its next week's pair of concerts (April 7-9) the evidently remarkable exhibition of the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt which Mr. Koussevitzky lately achieved in Boston, in fit and happy commemoration of the Goethe anniversary—a performance of the great work which moved Mr. Parker of the "Transcript" to note the eloquent projection of those transfigured final measures in which, as he justly remarked, "Liszt fulfills Goethe." Our own musical organizations having one and all ignored the shining opportunity to pay adequate musical tribute to the genius who deeply influenced the imaginations of Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, Boito, Mahler (and how many other tone-poets?), one must hope that a New York repetition of the Bostonians' performance will occur as promised.

* * *

The "Faust Symphony"

SINCE it is a number of years since the complete "Faust Symphony" of Liszt was heard in New York, it may assist our responsiveness to the hoped-for performance of next week if we recall just what it is that Liszt has sought to do in his treatment of certain aspects of Goethe's poem. Something was said here last week by way of general comment upon Goethe's drama and its reaction upon various composers. Let us now consider its reaction upon Liszt in particular.

Liszt described his symphony as "Three Character Pictures After Goethe: I, Faust; II, Gretchen; III Mephistopheles," with a final chorus for men's voices and solo tenor singing the chorus mysticus which ends the drama. He worked upon his score during the period in which Wagner composed the music of his "Rheingold"—1853-'54. But Liszt revised and amplified the symphony in 1857, adding the final chorus. The score was published in 1861. Liszt had already composed or sketched most of his symphonic poems and his "Dante" Symphony (begun in 1847-'48, completed in 1855). But the "Faust" Symphony, according to Lina Ramann, Liszt's voluminous biographer, has a longer background than these dates would indicate. She says that Liszt conceived the idea of the "Faust" Symphony in the '40s, inspired by the "Damnation of Faust" of Berlioz (to whom the score is dedicated); but Liszt does not appear to have put any of the symphony on paper until a decade later.

Mr. Huneker in his book on Liszt declares roundly that the work "is not a symphony"; though he inserts a parenthetical "query: What is the symphonic archetype?" and hastens on without answering his own question. The "Faust" Symphony he calls "a congeries of symphonic moods, structurally united by emotional intimacy and occasional thematic concourse." Mr. Apthorp, long before, had perhaps more happily termed it "a concatenation of three symphonic poems, rather than a symphony, properly so called." . . "It hardly comes within the domain of program music proper," he added, "for the composer has published no explanatory program nor preface with it, content to let the mere titles of the several movements help the music to tell what story it may have to tell; but it has in it so little that suggests the traditional symphonic form that it can properly be called a symphony only by certain stretching of terms. It is, for the most part, a piece of perfectly free composition. Yet there are, nevertheless, some symphonic characteristics discoverable in the first movement."

* * *

The Plan of the Work

THE general plan of the symphony—its dramatic and musico-poetic framework—may be described as an attempt to develop a philosophical o poetical idea by giving musical delineation to what the composer conceive to be the fundamental moods of the three principal characters in Goethe tragedy, in themselves and their relationship to one another. This purpose suggested in the title. The names of the three characters (Faust, Gretche and Mephistopheles) are put as superscriptions over the three movement which make up the symphony. Briefly stated, the plan is as follows: By mean of musical treatment given to four motives, or themes, in the first movement the idea of Faust is presented—a type of humanity harassed with doubt, rage despair, loneliness (the first theme, Lento); his strivings and hopes (secon theme, Allegro agitato); his ideals and longings (third theme, Andante); hi pride and energy (fourth theme, Grandioso).

The subject of the second movement is Goethe's heroine. There is brief prelude for flutes and clarinets, which introduces a melody obviousl designed to give expression to the gentle grace of Gretchen's characte (Andante); then a motive borrowed from the beginning of the first them of the first movement suggests the entrance of Faust into Gretchen's mind it is followed by the second extended melody, which delineates the feelin of love after it has taken complete possession of her imagination. Th gives way in turn to the third theme of the first movement, in which th composer had given voice to the longings of Faust, and which, in its develop ment, shows the clarifying influence of association with the Gretchen musi

In the third movement, Mephistopheles appears in his character as th spirit of negation ("der Geist der stets verneint"). The music consists mimicries and parodies of the themes of the first movement, especially th third (Faust's ideals and longings), "which," remarked Mr. Krehbiel, " made the special subject of the Evil One's sport, because it enables him get nearest to Gretchen, whose goodness protects her from his wiles." I these means Liszt develops a conflict which finds its solution in the epilogu sung by the male chorus and solo tenor. The text is the famous Chor mysticus which ends Goethe's tragedy: "Alles Vergänliche ist nur e Gleichniss," etc.

* * *

A Rare Finale

FOR many students of Liszt's Symphony, this setting of the close Goethe's drama is the most remarkable and engrossing thing in the sc What, one might have conjectured, could this singular and enigma finale, with its unplumbed depths of philosophie wisdom and its supersens ecstasies, mean to Liszt?—to Liszt the showman, the virtuoso, the sen tionalist, crossed with that other Liszt who was poet and pathbreaker; to Li the playactor and the penitent, the charlatan and the saint.

One had thought, it may be, of Liszt the tinseled Titan, the darling of footlights, the boudoir god, the fashionable male modiste of tones; but a one had remembered Liszt the prophet of musical tomorrows, Liszt the gener and kindly human being; and one had doubtless speculated upon the mu that such a flawed, unintegrated spirit would press from that incompara Epilogue in which the transfigured apparitions of the poet's vision "are m to pass before us as in a glass, and the divine wisdom is unfolded in a div ascent." For in this unique scene, Goethe, as he himself remarked of Fili Neri, received the gift of ecstasy, that standing outside oneself in freedo and became the Pater Ecstaticus of his own enraptured vision.

* * *

Liszt's Chorus Mysticus

IT WOULD be idle to pretend that Liszt has given us in his setting of Goeth Chorus Mysticus an equivalent, or anything like it, of the spiritual imaginative values of the poem. Liszt, after all, despite his authentic geni was no Beethoven, no Wagner, no Brahms. Yet Liszt, the everlasting anom among creative artists, has disclosed himself here, for a few extraordin pages, as a mystical seer, a visionary, a master of lofty and tender beau There are luminous, revelatory moments in these last hundred measures Liszt's score—music in which the imagination of the tone-poet, like that the dramatic poet himself, suggests—in Goethe's own words—"a hovering the spirit above the earth."

Those successive changes of key, at the beginning of the Chorus Mystic from C major and E minor, to A flat major and thence, exquisitely, to B na with the solo voice, in a transformed version of the Gretchen theme, rep its celebrated affirmation through ascending intervals to a rapturous h the orchestra's enveloping beauty and mystery and solemnity, which (as Li himself is said to have remarked), are "like the slow moving and disperse majestic clouds": these things are rare achievements of the creative w Here, for once, Liszt's music reflects the radiance and the exaltation of Goeth thought, and speaks to us of light and serenity and liberation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 26 1932

News

Mu Among "Fa Week" Dele

WAGNER

To mark the Goethe, Dr. Kouss for recent Boston S certs a program w
of Wagner's "Faust
Liszt's "Faust" Sym
Wagner's Overtur chiefly for its fore master of music symphony is of in same reason; but a would be difficult the extent or the Wagner's debt to included not only rial assistance, th great name in ge formed and in Wagnerian gospel actual musical m
ods. In the "Faus may discover mo
and even of "Pa erosity of Liszt w
by the ingratitud
It is true that with the materia Symphony is s evidence that support of th Liszt is among not only histor artistic "angel" tually by virtu put.
You may pr acterization of only because i you may grow bombast of th the symphony ness of this you can hard succeeded, w in establishi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 26 1932

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WILL CLOSE ITS SEASON IN A BLAZE OF GLORY

The Springfield Symphony orchestra will celebrate the successful conclusion of its tenth season by presenting the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Auditorium, Wednesday evening, April 6, in what promises to be the greatest symphony concert ever given in Springfield. The program has been made up by Dr Koussivitzky in accordance with the expressed wishes of his Springfield admirers and they are delighted with it, for it includes two modern works which are considered among the most brilliant interpretations of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr Koussevitzky, as well as what is generally regarded as the greatest symphony ever written, Beethoven's magnificent "Eroica."

The return of the Boston Symphony orchestra to the Auditorium, April 6, marks its first appearance in an evening concert in Springfield since 1917. It is especially appropriate that the great Boston orchestra should be brought to Springfield at this time, for it celebrated the 50th anniversary of its founding a year ago and is now at the very hight of its long and brilliant career. Under Dr Koussevitzky, the orchestra has attained a new degree of artistic perfection and even the New York critics now concede it to be the world's greatest symphony orchestra.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony orchestra as a part of its regular series, together with the large capacity of the Auditorium, make possible a popular scaling of prices which will enable every lover of orchestral music to enjoy this superb orchestra at its very best. The sale of single tickets will open at Steinert's music store Monday and there are good seats left at all prices. The management reports an excellent advance sale, with orders already received from Mount Holyoke, Smith and Amherst colleges, as well as from individuals in Holyoke, Northampton, Pittsfield and Hartford, assuring one of the largest audiences of the season. The program:—

Suite: Saraband; gigue; badinerie....Corelli
Eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"............N. Tcherepnin

1.	"Arab Boy"	5.	"Mama"
2.	"Egypt"	6.	"General"
3.	"Baba-jaga"	7.	"The Forest"
4.	"Stars"	8.	"The Tsarina"

Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," second suite, Ravel
Lever du jour; pantomime; danse generale

Symphony No 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55............................Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre; adagio assai
Scherzo; allegro vivace; trio
Finale; allegro molto

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 27 1932

TICKET SALE TOMORROW FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra to Give Program of Merit at Auditorium April 6

Tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium on Wednesday night, April 6, will go on sale at Steinert's music store tomorrow. The concert, which is being given under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony orchestra, is attracting wide attention, since that organization has not appeared in this city in several years. The program, which will include one of the greatest of all symphonies, Beethoven's "Eroica," is of outstanding quality.

A brief history of the orchestra, whose leader is now Dr Serge Koussevitzky, is as follows:—

In 1881, the late Maj Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world.

He engaged the finest musicians in Europe and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees.

After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr Serge Koussevitsky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:—

George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924- —.

159-60

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 27 1932

Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at its closing concert of the New York series on Saturday afternoon, April 9. Today the orchestra is scheduled to perform Bach's B minor Mass in Boston, assisted by the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe. An all-Haydn program will be given Friday and Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

MAR 27 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, commemorating the centenary of Goethe's death, will give Liszt's "Faust" symphony in Carnegie Hall in its last New York concert of the season, Saturday afternoon, April 9. The Harvard Glee Club, which sang the closing chorus of this work with this orchestra in Boston, will also take part in the New York concert.

Today in Boston, Serge Koussevitsky is conducting the Boston Symphony in Bach's B minor Mass, with the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses. Ernest Toch was soloist in his first piano concerto last week, when the program also included his "Bunte Suite." Next week, Dr. Koussevitsky will give an all-Haydn program including his first published symphony, in D, written when Haydn was twenty-three years old.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 29 1932

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield April 6th makes doubly interesting the volume, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931" by M. A. DeWolfe Howe. The earlier edition of this book was published in 1914, when the bitter feeling aroused by the World War nearly wiped out the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its large quota of German and Austrian players. After the war came two French conductors, and in 1924 Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor, became the leader. Under his able baton the orchestra has become known throughout the world for its brilliant technique and artistic interpretations. Koussevitzky freed the orchestra from the tradition of having soloists with each concert, soloists only being engaged when concertos are played or the score calls for a vocal part. "If there is a single trait which will encompass everything notable Dr. Koussevitzky has done, it is his tireless capacity for enthusiasm. Assimilating the music of youth and its point of view, he believes in it, for the time at least, with all his being. And he carries the same eager attitude toward that music which the world has heard too often. He can always restudy, freshly conceive, keep its emotions 'first-hand.' [Lib. No. 780.21 H83.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 27 1932

The new piano concerto of Serge Prokofieff will be introduced next season by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer at the piano. They are scheduled for New York appearance early in January, 1933.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAR 29 1932

SYMPHONY TALK

A. H. Turner to Explain Two Numbers to Be Heard at Concert.

The second of the two talks on the coming Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Municipal Auditorium April 6, will be presented tonight by Arthur H. Turner, conductor of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Lloyd Stoneman of the orchestra at the piano. Mr. Turner will speak in the Springfield Art Museum at 8.15 o'clock, and the public is invited to attend without charge.

The two numbers on the visiting orchestra's program which will be taken up tonight are Tcherepnine's "Twelve Miniature Pictures" and "Daphne and Chloe," ballet by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MA 9 932

Symphony Talk.

The second of the two talks on the coming Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Municipal Auditorium April 6, will be presented tonight by Arthur H. Turner, conductor of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Lloyd Stoneman of the orchestra at the piano. Mr. Turner will speak in the Springfield Art Museum at 8.15 o'clock, and the public is invited to attend without charge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAR 31 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate tomorrow and Saturday the bicentenary of Haydn's birth by playing three of his symphonies—the first, the last and the "Surprise"—and the 'cello concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

171

R 27 1932

LISZT AND GOETHE

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

FUTURE commentators upon the esthetic and cultural history of New York in the first half of the twentieth century may be puzzled to account for the fact that while the rest of the civilized world was observing the centenary of the death of the incomparable poet, thinker, and philosopher whose genius so richly fertilized the art of tones, the choral and symphonic organizations of America's musical capital paid no more attention to the great occasion than if Goethe—without whom, as I remarked last week, music would have worn a different face—had been the excellent Lydia Huntley Sigourney, author of "Letters to Young Ladies."

As so often happens in the musical world of the Eastern United States, we in New York shall have, in this instance, to depend upon the benefactions of another community. It now appears that the Boston Symphony Orchestra purposes to bring to Carnegie Hall at its next week's pair of concerts (April 7-9) the evidently remarkable exhibition of the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt which Mr. Koussevitzky lately achieved in Boston, in fit and happy commemoration of the Goethe anniversary—a performance of the great work which moved Mr. Parker of the "Transcript" to note the eloquent projection of those transfigured final measures in which, as he justly remarked, "Liszt fulfills Goethe." Our own musical organizations having one and all ignored the shining opportunity to pay adequate musical tribute to the genius who deeply influenced the imaginations of Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, Boito, Mahler (and how many other tone-poets?), one must hope that a New York repetition of the Bostonians' performance will occur as promised.

* * *

The "Faust Symphony"

SINCE it is a number of years since the complete "Faust Symphony" of Liszt was heard in New York, it may assist our responsiveness to the hoped-for performance of next week if we recall just what it is that Liszt has sought to do in his treatment of certain aspects of Goethe's poem. Something was said here last week by way of general comment upon Goethe's drama and its reaction upon various composers. Let us now consider its reaction upon Liszt in particular.

Liszt described his symphony as "Three Character Pictures After Goethe: I, Faust; II, Gretchen; III Mephistopheles," with a final chorus for men's voices and solo tenor singing the chorus mysticus which ends the drama. He worked upon his score during the period in which Wagner composed the music of his "Rheingold"—1853-'54. But Liszt revised and amplified the symphony in 1857, adding the final chorus. The score was published in 1861. Liszt had already composed or sketched most of his symphonic poems and his "Dante" Symphony (begun in 1847-'48, completed in 1855). But the "Faust" Symphony, according to Lina Ramann, Liszt's voluminous biographer, has a longer background than these dates would indicate. She says that Liszt conceived the idea of the "Faust" Symphony in the '40s, inspired by the "Damnation of Faust" of Berlioz (to whom the score is dedicated); but Liszt does not appear to have put any of the symphony on paper until a decade later.

Mr. Huneker in his book on Liszt declares roundly that the work "is not a symphony"; though he inserts a parenthetical "query: What is the symphonic archetype?" and hastens on without answering his own question. The "Faust" Symphony he calls "a congeries of symphonic moods, structurally united by emotional intimacy and occasional thematic concourse." Mr. Apthorp, long before, had perhaps more happily termed it "a concatenation of three symphonic poems, rather than a symphony, properly so called." . . "It hardly comes within the domain of program music proper," he added, "for the composer has published no explanatory program nor preface with it, content to let the mere titles of the several movements help the music to tell what story it may have to tell; but it has in it so little that suggests the traditional symphonic form that it can properly be called a symphony only by certain stretching of terms. It is, for the most part, a piece of perfectly free composition. Yet there are, nevertheless, some symphonic characteristics discoverable in the first movement."

* * *

The Plan of the Work

THE general plan of the symphony—its dramatic and musico-poetic framework—may be described as an attempt to develop a philosophical o poetical idea by giving musical delineation to what the composer conceive to be the fundamental moods of the three principal characters in Goethe tragedy, in themselves and their relationship to one another. This purpose suggested in the title. The names of the three characters (Faust, Gretcher and Mephistopheles) are put as superscriptions over the three movement which make up the symphony. Briefly stated, the plan is as follows: By mean of musical treatment given to four motives, or themes, in the first movement the idea of Faust is presented—a type of humanity harassed with doubt, rage despair, loneliness (the first theme, Lento); his strivings and hopes (secon theme, Allegro agitato); his ideals and longings (third theme, Andante); hi pride and energy (fourth theme, Grandioso).

The subject of the second movement is Goethe's heroine. There is brief prelude for flutes and clarinets, which introduces a melody obviousl designed to give expression to the gentle grace of Gretchen's characte (Andante); then a motive borrowed from the beginning of the first them of the first movement suggests the entrance of Faust into Gretchen's mind it is followed by the second extended melody, which delineates the feelin of love after it has taken complete possession of her imagination. Th gives way in turn to the third theme of the first movement, in which th composer had given voice to the longings of Faust, and which, in its develop ment, shows the clarifying influence of association with the Gretchen music

In the third movement, Mephistopheles appears in his character as th spirit of negation ("der Geist der stets verneint"). The music consists mimicries and parodies of the themes of the first movement, especially th third (Faust's ideals and longings), "which," remarked Mr. Krehbiel, " made the special subject of the Evil One's sport, because it enables him get nearest to Gretchen, whose goodness protects her from his wiles." these means Liszt develops a conflict which finds its solution in the epilog sung by the male chorus and solo tenor. The text is the famous Chor mysticus which ends Goethe's tragedy: "Alles Vergänliche ist nur e Gleichniss," etc.

* * *

A Rare Finale

FOR many students of Liszt's Symphony, this setting of the close Goethe's drama is the most remarkable and engrossing thing in the sc What, one might have conjectured, could this singular and enigma finale, with its unplumbed depths of philosophie wisdom and its supersens ecstasies, mean to Liszt?—to Liszt the showman, the virtuoso, the sen tionalist, crossed with that other Liszt who was poet and pathbreaker; to L the playactor and the penitent, the charlatan and the saint.

One had thought, it may be, of Liszt the tinseled Titan, the darling of footlights, the boudoir god, the fashionable male modiste of tones; but a one had remembered Liszt the prophet of musical tomorrows, Liszt the gener and kindly human being; and one had doubtless speculated upon the mu that such a flawed, unintegrated spirit would press from that incompara Epilogue in which the transfigured apparitions of the poet's vision "are m to pass before us as in a glass, and the divine wisdom is unfolded in a div ascent." For in this unique scene, Goethe, as he himself remarked of Fili Neri, received the gift of ecstasy, that standing outside oneself in freedo and became the Pater Ecstaticus of his own enraptured vision.

* * *

Liszt's Chorus Mysticus

IT WOULD be idle to pretend that Liszt has given us in his setting of Goeth Chorus Mysticus an equivalent, or anything like it, of the spiritual imaginative values of the poem. Liszt, after all, despite his authentic gen was no Beethoven, no Wagner, no Brahms. Yet Liszt, the everlasting anom among creative artists, has disclosed himself here, for a few extraordin pages, as a mystical seer, a visionary, a master of lofty and tender beau There are luminous, revelatory moments in these last hundred measures Liszt's score—music in which the imagination of the tone-poet, like that the dramatic poet himself, suggests—in Goethe's own words—"a hovering the spirit above the earth."

Those successive changes of key, at the beginning of the Chorus Mystic from C major and E minor, to A flat major and thence, exquisitely, to B na with the solo voice, in a transformed version of the Gretchen theme, rep its celebrated affirmation through ascending intervals to a rapturous h the orchestra's enveloping beauty and mystery and solemnity, which (as L himself is said to have remarked), are "like the slow moving and dispers majestic clouds": these things are rare achievements of the creative w Here, for once, Liszt's music reflects the radiance and the exaltation of Goeth thought, and speaks to us of light and serenity and liberation.

172

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 1 - 1932

VARIATIONS

By WILLARD M. CLARK

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays ~~here Wednesday~~ night as the climax of the 10th anniversary year of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, one of the most colorful figures in the world of music, Serge Kousseyitzky, will conduct.

Little has been written of Koussevitzky from a biographical standpoint, but Arthur Lourie's biography, written in Russia and admirably translated by S. W. Pring, reveals many interesting events in the exceptionally romantic life of this great conductor.

Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky was born in June, 1874, in the village of Vyshny Volochek, a poor little town now hardly discoverable on the map, situated in the Tver Government, which forms a part of Central Russia. The boy was born in a poor family, but a musical one. The father gave lessons on the violin and the mother played the piano. His mother died when he was three years old and his father's music was the original source from which the young Koussevitzky satisfied his longing, a longing for music expressed early in life. This passionate yearning for musical sounds was so strong that he soon learned to play every instrument, his teachers at that time being the strolling musicians wandering from one village to another. Sometimes Serge followed them for days at a time. To this period of his childhood belong the earliest attempts at musical composition. A typically provincial theater opened in his town and music was required for the entr'actes and the boy arranged it, welcoming the chance of testing his powers and displaying the "knowledge" he had acquired.

* * *

However small the Russian village, there is always some form of culture, and young Serge came under the influence of a cultured woman, wife of an engineer named Ropenberg. She was a fine pianist and introduced him to Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, playing their compositions for him. She gave him lessons in piano and soon he was playing duets with her. Still later, he became conductor of the little orchestra of the theater.

Very soon the confines of the little village became too narrow for him and he felt that he must get away to the big city, Moscow, and in face of parental objection to a career of music he ran away.

Of Koussevitzky's student years, Lourie has written in detail. We find the young man refused admission at the Moscow Conservatory and also at the Philharmonic School, but at the latter place he made so urgent a plea for an examination that it was given and he easily passed all the requirements. Only three scholarships were available at the school when he arrived, namely the horn, the trombone and the double-bass. He chose the double-bass, an instrument in which no one was interested, and which occupied the lowliest place in the orchestra. He, however, seemed even then to feel that this instrument held new and hitherto unexploited possibilities of development. Thus by a strange series of circumstances he became a double-bass player, a specialty that had never entered his mind, but which he was destined ultimately to raise to a level entirely unknown at this time, a pitch of perfection lost by this instrument since the days of the two remarkable virtuosi of the 19th Century, Dragonetti and Bottesini. During his career as a double-bass player Koussevitzky toured Europe and soon became head of the department in the Philharmonic School. In his 17th year he was admitted to the orchestra of the Imperial Theater without a contest becoming in one year leader of the double-basses. He made it a condition that he should have the right to the title of soloist, which in those days did not exist for the orchestral double-bass. In 1894 he completed his studies and graduated from the school. More than a bit of mischief and humor lurked in the boy. Once, after he had been appointed first double-bass in the imperial orchestra, he heard that a competition in St. Petersburg to fill the place of first double-bass player in the Imperial Opera was to be held. To test his ability and also as a joke he entered the competition. His appearance caused a furore and several competitors refused to play. The members of the committee never suspected such quality of tone or technique could be possible and Koussevitzky won unanimously. Great was the consternation when he told them of his contract with the Moscow Theater. Two of the competitors followed him to Moscow for study. As he continued to play publicly he realized that the literature for the double-bass was very meager. Thus it was necessary to arrange or write his own literature for the instrument and today there are a number of fine transcriptions which have come from his pen.

* * *

In 1905 he married Natalya Ushkova and Lourie pays high tribute to the wife as "ideal helper and friend who made it possible for him to realize everything for which he had consciously or unconsciously striven and which would have come to naught unless conditions so favorable for it had been created." Simultaneously with his marriage, Koussevitsky brought his career as a virtuoso of the double-bass to a close and began the realization of his project of becoming a conductor. He had exhausted the possibilities of the double-bass and could go no further. To take up another instrument would have been absurd and he did not feel that composition was his vocation.

In 1906 Koussevitzky settled in Berlin and his first conducting began with the Berlin Hochschule Orchestra, which Joachim permitted to be placed at his disposal. To all intents and purposes the professional school of conducting was created at that time and Berlin and Leipzig were the headquarters. The predominant position in the existing surroundings was occupied by Nikisch's class at Leipzig. Mr. Lourie denies the prevalent opinion that Koussevitzky was a pupil in this class. He states that Koussevitzky worked independently, studying the technique of conducting exclusively from living examples, Nikisch, Mahler, Weingartner and others.

Having learnt to score by heart, he made some pianist play it in accordance with the plan which he himself intended to adopt in conducting this composition. While the pianist was playing, Koussevitzky conducted, and he had the work repeated until he mastered the technique of the gesture necessary in the given instance. After gaining complete control of his gestures he turned to the orchestra. This system of studying a score he has continued to the present day.

* * *

He made his debut as a conductor in Berlin with the Philharmonic Orchestra on Jan. 23, 1908. In subsequent seasons he conducted in London, Paris and Vienna. His visits to Berlin and London became annual.

From the very first he insisted on the inclusion of new music on his programs and it was often only by most insistent effort that he gained the cooperation of the older orchestra members. It was about this time that he conceived the idea of starting a venture of his own for the publication of music. In 1908 he paid a visit to Scriabin, the most brilliant name in Russia at this period. He offered Scriabin an interest in the new business and his mission was successful. Thus began an acquaintance which had such significance in the lives of both.

In 1909 the Koussevitzkys arrived again in Moscow. He became one of the most striking figures in the city's musical life. He had left Moscow a star performer on the double-bass. On his return he demanded to be treated from an entirely different standpoint. He adopted the role of an advanced "Westerner," a cultivated European. His new venture the Russian Music Publishing House opened up new prospects for the young musician and met with sympathetic reception.

* * *

He announced his first cycle of symphony concerts during the Moscow season of 1909-10. Known as the Sergi Koussevitzky Symphonic Concerts, they became exceptionally popular. For these he used the orchestra of the Imperial Theater. He also gave a cycle of concerts in St. Petersburg. In 1910 he organized his own orchestra consisting of 85 players. They were engaged for a year and not allowed to play anywhere else. In 1911 he gave the first cycle of Beethoven concerts given in Russia. He toured Russia and instituted Sunday concerts for the first time. A Tschaikowsky festival in 1912 was followed by a Bach festival the following year and each season he shared his conductor's stand with famous European conductors. Especially did he welcome the appearance of Debussy who accepted his invitation to conduct programs of his own works.

In the spring of 1910 Koussevitzky took his entire orchestra and famous soloists down the Volga. This tour was repeated in 1912-14. On each occasion they gave concerts at all the big towns on both banks of the river. The seasons of 1914-15 were carried on under war conditions. In 1916 more than half his players had been called to service and the revolution in 1917 radically changed all his plans. In 1921 he returned with his wife to Paris. He played a number of double-bass concerts in the capitol and also in Rome and other centers. His first series of Paris concerts was given in 1921 in Salle Gaveau where he gave programs of Russian works. These concerts proved extremely popular for several seasons and in addition Koussevitzky also conducted opera, a field new to him. He had three seasons of opera in Spain and later was invited to the Paris Opera to conduct the first performance in French of Boris Godunov. Later he staged Moussorgsky's "Khovanshchina" at the Opera. In 1924 he was made a member of the French Legion of Honor at the request of French artists and in 1930 he was promoted to Officer of the Legion, a distinction rarely awarded foreign artists.

It was in 1924 that Koussevitzky was invited to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He arrived in Boston in the autumn of that year. What he has since accomplished is known to every musical person and under his leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra has regained its place as premier orchestra in this country and one of the great orchestras of the world.

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with its 110 members comprises one of the most distinguished group of musicians in the world. This orchestra, which Olin Downes calls "a superb ensemble of virtuosi," has been selected by Dr. Koussevitzky during the last 10 years from the best orchestra players in this country and Europe. Many of these musicians have been brought from abroad to fill particular places in the orchestra.

As now organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one great personality directing a well-nigh perfect machine devoid of personalities. Within this great organization are many musical personalities which when dissociated from the orchestra are recognized as leaders in their profession.

Richard Burgin, the concert-master, was brought from Europe by Dr. Koussevitzky to fill the first chair in this organization and he is today recognized not only as one of the greatest concert-masters of the present generation but as a violinist of extraordinary ability. Another concert artist who sinks his personality in the orchestra is Jean Bedetti, one of the greatest cellists in this country and a popular soloist on the concert stage. He has for 10 years or more occupied the first chair in the cello section in this great organization. Among the other virtuosi in Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in the brilliant flutest, G. Laurent, one of the world's foremost players of the flute. Both Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Laurent have appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Olin Downes wrote as follows of the orchestra after a New York concert:

"The unsurpassed and seldom equaled Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave an extremely brilliant concert last night in Carnegie Hall. Not often has the writer heard as fine a performance from this orchestra, at any time in its career. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a superb ensemble of virtuosi. For its string section alone it would be pre-eminent, but its brass and wind choirs are now of almost equal quality and balance. Not only this: Mr. Koussevitzky has sensitized the orchestra until it is a model of flexibility and fineness of texture.

"Last night this magnificent instrument glowed with beauty and color; the sheer tonal qualities of the playing would have bestowed significance upon the music. The audience deeply impressed by the performance, applauded and cheered."

* * *

The annual concert by members of the Junior Extension of the Tuesday Morning Music Club will be held in Central High School on April 8. Some of the most talented young musicians will be heard in the following varied and interesting program:

Concerto in D minor, Mozart
Allegro (Beethoven Cadenza)
Gladys Kiefer, Ann Richter.
Concerto in D, Seitz
Andante con mote,
Allegretto,
Earl Lange.
Scherzo in B minor, Chopin
Bella Pollak.
Aria, "Un bel di vedremo" (Madame Butterfly), Puccini
Gladys V. Kuchta.
Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53, Chopin
Prescott Barrows.
Intermission.
Trio in D minor, Mendelssohn
Parnassus Trio.
Andante in F major, Cadman
"Northern Lights," Torjussen
"The King's Jester," Adams
Emelie Matera.
"Der Sohn der Haide" (Pusztak fia), Kela Bela
Donald Radding.
"Hear Me, Ye Winds and Waves," Handel
"A Brown Bird Singing," Wood
"Roadways," Densmore
Russell Moffatt.
Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier
Prescott Barrows, Gladys Kiefer, George Hart, Genevieve Schultz.

At the piano: Marion Boron, Beatrice Lange, Dorothy Kraemer.

The Parnassus Trio: Flora Cross, Earl and Beatrice Lange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

APR 3 - 1932

Koussevitzky to Conduct Orchestra Concert Here

Russian Director Selects Program of Classic and Modern Composers For Wednesday Night Event Sponsored By Springfield Symphony—A Brief Sketch of the Conductor

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will give at the Auditorium Wednesday night, a program devoted to the works of both classic and modern composers. The concert, which is included in the series offered this season by the Springfield Symphony orchestra, has attracted wide interest. Secretary Edward H. Marsh has reported that many persons from out-of-town communities, including South Hadley and Northampton, have ordered tickets for the event. There has also been an unusually large local sale at Steinert's music store, according to Mr Marsh.

The program is as follows:—

Suite .... Corelli
Sarabande
Gigue
Badinerie
Eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" .... Tcherepnin
Arab-boy, Egypt, Baba-jaja, Stars, Mama, General, The Forest, The Tsarina.
"Daphnis et Chloe," ballet, second suite .... Ravel
"Lever du Jour"
Pantomime
Danse General
Symphony No 3, "Eroica" ...... Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre; adagio assai
Scherzo; allegro vivace; trio
Finale; allegro molto.

A brief sketch of Dr Koussevitzky, which appeared in Howe's "History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," is as follows:—

"The announcement of the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky a full year ahead of his coming deprived people of the "rumor" pastime, but left them another—speculation about the new conductor. To America, Koussevitzky was a rather legendary figure, spoken of as having suddenly come to the fore in the concerts of London and Paris. There were reports of his friendliness toward new music and his freedom with old; of his ability to excite an audience by goading an orchestra to a sort of furious eloquence.

"This western European reputation was not of long standing, for until after the war he had found his own vast land sufficient for his activities. Tver, a remote northern province of Russia, had given him birth, on July 26, 1874, and the inevitable Petrograd conservatory had been his mecca as a lad.

"There, every pupil was required to study some instrument, for the orchestral class. He chose the double bass. The young man withdrew into a corner with his monster, and emerged discoursing delicate tones such as neither students nor teachers bring forth from double basses. Before very long, he was going about with his instrument, astonishing everyone as he drew his solid bow fistwise across the strings, with the subtlety of a great 'cellist.

"The day that he performed his concerto at the Leipzig Gewandhaus under Nikisch was one of those sweet moments of a first general recognition. Koussevitzky remains faithful to his first love, keeping his Guarnerius always near at hand in his Paris or Boston home.

"Koussevitzky, the double-bass virtuoso, has a place in this narrative only in so far as Koussevitzky, the conductor, is thereby revealed. It must have been with something of the same sudden, inexplicable genius that he mastered the orchestra. Other conductors have progressed from a solo instrument to an orchestra, but always by the longer staircase to Parnassus. Again, the boy who chooses this extraordinary instrument, while another prodigy follows the ready-cut career of a violin virtuoso, has become the conductor who shuns routine and welcomes the unusual in his repertory. Still again, the Koussevitzky who coaxes such melodious eloquence from an intractable double bass is the leader who can "play upon" a string section, overpersuade what resistance of indifference there may be in 60 men assembled, and bring forth a songfulness which is the standing wonder of the Boston Symphony strings."

CONTRABASSISTE-CONDUCTOR

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, Who Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert at the Auditorium Wednesday Night

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES-STANDARD UNION

APR 3 - 1932

Boston Symphony's Last Concert of This Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the last concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences on Friday evening.

Patrons and patronesses are:

Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman.

Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Frederick E. Crane
Walter H. Crittenden
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
H. F. Gunnison
Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
R. Huntington Woodman

Other members of the Committee are:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Justice James C. Cropsey
Justice Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Theodore L. Frothingham
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
William T. Hunter
Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
James H. Jourdan
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. Robert B. Lea
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Beorge V. McLaughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
W. S. Morton Mead
Frank C. Munson
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
James H. Post
Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Eugene A. Widmann
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Surragate George A. Wingate
Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

* * *

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

APR 4 - 1932

Boston Symphony to Close Season Here Friday Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the last concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, on Friday evening.

Patrons and patronesses for the concert are: Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman; Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Herbert F. Gunnison, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, R. Huntington Woodman.

Other patronesses are: Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Jr., Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D., William M. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin. Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Judge James C. Cropsey, Judge Norman S. Dike, Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy DuVal, S. Ramond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Theodore L. Frothingham, William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Miss Amelia B. Hollenback. Dr. Alexander C. Howe, William T. Hunter, Darwin R. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, James H. Jourdan, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, George V. McDermott, George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall, W. S. Morton Mead, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, James H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, Jr., H. Stavely Sammond, Mrs. Henry Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Miss Marion J. Terry, William Armour Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Eugene A. Widmann, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Judge George A. Wingate, Cornelius D. Wood, Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

APR 5 -193

GALA NIGHT PLANNED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Largest Audience of Season Will Greet Return of Boston Organization

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to the Auditorium tomorrow, (Wednesday) evening under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony orchestra in celebration of the successful conclusion of its 10th season, it will be greeted by the largest audience of the season and the directors plan to make it a gala night. Many orchestra subscribers are giving small dinner parties before the concert which wil add colorful gayety to the audience. The concert is attracting music lovers from all the nearby towns and cities. Smith, Mount Holyoke and Amherst colleges will all be represented by delegates of students or faculty, and numerous orders have been received from Holyoke, Northampton, Easthampton, Shelburne Falls, Palmer, Monson, Ware, Westfield, Pittsfield, Lenox and Boston.

The program chosen by Dr Koussevitzky to meet the expressed wishes of the local orchestra seems to have pleased everyone and the directors believe it will prove one of the greatest symphony concerts ever given in Springfield.

The program is as follows:—

Corelli ....Suite
Saraband-Gigue-Badinerie
N. Tcherepnin, Eight Miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"
Arab Boy
Egypt
Bada-jaga
Stars
"Mama"
General
The Forest
The Tsarina
Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Second Suite.
Lever du Jour-Pantomime, Danse General
Beethoven, Symphony No 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivaca; Trio
Finale: Allegro molto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

PR 5 -1932

Boston Symphony Concert Tomorrow

Noted Organization to Play Splendid Program for Music Lovers.

The 10th season of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra will come to a brilliant close in the Auditorium tomorrow evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Springfield after a long absence. The famous Boston orchestra has not given an evening concert in Springfield since 1917, when it appeared in the Ellis Concert series, under the direction of C. A. Ellis, then manager of the orchestra. Music lovers from all over Western Massachusetts and Connecticut are being attracted by this unusual event and orders have already been received from Smith, Mt. Holyoke and Amherst Colleges as well as Holyoke, Northampton, Easthampton, Shelburne Falls, Palmer, Monson, Ware, Thompsonville, Willimantic, Westfield, Pittsfield, Lenox and Boston.

Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his entire orchestra of 110 men and the pro-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 5 -1932

DR. CHAPMAN TO CONDUCT HIS SERIES OF LECTURES

Critic to Discuss Program for Coming Symphony Concert.

Next Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock the last in the series of lectures by Dr. W. Louis Chapman on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given, April 12 being the final concert of the season.

Throughout the winter these lectures have attracted large and appreciative audiences among students, musicians and music lovers.

Dr. Chapman will speak Sunday on the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky for next Tuesday's concert, illustrating his talk at the piano and with other instruments. He will speak on the particular works to be played by the orchestra, taking up the lives of the four composers (Beethoven, Debussy, Strauss and Tchaikovsky) who are represented on the program.

The lectures are given in the Boys' and Girls' room of the Providence Public Library, and are free to the public. They are sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

APR 6 -1932

PROGRAM FOR CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA THIS EVENING

The Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Springfield in the Auditorium tonight, under the direction of one of the most colorful personalities in the world of music. Dr Serge Koussevitzky is known as the virtuoso of the double bass and one of the few musicians in the world who has played on this unwieldly instrument as a concert soloist. Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Russia, not far from Moscow, and when a mere lad made up his mind that he wanted to attend the Conservatory at Moscow. He realized his ambition and while still a boy he began the serious study of music. In the conservatory each student was obliged to choose some instrument and to the astonishment of his teachers Koussevitzky chose the double bass. He retired to some out-of-the-way corner and there worked with a determination which has characterized his whole life since then. When he emerged to play for the first time before a small group Koussevitzky had not only mastered his intrument but drew forth from its depths tones of marvelous beauty.

Soon after graduating from the conservatory young Koussevitzky performed his own concerto in the Leipsic Gewandhaus, under Nikisch whom he was destined to succeed many years later as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky remained true to his first love and kept his Gunarerius always near him and later when he became an established favorite in Paris he was frequently heard as the virtuoso of the double bass.

Dr Koussevitzky organized his own orchestra in Petrograd and took it to Moscow where he gave classical choral concerts. In the summer he put his orchestra on a boat and voyaged 2000 miles up the Volga giving concerts in village after village in the heart of rural Russia. From 1912 to 1920 Dr Koussevitzky was the director of a subsidized orchestra. Not in sympathy with the Communistic movement Koussevitzky went to Paris where, as the director of his own orchestra, he established the concerts Koussevitzky and became a reigning favorite. In 1924 he was invited to go to London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra where he performed the Beethoven 9th Symphony which added greatly to his fame. It was this great concert that brought him to the attention of America, and soon after he was engaged as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra He is now completing his eighth season as conductor of this great orchestra and he has brought it to a degree of perfection attained by few, if any, orchestras in the world.

Dr Koussevitzky has made up the program to be rendered this evening especially to please his Springfield admirers and it promises to be the greatest symphony concert ever given in Springfield. The concert is scheduled to begin at 8.15 and as Dr Kousevitzky is always desirous to start his concert promptly, concert-goers are urged to be in their places promptly.

The program is as follows:—

Suite ....Corelli
Saraband: gigue: badinerie
Eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"...........N. Tcherepnin
1. "Arab Boy"
2. "Egypt"
3. "Baba-jaga"
4. "Stars"
5. "Mama"
6. "General"
7. "The Forest"
8. "The Tsarina"
Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," second suite, Ravel
Lever du jour: pantomime; danse generale
Symphony No 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55 ....Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre; adagio assai
Scherzo; allegro vivacte; trio
Finale; allegro molto

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 6 -1932

MUSIC NOTES

Guild of Amateurs to Meet

The Guild of Musical Amateurs will hold its last meeting of the season today at 3:30 at the home of Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, at 934 Fifth Avenue. Harold Bauer, president and artistic adviser of the guild, will attend. During its first season the amateur musicians in the guild have played works for stringed instruments and piano by Mozart, Bach and Brahms, music for two pianos by Bach, Arensky, Gluck, Mendelssohn and Chabrier, and vocal numbers by Franck, Lalo, Brahms, Reger, Ravel and de Falla.

Symphony Program Revised

Serge Koussevitzky has revised the program to be played by the Boston Symphony tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall, omitting Anton von Webern's German Dances, by Schubert. The revised program consists of Ernst Toch's "Bunte Suite," Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

6 -1932

Boston Symphony Palys At Auditorium Tonight

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance in this city for several years, tonight at 8.15 at the Auditorium, under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony orchestra. A program of outstanding merit has been selected by the Russian director, and the largest audience of the season is assured.

This concert will conclude the series of five programs offered by the Springfield Symphony this season, the first four having been given by the local organization under the direction of Arthur H. Turner. The appearance of the Boston orchestra was arranged for in celebration of the Springfield group's 10th anniversary year. Tickets are on sale at Steinert's music store today, and may be procured at the Auditorium tonight.

The principal work on tonight's program will be Beethoven's Symphony in E-flat, commonly known as the "Eroica." It is many years since this symphony has been performed in Springfield. It is considered one of the greatest of orchestral works.

Two Composers Represented

Two modern composers also will be represented. The second ballet suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel, one of the best known contemporary writers, will be given its first local performance, and a suite by Tcherepnin, a modern Russian composer, also will be played. The concert will open with a suite by Corelli, an old Italian composer.

The complete program follows:—

Suite ....Corelli
Sarabande
Gigue
Badinerie
Eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" ....Tcherepnin
Arab boy, Egypt, Baba-jaga, Stars, Mama, General, The Forest, The Tsarina
"Daphnis et Chloe," ballet, second suite. Ravel
"Lever du Jour"
Pantomime
Danse Generale
Symphony No 3, "Eroica" ....Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funerbre: adagio assai
Screrzo; allegro vivace; trio
Finale; allegro molto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

APR 6 -1932

Music News and Gossip

Marcel Grandjany, harp, and Rene Le Roy, flute, gave a most interesting recital of music by Nin, Bach, Widor, Gretchaninoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff last evening in Steinway Hall for an enthusiastic audience, and in the Barbizon, Phyllis Grossman, pianist, was heard.

The German Dances of Schubert-Webern have been replaced by the Prelude to Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" at tomorrow night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

Sir Thomas Beecham will be unable to conduct the closing concerts of the season of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, so Hans Lange, assistant conductor, will preside at the concerts of April 21, 22, 23 and 24 in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

PR 6 -1932

CHANGE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Serge Koussevitzky will not perform the German dances of Schubert-Webern, which were announced for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall tomorrow evening. The program as it now stands will be: Toch's "Bunte" Suite, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

APR 6 -1932

MUSIC NOTES.

Serge Koussevitzky has amended his program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final visit to New York this season. The Shubert-Weber "German Dances," announced for tomorrow evening at Carnegie Hall, will be omitted and the program will comprise Toch's "Bunte" suite, Debussy's "Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 7 -1932

KOUSSEVITZKY ENDS SEASON OF MUSIC HERE

Large Audience Hears Boston Symphony Orchestra in Final Concert of Series.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

That Springfield is hungry for fine music was evidenced last night by the large and enthusiastic audience that greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium, an audience larger than even the most optimistic had dared predict.

It seemed fitting that New England's greatest orchestra should be invited to Springfield to assist at the culmination of the 10th anniversary of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. Not for 17 years has the Boston orchestra given an evening concert here although it has been heard in Sunday concerts as lately as 1928. The fact remains that during the past half dozen years Springfield music lovers have had little or no opportunity to hear the finest in music and apparently they will be satisfied with nothing but the best.

There is a glamor to a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Koussevitzky is one of the greatest conductors of the present day and the fact that the orchestra is a virtuoso organization makes the combination irresistible. The directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra had asked for a program embracing a bit of the old and a bit of the new and the result was that the program last night was one of the finest heard for many seasons, culminating in the full magnificence of the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven. For the new Dr. Koussevitzky chose the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite by Ravel and added a work entirely new to Springfield, a set of eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," by N. Tcherepnin.

The program opened with an early Italian suite by Corelli. For its string section alone this orchestra would be preeminent and in the Saraband, Gigue and Badinerie tones of purest gold were showered on the ear. There is well nigh perfect balance and equal quality in all sections of the orchestra.

The Tcherepnin "Miniatures" were utterly fascinating, some somber, some lively and some fantastic. For example nothing could have been more realistic than the fierce assault on a cardboard fortress by a battalion of tin soldiers as portrayed in "General." There was more than a bit of the influence of the French school in his portrayal of "The Forest" and an imperial swing and pomposity to the cortege of the "Tsarina."

Striking contrast was manifested in the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite by Ravel, which contains some of the loveliest passages in orchestral music and may well outlast both the "Bolero" and "Valse." Here is a work rich in color and rhythm where polyphonic and harmonic anarchy reign supreme. It was superbly played with a wealth of color and nuance, for Dr. Koussevitzky has a real and sympathetic understanding of modern French music and was one of the first to make it known in Russia.

He also was the first to give the complete cycle of Beethoven Symphonies in Russia and his love for Beethoven was apparent last night in his rendition of one of the greatest of these, the "Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55." Here is a heroic symphony to celebrate the memory of a great man, what man makes no difference. Within it is little of material triumphs, but grave and profound thoughts and ceremonials impressive in their grandeur, the life and death of a hero.

Though the opening movement is in triple time and taken at rapid tempo, it loses nothing of its inherent drama. The funeral march is a drama in itself, a drama that runs the gamut of emotions until the wind instruments bid a final adieu to their companions in arms. Even in the Scherzo, gay as it is, there are moments of mourning; it is like the kind of play which the warriors of the Iliad celebrated round the tombs of their chiefs. The final movement, with its varied themes, seems to sum up the past, present and future of this unknown hero.

This and more, Dr. Koussevitzky made known last night. It was a magnificent performance and one which will linger long in the memory. Conductor and players received an ovation at the close of the symphony and the 10th anniversary season of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra came to a fitting close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

R 5 -193

GALA NIGHT PLANNED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Largest Audience of Season Will Greet Return of Boston Organization

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to the Auditorium tomorrow, (Wednesday) evening under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony orchestra in celebration of the successful conclusion of its 10th season, it will be greeted by the largest audience of the season and the directors plan to make it a gala night. Many orchestra subscribers are giving small dinner parties before the concert which wil add colorful gayety to the audience. The concert is attracting music lovers from all the nearby towns and cities. Smith, Mount Holyoke and Amherst colleges will all be represented by delegates of students or faculty, and numerous orders have been received from Holyoke, Northampton, Easthampton, Shelburne Falls, Palmer, Monson, Ware, Westfield, Pittsfield, Lenox and Boston.

The program chosen by Dr Koussevitzky to meet the expressed wishes of the local orchestra seems to have pleased everyone and the directors believe it will prove one of the greatest symphony concerts ever given in Springfield.

The program is as follows:—

Corelli ....Suite
Saraband-Gigue-Badinerie
N. Tcherepnin, Eight Miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"
Arab Boy
Egypt
Bada-jaga
Stars
"Mama"
General
The Forest
The Tsarina
Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Second Suite.
Lever du Jour-Pantomime, Danse General
Beethoven, Symphony No 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivaca; Trio
Finale: Allegro molto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

PR 5 -1932

Boston Symphony Concert Tomorrow

Noted Organization to Play Splendid Program for Music Lovers.

The 10th season of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra will come to a brilliant close in the Auditorium tomorrow evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Springfield after a long absence. The famous Boston orchestra has not given an evening concert in Springfield since 1917, when it appeared in the Ellis Concert series, under the direction of C. A. Ellis, then manager of the orchestra. Music lovers from all over Western Massachusetts and Connecticut are being attracted by this unusual event and orders have already been received from Smith, Mt. Holyoke and Amherst Colleges as well as Holyoke, Northampton, Easthampton, Shelburne Falls, Palmer, Monson, Ware, Thompsonville, Willimantic, Westfield, Pittsfield, Lenox and Boston.

Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his entire orchestra of 110 men and the pro-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 5 1932

DR. CHAPMAN TO CONDUCT HIS SERIES OF LECTURES

Critic to Discuss Program for Coming Symphony Concert.

Next Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock the last in the series of lectures by Dr. W. Louis Chapman on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given, April 12 being the final concert of the season.

Throughout the winter these lectures have attracted large and appreciative audiences among students, musicians and music lovers.

Dr. Chapman will speak Sunday on the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky for next Tuesday's concert, illustrating his talk at the piano and with other instruments. He will speak on the particular works to be played by the orchestra, taking up the lives of the four composers (Beethoven, Debussy, Strauss and Tchaikovsky) who are represented on the program.

The lectures are given in the Boys' and Girls' room of the Providence Pubic Library, and are free to the public. They are sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

APR 6 -1932

PROGRAM FOR CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA THIS EVENING

The Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Springfield in the Auditorium tonight, under the direction of one of the most colorful personalities in the world of music. Dr Serge Koussevitzky is known as the virtuoso of the double bass and one of the few musicians in the world who has played on this unwieldly instrument as a concert soloist. Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Russia, not far from Moscow, and when a mere lad made up his mind that he wanted to attend the Conservatory at Moscow. He realized his ambition and while still a boy he began the serious study of music. In the conservatory each student was obliged to choose some instrument and to the astonishment of his teachers Koussevitzky chose the double bass. He retired to some out-of-the-way corner and there worked with a determination which has characterized his whole life since then. When he emerged to play for the first time before a small group Koussevitzky had not only mastered his intrument but drew forth from its depths tones of marvelous beauty.

Soon after graduating from the conservatory young Koussevitzky performed his own concerto in the Leipsic Gewandhaus, under Nikisch whom he was destined to succeed many years later as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky remained true to his first love and kept his Gunarerius always near him and later when he became an established favorite in Paris he was frequently heard as the virtuoso of the double bass.

Dr Koussevitzky organized his own orchestra in Petrograd and took it to Moscow where he gave classical choral concerts. In the summer he put his orchestra on a boat and voyaged 2000 miles up the Volga giving concerts in village after village in the heart of rural Russia. From 1912 to 1920 Dr Koussevitzky was the director of a subsidized orchestra. Not in sympathy with the Communistic movement Koussevitzky went to Paris where, as the director of his own orchestra, he established the concerts Koussevitzky and became a reigning favorite. In 1924 he was invited to go to London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra where he performed the Beethoven 9th Symphony which added greatly to his fame. It was this great concert that brought him to the attention of America, and soon after he was engaged as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra He is now completing his eighth season as conductor of this great orchestra and he has brought it to a degree of perfection attained by few, if any. orchestras in the world.

Dr Koussevitzky has made up the program to be rendered this evening especially to please his Springfield admirers and it promises to be the greatest symphony concert ever given in Springfield. The concert is scheduled to begin at 8.15 and as Dr Koussevitzky is always desirous to start his concert promptly, concert-goers are urged to be in their places promptly.

The program is as follows:—

Suite ....Corelli
Saraband; gigue; badinerie
Eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"............N. Tcherepnin
1. "Arab Boy"
2. "Egypt"
3. "Baba-jaga"
4. "Stars"
5. "Mama"
6. "General"
7. "The Forest"
8. "The Tsarina"
Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," second suite, Ravel
Lever du jour; pantomime; danse generale
Symphony No 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55 ....Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre; adagio assai
Scherzo; allegro vivace; trio
Finale; allegro molto

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 6 1932

MUSIC NOTES

Guild of Amateurs to Meet

The Guild of Musical Amateurs will hold its last meeting of the season today at 3:30 at the home of Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, at 934 Fifth Avenue. Harold Bauer, president and artistic adviser of the guild, will attend. During its first season the amateur musicians in the guild have played works for stringed instruments and piano by Mozart, Bach and Brahms, music for two pianos by Bach, Arensky, Gluck, Mendelssohn and Chabrier, and vocal numbers by Franck, Lalo, Brahms, Reger, Ravel and de Falla.

Symphony Program Revised

Serge Koussevitzky has revised the program to be played by the Boston Symphony tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall, omitting Anton von Webern's German Dances, by Schubert. The revised program consists of Ernst Toch's "Bunte Suite," Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

6 -1932

Boston Symphony Palys At Auditorium Tonight

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first appearance in this city for several years, tonight at 8.15 at the Auditorium, under the auspices of the Springfield Symphony orchestra. A program of outstanding merit has been selected by the Russian director, and the largest audience of the season is assured.

This concert will conclude the series of five programs offered by the Springfield Symphony this season, the first four having been given by the local organization under the direction of Arthur H. Turner. The appearance of the Boston orchestra was arranged for in celebration of the Springfield group's 10th anniversary year. Tickets are on sale at Steinert's music store today, and may be procured at the Auditorium tonight.

The principal work on tonight's program will be Beethoven's Symphony in E-flat, commonly known as the "Eroica." It is many years since this symphony has been performed in Springfield. It is considered one of the greatest of orchestral works.

Two Composers Represented

Two modern composers also will be represented. The second ballet suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel, one of the best known contemporary writers, will be given its first local performance, and a suite by Tcherepnin, a modern Russian composer, also will be played. The concert will open with a suite by Corelli, an old Italian composer.

The complete program follows:—

Suite ....Corelli
Sarabande
Gigue
Badinerie
Eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" ....Tcherepnin
Arab boy, Egypt, Baba-jaga, Stars, Mama, General, The Forest, The Tsarina
"Daphnis et Chloe," ballet, second suite. Ravel
"Lever du Jour"
Pantomime
Danse Generale
Symphony No 3, "Eroica" ....Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funerbre; adagio assai
Scerzo; allegro vivace; trio
Finale; allegro molto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

APR 6 -1932

Music News and Gossip

Marcel Grandjany, harp, and Rene Le Roy, flute, gave a most interesting recital of music by Nin, Bach, Widor, Gretchaninoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff last evening in Steinway Hall for an enthusiastic audience, and in the Barbizon, Phyllis Grossman, pianist, was heard.

The German Dances of Schubert-Webern have been replaced by the Prelude to Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" at tomorrow night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

Sir Thomas Beecham will be unable to conduct the closing concerts of the season of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, so Hans Lange, assistant conductor, will preside at the concerts of April 21, 22, 23 and 24 in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

R 6 1932

CHANGE IN BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Serge Koussevitzky will not perform the German dances of Schubert-Webern, which were announced for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall tomorrow evening. The program as it now stands will be: Toch's "Bunte" Suite, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

APR 6 1932

MUSIC NOTES.

Serge Koussevitzky has amended his program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final visit to New York this season. The Shubert-Weber "German Dances," announced for tomorrow evening at Carnegie Hall, will be omitted and the program will comprise Toch's "Bunte" suite, Debussy's "Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

R 7 -1932

KOUSSEVITZKY ENDS SEASON OF MUSIC HERE

Large Audience Hears Boston Symphony Orchestra in Final Concert of Series.

By WILLARD M. CLARK.

That Springfield is hungry for fine music was evidenced last night by the large and enthusiastic audience that greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Auditorium, an audience larger than even the most optimistic had dared predict.

It seemed fitting that New England's greatest orchestra should be invited to Springfield to assist at the culmination of the 10th anniversary of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. Not for 17 years has the Boston orchestra given an evening concert here although it has been heard in Sunday concerts as lately as 1928. The fact remains that during the past half dozen years Springfield music lovers have had little or no opportunity to hear the finest in music and apparently they will be satisfied with nothing but the best.

There is a glamor to a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Koussevitzky is one of the greatest conductors of the present day and the fact that the orchestra is a virtuoso organization makes the combination irresistible. The directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra had asked for a program embracing a bit of the old and a bit of the new and the result was that the program last night was one of the finest heard for many seasons, culminating in the full magnificence of the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven. For the new Dr. Koussevitzky chose the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite by Ravel and added a work entirely new to Springfield, a set of eight miniatures, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," by N. Tcherepnin.

The program opened with an early Italian suite by Corelli. For its string section alone this orchestra would be preeminent and in the Saraband, Gigue and Badinerie tones of purest gold were showered on the ear. There is well nigh perfect balance and equal quality in all sections of the orchestra.

The Tcherepnin "Miniatures" were utterly fascinating, some somber, some lively and some fantastic. For example nothing could have been more realistic than the fierce assault on a cardboard fortress by a battalion of tin soldiers as portrayed in "General." There was more than a bit of the influence of the French school in his portrayal of "The Forest" and an imperial swing and pomposity to the cortege of the "Tsarina."

Striking contrast was manifested in the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite by Ravel, which contains some of the loveliest passages in orchestral music and may well outlast both the "Bolero" and "Valse." Here is a work rich in color and rhythm where polyphonic and harmonic anarchy reign supreme. It was superbly played with a wealth of color and nuance, for Dr. Koussevitzky has a real and sympathetic understanding of modern French music and was one of the first to make it known in Russia.

He also was the first to give the complete cycle of Beethoven Symphonies in Russia and his love for Beethoven was apparent last night in his rendition of one of the greatest of these, the "Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Eroica, Op. 55." Here is a heroic symphony to celebrate the memory of a great man, what man makes no difference. Within it is little of material triumphs, but grave and profound thoughts and ceremonials impressive in their grandeur, the life and death of a hero.

Though the opening movement is in triple time and taken at rapid tempo, it loses nothing of its inherent drama. The funeral march is a drama in itself, a drama that runs the gamut of emotions until the wind instruments bid a final adieu to their companions in arms. Even in the Scherzo, gay as it is, there are moments of mourning; it is like the kind of play which the warriors of the Iliad celebrated round the tombs of their chiefs. The final movement, with its varied themes, seems to sum up the past, present and future of this unknown hero.

This and more, Dr. Koussevitzky made known last night. It was a magnificent performance and one which will linger long in the memory. Conductor and players received an ovation at the close of the symphony and the 10th anniversary season of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra came to a fitting close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

APR 8 -1932

At th

By GRENA BENNETT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final evening concert for the season in Carnegie Hall last night. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, perhaps aiming to increase the interest of the visit, began the program with the "Bunte" suite by Toch, giving that composition its first New York performance.

The suite consists of five movements—March Tempo, a sparkling quickstep; Adagio, expressivo, muted and veiledly shimmering; Marionetten Tanz, brisk and firmly rythmic; Galante Passacaglia, sounding like music in a fog, and Karrusel, spirited and metric.

These descriptions, however, do not take into account the rather harsh and unpleasant ideas of theme and melody that Toch invented. Piercing passages by the piccolo were superimposed on a beautiful and clean-cut rhythmed background by the concerted strings, or the sequence of a pleasing phrase was shattered by the sudden raucous notes of a large brass instrument whose tones seemed placed in a wrong key.

In the brief pauses that separated the sections of the suite one heard sounds of constrained laughter and much murmuring from the audience. The composer had planned to attend this first New York performance of his work, but a concert engagement in Detroit prevented.

A second novelty on the list was Schubert's German Dancer, which, according to a line on the program had its "first performance in America."

Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Franks" and Tschaikovsky's fifth symphony were the later offerings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK JOURNAL

APR 8 -1932

Modernist's Suite Led by Koussevitzky

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky, at last night's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra, added his bit to the little festival we have all been havin this season of Ernst Toch's little suites, little overtures and other abbreviated music. He introduced to New York this German modernist's "Bunte" suite, which may be Englished as "Assorted," or "Motley" or "Variegated" suite, as your choice runs. And it proved to be something more of the same.

Mr. Toch here uses a very large orchestra for his usual snippets of result. There are five parts to his suite, with scarcely more than a single flip of an idea apiece and the whole thing is over in fifteen minutes. There is a march, an adagio, a "Dance of Marionettes," a "Gallant Passacaglia" and a finale called "Carousel."

In a collection of pieces like that one expects a certain grace of fancy, a certain humorous touch, an effervescent quality that shall carry the listener along with it. There is no bar to as much sophistication as any modernist may choose, but such knowing approach to the thing must not be apparent, must not become obviously self-conscious.

But Mr. Toch lagged a long way from giving one what one expected. The whole orchestral pother was to little—very little—purpose. All the composer's tiny melodic ideas were without distinction, indeed were thoroughly commonplace, and their atonal treatment didn't disguise their poverty in the least. The instrumentation strove hard to be "different," but was quite unconvincing.

The most pretentious part of the suite was the adagio which is marked to be played "expressively." It seemed, on this very account, to be pretty thoroughly out of character with the other oddments of the piece, a sudden relapse into sentimentalism such as the modernists are supposed to abhor. It sounded, indeed, like very early Schoenberg, of the "Transfigured Night" period, only it had not the remotest tinge of the strength and moving quality of that work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

APR 8 -1932

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Orchestra Cheered for Superlative Performances—Novelty by Toch

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its final pair of New York concerts of the present season last night in Carnegie Hall. The event testified again to the surpassing tonal beauty and technical finish of this orchestra, and to Mr. Koussevitzky's special and significant qualities as interpreter.

The program was devoted principally to familiar scores, the one novelty being Ernst Toch's "Bunte Suite," composed for radio performance in Germany as late as 1928 and performed for the first time in 1929. The other works were Debussy's "L'Apres midi d'un Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

These are works which Mr. Koussevitzky has played before in New York. Yet the flavor of repetition was wholly absent. For Mr. Koussevitzsky, even as a reverent interpreter, seldom repeats himself, and the performances were of such beauty and spirit that they destroyed precedent and created new memories.

Mr. Toch's suite has its witty pages; it is singularly dexterous and clever. The suite is "Bunte"—many or variously colored. The movements are short and strongly contrasted. The peppery harmonic and polytonal combinations, the clear and scintillating instrumentation, which has its special sonorities, stamp the pieces as dating from the 1920s. But we do not find in this suite qualities as distinguished or impressive as those, for instance, of Toch's piano concerto, which Mr. Koussevitzky and Jesus Sanroma introduced in this city. The suite is of a certain school, manner, type. It has the modern tang, the contemporaneous "kick." Or is it entirely contemporaneous? Is not contemporaneous European musical thought turning a little from this highly organized style of Toch, with its inclusion of negroid rhythms as one of its now not novel elements, and has not Toch written more vitally and with more originality in other pages?

Of course, a work in lighter vein need not be taken too seriously. Mr. Toch might say that he did not intend to create an epoch or relieve himself of a grand masterpiece when he composed, for purposes of entertainment rather than instruction, this short and lively suite. For all that, with exception of pages of the slow movement and "Galante Passacaglia" and "Karrusel," this appears as lively and ingenious but not very individual music. A number of Mr. Toch's German and Austrian contemporaries have done likewise, and they, too, are showing signs of turning in other directions.

The suite, if you will, was a cocktail well calculated to open the repast. There, however, its usefulness stopped. If one did not know Mr. Koussevitzky's interest in new music and enthusiasm in aiding and abetting modern composers, one would ask whether the conductor had not his tongue in his cheek when he followed the suite with the incomparable and antique reverie of Debussy, This music Mr. Koussevitzky and his players re-created as if it were a dream not recorded on music paper or sounded by actual instruments. Its mysterious and glamorous beauty left, as of yore, a sense of sheer wonder and melancholy at its departure.

If one remarks upon these qualities of Debussy's music, the same words may imply something of the nature of the vaporous and exquisite performance. Whether the performance last night was only equal to an earlier one given here by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men or whether the mystery of the music itself was responsible for its new revelation, it is enough to say that no conductor or orchestra that we remember has accomplished as much with Debussy's score.

There was, of course, the strongest imaginable contrast between this lotus dream and "Till Eulenspiegel," the inspired masterpiece of Strauss, which is all of folklore, racial genius, humor, poetry and revolt, sublimated in the mind of an individual master. There is no need to speak of the combination of Mozart and Rabelais in the music, or of Strauss's endless resource and reckless mastery in the manipulation of his ideas. The performance was another triumph for leader and orchestra. It may be that a memory of the Richard Strauss of more than twenty-five years ago, conducting "Eulenspiegel" in this country, is accurate in recording a reading more fiery and reckless, more robust in the earlier pages, and in many of these pages more—let us say—shocking, than the virtuoso performance of last night. It is enough to record the event under consideration, and the enthusiasm of the audience, and the demonstration, again, from a different point of view than those of Toch and Debussy, of superlative qualities of leader and orchestra. Tchaikovsky's symphony, of which Mr. Koussevitzky always gives an inspiring reading, was still another perspective. The audience applauded, yelled, cheered. The concert tomorrow afternoon, the last that the Boston Symphony will give this season in New York, has a special feature in Liszt's crowning orchestral work, the "Faust" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 8 -1932

Boston Symphony Presents 'Diversified' Novelty at Closing Evening Concert

Program Changes Made

Debussy, Tchaikovsky and Strauss Works Are Heard

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last concert of its evening series in Carnegie Hall yesterday, when Serge Koussevitzky began his program with the first New York performance of Ernst Toch's "Bunte Suite," Op. 48. According to Dr. Koussevitzky's original programmatic plan, as set forth in the program notes, a quasi-novelty, Anton von Webern's orchestra transcription of German Dances by Schubert was to have followed the Toch novelty, but the conductor substituted Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" and continued with other well known numbers, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Toch on Visit Here

Mr. Toch, who is paying his first visit to this country, made his first public appearance here last Sunday as a pianist in a concert of the League of Composers. His orchestral music is not unknown to New York concertgoers; the Boston Symphony introduced his piano concerto, Op. 38, to us three years ago; his "Little Theater Suite" and overture to "The Fan" were layed here last November by the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras, respectively, under Erich Kleiber and Fritz Reiner. The suite heard last night, whose title can be translated, according to Mr. Hale, as "variously colored" or "diversified," is in five sections; it was composed for radio performance in 1928, and first played in Frankfort the following year.

Mr. Toch is among the more conservative of the German and Austrian composers who can be considered as modernists, and the suite heard last night, as well as the two works played here last fall, have certain characteristics which figure in the music of other contemporary Teutonic writers; effectiveness in scoring, discreet use of latter-day harmonies, considerable motion and vivacity and an avoidance of emotional depths. The "Bunte" suite is skillfully orchestrated; it combines tunefulness with polytonality, although its musical ideas, with some exceptions, are not marked by distinction or memorability. The use of these ideas is adroit, but it seems music aimed to divert rather than to impress or to make any pronounced emotional appeal to its hearers.

Shows Strauss Influence

While Mr. Toch has been quoted as admiring Schönberg the most among contemporary composers, the "Bunte" suite (which was not ill described by its title) showed a Straussian influence in one or two of its themes, especially in the opening march, which recalled a theme from "Heldenleben," and hints of Stravinsky were not altogether absent. The work was notably well played by Dr. Koussevitzky's excellent orchestra, and well received.

The interpretations of the Debussy prelude and the Strauss tonepoem followed orthodox lines; that of the Tchaikovsky symphony was more individual, vivid and eloquent, while sometimes impressing as mannered. Adopting tempos slower, as a rule, than those taken by his colleagues, Dr. Koussevitzky read the symphony with much rubato, dwelling over particular phrases, emphasizing the most orotund and tuneful passages, and, in ways sometimes debatable, giving the work its full due of frank, romantic emotionalism. The close was brilliant, and bravos sounded from the gallery.

The Boston Symphony closes its season here tomorrow afternoon, when Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be played in observance of the Goethe centennial. In the symphony, the Harvard Glee Club will be the assisting chorus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 8 -1932

Around and About

By QUIPPE QUI.

There was more dress at the Boston Symphony concert Wednesday evening than one has seen in this city for some time. It did not look like depression. It looked much like gaiety, and that the public is willing to buy and wear "glad rags," if there is only a place to wear them. There has been such a dearth of high-class entertainments in this city of late years that an evening gown seemed almost an elephant on one's hands. But Wednesday's display showed that the women still have them and will wear them if the occasion presents.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 8 -1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra Play a Toch Suite and Music by Debussy, Strauss, Tschaikowsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky played to their Thursday audience for the last time this season at Carnegie Hall last night, and much of what they played was what the audience, had it been offered the opportunity, would doubtless have asked to hear. There was to begin with a suite by the German modernist Ernst Toch, but this was short and quickly dispatched; the balance of the program was given over to Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At Carnegie Hall last night.

THE PROGRAM

Toch	Bunte Suite (First time in New York)
Debussy	"Afternoon of a Faun"
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegel"
Tschaikowsky	E minor Symphony

Toch's suite, because it was the evening's novelty and led off the program, must be the first of these things to receive attention. It was written four years ago and specifically for the radio. About that time the young German composers—young French and Italian and English and Russian and American composers too, for that matter—were warming to the idea that just music was not suitable for broadcasting or recording. The radio and the phonograph were modern musical instruments, and it followed that special music would have to or should be written for them. There were obvious weak points along this line of reasoning, and the discovery of them is probably responsible for the fact that we hear less today of "Gebrauchsmusik" than we did a few years ago. Toch's Bunte Suite was a product of the theory.

Last evening's audience, had it thought back to the origins of the suite, might have been puzzled to account for its quite orthodox character. (Orthodox, that is, in the modernist's sense.) Why this suite particularly should be suitable for broadcasting and countless other suites, overtures, sinfoniettas, divertimentos, etc., not be equally fitted to the same purpose was not clear from the performance. Toch's music seemed very similar in spirit and technique to any amount of music produced, not necessarily for the radio, by any number of young or middling-young composers of today. It is a cheerful score, not particularly distinguished in any way except by the cleverness which is to be expected in products of this sort. Thematically, it contains no particularly striking ideas beyond one from "Ein Heldenleben" and another from "Don Quixote"; harmonically, it is quite unadventurous; the instrumentation is diversified. It pleased the audience, as there was every reason why it should.

Toch is known here only for his Piano Concerto, introduced to us some years ago by Mr. Koussewitsky. The suite could easily be the work of another man entirely; there is in it none of the savage power, the bitterness of thought and astringency of style that were characteristic of the concerto. Its five movements—a march, adagio, marionette dance, passacaglia and caroussel—are light, brittle, diverting, nothing more. The composer, since he is in New York, doubtless was present for last evening's brilliant performance of his music, but the applause of the audience did not persuade him to disclose himself.

Mr. Koussewitsky next delivered himself of an exquisitely phrased and modulated reading of "The Afternoon of a Faun." No one here can play this music as he plays it—until he plays it again we shall hear nothing to compare with his treatment of the rapturous D-flat theme that blossoms from the woods and strings midway through the poem, voicing both longing and appeasement. Strauss' "Till" was also finely done, with zest and an ironic spirit that only Koussewitsky commands. One was disappointed only by the lack of breadth toward the end of the rondo, in the section descriptive of Till's trial and condemnation. The trombone proclamations over the rolling drums were hurried, and the pauses between Mr. Koussewitsky gave no value. This, however, was a detail, only one of many, the rest of which invariably satisfied. . . . With Mr. Koussewitsky's version of Tschaikowsky's Fifth one has not the disposition, just now, to find fault.

* * *

APRIL 8 →

DAILY MIRROR

passacaglias rub shoulders with such waggish episodes as "Marionette Dance" and "Carrousel." The audience, on the whole, responded, as was to be expected, with spon-

B.

Recital by Harpist

Virginia Morgan, who gives a harp recital of French music at Steinway Hall next Wednesday evening, under the patronage of Gov. and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Consul General of France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 8 -1932

Ernst Toch's 'Bunte Suite' Reaches New York Ears

Austrian Modernist's Work Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—Composition Skilfully Constituted but Banal in Its Analysis.

By PITTS SANBORN.

INASMUCH as Ernst Toch, the Austrian modernist, is now over here, it is altogether fitting that his works should be heard in the land. Last evening, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky led off the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with his "Bunte Suite," op. 48 (a first time in New York), thereby providing a valuable comparison with the next two numbers, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

This suite, which, by the way, was composed for radio in 1928, had its first performance anywhere at Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1929. It is scored for a large orchestra, including a number of pulsatiles, among them a "ratchet rattle," and it consists of five movements, none being long.

"Bunte" in this place might well be rendered by "diversified." The first movement is an animated march. Then sentiment is allowed to enter in an "Adagio expressivo." A "Dance of Marionettes" suggests the old-time German band. A "Galante Passacaglia" follows, and the concluding section, "Karrusel," though it be a merry-go-round, hints at Honneger's well known locomotive, "Pacific 231."

Of Formulistic Modernism.

The entire suite is clever, skilfully made, smart, but it also sounded singularly banal yesterday in spite of a masterly performance. It sounded banal because though written only four years ago and by a modernist whose idol is Arnold Schoenberg, it yet is formulistic, conventional, for the modernists have worked out formulae that are fast becoming as recognizable and as tiresome as any to be found in the ancients.

On the other hand, Debussy's "Faun" and Strauss' "Till," which were the very latest cry of modernism back in the eighteen-nineties, and by some affrighted souls deemed decidedly alarming, are established a generation later as young classics. Will the "Bunte Suite" be held a classic thirty years hence? Will it even be remembered, except by students and chroniclers, three years hence?

Stirs Audience to Cheers.

It seems impossible that either the "Faun" or "Till" can ever have been more beautifully played than was the case last night. Mr. Koussevitzky read them in peculiarly sympathetic vein, and the superb orchestra gave him all that he asked of it. Especially noteworthy was Mr. Laurent's treatment of the flute solos in the "Faun."

To complete the program, Mr. Koussevitzky had recourse to Tschaikowsky, a composer who is no longer so cruelly overdriven here as once was the case. The fifth symphony was the choice, and the performance accorded it stirred the huge audience to cheers.

Enthusiasm, however, was the order of the evening. Debussy, Strauss and Toch were also received with long and loud applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

APR 8 -1932

additional liquidation iberal in their black pparently consider st

At th

By GRENA BENNETT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final evening concert for the season in Carnegie Hall last night. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, perhaps aiming to increase the interest of the visit, began the program with the "Bunte" suite by Toch, giving that composition its first New York performance.

The suite consists of five movements—March Tempo, a sparkling quickstep; Adagio, expressivo, muted and veiledly shimmering; Marionetten Tanz, brisk and firmly rythmic; Galante Passacaglia, sounding like music in a fog, and Karrusel, spirited and metric.

These descriptions, however, do not take into account the rather harsh and unpleasant ideas of theme and melody that Toch invented. Piercing passages by the piccolo were superimposed on a beautiful and clean-cut rhythmed background by the concerted strings, or the sequence of a pleasing phrase was shattered by the sudden raucous notes of a large brass instrument whose tones seemed placed in a wrong key.

In the brief pauses that separated the sections of the suite one heard sounds of constrained laughter and much murmuring from the audience. The composer had planned to attend this first New York performance of his work, but a concert engagement in Detroit prevented.

A second novelty on the list was Schubert's German Dancer, which, according to a line on the program had its "first performance in America."

Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Franks" and Tschaikovsky's fifth symphony were the later offerings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK JOURNAL

APR 8 -1932

Modernist's Suite Led by Koussevitzky

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky, at last night's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra, added his bit to the little festival we have all been havin this season of Ernst Toch's little suites, little overtures and other abbreviated music. He introduced to New York this German modernist's "Bunte" suite, which may be Englished as "Assorted," or "Motley" or "Variegated" suite, as your choice runs. And it proved to be something more of the same.

Mr. Toch here uses a very large orchestra for his usual snippets of result. There are five parts to his suite, with scarcely more than a single flip of an idea apiece and the whole thing is over in fifteen minutes. There is a march, an adagio, a "Dance of Marionettes," a "Gallant Passacaglia" and a finale called "Carousel."

In a collection of pieces like that one expects a certain grace of fancy, a certain humorous touch, an effervescent quality that shall carry the listener along with it. There is no bar to as much sophistication as any modernist may choose, but such knowing approach to the thing must not be apparent, must not become obviously self-conscious.

But Mr. Toch lagged a long way from giving one what one expected. The whole orchestral pother was to little—very little—purpose. All the composer's tiny melodic ideas were without distinction, indeed were thoroughly commonplace, and their atonal treatment didn't disguise their poverty in the least. The instrumentation strove hard to be "different," but was quite unconvincing.

The most pretentious part of the suite was the adagio which is marked to be played "expressively." It seemed, on this very account, to be pretty thoroughly out of character with the other oddments of the piece, a sudden relapse into sentimentalism such as the modernists are supposed to abhor. It sounded, indeed, like very early Schoenberg, of the "Transfigured Night" period, only it had not the remotest tinge of the strength and moving quality of that work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

APR 8 -1932

ANT MUSIC TAUGHT IN GRAMMAR SCHOOL

State Clubs at Convention Here

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its final pair of New York concerts of the present season last night in Carnegie Hall. The event testified again to the surpassing tonal beauty and technical finish of this orchestra, and to Mr. Koussevitzky's special and significant qualities as interpreter.

The program was devoted principally to familiar scores, the one novelty being Ernst Toch's "Bunte Suite," composed for radio performance in Germany as late as 1928 and performed for the first time in 1929. The other works were Debussy's "L'Apres midi d'un Faun," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

These are works which Mr. Koussevitzky has played before in New York. Yet the flavor of repetition was wholly absent. For Mr. Koussevitzsky, even as a reverent interpreter, seldom repeats himself, and the performances were of such beauty and spirit that they destroyed precedent and created new memories.

Mr. Toch's suite has its witty pages; it is singularly dexterous and clever. The suite is "Bunte"—many or variously colored. The movements are short and strongly contrasted. The peppery harmonic and polytonal combinations, the clear and scintillating instrumentation, which has its special sonorities, stamp the pieces as dating from the 1920s. But we do not find in this suite qualities as distinguished or impressive as those, for instance, of Toch's piano concerto, which Mr. Koussevitzky and Jesus Sanroma introduced in this city. The suite is of a certain school, manner, type. It has the modern tang, the contemporaneous "kick." Or is it entirely contemporaneous? Is not contemporaneous European musical thought turning a little from this highly organized style of Toch, with its inclusion of negroid rhythms as one of its now not novel elements, and has not Toch written more vitally and with more originality in other pages?

Of course, a work in lighter vein need not be taken too seriously. Mr. Toch might say that he did not intend to create an epoch or relieve himself of a grand masterpiece when he composed, for purposes of entertainment rather than instruction, this short and lively suite. For all that, with exception of pages of the slow movement and "Galante Passacaglia" and "Karrusel," this appears as lively and ingenious but not very individual music. A number of Mr. Toch's German and Austrian contemporaries have done likewise, and they, too, are showing signs of turning in other directions.

The suite, if you will, was a cocktail well calculated to open the repast. There, however, its usefulness stopped. If one did not know Mr. Koussevitzky's interest in new music and enthusiasm in aiding and abetting modern composers, one would ask whether the conductor had not his tongue in his cheek when he followed the suite with the incomparable and antique reverie of Debussy. This music Mr. Koussevitzky and his players re-created as if it were a dream not recorded on music paper or sounded by actual instruments. Its mysterious and glamorous beauty left, as of yore, a sense of sheer wonder and melancholy at its departure.

If one remarks upon these qualities of Debussy's music, the same words may imply something of the nature of the vaporous and exquisite performance. Whether the performance last night was only equal to an earlier one given here by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men or whether the mystery of the music itself was responsible for its new revelation, it is enough to say that no conductor or orchestra that we remember has accomplished as much with Debussy's score.

There was, of course, the strongest imaginable contrast between this lotus dream and "Till Eulenspiegel," the inspired masterpiece of Strauss, which is all of folklore, racial genius, humor, poetry and revolt, sublimated in the mind of an individual master. There is no need to speak of the combination of Mozart and Rabelais in the music, or of Strauss's endless resource and reckless mastery in the manipulation of his ideas. The performance was another triumph for leader and orchestra. It may be that a memory of the Richard Strauss of more than twenty-five years ago, conducting "Eulenspiegel" in this country, is accurate in recording a reading more fiery and reckless, more robust in the earlier pages, and in many of these pages more—let us say—shocking, than the virtuoso performance of last night. It is enough to record the event under consideration, and the enthusiasm of the audience, and the demonstration, again, from a different point of view than those of Toch and Debussy, of superlative qualities of leader and orchestra. Tchaikovsky's symphony, of which Mr. Koussevitzky always gives an inspiring reading, was still another perspective. The audience applauded, yelled, cheered. The concert tomorrow afternoon, the last that the Boston Symphony will give this season in New York, has a special feature in Liszt's crowning orchestral work, the "Faust" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 8 -1932

Ernst Toch's 'Bunte Suite' Has Premiere

Boston Symphony Presents 'Diversified' Novelty at Closing Evening Concert

Program Changes Made

Debussy, Tchaikovsky and Strauss Works Are Heard

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last concert of its evening series in Carnegie Hall yesterday, when Serge Koussevitzky began his program with the first New York performance of Ernst Toch's "Bunte Suite," Op. 48. According to Dr. Koussevitzky's original programmatic plan, as set forth in the program notes, a quasi-novelty, Anton von Webern's orchestra transcription of German Dances by Schubert was to have followed the Toch novelty, but the conductor substituted Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" and continued with other well known numbers, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Toch on Visit Here

Mr. Toch, who is paying his first visit to this country, made his first public appearance here last Sunday as a pianist in a concert of the League of Composers. His orchestral music is not unknown to New York concertgoers; the Boston Symphony introduced his piano concerto, Op. 38, to us three years ago; his "Little Theater Suite" and overture to "The Fan" were layed here last November by the Philharmonic-Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras, respectively, under Erich Kleiber and Fritz Reiner. The suite heard last night, whose title can be translated, according to Mr. Hale, as "variously colored" or "diversified," is in five sections; it was composed for radio performance in 1928, and first played in Frankfort the following year.

Mr. Toch is among the more conservative of the German and Austrian composers who can be considered as modernists, and the suite heard last night, as well as the two works played here last fall, have certain characteristics which figure in the music of other contemporary Teutonic writers; effectiveness in scoring, discreet use of latter-day harmonies, considerable motion and vivacity and an avoidance of emotional depths. The "Bunte" suite is skillfully orchestrated; it combines tunefulness with polytonality, although its musical ideas, with some exceptions, are not marked by distinction or memorability. The use of these ideas is adroit, but it seems music aimed to divert rather than to impress or to make any pronounced emotional appeal to its hearers.

Shows Strauss Influence

While Mr. Toch has been quoted as admiring Schönberg the most among contemporary composers, the "Bunte" suite (which was not ill described by its title) showed a Straussian influence in one or two of its themes, especially in the opening march, which recalled a theme from "Heldenleben," and hints of Stravinsky were not altogether absent. The work was notably well played by Dr. Koussevitzky's excellent orchestra, and well received.

The interpretations of the Debussy prelude and the Strauss tonepoem followed orthodox lines; that of the Tchaikovsky symphony was more individual, vivid and eloquent, while sometimes impressing as mannered. Adopting tempos slower, as a rule, than those taken by his colleagues, Dr. Koussevitzky read the symphony with much rubato, dwelling over particular phrases, emphasizing the most orotund and tuneful passages, and, in ways sometimes debatable, giving the work its full due of frank, romantic emotionalism. The close was brilliant, and bravos sounded from the gallery.

The Boston Symphony closes its season here tomorrow afternoon, when Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be played in observance of the Goethe centennial. In the symphony, the Harvard Glee Club will be the assisting chorus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

EVE. UNION

APR 8 -1932

Around and About

By QUIPPE QUI.

There was more dress at the Boston Symphony concert Wednesday evening than one has seen in this city for some time. It did not look like depression. It looked much like gaiety, and that the public is willing to buy and wear "glad rags," if there is only a place to wear them. There has been such a dearth of high-class entertainments in this city of late years that an evening gown seemed almost an elephant on one's hands. But Wednesday's display showed that the women still have them and will wear them if the occasion presents.

Mr.

T their last it be There but t was Eulen
T progr writte cally
the young lish compo were music castin the p cal in speci shoul
were

line of reasoning, and the discovery of them is probably responsible for the fact that we hear less today of "Gebrauchsmusik" than we did a few years ago. Toch's Bunte Suite was a product of the theory.

Last evening's audience, had it thought back to the origins of the suite, might have been puzzled to account for its quite orthodox character. (Orthodox, that is, in the modernist's sense.) Why this suite particularly should be suitable for broadcasting and countless other suites, overtures, sinfoniettas, divertimentos, etc., not be equally fitted to the same purpose was not clear from the performance. Toch's music seemed very similar in spirit and technique to any amount of music produced, not necessarily for the radio, by any number of young or middling-young composers of today. It is a cheerful score, not particularly distinguished in any way except by the cleverness which is to be expected in products of this sort. Thematically, it contains no particularly striking ideas beyond one from "Ein Heldenleben" and another from "Don Quixote"; harmonically, it is quite unadventurous; the instrumentation is diversified. It pleased the audience, as there was every reason why it should.

Toch is known here only for his Piano Concerto, introduced to us some years ago by Mr. Koussewitsky. The suite could easily be the work of another man entirely; there is in it none of the savage power, the bitterness of thought and astringency of style that were characteristic of the concerto. Its five movements—a march, adagio, marionette dance, passacaglia and caroussel—are light, brittle, diverting, nothing more. The composer, since he is in New York, doubtless was present for last evening's brilliant performance of his music, but the applause of the audience did not persuade him to disclose himself.

Mr. Koussewitsky next delivered himself of an exquisitely phrased and modulated reading of "The Afternoon of a Faun." No one here can play this music as he plays it—until he plays it again we shall hear nothing to compare with his treatment of the rapturous D-flat theme that blossoms from the woods and strings midway through the poem, voicing both longing and appeasement. Strauss' "Till" was also finely done, with zest and an ironic spirit that only Koussewitsky commands. One was disappointed only by the lack of breadth toward the end of the rondo, in the section descriptive of Till's trial and condemnation. The trombone proclamations over the rolling drums were hurried, and the pauses between Mr. Koussewitsky gave no value. This, however, was a detail, only

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKYLN, N. Y.

EAGLE

APR 8 -1932

* * *

Boston Symphony at Carnegie.

The final evening concert in the current series of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall took place last night. Before bidding his New York patrons "au revoir" Maestro Koussevitzky felt it incumbent upon himself to allow them to share with the audiences of other large symphonic organizations the delight of hearing a work of Ernst Foch, who is now a visitor in this country. For this purpose he chose the "Bunte Suite" ("bunte" designating "varied") in which passacaglias rub shoulders with such waggish episodes as "Marionette Dance" and "Carrousel." The audience, on the whole, responded, as was to be expected, with spontaneous acquiescence and widespread satisfaction.

Toch's choice of subject in this opus admits of the banalities, the pleasing melodies, the "catchy" rhythms which, despite a suavity of technic, are scarcely less obvious in other of his orchestra works heard here. One is reminded by the "Bunte Suite" of the "dadaists" (the French "Six"), except that the present music is glaringly Viennese, and lacking the simplicity of the French.

It is high time Toch recognized that merely superficial music has little chance of gaining the coveted immortality. One even doubts whether the Six: Poulenc, Milhaud, etc., with all their drolleries and banter, will outlive the century. This writer would regret the annihilation of that school, legitimate as it is, yet he feels their day is spent, and to imitate them now is futile.

Koussevitzky's conducting was nothing short of magnificent. From the burlesque of Toch to the sublime cadences of Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," which followed, his interpretation was always commanding, the orchestra always ample. His reading of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was no less felicitous. The program closed with Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

A. V. B.

APRIL 8 → DAILY MIRROR

Recital by Harpist

Virginia Morgan, who gives a harp recital of French music at Steinway Hall next Wednesday evening, under the patronage of Gov. and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Consul General of France.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 8 -1932

Ernst Toch's 'Bunte Suite' Reaches New York Ears

Austrian Modernist's Work Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert—Composition Skilfully Constituted but Banal in Its Analysis.

By PITTS SANBORN.

INASMUCH as Ernst Toch, the Austrian modernist, is now over here, it is altogether fitting that his works should be heard in the land. Last evening, in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky led off the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with his "Bunte Suite," op. 48 (a first time in New York), thereby providing a valuable comparison with the next two numbers, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

This suite, which, by the way, was composed for radio in 1928, had its first performance anywhere at Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1929. It is scored for a large orchestra, including a number of pulsatiles, among them a "ratchet rattle," and it consists of five movements, none being long.

"Bunte" in this place might well be rendered by "diversified." The first movement is an animated march. Then sentiment is allowed to enter in an "Adagio expressivo." A "Dance of Marionettes" suggests the old-time German band. A "Galante Passacaglia" follows, and the concluding section, "Karrusel," though it be a merry-go-round, hints at Honneger's well known locomotive, "Pacific 231."

Of Formulistic Modernism.

The entire suite is clever, skilfully made, smart, but it also sounded singularly banal yesterday in spite of a masterly performance. It sounded banal because though written only four years ago and by a modernist whose idol is Arnold Schoenberg, it yet is formulistic, conventional, for the modernists have worked out formulae that are fast becoming as recognizable and as tiresome as any to be found in the ancients.

On the other hand, Debussy's "Faun" and Strauss' "Till," which were the very latest cry of modernism back in the eighteen-nineties, and by some affrighted souls deemed decidedly alarming, are established a generation later as young classics. Will the "Bunte Suite" be held a classic thirty years hence? Will it even be remembered, except by students and chroniclers, three years hence?

Stirs Audience to Cheers.

It seems impossible that either the "Faun" or "Till" can ever have been more beautifully played than was the case last night. Mr. Koussevitzky read them in peculiarly sympathetic vein, and the superb orchestra gave him all that he asked of it. Especially noteworthy was Mr. Laurent's treatment of the flute solos in the "Faun."

To complete the program, Mr. Koussevitzky had recourse to Tschaikowsky, a composer who is no longer so cruelly overdriven here as once was the case. The fifth symphony was the choice, and the performance accorded it stirred the huge audience to cheers.

Enthusiasm, however, was the order of the evening. Debussy, Strauss and Toch were also received with long and loud applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

APR 8 _1932

Toch's Bunte Suite Heard

Koussevitzky Offers New Composition at Final Thursday Concert of Boston Symphony.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his company of musical savants from over against Harvard Yard once more made glad the spaces of Carnegie Hall with the final Thursday concert of the season which they gave with brilliance last night. The Boston Symphony Orchestra nearly always brings gifts. This time the new offering laid upon our altars was Ernest Toch's "Bunte" suite.

What is a Bunte suite? One agreeably diversified. Some suites are neither diversified nor agreeable. Toch's proved to be all that its name implied. There were capers and mediations, antics and reflections. Such are the uses of diversity.

One must expect a Bunte suite to be sprung full grown from a high brow. This one is a sample of modernist music arrayed on the side of good humor, spiced with a passing sprinkle of sentiment, and published in idiom which does not shun vulgarity. The first movement is entitled march tempo and is just a hustling piece of street parade music dressed up in theatrical instrumentation. It is well made and goes to its little point with directness.

Then comes an adagio expressivo, a thing of which no true modernist should be guilty. Yet here is a movement replete with delicate sentiment made known in ingenious musical phraseology. It is excellently conceived and successfully built. The marionette dance which follows is another outbreak of slatternly gayety, the sort of thing one might expect from marionettes born and brought up in the slums and bent on kicking up their heels in polite society. The "Galante Passacaglia" is another demonstration of Toch's command of the materials of modernist art. It is delightful in melodic eccentricity, in harmonic surprise and clearness of outline.

The finale is called "Carousel," and it is riotous, jolly and—like the marionette dance—something that did not originate among those present. It is just the outbreak of a holiday crowd riding the hobby-horses of tradition. The Bostonians performed this music with gusto and with a technical skill quite compelling. The audience swallowed the suite with avidity and applauded it long and loudly. Toch had another public success similar to that of his piano concerto.

After the novelty came old friends. Debussy's faun had another of his dreamy and bewitching afternoons and then Til Eulenspiegel went roystering through the provinces until justice overtook him with tremendous chords and sent him squeaking to his doom. The concert came to its conclusion with the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES-STANDARD UNION

APR 9 -1932

MUSIC

FINAL BOSTON CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its annual Brooklyn season last night at the Academy of Music when Serge Koussevitsky presented numbers inspired by works of Goethe as his contribution to the current homage being paid the foremost Teutonic poet.

But two numbers made up the program, the overture to "Egmont" which Beethoven wrote following his acquaintance with the play and which led to an exchange of letters between composer and author, and the three tone poems which Liszt grouped into a symphony after he had heard Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." For the final section of the latter work, the orchestra had the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who recently

however, is a weak one from standpoint of tonal portraits, for the composer fails to give reality to Faust's loved one. Despite elaboration with all the mechanical craft of a deft musician and despite also some exquisite string choir material, this section becomes tedious except for moments when dominated by the Faust ideal.

It is in the third poem where the character delineation of Mephistopheles is set against that "chorus mysticus" that the male singers assist. That mocking imp of all evil as he burlesques and sneers at the tender passion of his two victims is a Liszt in all his power and glory. And though it comes at the end of a lengthy exposition, it literally is the essence of the symphony.

Mr. Koussevitsky read the three poems not as individual numbers, but as parts of an entity. His magnificent string section was of considerable assistance in the beautiful tonal portrait which resulted.

H. E.. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

APR 8 -1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky's Bostonians Introduce Toch's "Bunte" Suite as Their Last Novelty in New York

ONE last novelty was introduced to New York last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at the final concert of the orchestra's evening series in Carnegie Hall. This was Ernst Toch's "Bunte" Suite, composed for radio performance in 1928 and performed the next year in Frankfort-on-Main. The program embraced, otherwise, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, numbers that have been happily identified with this conductor and this orchestra in the past and again admirably performed on this occasion.

Toch's variegated suite, consisting of five numbers of unrelated character, the first designated March Tempo, the second Adagio Expressivo, the third Marionetten Tanz, the fourth Galante Passacaglia and the fifth Karrusel, came to the ears on first hearing as among the most attractive of the numerous contributions he has made to contemporary musical tidbits, amusing, ingenious, readily taken in. For the most part this music is lively and touched with whimsicality, though in the Adagio the composer has elaborated a structure of rare delicacy, in which there is a clear suggestion of restrained feeling. The Mar ionetten Tanz, were its intervals mor conventional, would merit description a frank tune.

Rhythmically and in the thin firmness of his linear structure, there i something consistently personal in Toch, though his music has seemed to us to have a very narrow and quite shallow range of expressiveness. This suite had the same Toch hallmarks that were to be noted in the small numbers for piano solo the composer played at last Sunday's concert of the League of Composers. If he is not to be ranked among the stronger creative spirits of the polytonalists and atonalists of the day in Central Europe, he can be looked upon as one of those who are the surest as to just what they are about. Mr. Koussevitsky gave the novelty a precise and clear performance, ratchet rattle, Ruten-switches Pfiefsirene, xylophone, glockenspiel, woodblock and all.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 9 -1932

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra are seldom as generous to Brooklyn as they were last evening. The most interesting of the programs with which, five times a year, they visit us from Boston are seldom to be heard at the Academy of Music. When Mr. Koussewitsky has something very special to offer in the way of a novelty or a revival, he offers it, usually, at Carnegie Hall, and the musically-minded of this borough must make the journey to 57th St., Manhattan, if they would share the dispensation. One would probably suspect Mr. Koussewitsky of favoritism if one had not heard, and regretfully believed, that the conservation of his Brooklyn programs is a concession to the expressed tastes of his Brooklyn audience.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. Assisting artists: Harvard University Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robinson, tenor. At the Academy of Music last night.

THE PROGRAM

Beethoven ......"Egmont" Overture
Liszt ...."A Faust Symphony"
Three Character Pictures after Goethe.
"Faust"
"Gretchen"
"Mephistopheles"

Last evening, however (as when, a month ago, he played us the Sibelius Second Symphony), he was, as we have said, generous. The program of the season's last Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn might easily have been a repetition of that fperormed on Thursday at Carnegie Hall, including Debussy's "Afternoon fo a Faun," Strauss' "Till," Tschaikowsky's E-minor Symphony. Instead, it is the program of today's matinee concert at Carnegie Hall which will be a repetition of that offered at the Academy of Music last night and devoted, in observance oft he centenary of Goethe's death, to Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.

Performances of the "Faust" symphony are so infrequent that decades, almost, separate them. The work was last heard in New York seven years ago, at a concert of the State Symphony Orchestra conducted by Ernst von Dohnanyi. If there were any relation between the merits of music and frequency of its performance, this neglect of Liszt's masterpiece which the "Faust" symphony undoubtedly is would seem surprising. But there does not seem to be, and the reasons why we hear the "Faust" symphony ones: the length of the work and the fact that a chorus as well as an orchestra is required for its performance. When the symphony was last played here, members of the Yale Glee Club lifted up their voices in the Chorus mysticus with which it concludes last evening the Harvard Glee Club was heard in the peroration.

One's faith in Mr. Koussewitsky, so often subjected to severe tests, gained new strength from last evening's performance of the symphony. It was in every was exceptional, a performance which could have been the result only of patient and devoted study of the music—and not only patient and devoted, but comprehending as well. Mr. Koussewitsky's virtues in- de diligence, but one has not al- s felt, as one did last evening, penetration was among them. would be difficult to conceive a e sensitively conceived or ex- ssively articulated reading of the ust" symphony than that de- red on this occasion. No feature the music's design excaped Mr. ussewitsky's attention, no im- ation of the music his under- nding in this veritable recrea- n of a masterpiece. Orchestrally, performance was superb, the aral singing admirable.

This says nothing of the work it- f, of which a great deal might y well be said, though not within limits of space and time allowed is reviewer. An estimate of Liszt ich fails to take the "Faust" mphony into consideration (as usual estimate does fail to do) dangerously inadequate and pidly unjust, for these tone por- its of Faust, Gretchen and ephistopheles contain, most cer- inly, his finest music—page after age deeply felt and beautifully ashioned. Nothing in the tone poems, little in the piano music, rings as true as this symphony; nowhere else does Liszt disclose an equal depth of mind, capaciousness of heart; nowhere else is the integrity or the taste of the artist as unquestionable as here . . . One hopes, impractivally but at the same time not unreasonably, that Mr. Koussewitsky's revival of the symphony will lead to others — though from none will one expect to derive satisfaction greater than last evening's performance afforded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 9 -1932

ubts whether the Six: Poulenc, Milhaud, etc., with all their drolleries and banter, will outlive the century. This writer would regret the annihilation of that school, legitimate as it is, yet he feels their day is spent, and to imitate them now is futile.

Koussevitzky's conducting was nothing short of magnificent. From the burlesque of Toch to the sublime cadences of Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," which followed, his interpretation was always commanding, the orchestra always ample. His reading of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was no less felicitous. The program closed with Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

A. V. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 10 1932

Ravel Concerto To Be Heard In Boston and Philadelphia

Maurice Ravel's new piano concerto will have its American premiere on Friday afternoon, April 22, in simultaneous performances in their home cities by the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. The soloist in Boston, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will be J. M. Sanroma. M. Ravel intended to dedicate the score to the Boston Symphony for its fiftieth anniversary, but had not time to complete it last season.

Next Friday and Saturday, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony will give the first performances of Vladimir Dukelsky's "Epitaph" for orchestra, chorus and soprano solo, composed in memory of Diaghileff. Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Brahms's D minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, will be the other numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

APR 10 1932

Ravel's new piano concerto will be performed simultaneously in Boston and Philadelphia on the afternoon of April 22 by the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras. The piece was intended for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fiftieth anniversary last season, but Ravel was unable to finish it in time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES-STANDARD UNION

APR 9 -1932

Boston Symphony Closes Brooklyn Season

The Boston Symphony orchestra closed its present Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music last evening.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conducted Listz's Faust symphony in three tone poems was presented.

Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman of the Citizens Committee, which has been organized to promote intrest in the series of concerts in Brooklyn. The vice chairmen are Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Herbert F. Gunnison, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith and R. Huntington Woodman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 10 1932

Symphony Offers Superb Program

Dr. Koussevitzky Selects "Brilliant Galaxy" of Composers

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

On Tuesday evening the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Albee Theatre. No more enjoyable and improving program has been offered during the season than this nor could there be a more brilliant and glowing galaxy of composers than Beethoven of the great classicists, and Debussy, Richard Strauss and Tschaikowski of our own time.

The Overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven, not only offers a splendid illustration of the composer's solid, substantial and rugged genius, and an example of tonal contrasts and dramatic character, but also serves as a reminder of his friendship with Goethe and of the anniversary of the latter's death, now being memorialized by the whole world of letters. It begins, as did so many of Beethoven's works with a commanding unison forte in stately and dignified tempo which is followed by equally impressive massive chords in F-minor by the entire string band. The woodwind replies, in less solemn strains, which are imitated by the strings and lead into the portentous and tragic tones of the introduction. Then follows in 3-4 time less ominous sentiments, by the strings, followed by the entire orchestra with interesting dialogue between the string and woodwind choirs, with suggestions of questioning mystery.

In this overture Beethoven does not attempt to recount the events of the tragedy but follows his well known dictum of the creation of an atmosphere by suggestion rather than by the exposition of an actual picture. Quite the opposite of the intent of "program music" so much in vogue at the present time, and so much easier to create. It is easy to see that creative artistry such as this is of a far higher esthetic type and upon an entirely different plane from that of the obvious and the definite.

Debussy, although of a century later, followed this high ideal of musical treatment and created ideals of musical impressionism which persisted throughout his life. Even with stage, scenery and operatic libretto, Debussy's genius of composition creates atmosphere and sentiment rather than definite portrayal, which is undoubtedly the secret of his high position among the great composers of all time.. Even with a stated subject, his music is luminous and mystic rather than direct and definite. Those who would correlate visual color with musical timbre will find in this superb tone poem upon cloud effects remarkable material for such association. Yet beyond the domain of suggestiveness they cannot go. They cannot properly align tonal keys with colors or shades, nor may the voices of orchestral instruments be assigned to definite emotions or impressions. We should not attempt to unite the real and the actual too closely or turn all poetry into prose. But try as one will, Debussy's luminous dust can never be brought down to earth.

In "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" we have an entirely different kind of music, one in which the mood is not of tragic and dramatic prophecy or of fleecy clouds slowly and lazily rolling across the sky. Here is quick action, the rake's progress, cavortings and adventure, and all at top speed. Strauss himself refused to assign a program to the work. The story in the program book is highly suggestive and cannot fail to interest, and many of its surmises go very well indeed with the shrieking of the high D clarinet, the whirlwind chromatics of the flutes, onward rushing of rapid strings and the sinister bleatings of the French horns. It is a veritable study of virtuoso orchestra because of the technical difficulties of the parts.

None but orchestras of the highest technical and artistic attainments should attempt the performance of this work—nor do they. It is a marvellous orchestral fantasy: invested with the gruesome story, it is a phantasmagoria, and it is one of the greatest works of that colossal genius of our own time, Richard Strauss. The tired business man will not slumber nor sleep during this portrayal and should he read a few chapters of Francois Villon with this music still ringing in his ears after the concert its effect will not be lessened.

In the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowski we have a return to more serious and profound moods. One might read into this symphony an infinite variety of poetic thoughts. Its movements might have application to the great events in the lives of individuals or peoples, for into the work are poured thoughts of melody and harmony which may be construed in many ways. One hears with much interest the "borrowing" of many of the finest musical thoughts of Tschaikowski for the "talking" screen and often the music is far better than the picture. So far no name has been given to this symphony, which is to many the finest of all of the Tschaikowski's works. From the first utterance of the low rich chalumeau of the clarinet to the final "allegro vivace," with its suggestion of clanging bells and the onward tramping of a peasant nation, it is absorbing and gripping in its fierce intensities. Strongly rhythmic, persuasive in orchestral voices, grand and massively impressive in its use of the brass choir, and colossal in its tonal climaxes, its fascination is irresistible.

The second movement contains the famous horn solo which offers opportunity for familiarity with this potent orchestral voice with the exquisite musical material of the composer. At times horn sings alone, at others the clarinet enters with pleasing obligato. Again the 'cellos take up the same melody and with typical Tschaikowski idiom the solo oboe may in turn take it from the strings. The motive is graceful, stately and contemplative. The composer handles this theme with the greatest skill and esthetic artistry and leads it to a thunderous climax with the full orchestra only to part with it in the softest possible pianissimo. This movement is a veritable gem of graceful legato in which the solo instruments have many opportunities for their individual and characteristic speech. Attention must be called to the delicious waltz which is heard before the finale.

Tschaikowsky is not often thought of as a "Waltz King" yet this title is fully deserved when one considers the beautiful 3-4 movements in the piano trio, Opus. 50, th-t in the "Serenade for Strings," Opus 48, in the "Valse des Fleurs" of the Nutcracker Suite, and this movement of the symphony. The violins first announce a charming theme punctuated off beat by horns, bassoons and the other strings pizzicato. This is answered by bassoons and clarinets to which the oboe is soon added. The full woodwind chorus takes up the strain to a legato accompaniment of slowly moving scales by the 'cellos and first violins. The bassoon then plays a counter subject which is taken up by the woodwind choir in full voice only to give way to a pizzicato episode by the strings in entirely different mood and sentiment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

APR 8 1932

Toch's Bunte Suite Heard

Koussevitzky Offers New Composition at Final Thursday Concert of Boston Symphony.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his company of musical savants from over against Harvard Yard once more made glad the spaces of Carnegie Hall with the final Thursday concert of the season which they gave with brilliance last night. The Boston Symphony Orchestra nearly always brings gifts. This time the new offering laid upon our altars was Ernest Toch's "Bunte" suite.

What is a Bunte suite? One agreeably diversified. Some suites are neither diversified nor agreeable. Toch's proved to be all that its name implied. There were capers and mediations, antics and reflections. Such are the uses of diversity.

One must expect a Bunte suite to be sprung full grown from a high brow. This one is a sample of modernist music arrayed on the side of good humor, spiced with a passing sprinkle of sentiment, and published in idiom which does not shun vulgarity. The first movement is entitled march tempo and is just a hustling piece of street parade music dressed up in theatrical instrumentation. It is well made and goes to its little point with directness.

Then comes an adagio expressivo, a thing of which no true modernist should be guilty. Yet here is a movement replete with delicate sentiment made known in ingenious musical phraseology. It is excellently conceived and successfully built. The marionette dance which follows is another outbreak of slatternly gayety, the sort of thing one might expect from marionettes born and brought up in the slums and bent on kicking up their heels in polite society. The "Galante Passacaglia" is another demonstration of Toch's command of the materials of modernist art. It is delightful in melodic eccentricity, in harmonic surprise and clearness of outline.

The finale is called "Carousel," and it is riotous, jolly and—like the marionette dance—something that did not originate among those present. It is just the outbreak of a holiday crowd riding the hobby-horses of tradition. The Bostonians performed this music with gusto and with a technical skill quite compelling. The audience swallowed the suite with avidity and applauded it long and loudly. Toch had another public success similar to that of his piano concerto.

After the novelty came old friends. Debussy's faun had another of his dreamy and bewitching afternoons and then Til Eulenspiegel went roystering through the provinces until justice overtook him with tremendous chords and sent him squeaking to his doom. The concert came to its conclusion with the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES-STANDARD UNION

APR 9 1932

MUSIC

FINAL BOSTON CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its annual Brooklyn season last night at the Academy of Music when Serge Koussevitsky presented numbers inspired by works of Goethe as his contribution to the current homage being paid the foremost Teutonic poet.

But two numbers made up the program, the overture to "Egmont" which Beethoven wrote following his acquaintance with the play and which led to an exchange of letters between composer and author, and the three tone poems which Liszt grouped into a symphony after he had heard Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." For the final section of the latter work, the orchestra had the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who recently revived the rarely heard Lisztian "Faust" symphony, read the "Egmont" overture with fervor and with a typical Slavonic conception of Teutonic ideals. His interpretation made all the more vivid the contrasting Liszt symphony.

Liszt segregated the Goethe tragedy into three parts in order that Faust, Gretchen (Marguerite in the more familiar versions) and Mephistopheles might be apostrophized according to his own conceptions. The aged Faust, bemoaning the futility of life in no uncertain style, was finally transformed into a dashing cavalier. But the revitalized philosopher seemed to fall below the standards associated with a young and immature individual who sought the answer to that interminable question "Why?" and, despite the external change, retained much of the nature of the original metaphysician.

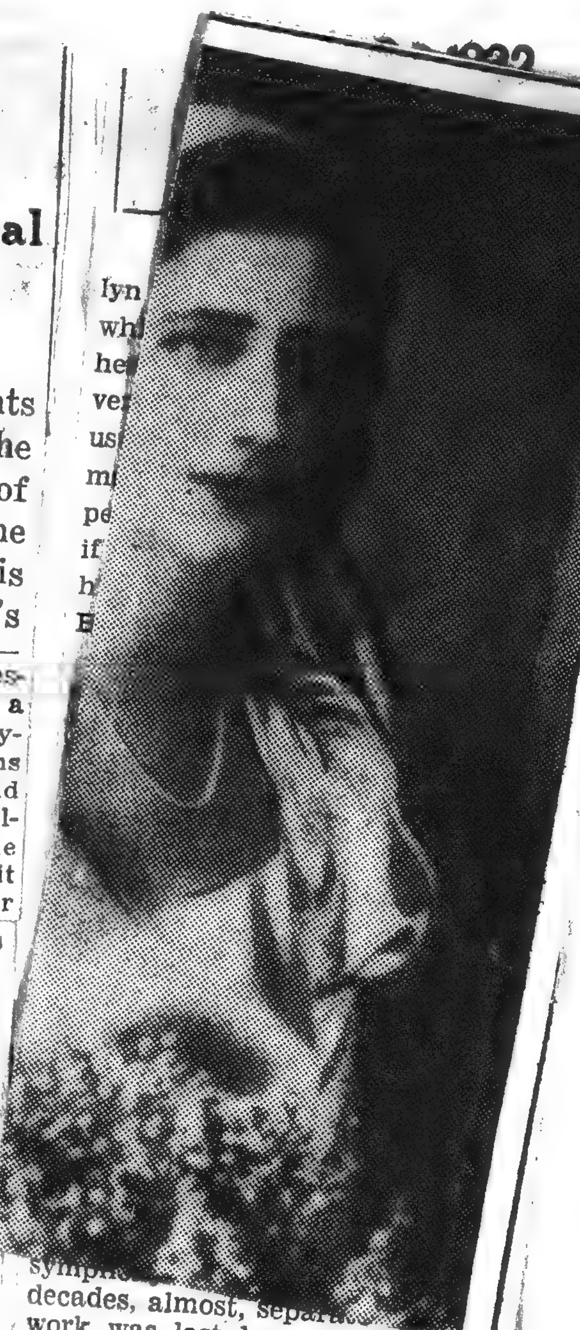
The love motif, denoting his passion for the young girl, is skilfully woven with all that orchestral power which is Liszt's in contrasting style with the simple theme which denotes the purity of the beloved one. The Gretchen section, however, is a weak one from the standpoint of tonal portraits, for the composer fails to give reality to Faust's loved one. Despite elaboration with all the mechanical craft of a deft musician and despite also some exquisite string choir material, this section becomes tedious except for moments when dominated by the Faust ideal.

It is in the third poem where the character delineation of Mephistopheles is set against that "chorus mysticus" that the male singers assist. That mocking imp of all evil as he burlesques and sneers at the tender passion of his two victims is a Liszt in all his power and glory. And though it comes at the end of a lengthy exposition, it literally is the essence of the symphony.

Mr. Koussevitsky read the three poems not as individual numbers, but as parts of an entity. His magnificent string section was of considerable assistance in the beautiful tonal portrait which resulted.

H. E.. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE



decades, almost, separa

work was last heard in New York seven years ago, at a concert of the State Symphony Orchestra conducted by Ernst von Dohnanyi. If there were any relation between the merits of music and frequency of its performance, this neglect of Liszt's masterpiece which the "Faust" symphony undoubtedly is would seem surprising. But there does not seem to be, and the reasons why we hear the "Faust" symphony ones: the length of the work and the fact that a chorus as well as an orchestra is required for its performance. When the symphony was last played here, members of the Yale Glee Club lifted up their voices in the Chorus mysticus with which it concludes last evening the Harvard Glee Club was heard in the peroration.

One's faith in Mr. Koussewitsky, so often subjected to severe tests, gained new strength from last evening's performance of the symphony. It was in every was exceptional, a performance which could have been the result only of patient and devoted study of the music—and not only patient and devoted, but comprehending as well. Mr. Koussewitsky's virtues include diligence, but one has not always felt, as one did last evening, that penetration was among them. It would be difficult to conceive a more sensitively conceived or expressively articulated reading of the "Faust" symphony than that delivered on this occasion. No feature of the music's design excaped Mr. Koussewitsky's attention, no implication of the music his understanding in this veritable recreation of a masterpiece. Orchestrally, the performance was superb, the charal singing admirable.

This says nothing of the work itself, of which a great deal might very well be said, though not within the limits of space and time allowed this reviewer. An estimate of Liszt which fails to take the "Faust" symphony into consideration (as the usual estimate does fail to do) is dangerously inadequate and stupidly unjust, for these tone portraits of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles contain, most certainly, his finest music—page after page deeply felt and beautifully fashioned. Nothing in the tone poems, little in the piano music,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

APR 8 1932

Blake, Mrs. George B. Brett Jr., Mrs. Henry Bultman, Mrs. J. Alston Gabell, Mrs. Irving H. Chase, Mrs. John Glaflin, Mrs. John Edwards, Mrs. Joel Ellis Fisher Jr., Mrs. John C. Juhring, Miss Jennie Hinman, Mrs. Francis C. Huntington, Mr. and Mrs. Gustavus Town Kirby, Miss Ruth Lawrence, Mrs. Walter Pierson, Miss Alla Chandler-Smith, Mrs. Garald Thorp, Mrs. Russell Evans Tucker, Mrs. J. Macy Willets, Mrs. George D. Yeomans and Mrs. Joseph Simmons.

In Washington they will be joined by Washington members of the daughters, who will include Mrs. Charles T. Ames, Mrs. Edwin P. Andrus, Mrs. Clifford K. Berryman, Mrs. Gilmer Bronizer, Miss Sophie Pearce Cerey, Miss Julia Herrick Hunt, Mrs. William Alexander McCain, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Jessica Randolph Smith. The New York party are to stop at the Mayflower Hotel. Tomorrow night a lecture and reception is to be tendered them by the Washington members at the Colonial Dames delicacy, in which there is a clear suggestion of restrained feeling. The Marionetten Tanz, were its intervals mor conventional, would merit description a frank tune.

Rhythmically and in the thin firmness of his linear structure, there is something consistently personal in Toch, though his music has seemed to us to have a very narrow and quite shallow range of expressiveness. This suite had the same Toch hallmarks that were to be noted in the small numbers for piano solo the composer played at last Sunday's concert of the League of Composers. If he is not to be ranked among the stronger creative spirits of the polytonalists and atonalists of the day in Central Europe, he can be looked upon as one of those who are the surest as to just what they are about. Mr. Koussevitsky gave the novelty a precise and clear performance, ratchet rattle, Ruten-switches Pfiefsirene, xylophone, glockenspiel, woodblock and all.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN TIMES-STANDARD UNION

APR 9 1932

Boston Symphony Closes Brooklyn Season

The Boston Symphony orchestra closed its present Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music last evening.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conducted Listz's Faust symphony in three tone poems was presented.

Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman of the Citizens Committee, which has been organized to promote intrest in the series of concerts in Brooklyn. The vice chairmen are Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Herbert F. Gunnison, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith and R. Huntington Woodman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 9 1932

Music
by GUSTAV DAVIDSON

Reprinted from yesterday's late edition.

Boston Symphony Closes Series

The final evening concert in the current series of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall took place last night. Before bidding his New York patrons "au revoir" Maestro Koussevitzky felt it incumbent upon himself to allow them to share with the audiences of other large symphonic organizations the delight of hearing a work of Ernst Toch, who is now a visitor in this country. For this purpose he chose the "Bunte Suite" ("bunte" designating "varied") in which passacaglias rub shoulders with such waggish episodes as "Marionette Dance" and "Carrousel." The audience, on the whole, responded, enthusiastically.

Toch's choice of subject in this opus admits of the banalities, the pleasing melodies, the "catchy" rhythms which, despite a suavity of technic, are scarcely less obvious in this as in other of his orchestra works heard here. One is reminded by the "Bunte Suite" of the dadaists" (the French "Six"), except that the present music is glaringly Viennese, and lacking the simplicity of the French.

It is high time Toch recognized that merely superficial music has little chance of gaining the coveted immortality. One even doubts whether the Six: Poulenc, Milhaud, etc., with all their drolleries and banter, will outlive the century. This writer would regret the annihilation of that school, legitimate as it is, yet he feels their day is spent, and to imitate them now is futile.

Koussevitzky's conducting was nothing short of magnificent. From the burlesque of Toch to the sublime cadences of Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," which followed, his interpretation was always commanding, the orchestra always ample. His reading of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was no less felicitous. The program closed with Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

A. V. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 10 1932

Ravel Concerto To Be Heard In Boston and Philadelphia

Maurice Ravel's new piano concerto will have its American premiere on Friday afternoon, April 22, in simultaneous performances in their home cities by the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra. The soloist in Boston, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will be J. M. Sanroma. M. Ravel intended to dedicate the score to the Boston Symphony for its fiftieth anniversary, but had not time to complete it last season.

Next Friday and Saturday, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony will give the first performances of Vladimir Dukelsky's "Epitaph" for orchestra, chorus and soprano solo, composed in memory of Diaghileff. Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" and Brahms's D minor piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, will be the other numbers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

APR 10 1932

Ravel's new piano concerto will be performed simultaneously in Boston and Philadelphia on the afternoon of April 22 by the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras. The piece was intended for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fiftieth anniversary last season, but Ravel was unable to finish it in time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 10 1932

Symphony Offers Superb Program

Dr. Koussevitzky Selects "Brilliant Galaxy" of Composers

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

On Tuesday evening the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Albee Theatre. No more enjoyable and improving program has been offered during the season than this nor could there be a more brilliant and glowing galaxy of composers than Beethoven of the great classicists, and Debussy, Richard Strauss and Tschaikowski of our own time.

The Overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven, not only offers a splendid illustration of the composer's solid, substantial and rugged genius, and an example of tonal contrasts and dramatic character, but also serves as a reminder of his friendship with Goethe and of the anniversary of the latter's death, now being memorialized by the whole world of letters. It begins, as did so many of Beethoven's works with a commanding unison forte in stately and dignified tempo which is followed by equally impressive massive chords in F-minor by the entire string band. The woodwind replies, in less solemn strains, which are imitated by the strings and lead into the portentous and tragic tones of the introduction. Then follows in 3-4 time less ominous sentiments, by the strings, followed by the entire orchestra with interesting dialogue between the string and woodwind choirs, with suggestions of questioning mystery.

In this overture Beethoven does not attempt to recount the events of the tragedy but follows his well known dictum of the creation of an atmosphere by suggestion rather than by the exposition of an actual picture. Quite the opposite of the intent of "program music" so much in vogue at the present time, and so much easier to create. It is easy to see that creative artistry such as this is of a far higher esthetic type and upon an entirely different plane from that of the obvious and the definite.

Debussy, although of a century later, followed this high ideal of musical treatment and created ideals of musical impressionism which persisted throughout his life. Even with stage, scenery and operatic libretto, Debussy's genius of composition creates atmosphere and sentiment rather than definite portrayal, which is undoubtedly the secret of his high position among the great composers of all time.. Even with a stated subject, his music is luminous and mystic rather than direct and definite. Those who would correlate visual color with musical timbre will find in this superb tone poem upon cloud effects remarkable material for such association. Yet beyond the domain of suggestiveness they cannot go. They cannot properly align tonal keys with colors or shades, nor may the voices of orchestral instruments be assigned to definite emotions or impressions. We should not attempt to unite the real and the actual too closely or turn all poetry into prose. But try as one will, Debussy's luminous dust can never be brought down to earth.

In "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" we have an entirely different kind of music, one in which the mood is not of tragic and dramatic prophecy or of fleecy clouds slowly and lazily rolling across the sky. Here is quick action, the rake's progress, cavortings and adventure, and all at top speed. Strauss himself refused to assign a program to the work. The story in the program book is highly suggestive and cannot fail to interest, and many of its surmises go very well indeed with the shrieking of the high D clarinet, the whirlwind chromatics of the flutes, onward rushing of rapid strings and the sinister bleatings of the French horns. It is a veritable study of virtuoso orchestra because of the technical difficulties of the parts.

None but orchestras of the highest technical and artistic attainments should attempt the performance of this work—nor do they. It is a marvellous orchestral fantasy: invested with the gruesome story, it is a phantasmagoria, and it is one of the greatest works of that colossal genius of our own time, Richard Strauss. The tired business man will not slumber nor sleep during this portrayal and should he read a few chapters of Francois Villon with this music still ringing in his ears after the concert its effect will not be lessened.

In the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowski we have a return to more serious and profound moods. One might read into this symphony an infinite variety of poetic thoughts. Its movements might have application to the great events in the lives of individuals or peoples, for into the work are poured thoughts of melody and harmony which may be construed in many ways. One hears with much interest the "borrowing" of many of the finest musical thoughts of Tschaikowski for the "talking" screen and often the music is far better than the picture. So far no name has been given to this symphony, which is to many the finest of all of the Tschaikowski's works. From the first utterance of the low rich chalumeau of the clarinet to the final "allegro vivace," with its suggestion of clanging bells and the onward tramping of a peasant nation, it is absorbing and gripping in its fierce intensities. Strongly rhythmic, persuasive in orchestral voices, grand and massively impressive in its use of the brass choir, and colossal in its tonal climaxes, its fascination is irresistible.

The second movement contains the famous horn solo which offers opportunity for familiarity with this potent orchestral voice with the exquisite musical material of the composer. At times horn sings alone, at others the clarinet enters with pleasing obligato. Again the 'cellos take up the same melody and with typical Tschaikowski idiom the solo oboe may in turn take it from the strings. The motive is graceful, stately and contemplative. The composer handles this theme with the greatest skill and esthetic artistry and leads it to a thunderous climax with the full orchestra only to part with it in the softest possible pianissimo. This movement is a veritable gem of graceful legato in which the solo instruments have many opportunities for their individual and characteristic speech. Attention must be called to the delicious waltz which is heard before the finale.

Tschaikowsky is not often thought of as a "Waltz King" yet this title is fully deserved when one considers the beautiful 3-4 movements in the piano trio, Opus. 50, that in the "Serenade for Strings," Opus 48, in the "Valse des Fleurs" of the Nutcracker Suite, and this movement of the symphony. The violins first announce a charming theme punctuated off beat by horns, bassoons and the other strings pizzicato. This is answered by bassoons and clarinets to which the oboe is soon added. The full woodwind chorus takes up the strain to a legato accompaniment of slowly moving scales by the 'cellos and first violins. The bassoon then plays a counter subject which is taken up by the woodwind choir in full voice only to give way to a pizzicato episode by the strings in entirely different mood and sentiment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 10 1932

Koussevitzky Had to Run Away

He Led an Orchestra When 12 'And Could Play Everything But His Father Frowned

FOURTEEN years old and motherless since he was 3, a little Russian boy stood on the edge of a tiny provincial town in the fall of 1888. A few things were tied up in a modest bundle under his arm as he looked back, and his face showed a regret not wholly conquered by the determination there. He shook his head and moved on hastily.

Serge Koussevitzky was running away from home.

It was the first crisis in his life, the first step toward musical greatness as a virtuoso of the double-bass and later as the orchestral conductor two continents came to admire. That fame rewarded him quickly, for this week as he leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its last concert in Providence this season he has already been a full-fledged conductor for 26 years—since he was 30.

It has been a brilliant career, set in one of the most interesting periods in musical history. And it makes an excellent "biographical chronicle" as written by Arthur Lourie. The book, "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch," has been published by Alfred A. Knopf.

◆ ◆ ◆

Mr. Lourie, who succeeded Koussevitzky in an important musical capacity for the Russian government, has known the conductor for more than 15 years and for the first time tells a complete story of that life in music, almost up to the present.

Mr. Lourie makes the "poor little town" of Vyshny Volochek out a desolate, dreary place indeed. Here in all the monotony of the central provinces Koussevitzy was born in 1874. It was a life from which he eventually had to run away in order to be true to himself, but first it offered him a foundation in music and an incentive to better himself therein.

Serge was born into poverty but into music as well. His father was a music teacher who gave lessons on the violin to such of the town's few thousands as had either money or interest enough for such instruction. And Koussevitzky recalls that, with responsibilities gone at the end of the day, his father would find comfort and consolation in playing for himself instead of watching over the pupils' labor. One might have suspected that the elder Koussevitzky would have been more sympathetic to his son's ambitions later.

◆ ◆ ◆

The boy's mother was musical too, and played the piano. But he was not to come under her influence long. She died when he was only three years old.

The little orphan had to bring himself up, finding that the love of music grew stronger and stronger in him and learning, too, how to make his own decisions. Strolling musicians visiting the town fascinated him, and they were not unwilling to teach him what little they knew. Often he would join up with them for a few days, wandering from home to play with them in some nearby village.

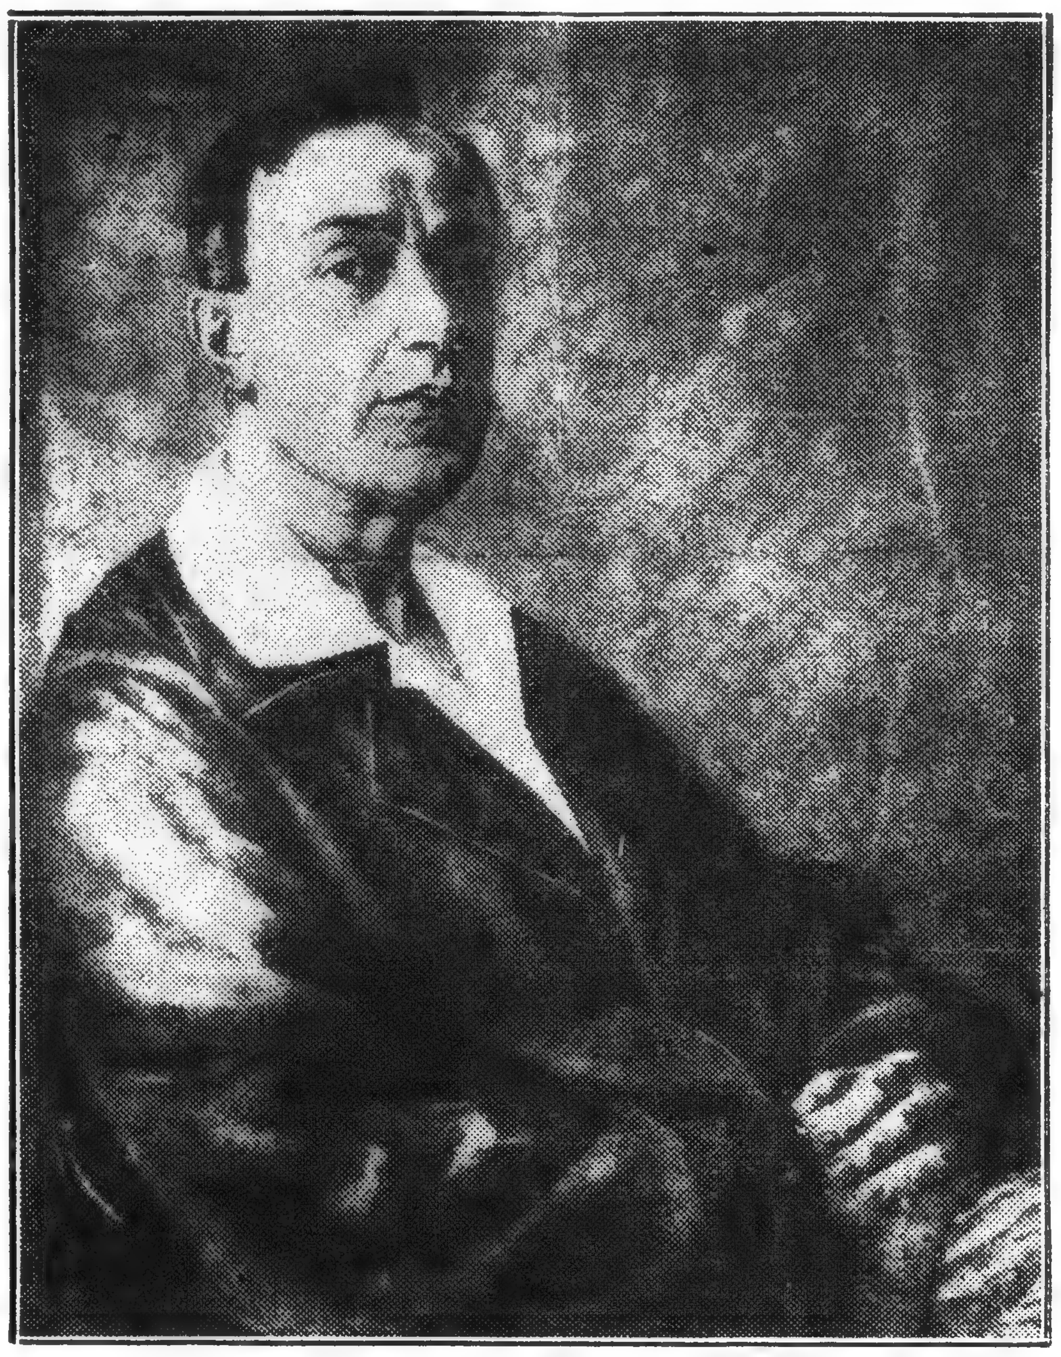
This unorthodox education might not meet with the approval of social or musical advisers today, but out of these minor adventures in vagabondage Koussevitzky learned how to play every important instrument before he was 10 years old.

And then a great event happened for the small town of Vyshny Volochek—and for Serge Koussevitzky.

A little provincial theatre was opened in the town, prepared to present the classics of the drama. Hardly less important to the audiences was the music played in the intervals between the acts, and it was left to the boy to arrange it. He even came to compose some of the tunes they sang and played as entr'actes.

There was in Vyshny Volochek a woman who came to influence Serge profoundly, Maria Fedorovna Ropenberg. Her husband had been an engineer whose official duties had made it necessary for him to reside in the town, and upon his death she remained there. She was a person of much culture and musical ability, having been a pupil of Nikolai Rubinstein. Mme. Ropenberg became very much interested in Serge, a playmate of her little daughter.

She gave the boy his first formal piano lessons when he was eight years old, introducing him to the works of Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, playing duets at the piano with him, and at the same time giving the orphan the motherly care he would otherwise have missed. She was later to see her protege a distinguished artist and feel proudly rewarded for the promise she had recognized. Koussevitzky, in turn, always felt a mighty gratitude toward this dear friend.



Sergei Koussevitzky

— from the oil painting by Petroff-Vodkin reproduced in Arthur Lourie's biography

◆ ◆ ◆

The theatre at Vyshny Volochek came in time to have a certain small fame throughout the province, and the natural outcome was that its company should go on tour, initiating starring performances in the principal city of the Government, Tver. Twelve-year-old Serge went with the troupe, looking after the musical department, doing all the musical work in connection with the tours for the next two years.

The boy even conducted the little orchestra that was as much a part of the company as the actors. The grown-ups, some of them gray-haired, who made up the orchestra took their leader in full earnestness and were not only proud but fond of the youngster who led them.

Serge enjoyed the theatre, and for a time, says Mr. Lourie, considered seriously the possibility of becoming an actor. But after he had known the thrill of conducting he knew that his greatest happiness would always be bound up with music.

◆ ◆ ◆

At the same time, however, the boy seemed to realize that he could get nowhere if he were to spend his whole life in his town. Real study was necessary, and there was no one in Vyshny Volochek who could help him go further in his ambition.

His father had no sympathy for his hopes. He misunderstood his aspirations, he thought the boy too young to be bothering his head, and he opposed him entering upon a musical career, in spite of the local success the lad had enjoyed. Perhaps the man's own drudgery and disappointments were too vivid and insistent as arguments against his son following the same calling, whatever the promise. He may not have accepted that promise as real.

He wanted the boy to stay with him in Vyshny Volochek, as tradition demanded of a son. Moreover, he had no money to give toward the boy's future even if he had approved of his suggestions. His opposition grew more and more determined; he would not listen, finally, to further talk of Serge's becoming a professional musician.

◆ ◆ ◆

"He would have to come to a firm decision," writes Mr. Lourie, "to break with his family and go his own way, at the mercy of fate. Flight was the only solution.

"Making a bundle of his more than modest belongings, one bright day, which seemed to him more propitious for his venture, the boy left the house secretly, with three roubles in his pocket, gripped with a feeling of anguish as he thought of the rupture with his people, but with his heart filled with a suppressed anxiety and illimitable visions. This was in the late autumn of 1888.

"He was fourteen years old when he alighted from the train at Moscow without a farthing in his pocket, in that huge city, vast and intimidating after the quietness of life in the provinces; not knowing a soul; and having neither shelter nor friend.

"But the dream became a reality; a new life began for him; he believed firmly in his lucky star, which had led him on his way and which did not delude him."

And so a great career started, a career described interestingly in this book of Mr. Lourie's against the rich background of his time. It is, to be exact, more than a background, for Koussevitzky influences it, striding prominently, indomitably through it as a force and factor in bringing about the music of today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

APR 10 1932

Yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was its tenth and final event in the New York series.

The program contained only two numbers: Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The last named work was, in a measure, a departure from the orchestra's usual fare.

The instrumentalists were assisted by the members of the Harvard Glee Club, whose well-selected and finely-blended voices were heard in the splendid chorus that is introduced in the tonepicture, "Mephistopheles."

The orchestra had been meticulously rehearsed in Liszt's musical portraits of "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," responding sensitively and with skill to the composer's version. As usual, the string choirs were superb, with quality of matchless beauty and brilliancy, and the attack a model of synchronization.

ORGANIZATION TO STAY.

It was told in the lobby that next season will find the organization the same to a man and with its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky continuing with the splendid record he has made as musical director of Boston's ancient and honorable band.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 11 1932

Around and About

By QUIPPE QUI.

IN spite of the wonderful concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra put on last Wednesday night there were an unusual number of sleepers in the audience, and still more nodders—those who just catch themselves before dropping into a nap. But this was not the fault of the music, neither was it altogether the fault of those who slept, but was due to the temperature of the Auditorium. It was not just warm, it was plain hot. The conductor himself felt it and after each number he was in a dripping sweat and frankly mopped himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 10 1932

Koussevitzky Had to Run Away

He Led an Orchestra When 12 'And Could Play Everything But His Father Frowned

FOURTEEN years old and motherless since he was 3, a little Russian boy stood on the edge of a tiny provincial town in the fall of 1888. A few things were tied up in a modest bundle under his arm as he looked back, and his face showed a regret not wholly conquered by the determination there. He shook his head and moved on hastily.

Serge Koussevitzky was running away from home.

It was the first crisis in his life, the first step toward musical greatness as a virtuoso of the double-bass and later as the orchestral conductor two continents came to admire. That fame rewarded him quickly, for this week as he leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its last concert in Providence this season he has already been a full-fledged conductor for 26 years—since he was 30.

It has been a brilliant career, set in one of the most interesting periods in musical history. And it makes an excellent "biographical chronicle" as written by Arthur Lourie. The book, "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch," has been published by Alfred A. Knopf.

◈ ◈ ◈

Mr. Lourie, who succeeded Koussevitzky in an important musical capacity for the Russian government, has known the conductor for more than 15 years and for the first time tells a complete story of that life in music, almost up to the present.

Mr. Lourie makes the "poor little town" of Vyshny Volochek out a desolate, dreary place indeed. Here in all the monotony of the central provinces Koussevitzy was born in 1874. It was a life from which he eventually had to run away in order to be true to himself, but first it offered him a foundation in music and an incentive to better himself therein.

Serge was born into poverty but into music as well. His father was a music teacher who gave lessons on the violin to such of the town's few thousands as had either money or interest enough for such instruction. And Koussevitzky recalls that, with responsibilities gone at the end of the day, his father would find comfort and consolation in playing for himself instead of watching over the pupils' labor. One might have suspected that the elder Koussevitzky would have been more sympathetic to his son's ambitions later.

◈ ◈ ◈

The boy's mother was musical too, and played the piano. But he was not to come under her influence long. She died when he was only three years old.

The little orphan had to bring himself up, finding that the love of music grew stronger and stronger in him and learning, too, how to make his own decisions. Strolling musicians visiting the town fascinated him, and they were not unwilling to teach him what little they knew. Often he would join up with them for a few days, wandering from home to play with them in some nearby village.

This unorthodox education might not meet with the approval of social or musical advisers today, but out of these minor adventures in vagabondage Koussevitzky learned how to play every important instrument before he was 10 years old.

And then a great event happened for the small town of Vyshny Volochek—and for Serge Koussevitzky.

A little provincial theatre was opened in the town, prepared to present the classics of the drama. Hardly less important to the audiences was the music played in the intervals between the acts, and it was left to the boy to arrange it. He even came to compose some of the tunes they sang and played as entr'actes.

There was in Vyshny Volochek a woman who came to influence Serge profoundly, Maria Fedorovna Ropenberg. Her husband had been an engineer whose official duties had made it necessary for him to reside in the town, and upon his death she remained there. She was a person of much culture and musical ability, having been a pupil of Nikolai Rubinstein. Mme. Ropenberg became very much interested in Serge, a playmate of her little daughter.

She gave the boy his first formal piano lessons when he was eight years old, introducing him to the works of Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, playing duets at the piano with him, and at the same time giving the orphan the motherly care he would otherwise have missed. She was later to see her protege a distinguished artist and feel proudly rewarded for the promise she had recognized. Koussevitzky, in turn, always felt a mighty gratitude toward this dear friend.

◈ ◈ ◈

The theatre at Vyshny Volochek came in time to have a certain small fame throughout the province, and the natural outcome was that its company should go on tour, initiating starring performances in the principal city of the Government, Tver. Twelve-year-old Serge went with the troupe, looking after the musical department, doing all the musical work in connection with the tours for the next two years.

The boy even conducted the little orchestra that was as much a part of the company as the actors. The grown-ups, some of them gray-haired, who made up the orchestra took their leader in full earnestness and were not only proud but fond of the youngster who led them.

Serge enjoyed the theatre, and for a time, says Mr. Lourie, considered seriously the possibility of becoming an actor. But after he had known the thrill of conducting he knew that his greatest happiness would always be bound up with music.

◈ ◈ ◈

At the same time, however, the boy seemed to realize that he could get nowhere if he were to spend his whole life in his town. Real study was necessary, and there was no one in Vyshny Volochek who could help him go further in his ambition.

His father had no sympathy for his hopes. He misunderstood his aspirations, he thought the boy too young to be bothering his head, and he opposed him entering upon a musical career, in spite of the local success the lad had enjoyed. Perhaps the man's own drudgery and disappointments were too vivid and insistent as arguments against his son following the same calling, whatever the promise. He may not have accepted that promise as real.

He wanted the boy to stay with him in Vyshny Volochek, as tradition demanded of a son. Moreover, he had no money to give toward the boy's future even if he had approved of his suggestions. His opposition grew more and more determined; he would not listen, finally, to further talk of Serge's becoming a professional musician.

◈ ◈ ◈

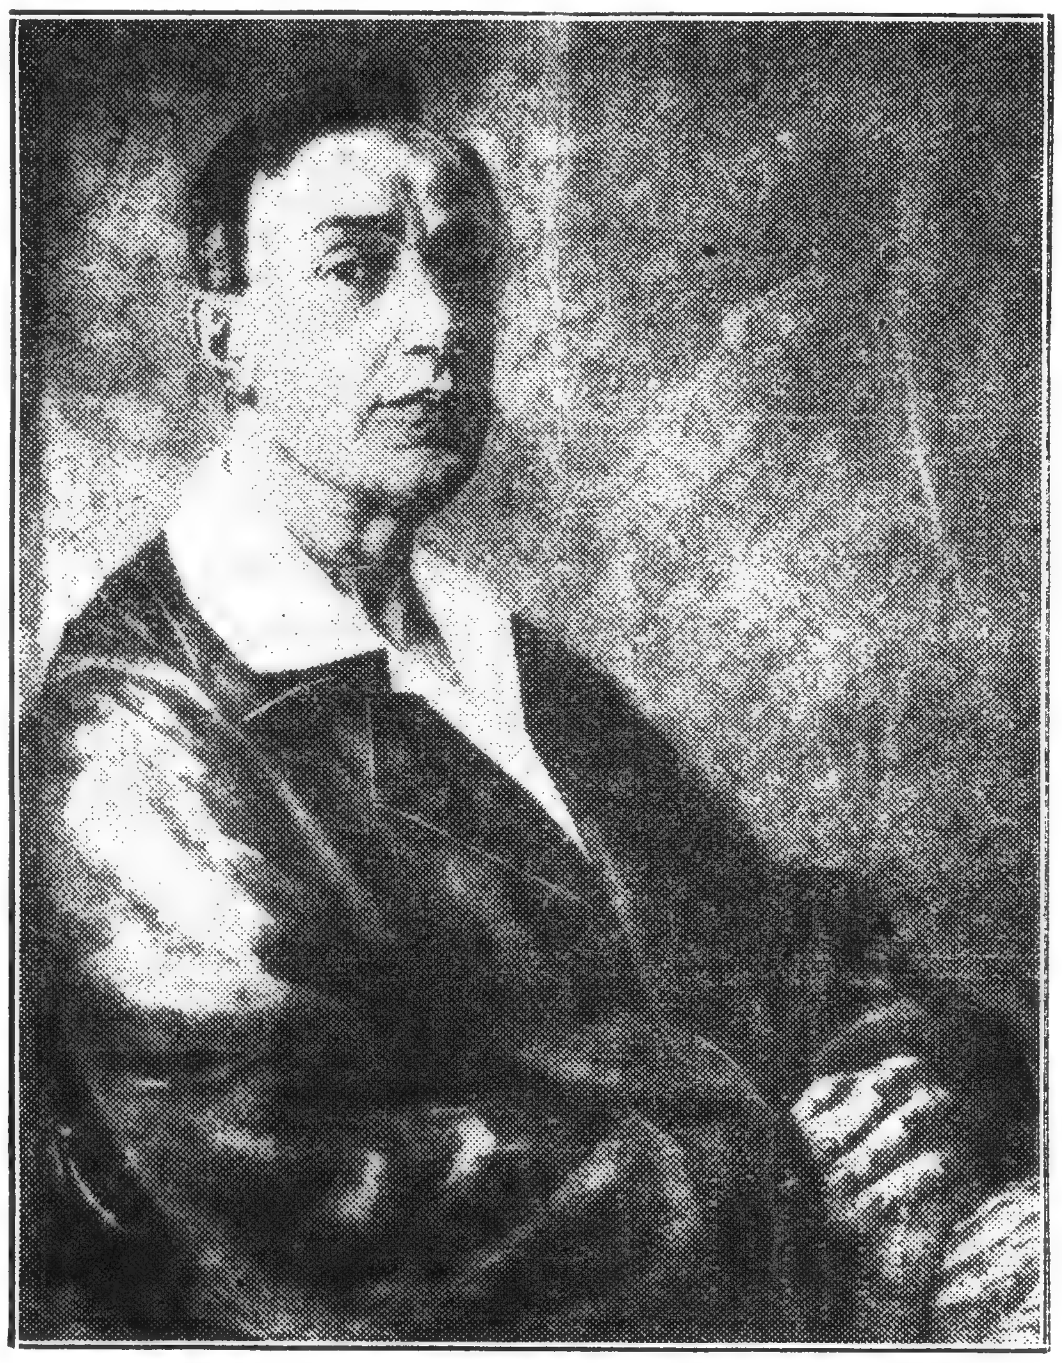
"He would have to come to a firm decision," writes Mr. Lourie, "to break with his family and go his own way, at the mercy of fate. Flight was the only solution.

"Making a bundle of his more than modest belongings, one bright day, which seemed to him more propitious for his venture, the boy left the house secretly, with three roubles in his pocket, gripped with a feeling of anguish as he thought of the rupture with his people, but with his heart filled with a suppressed anxiety and illimitable visions. This was in the late autumn of 1888.

"He was fourteen years old when he alighted from the train at Moscow without a farthing in his pocket, in that huge city, vast and intimidating after the quietness of life in the provinces; not knowing a soul; and having neither shelter nor friend.

"But the dream became a reality; a new life began for him; he believed firmly in his lucky star, which had led him on his way and which did not delude him."

And so a great career started, a career described interestingly in this book of Mr. Lourie's against the rich background of his time. It is, to be exact, more than a background, for Koussevitzky influences it, striding prominently, indomitably through it as a force and factor in bringing about the music of today.



Sergei Koussevitzky

— from the oil painting by Petroff-Vodkin reproduced in Arthur Lourie's biography

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

APR 10 1932

Yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was its tenth and final event in the New York series.

The program contained only two numbers: Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The last named work was, in a measure, a departure from the orchestra's usual fare.

The instrumentalists were assisted by the members of the Harvard Glee Club, whose well-selected and finely-blended voices were heard in the splendid chorus that is introduced in the tonepicture, "Mephistopheles."

The orchestra had been meticulously rehearsed in Liszt's musical portraits of "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," responding sensitively and with skill to the composer's version. As usual, the string choirs were superb, with quality of matchless beauty and brilliancy, and the attack a model of synchronization.

ORGANIZATION TO STAY.

It was told in the lobby that next season will find the organization the same to a man and with its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky continuing with the splendid record he has made as musical director of Boston's ancient and honorable band.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 1 1932

Around and About

By QUIPPE QUI.

IN spite of the wonderful concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra put on last Wednesday night there were an unusual number of sleepers in the audience, and still more nodders—those who just catch themselves before dropping into a nap. But this was not the fault of the music, neither was it altogether the fault of those who slept, but was due to the temperature of the Auditorium. It was not just warm, it was plain hot. The conductor himself felt it and after each number he was in a dripping sweat and frankly mopped himself.

177

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

APR 10 1932

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives a Notable Performance of Liszt's "Faust"

Tenth and last New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor.

PROGRAM

1. Beethoven.........Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
2. Liszt......"A Faust Symphony, in Three Character Pictures" (after Goethe)
   (Johann Wolfgang von Goethe: August 28, 1749—March 22, 1832)
   - I. Faust: Lento assai—Allegro impetuoso
   - II. Gretchen: Andante soave
   - III. Mephistopheles:
     - (a) Alegro vivace ironico
     - (b) Andante mistico (with Male Chorus)

The Harvard Glee Club
(Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor)
Tenor Solo: Rulon Y. Robison

NEW YORK, which is not unsupplied with orchestras, choral bodies and conductors, has been obliged to make its chief musical contribution to the centennial observance of Goethe's death through the agency of an out-of-town orchestra, conductor, and chorus. Our singular metropolis has a way of fulfilling many of its obligations vicariously, and this was just another case in point.

Let us acknowledge ourselves negligent in this matter and pass on to the further admission that Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston band of virtuosi, aided by Dr. Davison's celebrated Harvard choristers, gave us yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall not only the most completely expressive performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" that New York has heard in many years, but one of the excelling concerts of this season. The event was worthy of the occasion—a felicitously planned and eloquently realized tribute to the memory of the uncompanioned poet and philosopher.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is ideally equipped by temperament and imagination to be the projector of such music as the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt. In this case the work and the interpreter were complementary. Again and again at yesterday's performance one was aware of a measure of sympathetic identification that is not often achieved in the case of a creative artist and his agent. And the conductor was magnificently served by his players, who discoursed with a tonal beauty, a rectitude and flexibility and finesse, an attainment of all the major virtues of great orchestral playing, which the duly appreciative among their hearers are not likely to forget.

It is invidious to single out examples, for each of the orchestra's choirs excelled itself: yet one's memory happens to linger over the exquisiteness of tone and phrasing achieved by the woodwind in the first and second movements of the symphony—though, having said this, one should hasten to praise in like terms the unforgettable deeds of the strings and of the brass.

* * *

Perhaps the summit of poetic beauty and eloquence in the establishment and sustaining of a mood was reached in the passage of transition from the "Mephistopheles" section to the choral finale—the greatest page that Liszt has bequeathed us: music of luminous and mystical beauty, visionary and rapt, of an impressiveness, an otherworldly rarity, that one would find it difficult to parallel; music in which the imagination of the tone-poet, like that of the dramatic seer himself, suggests (in Goethe's own words) "a hovering of the spirit above the earth."

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted the performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" at the Boston Orchestra concert

This moment and its mood were wonderfully realized by the conductor and his players; and the first entrance of the chorus sustained and heightened the effect—even if one were compelled to suspect the organ's purity of intonation in the C major-E minor of the accompaniment, and even if one's suspicion became a certainty regarding the subsequent aspirations of the solo tenor.

* * *

What a work is this symphony of Liszt's! Flawed though it be, dubious at times in the quality of its thinking and its feeling, streaked as it certainly is with sentimentalism and grandiloquence, how amazing it remains as a source-book of the music that came after it, as an utterance of much that is essential in its poetic original! We shall wait long before the Gretchen of Goethe's "Faust" comes closer to us in music than she does in certain pages of the second movement of Liszt's symphony; and we shall wait quite as long for the equal of Liszt's symphonic Mephistopheles, with his sardonic and crackling wit, his scarifying malice, his lethal irony.

* * *

As for the Epilogue, with its setting of the "Chorus Mysticus," one can scarcely put one's hand on one's heart and say that Liszt has given us here the full equivalent of Goethe. Yet how extraordinary certain of these closing pages are, when one thinks of all that Liszt the artist was and all that he was not! For there are moments in this finale when the body of the music seems transillumined, when the mystical adoration and exaltation that are implicit in the poem, its paradisial ascents and purifications, seem to have transfigured and irradiated the musician's thought. Contemplating his music and the spiritual beauty whose reflection it sought to be Liszt might almost have said, in the words of the incomparable mystic among poets: "In its image it transformed itself."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

APR 11 1932

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky's Bostonians Contribute Something to Be Remembered in Bringing Back the Liszt "Faust"

AMONG musical events of a troubled and not otherwise particularly memorable season, the last of the Boston Symphony's series of New York concerts on Saturday afternoon bulks large by reason of Serge Koussevitzky's carefully prepared and in many respects eloquent performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. This neglected but important work, with Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, served to give Carnegie Hall a Goethe program of appropriate weight and significance, some eighteen days after the 100th anniversary of the death of the poet.

This was not, however, the identical program of Mr. Koussevitzky's Goethe observance in Boston on March 19. There, it was the "Faust" Overture of Wagner that was heard in company with the Liszt "Faust" Symphony. Much as the Boston juxtaposition of Liszt and Wagner would have been welcome here, and stimulating the associations and parallels between them, the visiting conductor may very well have had his eye upon the greater measure of musical contrast to be achieved by prefacing the stupendous Liszt score with the compact and concentrated overture of a very different era, and, if so, the "Egmont" music served his purpose well. The performance of Beethoven's composition was a vital one, without the hardness of another of this same number, remembered from a Boston Symphony visit of two or three seasons ago.

If the "Egmont" curtain-raiser is seldom long neglected, the Liszt Symphony has had so few performances in what may be regarded as our present orchestral era in New York as to make of the one on Saturday a first hearing, we have no doubt, for a considerable part if not the great majority of the Boston Symphony's audience; as experienced an audience, it may be assumed, as any this city assembles. The fortunate few who remembered the Muck performance shortly before America's entry into the World War had a basis for comparisons that was by no means common property. We have it on the authority of one who had marked an orchestral score at that time, so as to conform to the various changes of instrumentation which Muck employed (in common, we believe, with other conductors in Central Europe), that Koussevitzky reverted to the original, though trumpets were heard where Liszt wrote for none.

SO EMINENT an authority as Ernest Newman has found that all other orchestral settings of the "Faust" subject pale before the magnificence of this one. Whether this could have been said if Wagner had carried out his original intention to write a "Faust" symphony is beyond conjecture. The so-called Overture, which was to have been a movement of the symphony, representative of "Faust in Solitude," was re-written at about the time Liszt finished the symphony, though it was completed in its original form ten years or more before Liszt's first paper-work was done. The POST reviewer could find no reason on Saturday to surrender a conviction that the Wagner Overture clearly reflects the greater genius that was on the side of the younger man.

Doubtless one of the reasons for the neglect of the gigantic Liszt work is its requirement of a large chorus of men's voices for the concluding part of the third movement. Symphonic composers have written choral movements at their peril. Strong as is the appeal of the Beethoven Ninth, it has achieved but a fraction of the number of performances given the Third, Fifth, Sixth and Seventh. If Brahms, for reasons that happily have nothing to do with the case, had used a chorus for the broad melody of the last movement of the C Minor Symphony that has so many times been likened to the vocal melody of the Beethoven Ninth, it, no doubt, would be the least familiar of the Brahms four.

The "Faust" Symphony contains some, perhaps much, of Liszt's finest orchestral writing. The "Gretchen" picture is one of a refinement and sensitiveness that is scarcely duplicated in the symphonic poems. The "Faust" section rings true, if at times there is a forced quality in the ordering of the motif-like themes. It is not too much to say—though there is no need to overstate the case on its creative side—that the diablerie of the Mephistopheles picture, with its distortions of the themes from the "Faust" section, conveys a sense of intellectual irony that is closer to the purpose of Goethe, than any of the several broader and, incidentally, humanized characterizations of the spirit that denies. The choral section builds impressively, but it is not, for us, the climax of musical beauty in this work. That comes with the repetition and the sea-change that is put upon the music of Gretchen in the transition from the music of Mephistopheles to the Andante Mistico of the voices. Though there are many pages in this work suggestive of Wagner, whether preparatory or recollective need not be rehearsed anew, here is one that he could have signed as worthy of his greatest gifts—but, happily, it is pure Liszt.

THE work is weakened by its length and conveys something of instability of purpose; either that, or of inability to re-work the material, in transforming it, so that it would achieve a structural unity with what had gone before. There are those who try to tell us, today, that Wagner was a poor craftsman. But Liszt was no mean one, and when we hear this huge work on a Wagnerian scale we realize that it was Wagner who did not sprawl, whatever his canvas.

Mr. Koussevitzky had at his command an orchestra that played superbly and in the Harvard Glee Club a chorus that met his needs. The tenor solo was sufficiently well sung by Rulon Y. Robison, but it could have been given with profit to a more important voice. In its entirety, this was a performance of sobriety, insight and sympathy, clear, well proportioned and of glowing sonorities.

IN CONTINUING his valuable and pleasurable exposition of music by contemporary English composers, Sir Thomas Beecham played Arnold Bax's tone-poem, "The Garden of Fand" at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Now about twenty years old, it has held up better, as to freshness of color and poetic content, than some later writing of Bax in symphonic form. It received a particularly sympathetic performance. The same must be said again for the Delius opera excerpt, "The Walk to Paradise Garden," from "A Village Romeo and Juliet," repeated from earlier concerts. Sir Thomas is to be thanked for playing one of the least familiar of the Handel Concerti Grossi, No. 3 of Op. 6, though the performance was rather a spotty one. There were also the Overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," in which the sonorities were over-driven; Tchaikovsky's Serenade for String Orchestra, Op. 48, and the Introduction and March from the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Le Coq d'Or," which Sir Thomas converted into a show-piece, with an abruptly altered ending so as to be able to stop at the peak of his voluminous climax. It was not altogether Rimsky, but it achieved the desired effect. There was very hearty applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

APR 11 1932

Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony Heard

Koussevitzky Conducts the Boston Symphony Concert—Harvard Glee Club Sings.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

In his "Zur Morphologie" (1790) Goethe formulated this law: "The more perfect the being is the more different are its parts." One might readily have thought of this Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall while the Boston Symphony Orchestra was with anxious attention to every detail performing the "Faust" symphony of the illustrious Abbe Liszt.

Goethe died on March 22, 1832, and the anniversary has been celebrated in many places with appropriate music. Mr. Koussevitzky prefaced the symphony with the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven. The audience was entirely respectful, though perhaps not unaware of the prodigious and not altogether triumphant effort which Liszt had made to climb up to the knees of the Titan who wrote "Faust."

Liszt was addicted to "Etudes Transcendantes," not only in piano music, but also in orchestral. His "Faust" symphony exhausted instrumental language in two of its three prolonged movements and called in the aid of a tenor soloist (Rulon Robison on Saturday) and a male chorus (the Harvard Glee Club) to say the last word. The famous pianist made it the fashion to employ his friend Wagner's leading motives in instrumental music and we have Faust, Gretchen, Mephistopheles, their attributes and emotions, their relations and the action and reaction of their passions—or in the case of Mephistopheles, deviltry—all represented by melodic fragments reiterated in changing keys and with varied orchestration. The whole is accomplished with a constructive skill of high order and with occasional flashes of imagination. There are moments of real eloquence in the work, but after each of them the composer pants while he plods.

Doubtless we expect too much. Goethe filled numerous composers with the urge to work, and we continually ask ourselves how near they came to communicating in music the thought and feeling of his masterpiece. We ruminate upon the scores of Liszt's symphony, Wagner's overture, Gounod's "Faust," Boito's Mefistofele," Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," Schumann's scenes from "Faust" and perhaps with a sigh murmur, "But after all it was Schubert who wrote 'Gretchen am Spinnrade.' "

But what we ought to ask is "How much of worth did Goethe influence any or all of these composers to create? How far above themselves did they rise under the inspiration of the greatest literary mind of the romantic period? If we view Liszt's "Faust" symphony from this angle we shall accord it considerable admiration.

The thematic ideas are quite as worthy as many found in the tone poems of Strauss. The mastery of orchestral idiom is as authoritative as that of the composer of "Don Juan," when we take into due consideration the progress in the development of instrumental technic. The weaving of the web of themes is most skillful. What we miss is the voice of divine inspiration. The symphony is an important work; it is not one which leaves no doubt in the mind.

The performance Saturday afternoon was one of noble character. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the music with intimate knowledge of the score and with an affection which warmed every measure. The musicians gave him everything he demanded. The gorgeousness of the instrumental color was noteworthy. The young men from Harvard and Mr. Robison discharged their duties well. The audience rewarded them with the customary signs of approval. It may interest some music lovers to recall that the last prevous performances of the symphony took place in the spring of 1923. The first was the Boston orchestra under M. Monteux and the second by the Philadelphia, under Mr. Stokowski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

APR 12 1932

Orchestras to Play New Ravel Concerto

Ravel's new piano concerto will be performed simultaneously in Boston and Philadelphia on the afternoon of April 22 by the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestras. The piece was intended for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its fiftieth anniversary last season, but Ravel was unable to finish it in time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 11 1932

Boston Symphony Honors Memory of Goethe Here

Devotes Entire Program of Concert to Music Suggested by German Poet in Recognition of Death Centenary.

By PITTS SANBORN.

A NOTABLE commemoration of the centenary of Gothe's death took place Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted its program to music inspired by Goethe. Beethoven supplied the "Egmont" overture, Liszt the "Faust Symphony."

Performances of the "Egmont" overture are numerous, but Liszt's symphony seldom adorns our programs. In a way it is just as well that such should be the case. "A Faust Symphony" is not a work for any orchestra or any conductor. It is something of a rite and should not be recklessly exposed to profanation.

Of course, certain charges can be preferred against Liszt as a symphonist. But to dwell on them here would be merely tiresome. The "Faust Symphony" consists of three "character pictures" or tone poems which are almost surcharged with imagination, with musical invention, with poetic and dramatic feeling.

The first section, "Faust," is unquestionably one of the most eloquent delineations of the tempestuous human spirit in all art. It is somewhat prolix, if you like, but that is due to excess of substance, rather than to unnecessary repetition.

Harvard Gleemen Assist.

The second section, "Gretchen," stands alone as a picture of Goethe's Margaret. Along with one or two songs it represents the very apex of Liszt's genius.

The third section, "Mephistopheles," is also an extraordinary achievement, though, in common with all music that at a first hearing astonishes or shocks, some of its original vitality has gone.

It is only in the epilogue ("Andante mistico") that the symphony falls perceptibly from its high estate.

The performance accorded the work by the Boston orchestra under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky was altogether worthy of the music and the occasion.

The Harvard Glee Club sang well the choral part of the epilogue, but Rulon Y. Robison was unsuited to the tenor solo.

Beecham Directs Varied Program.

At Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Sir Thomas Beecham led the Philharmonic-Symphony in one of his interestingly varied programs, part of which had been heard at preceding concerts.

The pieces offered comprised Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Bax's symphonic poem "The Garden of Fand," Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings, Handel's concerto grosso in E minor for string orchestra, Delius' "The Walk to Paradise Garden" (from "A Village Roemeo and Juliet"), and Rimsky-Korsakoff's introduction and march from "Le Coq d'Or."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

APR 12 1932

Symphony Concert Support Urged By Mrs. H. D. Sharpe

An appeal for subscriptions to make possible continuance of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here next season was made today by Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association. The final concert o fthe present season will be given tonight in the RKO Albee Theatre. A fund of $4500 is required to buy out the theatre for four night next season.

"After two successful membership campaigns and one successful Community concert season, we feel confident that the additional music of a high order will be continued. Our only concern now, then, is making certain that we keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra with us," said Mrs. Sharpe.

"The concerts of the Boston Symphony this season have been excelleent and Providence, I am sure, will not permit them to be discontinued. eRsponses from the campaign for the necessary $4500 will determine the future of the concert series. Those enthusiastic symphony supporters wh odesire to hear the Boston orchestra next season have only t osend in their pledges and the return of this excellent concert organization will be guaranteed."

Officers of the Music Association which is making the appeal for funds are: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Robert S. Holding, Jr., treasurer, and Hugh F. MacColl, secretary.

See Page 190 for other comments

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13, 1932

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience Shows Appreciation of Artistry of Season's Final Concert Presented by Boston Symphony Orchestra; Hails Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave the last concert of its season last night in the Albee Theatre, presenting as varied and interesting a program as could be well imagined or designed. To remind of Goethe, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was played. For sterner fare, the brilliant and massively grand Symphony No. 5 of Tchaikovsky was offered and, lest we forget the tremendous inroads of modern musical speech, representative examples were very much in evidence in the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss and two "Nocturnes" by Debussy.

The musical worth of these compositions is so great in each case that one may not hold one against the other for invidious comparison, but rather praise each in its manner and kind and allow it to be accepted as exemplary of its composer. In the short "Overture to Egmont" one hears features very characteristic of Beethoven, his remarkable use of comparatively simple thematic material, the manner in which he forms moods and sentiment with only few themes and their variants and what we feel to be highly legitimate and orthodox orchestration. Few opportunities for great virtuosity on the part of orchestra or conductor are offered by this overture, yet it interests by its straightforwardness and by the contrast it offers with the extremely modern idioms to follow.

Comparison of two modernists would be facilitated by greater similarity of works. Surely no more diverse sentiment could be offered than a tone poem upon clouds and the helter-skelter scamperings of a shameless rascal. The comic or grotesque has no place in the former and the delicate refinements of tone color are entirely out of place in Till's cavortings.

The analysis of Strauss's methods of musical expression, very similar to other compositions of Debussy, but not to this one, would seem to show that disgust, horror and dread can be expressed better by modern harmonic devices than by those to which we are more accustomed. One recalls the failure of Handel to instill fear and dread into the "horrid thought" of his beautiful "Waft Her Angels Through the Sky" and a number of other examples where creative art failed because it did not have the tools with which to work.

At all events, last night's concert marshalled these modernistic forces in the delicate touches of pictoral artistry and in the full panoply of war, death and destruction. As played by the superb tonal artistry of this orchestra, these works were immensely impressive and to those interested in the technique of a large orchestra with the moderns, most revealing.

One cannot but note the superiority of the orchestra of today and its writing over that of Beethoven, its larger voices and the opportunities for orchestral richness offered by the addition of the English horn, the bass clarinet, the double bassoon, and by the greater freedom of musical thought made possible by elaborate orchestral scoring for virtuosi.

Whereas the Debussy "Nocturnes" allowed more opportunity for the appreciation of orchestral tone coloring in slower measure and contemplative manner, "Till" fascinated from the bravura of bravado and made the senses keen and taut in one's endeavor to keep pace with the composer's kaleidoscopic changes of mood and color. One can hardly recall any composition more afire with orchestral scintillation, more rich in varied tone color, more intense in its musical emotions than this composition as played by this orchestra and as directed by Dr. Koussevitzky. Nor can greater technical perfection on the part of the orchestra be imagined than this, one of its most successful "showpieces."

Although Tchaikovsky accomplishes his purpose in tonal expression with simpler and less involved figures and invokes greater variety and wealth of thematic material, his efforts are no less impressive.

Serious musical thought is everywhere evident; it is idealistic, esthetic and more in the classic style. It is an epic rather than a fantasy, a volume rather than a short story, philosophic instead of comic. From the first announcement of the principal theme, offered plainly without preamble, to the tremendous finale, it is in the heights of tonal nobility without hint of mediocrity. One noted the splendor of the brass choir which has many opportunities for the display of its powers, the richness of the woodwind, its flexibility of articulation and beauty of tone color, and the perfection of ensemble of the strings. Into this work Dr. Koussevitzky projects the tremendous vitality of his personality; he holds his forces in reserve, yet releases them when occasion requires. He is sensitive to the finer nuances and delicacies of expression, but does not stress them unduly or oversentimentalize.

Neither director nor orchestra seemed jaded from the tremendous activities of the season just closing. Fit and in the prime of condition there were no evidences of technical uncertainty, weariness or lack of interest.

Conspicuous among the many superb tonal effects achieved were the exquisite nuances in the "Waltz" of the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the dramatic impressions of muted French horns and trumpets in "Till Eulenspiegel" and the atmospheric and visionary iridescence of the stately "Nuages" of Debussy. Nor should one forget the agility and tone colors of the woodwind, the unity of ensemble and the telling extremes of sforzando and pianissimo of the entire orchestra and the perfection of the string choir in its many episodes and configurations. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the "Andante Cantabile" will be long remembered for its rare sympathy and feeling, as will Mr. Boettcher's splendid tone study of the leading theme of this now famous movement.

The capacity audience was quick to appreciate the artistry of this concert and called both conductor and orchestra to their feet to acknowledge its applause. Ane one rejoices in the interest shown Debussy and Richard Strauss, composers, who have not always been so readily accepted or understood.

With the closing of this season's offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one notes with more than ordinary interest the musical and popular appeal of its well planned programs, the consistently perfect performances and the capacity attendance which has greeted each performance.

The program:
Beethoven ....
...Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
a. Nuages.
b. Fetes.
Strauss .. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner," —in Rondo Form, Op. 28
Tchaikovsky ....
......Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op., 64
I. Andante: aliegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

DR. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

FINANCIAL AID SOUGHT TO CONTINUE CONCERTS

$4500 Must Be Raised; Guarantors Asked To Enroll

A plea for financial support to assure continuance of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next year was made last night by Harry Parsons Cross at the orchestra's final appearance in Providence this season, the 50th the organization has visited this city.

Mr. Cross, speaking during an intermission in the concert at the Albee Theatre, urged Providence music-lovers to enroll as guarantors of the 1932-33 concerts as soon as possible. To assure the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next year, he said, $4500 must be raised.

"The visits of this magnificent organization are our most precious and most important musical event," he declared. "Nothing in the musical year of Providence has ever equalled them in importance and musical significance, and I feel certain that I voice the feelings of everyone present when I express our deep appreciation of the great cultural value of these concerts and bespeak your support and assistance for their continuance."

He congratulated the orchestra on "its 51 years of superb music and brilliant performance," Dr. Koussevitzky, the director, for "his high musical ability and ideals which have brought the orchestra to fresh heights of achievement and fame," and this community "for having been able to enjoy these concerts for the past 50 years."

Boston's Prowess, New York's Profit

As Liszt's "Faust Symphony" Went from Symphony To Carnegie Hall

Apr 13 — Trans.

WHEN Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Orchestra and a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club repeated Liszt's "Faust Symphony" in New York last Saturday afternoon, the conductor chose as forepiece Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont." In Boston he had preferred Wagner's "Faust Overture." Among the reviewers, Mr. Thompson of The Evening Post regretted the change. In his opinion "the juxtaposition, the associations and the parallels of Wagner and Liszt would have been stimulating." His colleagues were unaware or took no note of the change. Nor did they dwell upon the concert as the only musical marking of the Goethe centenary vouchsafed to New York—via Boston. Quickly they proceeded to dissertations upon the "Faust Symphony" itself. For the most part they repeated or diversified well-worn commonplaces; but Mr. Henderson's laconic paragraph, mistrustful of the whole work, deserves reprint from The Sun:

> The thematic ideas are quite as worthy as many found in the tone-poems of Strauss. The mastery of orchestral idiom is as authoritative as that of the composer of "Don Juan," when we take into due consideration the progress in the development of instrumental technic. The weaving of the web of themes is most skillful. What we miss is the voice of divine inspiration. The symphony is an important work; it is not one which leaves no doubt in the mind.

Similarly comment on the performance abounded in the hackneyed adjectives that may mean something, little or nothing (except a tired reviewer) according as the reader construes them. To one the performance was "altogther worthy." To another, it had "sobriety, insight, sympathy, clarity, proportion and glowing sonorities." To a third, it was "thoughtful, effective and sincere." Mr. Henderson again had something definite to say: "The performance was one of noble character. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the music with intimate knowledge of the score and with an affection which warmed every measure. The musicians gave him everything he demanded. The gorgeousness of the instrumental color was noteworthy. The young men from Harvard and Mr. Robison discharged their duties well."

There remains, in contrast to all this, the notable article that Mr. Gilman contributed to the Herald Tribune, the only review commensurate with the occasion. "New York,' he wrote, "which is not unsupplied with orchestras, choral bodies and conductors, has been obliged to make its chief musical contribution to the centennial observance of Goethe's death through the agency of an out-of-town orchestra, conductor, and chorus. Our singular metropolis has a way of fulfilling many of its obligations vicariously, and this was just another case in point.

"Let us acknowledge ourselves negligent in this matter and pass on to the further admission that Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston band of virtuosi, aided by Dr. Davison's celebrated Harvard choristers, gave us not only the most completely expressive performance of Liszt's 'Faust Symphony' that New York has heard in many years, but one of the excelling concerts of this season. The event was worthy of the occasion—a felicitously planned and eloquently realized tribute to the memory of the uncompanioned poet and philosopher.

"Mr. Koussevitzky is ideally equipped by temperament and imagination to be the projector of such music as the 'Faust Symphony' of Liszt. In this case the work and the interpreter were complementary. Again and again at Saturday's performance, one was aware of a measure of sympathetic identification that is not often achieved in the case of a creative artist and his agent. And the conductor was magnificently served by his players, who discoursed with a tonal beauty, a rectitude and flexibility and finesse, an attainment of all the major virtues of great orchestral playing, which the duly appreciative among their hearers are not likely to forget. It is invidious to single out examples, for each of the orchestra's choirs excelled itself; yet one's memory happens to linger over the exquisiteness of tone and phrasing achieved by the woodwind in the first and second movements of the symphony —though, having said this, one should hasten to praise in like terms the unforgettable deeds of the strings and of the brass.

"Perhaps the summit of poetic beauty and eloquence in the establishment and sustaining of a mood was reached in the passage of transition from the 'Mephistopheles' section to the choral finale—the greatest page that Liszt has bequeathed us: music of luminous and mystical beauty, visionary and rapt, of an impressiveness, an otherworldly rarity, that one would find it difficult to parallel; music in which the imagination of the tone-poet, like that of the dramatic seer himself, suggests (in Goethe's own words) 'a hovering of the spirit above the earth.' This moment and its mood were wonderfully realized by the conductor and his players and the first entrance of the chorus sustained and heightened the effect.

"What a work is this symphony of Liszt! Flawed though it be, dubious at times in the quality of its thinking and its feeling, streaked as it certainly is with sentimentalism and grandiloquence, how amazing it remains as a source-book of the music that came after it, as an utterance of much that is essential in its poetic original! We shall wait long before the Gretchen of Goethe's 'Faust' comes closer to us in music than she does in certain pages of the second movement of Liszt's symphony. And we shall wait quite as long for the equal of Liszt's symphonic Mephistopheles, with his sardonic and crackling wit, his scarifying malice, his lethal irony.

"As for the Epilogue, with its setting of the 'Chorus Mysticus,' one can scarcely put one's hand on one's heart and say that Liszt has given up here the full equivalent of Goethe. Yet how extraordiary certain of these closing pages are, when one thinks of all that Liszt the artist was and all that he was not! For there are moments in this finale when the body of the music seems transilluminated, when the mystical adoration and exaltation that are implicit in the poem, its paradisial ascents and purfications, seem to have transfigured and irradiated the musician's thought."

Plays and Players === Music and Musician

From Russia, From Boston, Choral Music

An "Epitaph" for Diaghilev, A Psalm for Radcliffe, To Be Heard

THREE choral works stand on the current program of the Symphony Orhcestra. One is Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," remembered as notable piece written for the orchestra's anniversary year. A second is Miss Mabel W. Daniels's "Exultate Deo," written also for a fiftieth anniversary, in this case of the founding of Radcliffe College. The third is again commemorative, being an Epitaph for Diaghilev, the founder and sustainer of the Russian Ballet who died in 1929. Vladimir Dukelsky wrote it—the young Rusisan composer already thrice heard in Boston. His piece will be performed for the first time.

Mr. Dukelsky at Symphony Hall yesterday gave information concerning his new work: "It is the second that I have written which honors Diaghilev. The opera I have just finished, 'Demoiselle Paysanne,' in two acts and prologue after a tale of Pushkin, is the first. On completion I dedicated it to the memory of Diaghilev. It seemed to me, however, that it would be appropriate for one who owes what success he has had in music to Diaghilev, to write something specifically in his memory. So I cast about for a poem which should in some way express a suitable idea. I did not wish to commission a poem. I preferred to find something which had not been written on order. I searched for about three months before I found what I wanted in a poem by the Russian, Ossip Mandelstamm. He is one of the leaders of 'The Acmeists' in Russia, who in turn are akin to the Parnassians in Paris—writing a species of neo-classical verse.

"The poem has nothing whatever to do with death. It blends the spirit of the North (in this case Russia) which was the home of Diaghilev, with the warmth of Italy, of which he was so fond and in which he died. It depicts a theater of Italian opera at Petersburg, as it is being emptied after an evening's performance in winter. I give the description of the rather glamorous scene to the chorus, which acts as narrator. Lyric utetrances go to a solo-soprano, who evokes the spirit of Melpomene; relates how Melpomene is strangely at ease in this old Russian land; how the native music is closely akin to Italian song. The poem ends with the Italian swallow dying on the 'hot snows' of Russia. I believe this idea an appropriate one for my purpose, since by inversion it mirrors the life of Diaghilev: he, the great artist born in Russia, dying on Italian soil; the song of this type of opera, born in Italy, dying on Russian snows." In translation by Elaine de Sincay Ross, the poem runs:

Chorus:
Pale and ghostlike stage and footlights shimmer,
Spectral choirs resound no more;
In the temple of Melpomene scarce a glimmer,
Silken curtains veil the door.

Coaches camp aligned in black procession,
Frost is snapping on the street;
Throngs are passing shaggy in succession,
Stinging snow grinds under feet.

Now the varlets sort the furry clutter,
Heavy bearskins for the snows;
Midst confusion, butterfly a-flutter,
Furs enwrap a tender rose.

Motley colorings in modish prinking,
Slightly torpid theater air,
On the street the lantern dimly blinking,
And the vapor steaming everywhere.

Weary coachmen, cursing, yelling, snarling,
Puffs and snorts, Night's inky fold.

Soprano solo (at times with chorus):
Oh, what care we, Euridyce, my darling,
If our winters are so cold?

Sweeter than Italia's liquid singing
Is to me my native tongue,
And the Northern harps mysteriously singing
Are the fount of alien song.

Symbol of privation,
Lies bedraggled, wretched gutter thing,
But from distant realms of glorious creation,
Flies to us the everlasting Spring.

Chorus:
Oh, come again, with melody undying,
Let the valley with enchantment ever ring,
For the soaring swallow now is lying
On hot snows with broken wing!

The "Epitaph" was written in April and May of 1931 and scored in the fall of that year. In addition to the soprano and the mixed chorus (Miss Adelle Albert and The Cecilia), it assembles an orchestra with a large wood-wind choir, scant brass (two horns, one trumpet, one trombone), two guitars, "which are very important" (says the composer), a piano and the usual strings. There is considerable orchestral introduction, chiefly on a melody heard in the first five measures. It occurs also, on occasion, later in the work. There is much writing for sopranos and altos without the male voices. The music follows the text rather closely. There is brilliant, semi-descriptive music of the scene of the emptying of the theater. The soprano is joined by the choir not long after the first entry of the solo-voice. The choir brings the work to a close with a plaintive chorus unaccompanied by orchestra.

Made in Boston

Miss Mabel W. Daniels's "Exultate Deo" was "composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Radcliffe College" and was first performed at a "Radcliffe Semi-Centennial Concert in honor of the founders," at Symphony Hall, May 21, 1929. It has also been heard at a concert of the Handel and Haydn Society. It is set to a Latin text chosen from the Psalms of David, viz:

> Exultate Deo! Jubilate Deo, Jacob! Deo, adjutori nostro, exultate Deo! Sumite psalmum, et date tympanum, jucundum psalterium cum cithara. Laudate Domnium in sono tubæ, in cymbalis sonantibus. In te, Domine, speravi. Non confundar in æternum. Inclina ad me aurem tuam et salva me. Quoniam tu es patientia mea, Domine, spes mea, a juventute mea. Exultate super cœlos, Deus, et super omnem terram, gloria tua. Exultate Deo!

Of which the composer furnishes the following English paraphrase:

> Sing to God, rejoicing! Praise the God of Jacob! Praises sound to him our helper, sing aloud, rejoicing! Come ye with music and strike the tympanum; the sweet-voiced lyre bring hither with lute and harp. Praise ye the Lord with ringing trumpet, praise Him forever with resounding cymbals! In Thee, Lord my God, have I trusted. Let me never be confounded. Incline thine ear to thy servant and save me. Lo! for years Thou hast been my help and my consolation, Thou, O Lord, my hope from youth's first early dawning. Be Thou exalted, God, above the heavens. And over all the earth, Thy glory. Sing to God rejoicing.

In the main, Miss Daniels's music is of high exultation. The first and the last portions ring to the skies in praise of the Lord. Trumpet fanfares assist the voices in heightening the effect. Between are two divisions, lighter textured, lower-voiced, less excitingly but more ingratiatingly rhythmed. The first contains the warmly written pages beginning: "Come ye with music," and setting forth the quality of the various instruments that shall join together in praise. The second is the short prayer of trust in the Lord—a music of contrition and humility. Between these two middle sections is a short period of praise, suggesting the opening and closing choruses of exultation which strike the key note of the entire work. . . . Miss Daniels's music and text made a favorable impression at the Radcliffe celebration and in subsequent performance by the Handel and Haydn Society.

A. H. M.

Lining Him Out

Vladimir Dukelsky (Von Behr—New York)

Whose New Piece for Chorus and Orchestra, "Epitaph"—in Memory of Diaghilev of the Russian Ballet—Will Be Heard at the Symphony Concerts This Week

Music in The Land

From Symphony Hall

FOR strange mating, Martelli, Ravel and Bruckner will divide the Symphony Concerts of next week. Martelli is the Parisian from Corsica whose Suite, suggested by Assyrian bas-reliefs, was played at Symphony Hall two years ago. He will now be heard in a Concerto for Orchestra. . . . Ravel's piece is the Piano-Concerto originally intended for performance at the jubilee concerts of the Boston Orchestra in 1930-31; deferred because it was unfinished, produced in Paris last January; now to be played, jointly with the Philadelphia Orchestra, for the first times in America. At Symphony Hall, Mr. Sanromá will take the piano-part. . . . Bruckner's share in the program is the long promised repetition of his Eighth Symphony. Many will hope for the restoration of the cut in the slow movement made by Dr. Koussevitzky when he first played the Symphony in 1929. Nowhere did Bruckner write a more celestial music than in this Adagio. It should be heard note for note and measure for measure. The other three movements are another matter. The replacement, moreover, would not materially lengthen the concert.

Cut or No Cut

By telephone and by mail one and another frequenter of the Symphony Concerts joins this department in the hope that when Dr. Koussevitzky returns next week to Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, he will restore the cut hitherto made in the slow movement. One persistent Brucknerite, who has heard the Symphony from conductors in both Europe and America, avers that not one, whatever he did elsewhere, removed so much as a single measure from this Adagio. "Without it there is no reason to play the Eighth." . . . Another correspondent would remind Dr. Koussevitzky that length is an intrinsic and characteristic element in the Symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler. The hearer may like or dislike it, but without it they are not themselves. The conductor may cut a few pages from this slow movement, but the chances are that, so doing, he will not make two new friends for Bruckner whereas he will disappoint twenty old admirers. . . . A message over the telephone brings one more objection: "Usually," said the voice, "Dr. Koussevitzky's cuts are invisible to the naked ear and better the music. But this cut in Bruckner's Adagio sticks out like a sore thumb. Anyone who listens closely knows that something has happened."

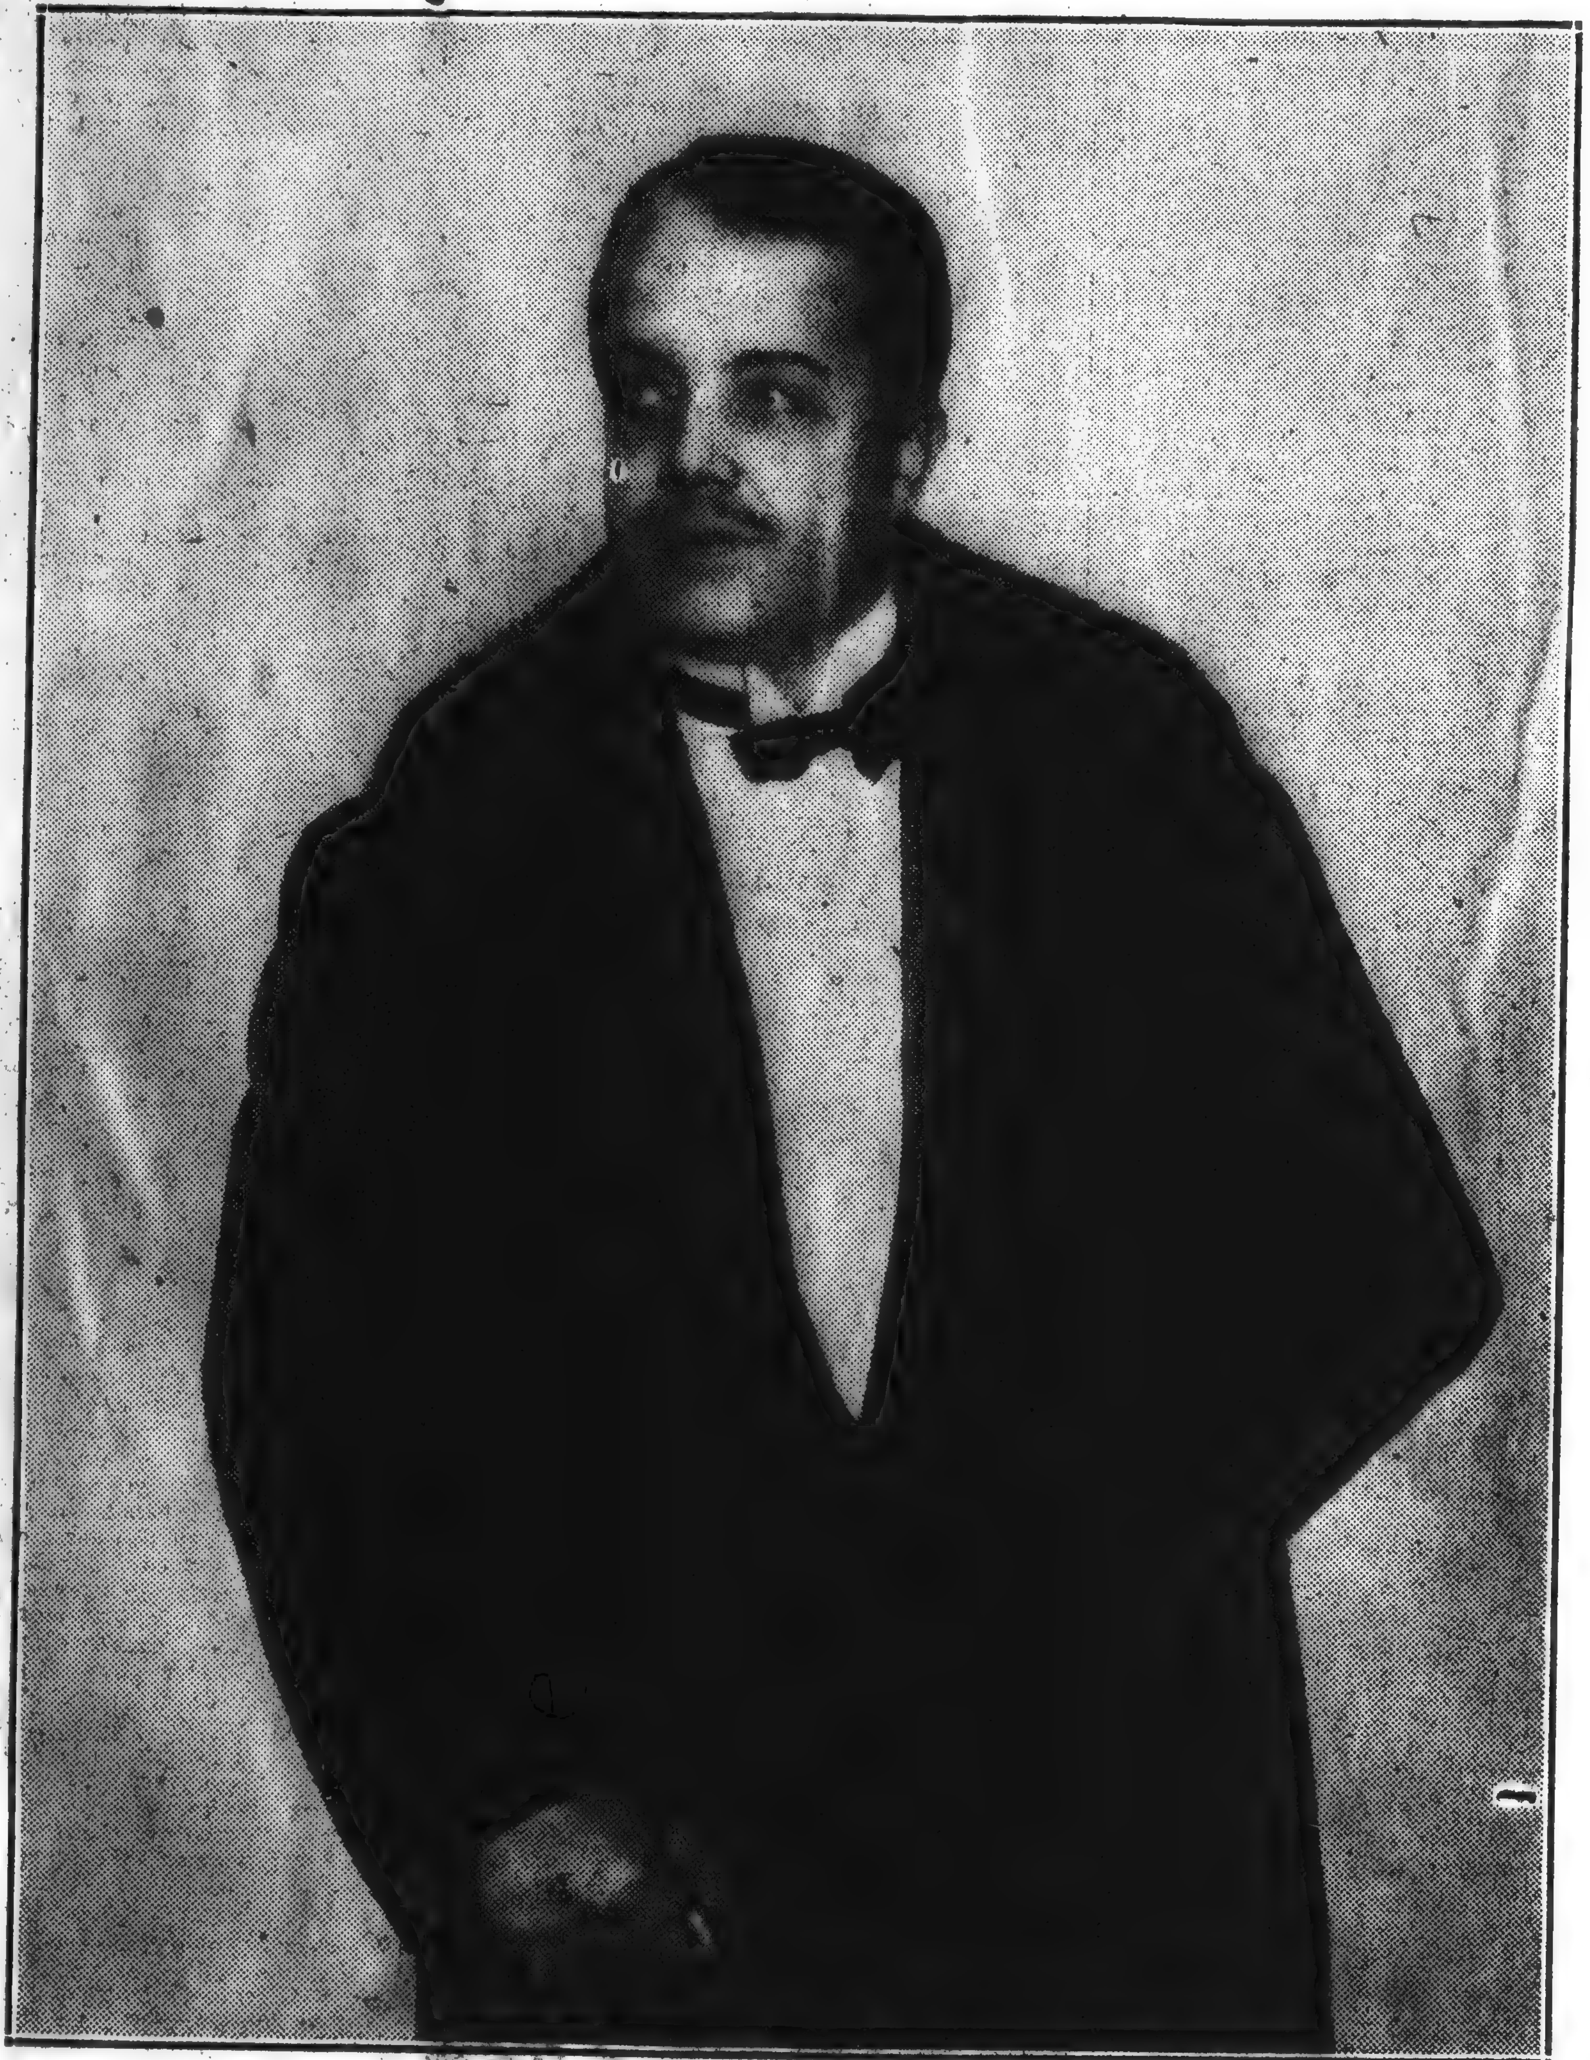
Incidents and Prospects

In the years before "the strike," Theodore Cella was second harp at Symphony Hall. Afterward he passed to the Philharmonic Society in New York and ultimately became first harp. Now he is composer as well. Yesterday and today Sir Thomas Beecham and the orchestra played his tonal travel-picture, "Through the Pyrenees."

Dr. Koussevitzky is not only to conduct the Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna in a special concert during the "Festival Fortnight" in June. He is also to share with Mr. Mengelberg the judging of a competition of young violinists.

H. T. P.

Animator of Mingled Arts



Serge Diaghilev (1872-1929) (Sasha—London)

Founder and Sustainer of the Russian Ballet Whose "Epitaph," in Dukelsky's Music for Chorus and Orchestra, Was Heard for the First Time at the Symphony Concert This Afternoon

(Reproduced from Propert's "Russian Ballet" Published by Greenberg, New York)

CHORUS AND SOLOS WITH SYMPHONY

First Performance of Dukelsky's "Epitaph"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There was an abundance, if not entirely of good things, at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky's generous programme included choral pieces by Mabel Daniels, the youthful Dukelsky and Stravinsky, in which the Cecilia Society and, in Dukelsky's piece, Miss Adelle Alberts, soprano, assisted, and also Brahms' First Pianoforte Concerto with Myra Hess as soloist and, an example of that composer's only excursion into light music, two of his Hungarian dances.

FIRST HEARING OF "EPITAPH"

Miss Daniels' "Exultate Deo," written for Radcliffe's golden jubilee and since heard here from the Handel and Haydn Society, was new piece at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Dukelsky's Epitaph, composed in memory of Serge Diaghilev of the Ballet Russe, received yesterday its first public hearing. Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," made for the orchestra's 50th anniversary, appeared for the third time on the Symphony programmes. Both Miss Daniels and Mr. Dukelsky, who now lives in New York, were present in the audience. The former bowed her acknowledgments from a seat near the stage; the latter, escorted by Dr. Koussevitzky, came forth upon the platform itself.

These three choral pieces, admirably performed by Mr. Fiedler's singers of the Cecilia Society and the supporting orchestra, provided interesting contrast. Miss Daniels, writing an "occasional" piece which should voice both joyousness and solemnity, found suitable verses in the Vulgate to which she has fitted music appropriate in spirit. Her treatment of the chorus betrays a practised hand; the orchestral writing is effective, if in the conventional manner. The piece sounds, and the applause that followed it yesterday was no mere token of respect due a distinguished fellow-townswoman.

Dukelsky's Music Uncertain

For his text Mr. Dukelsky chose a curious poem by his former countryman, Ossip Mandelstamm, published in 1921, having for its background the exterior of a St. Petersburg theatre and suggesting vaguely the death in Russia of an Italian singer. (Diaghilev, a Russian, died in Italy, it will be recalled.) Between these verses and Mr. Dukelsky's music, whether the latter was sung by the chorus or was heard from Mrs. Alberts' excellent soprano, there is no discernible relationship. They merely co-exist; while the music itself, save for the impressively elegiac mood of the opening, is, like other music by Mr. Dukelsky which has been heard here, tentative and uncertain in style, seeming even inept and amateurish.

Stravinsky, on the contrary, knows exactly what he wants and obtains it. Yet in this "Symphony of Psalms" he seems deliberately to have avoided the more obvious implications of the texts he has set; and how cold, calculating and cerebral is this music, a music, it would seem, willed rather than felt. The no doubt accidental but singularly pointed resemblance to the first finale in "Tosca' that is borne by the final pages is responsible for the only warmth and geniality that this otherwise austere and forbidding score can offer.

Miss Hess Rewarded

Nevertheless there was warm applause yesterday for this "Symphony," inspired perhaps by the excellent performance. But it was hardly so fervent or so long-continued as that which rewarded Miss Hess for her share in an eloquent and moving exposition of Brahms' Concerto, his first significant work yet the most profound, most deeply expressive of all pieces in its particular form.

Herald

TURDAY, APRIL 16, 1932

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, that took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon was the 22d of the season. The orchestra was assisted by the Cecilia Society chorus, which had been prepared by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler. Myra Hess was the solo pianist. The program was as follows: Mabel Daniels, "Exultate Deo," for chorus and orchestra (first time at these concerts); Dukelsky, "Epitaph," for chorus, soprano (Adelle Alberts), and orchestra (first performance); Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus; Brahms, concerto for piano No. 1, D minor, and two Hungarian dances, Nos. 5, G minor; 6, D major.

Dukelsky's "Epitaph," written last year, is a "belated tribute to Diaghilev." A poem by Ossip Mandelstam, a "co-founder of the 'acmeist' school of poetry," whatever that may be, is printed in the score. Mr. Dukelsky admits this poem was not intended for an epitaph, certainly not one for Diaghilev: the poem was published eight years before his death. "I have chosen it for this work, as it gave me a curious insight into the emotional paradox of Diaghilev's life—the life of a Siberian, who adored Italy and died in Venice. In the poem it is the presumably Italian swallow that dies on the snows of Russia—and it is to Russia that Diaghilev's heart belonged, even if his mind was that of an embittered Medici." The poem is as curious as the paradox; the music is not of a common, expected or obvious nature. It portrays in turn, according to the composer, a theatre, just emptied in Leningrad; the noise outside, coachmen, furs for the "Venuses of the North"; music comparable to a "chanson de faubourg"; finally a prayer-like chant. Leaving aside the pictorial quality of the music, and this quality is largely to be imagined after the poem has been read—no one of the sections of this music is clearly illuminative of the corresponding sections of the poem, except the "prayer-like chant,"—what is to be said of this composition? There are ingenious pages, beginning with the few opening orchestral measures that sound a note of grief; a certain technical skill is shown, for the orchestra and not for the chorus, but as a whole "Epitaph" is lacking in imagination and much of it lacks spontaneity, the outpouring of emotion that must out from the breast of the composer. To say it is manufactured music would be perhaps unjust; it is certainly labored. The orchestral writing and performance were more interesting than the music for the chorus. The Cecilia sang bravely, for it is difficult music with forbidding intervals.

Dr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked for a repetition of Stravinsky's "Psalms." There is little that has been written of late that is of such spiritual and haunting beauty as the third of these Psalms with the final and marvellous measures of the "Alleluia." The orchestral introduction to the second of the Psalms made a greater impression than it did last season. This "Symphonie" must be ranked among Stravinsky's major works, for its directness, its absence of padding, the sincerity of musical thought and expression.

Miss Daniels's motet, composed for the 50th anniversary of the founding of Radcliffe College, unlike many works for a special occasion, is good for other occasions than the one that prompted it. It is straightforward music, well written for the voices. Chorus and orchestra with the sounding of the trumpets are exultant. Saint-Saens once said of Augusta Holmes that when a woman composed she took delight in noisy effects to prove that she could be as virile as a man. This cannot be said of Miss Daniels. Her jubilation is musical, not boisterous.

Some wondered before the concert why Miss Hess chose Brahms's D minor concerto. Would it suit the miniature, prudish nature of her art, which has often characterized her recitals? Her performance of the concerto, which under other hands is often monochrome and granitic, was strong where strength to be poetic. A performance that was was required, poetic whenever Johannes, as in the second movement, deigned sevitzy gave a remarkably fine reading of the score; the orchestra played superbly.

And here should have been the end. Dances were brilliant, but they lengthened unduly the concert. Miss Hess was enthusiastically applauded. Miss Daniels and Mr. Dukelsky, who were in the audience, were obliged to bow in recognition of the audience's expressed approval.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week: Martelli, concerto for orchestra (first time in the United States); Ravel, concerto for piano (Mr. Sanroma) and orchestra (first time in Boston); Bruckner's symphony No. 8, C minor.

MUSIC

Globe April 16

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Myra Hess, as soloist in Brahms' D minor piano concerto, was applauded with unusual warmth at yesterday's Symphony concert. The audience not merely clapped loud and long, it stamped its feet. One expected to hear cheers, but the New England temperament does not lend itself to such vociferations. Not since the debut of Horowitz has any soloist been so cordially greeted by the Friday subscribers.

The Cecilia Society chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the performance of Miss Daniels' "Exultate Deo," Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and a new "Epitaph" by the young Russian composer, Dukelsky, composed in memory of Diaghilev. In the latter number an incidental soprano solo was effectively sung by Adelle Alberts.

Miss Daniels' "Exultate," written for the 50th anniversary of Radcliffe College, again impressed one by its sincerity and good taste. It is an eloquent and well-written setting of a Latin text from the Vulgate, far beyond the usual run of commemorative pieces for special occasions, worthy indeed of a place in the repertory of choral societies, for whose use few pieces so good have been written in this century. In answer to hearty applause the composer bowed acknowledgments from her place in the audience, wisely refusing to come out on the stage.

Mr Dukelsky, wishing to honor the memory of Diaghilev, whose commissions to him started his career, as Diaghilev had started so many other young men of talent, chose Russian verses by the modernist poet, Mandelstamm, to set for chorus and soprano with orchestra. One was not impressed by the emotional quality or by the originality of this music, which lacks distinction of any kind. Dukelsky's talent is not for elegy but for sprightly trifles. The composer was present yesterday, yet the applause was very scanty.

Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," heard for the third time at these concerts yesterday, again impressed one as a great masterpiece. Its marked originality of style does not impress one as selfconscious audacity, but rather as the work of a genius, who for once has perfectly suited his manner to his matter. One would not have supposed the composer of the "Sacre" and "Petruchka" capable of the kind of emotion demanded by the Psalms. Yet this symphony, to give it the title he has arbitrarily chosen, is austere and noble music, quite free from the megalomania of 19th century musical heroics. There is no aping the style of Bach, but Stravinsky has given us something of the substance of Bach's musical thought, or of that of Beethoven in the "Missa Solemnis."

The Cecilia Society and Dr Koussevitzky had taken great pains in preparing these choral numbers, and not in vain. The performance of each of them was admirable. Mr Fiedler deserved the special round of applause he got, since on him must have fallen much of the burden of rehearsing the chorus.

Miss Hess needs no praise these days. Her admirable qualities as pianist and as musician have long been admired here. This Brahms concerto is difficult and unrewarding music, which even she failed to vitalise.

Dr Koussevitzky, wishing no doubt to lighten a rather serious program, ended it with two "Hungarian

---

Afternoon of Choral Music And Dukelsky

TRANS.—APR. 16

With Stravinsky Again, Miss Daniels's Anthem, and Myra Hess

THE season of Symphony concerts is drawing near a close. With such a conductor as Dr. Koussevitzky this does not mean slackening of effort nor complacent lapsing into routine. Rather, it almost seems as if the end of a season spurs him on to additional pains. By way of example one may consider the program of yesterday's concert and today's. This one program contained (1) a world-première; (2) a performance of a notable and exacting masterpiece of only a year ago; (3) an appearance of an esteemed soloist; (4) a work played in recognition of a deserving Boston composer. Any one of them would have been a sufficient focal point for holding the interest of a single concert.

A Friday afternoon audience, sometimes judged a bit lethargic, warmed to it all. After Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms there was applause enough to justify the conductor in bringing chorus and orchestra to their feet in acknowledgment. After Miss Hess's playing of Brahms's First Concerto, she was recalled more times than one cared to count; from this staid audience there was unbelievable hand-clapping, not a little stamping of feet, here and there even a shouting voice. And though the hour was already 4.30, no one seemed to think of shortening this applause, the departures were not more numerous, and a large audience settled down to ten minutes of further enjoyment of two of Brahms's Hungarian dances.

Miss Mabel W. Daniels's "Exultate Deo," was first upon this program. From the psalms Miss Daniels had selected verses for the making of an anthem of praise. This anthem bids one rejoice in the Lord; Oriental fashion, it displayfully enumerates a list of instruments to be used for such rejoicing; it rises once more to the heights of exultation, than for a moment figuratively bows its head in abasement and humility; finally returns to unmixed praise. For this scheme Miss Daniels has provided a music noble and stirring when occasion demands, enticing or expressive according to the sentiment of her text. It is full-voiced chorus music, all of it, assisted notably, in the first and last sections by martial trumpets heightening the stirring effect. Mr. Fiedler had ably trained the Cecilias to give this Song of Rejoicing its fullest due. It has been heard in Boston before, but never with the elastic, resilient, keen-edged rhythms, the snap and the verve, the cumulative climaxes which Dr. Koussevitzky gave to it yesterday. Miss Daniels was present to bow her recognition of the applause.

Came next Mr. Vladimir Dukelsky's Epitaph on the Death of Diaghilev. From the Russian Ossip Mandelstamm had selected a poem which brought together ideas of both Russia and Italy. This juxtaposition of ideas pleased the composer, seemed to him in a way to typify Diaghilev who was born in Russia and died in Italy. Mrs. Ross of New York wrote the translation which was used yesterday. The poem deals with the emptying of an Italian opera theater in St. Petersburg after a winter evening's performance; expresses preference for the songs of Russia as compared with the melodies of these operas. Mr. Dukelsky writes an introduction largely lyrical; writes a music of confusion for the confusion of the emptying of the theater; provides climax and a sense of excitement as he contemplates the oaths and the rudeness of coachmen in the streets; allows a soprano to sing musingly her pseudo-lyrical, pseudo-declamatory lines; ends with an a cappella chorus. The whole he keeps in sombre, darkening colors, carrying through the idea of the mood suitable in an Epitaph. To one hearer the most expressive and significant music of the piece lies in the orchestral introduction, the short orchestral interludes and the closing chorus. Again the Cecilias had mastered the score, this time one bristling with difficulties. Adelle Albers did her best with none too grateful solo passages. Performance, from soloist, chorus and orchestra, must have been all that Mr. Dukelsky desired.

Then, for final choral number, Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms. It is well known how this Symphony in its three movements rises from deepest penitence in the first movement; through hope and a trust that looks toward praise, in the second; how it sings its praise in the third. Curiously, the scheme of this last movement is similar to that of Miss Daniels's "Exultate Deo"; curiously also, both were written for fiftieth anniversaries—of Radcliffe College—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Increasing familiarity with this symphony serves only to deepen the highly favorable impressions of the first hearings last year. It belongs beyond reasonable doubt to the more important of Stravinsky's works. Hairsplittings as to whether it is as great as the trio of ballets beginning with the "Fire-Bird" are futile and not to the point; it is sufficient to say that it belongs on the same plane with them. It is again a music which draws its point from words. The "Rite of Spring" would be unintelligible for many hearers who now value it, were it not for the program. Whether this is good "esthetics" one may waive for the time being. It appears to be a fact.

Similarly the Symphony of Psalms can come to its fullest understanding only through the program which inheres in its text. Unless one is willing to listen to the first movement as a music which is the extreme of self-negation, one is apt to find it tiresome. The minor second which is the kernal of the thematic matter of the movement is hardly a "thriller" in any possible sense. The mood of humility, penitence, contrition, is however, proper subject for musical portrayal. It is inconceivable that it could be better or more fully, or more consistently expressed than does Stravinsky in this first movement. Not a note, not a melodic curve, not a rhythm, not a moment of orchestral coloring detracts even momentarily from this mood. It is all sack-cloth and ashes; it is the heavy step of one not daring to lift eyes to heaven; with it this symphony begins its upward course from the lowest possible point.

Observe now the sensitive Stravinsky in passing from this atmosphere of greys into which no color intrudes, into the atmosphere of hope and trust, the atmosphere anticiapting praise. That this second movement is a double fugue is neither here nor there—is of interest only to the student of technic. The fact of significance is the presence of the serene flutes (tinged only slightly by the acid oboe color), for the music on this new emotional level. Not for nothing does Stravinsky ask for five flutes and five oboes in this score. This movement is witness of their need, of their felicitous use. With sustained voices, with the more fluid wood-winds, in music which appears to be unrelated, Stravinsky again summons his mood as uneringly as in the more darksome beginning.

And then the movement of praise, the crowning glory of the whole, the mood which is the point of an anniversary piece. Within belief Stravinsky has held himself in during those first two movements the more to enhance the effect of this final movement. Certainly no more expressively beautiful phrase has been written than the "Alleluia" of its beginning, its middle, its end. Certainly the whole school of classicists combined have never gotten more effect out of a single, simple chord than Stravinsky gets out of the simple C major chord on the word "Dominum." One can enthuse almost equally over the "laudate," over the restrained dance measures, over the grave jubilation to which they eventually give way. And through it all one is conscious of a sense of beauty such as one has rarely heard from Stravinsky. That he has ever exceeded this movement is doubtful.

As common denominator for the whole three movements there runs a spirituality such as little of the music of the world can offer. Not once does Stravinsky strike a note which runs counter to it. Praise, the dance, jubilation, are made secondary to it. This mood of worship is as strong in this symphony as is the mood of paganism in "Le Sacre"—and the symphony contains far fewer measures of ineffective writing than the "Rite." If it is less quick to make its beauties known, the reason lies in their far greater subtlety. A Friday audience yesterday notably warmed to them. It goes without saying that the performance was beyond praise.

Finally Myra Hess and her performance of Brahms's First Piano Concerto, in D minor, an event of major importance in itself. If there were still those in the audience who thought of Miss Hess as a pleasant player of Chopin and Mozart, they only revealed that they have not followed the unfolding and the broadening and the deepening of her art in the last few years. This concerto, through all the diversities and contrasts necessary to all musical composition is essentially a work of stern gravity raised to heights of transcendant beauty. Miss Hess brought to it both the gravity and the beauty. Dr. Koussevitzky worked with her more in the way in which one artist works with another in a piece of "ensemble" music, than as a conductor with a supporting orchestra. Miss Hess playing upon her piano, Dr. Koussevitzky playing upon his orchestra—these two formed an ensemble which raised a Brahms concerto to heights which it seldom attains. They had their deserved reward.

Upon the two Hungarian dances of Brahms—Number 5 in G miner, and Number in D major—Dr. Koussevitzky bestowed illuminating performance. It is good to hear them so. A. H. M.

Second Hearing of Miss Hess's Brahms

[illegible]

FOR the audience at the Symphony Concert on Saturday, Miss Hess's playing of the piano-part in Brahms's Concerto in D minor was manifestly the incident of the evening. It called Miss Daniels to rise in her place at the end of her full-throated, firm-set, gravely expressive Motet, "Exultate Deo," music that without waste or overt labor declares fully and exactly the composer's mind and mood. It listened as responsively as might be to Mr. Dukelsky's orchestral and choral "Epitaph" for Diaghilev—music of thought, will and skill rather than of compelling matter and manner. It received Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," at third hearing, with the understanding and appreciation that now await him at Symphony Hall For two publics at least, he does not write in vain, one in Paris, the other in Boston. Both set him high among living composers—in this "Symphony of Psalms" with recurring reason. But before Miss Hess began Brahms's Concerto and after she had finished it, the welcoming and the rewarding applause rose long and loud. Had not her Bostonian audience, many in which sit also in Symphony Hall, been fubbed off with one concert when it had confidently expected two?

Some that heard the Concerto saw no reason for the considering of Miss Hess as a woman essaying an intrinsically masculine music. For them her approach and accomplishment as pianist and musician sufficed. (Must sex be always hanging about our necks?) The first movement may have taxed her strength of hand and will; but throughtout she was at one with the close-knit musical thought; outspread the spaciousness of the musical progress; succeeded well with the celebrated chain of intensified trills; sang the evocative measures in F major with romantic fervor. In the slow division, her weaving of the limpid ornament that the piano twines about the singing voices of the wind choir, her spacing and coloring of that selfsame melody when in turn the piano sang, were romantically imagined and sounded. In the Finale her rhythm was keen and fluid, her sense of detail alert and vital.

Throughout, moreover, pianist and conductor were agreed that this first Piano Concerto, like the second, is the quintessence of the romantic Brahms; that, furthermore, it is an intrinsically symphonic music with the piano thrown into high relief. No doubt Miss Hess fell short of Mr. Schnabel's signal performance of this Concerto. Once heard, it endures in memories that at Symphony Hall are no more than two years old. But because there is one superlative master of a given Concerto, shall no others adventure it? Nor did Miss Hess fall far behind when out of the strength of the first movement she also distilled the sweetness of the second. H. T. P.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1932

Matured

Arthur Fiedler—1932 (Zlata Llamas—Boston)

Conductor of the Concert at the Museum of Fine Arts Last Evening; The Pops at Symphony Hall; The Cecilia Chorus; the Esplanade Concerts; His Own Chamber Orchestra

---

Herald Apr. 20

MUSIC

TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series, which took place yesterday, assumed the character of a slightly belated observance of the Goethe centenary and afforded its audience an opportunity to hear Liszt's monumental—and hence neglected—"Faust" symphony. In this the orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, was assited by the Harvard Glee Club and by Rulon Robison, tenor.

Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" served as curtain-raiser, so to speak. By the uncomplicated heroism and nobility of its style, by its tragic simplicity, it reflects the earlier drama's simpler and more external conflict as truly as Liszt's trilogy reflects the complex inner action of "Faust." The later composer's three "character sketches," misnamed a symphony, yet of vast scope, portray in turn the perplexities and disillusionment of Faust and his musings on love and life, the sweet innocence of Gretchen, the mocking cynicism of Mefistopheles, all this with a felicity of thematic invention, a suggestive power, a resourcefulness in development and orchestration that go far to justify those who regard Liszt as a sometimes great composer who has not received his due.

Dr. Koussevitzky led his forces through a performance as brilliant, as dramatic, and as eloquent as that of a month ago, when he presented the "Faust" symphony for Friday and Saturday audiences. If a passage here and there seemed over-stiffly regimented, or a ritardando much exaggerated, the fault—not infrequent in this gifted conductor's work—might be forgiven him for the sake of the electrifying power of the performance as a whole, and especially for the gratitude his audiences owe him for having vouchsafed them a hearing of a remarkable and seldom-played composition. The singing of chorus and soloist has improved since the other recent performances of the work, and the ethereal beauty of its close—to which Wagner undoubtedly owes an idea or two—was thereby made the more impressive.

There was much well-deserved applause for all concerned. S. S.

With "Faust" to Mark Conclusion

Liszt's Symphony as It Is Heard at the Last of The "Tuesdays"

Trans. Apr. 20

THE last of the Tuesday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday repeated in a measure the music of the Goethe commemorative concert. That concert a few weeks ago presented Liszt's symphony based on Goethe's "Faust," preceded it with Wagner's overture on the same subject. Yesterday's concert repeated Liszt's symphony, but substituted Beethoven's Egmont overture, (also to a play of Goethe) for the Faust overture. Again the Harvard Glee Club sang the choral parts, Mr. Rulon Robison the solo parts, in the epilogue to the symphony.

One can hardly hear this symphony without being impressed by its monumental qualities. Where are the other composers of Liszt's day who could stretch a canvas so wide, fill it so full of signficance, of beauty, as did Liszt in this symphony of three tone poems? In it that group of qualities which are loosely linked together under the common label "romantic" find their fullest fruition. Three tone poems, representing three characters in a great drama, linked together to show their subtle relationships, that was the task which Liszt set himself, which he so superbly accomplished.

If commentators find a multiplicity of themes in the "Faust" episode, the reason is that Faust was a complex, many sided character. One passes these several themes in mental review. One can hardly feel other than that Liszt has accomplished the task of character analysis as shrewdly and as persuasively as any biographer might have done. And, with music as his medium, he has gone farther than any biographer; he has given a gorgeous and compelling emotive picture of the many things which together make up the composite Faust.

Again, consider the Gretchen characterization. One need go no farther than the first theme to discover the aptness of Liszt's portrayal. Words can convey only the palest reflection of what this music so clearly reveals of the artlessness, the complete and charming unsophistication, the naiveté, the disarming and sweet innocence of the child-woman, Gretchen. If proof were ever needed that music goes far beyond words, here it is found at its best.

And once again, Mephistopheles. In Goethe's "Faust" Mephistopheles says somewhere, "Ich bin der Geist der stets verneint" ("I am the constant spirit of negation"). And scholars, basing their assertion in part on this line, have insisted that there is no real Mephistopheles in "Faust," that the lines given to the so-called Mephistopheles are merely intended to paint a picture of the reverse of all of Faust's good and noble qualities. In some such wise Liszt conceived his Mephistopheles. For he invents no new themes for this master of darkness. With surest of hands he merely caricatures themes which before illumined the picture of Faust. And what a caricature! Who would ever have suspected, hearing this first movement, that such a hell's-broth could have been made of it! Yet here it is, as strong and as apt a portrayal of the subtlest of Goethean meanings as anything in the pictures of Faust and of Gretchen themselves.

But if Liszt's "Faust" is thus a supreme example of the art of musical characterization, it is to be held in no less esteem for the intrinsic value of the music itself. There is not a shabby theme in the entire work. Each in its own way and after its own manner is deeply and musically expressive, musically a thing inherently beautiful. And Liszt's handling of them, his manner of combining them, of building huge forms from them is of a piece with the themes themselves.

Yesterday's performance matched the qualities of the work itself. Faust themes, Gretchen themes, Mephistophelian caricatures, all stood fully revealed in their most significant selves. What is more, the complete entities which are so much more than themes themselves sounded as Liszt may have dreamed that some day they would sound. Finally, the great choral epilogue was proportioned as a fitting conclusion to it all. From the grave and infinitely dignified conclusion of Goethe, Liszt takes his cue. And to Goethe, to Liszt, Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, Mr. Robison gave fullest due.

Extended analysis of the Tuesday series of concerts is hardly necessary. Brief classification of the programs of the series may be worthwhile. It is worthy of note that all the compositions presented came from German, American and Russian pens. Of German composers there were eight, with thirteen works; of American two composers with two works; of Russian, four and four. By way of historical classification the story looks thus: classical, three composers, five works; romantic, six composers, nine works; modern, five composers, five works. A. H. M.

A Word and A Blow

Mrs. Fiske's Childish Encounter With Edwin Booth

I HAD heard so much of the brilliant genius and immense modesty of Edwin Booth, as well as of his beautiful character, that I begged my mother [who was acting with him] to take me behind the scenes with her and let me sit in her dressing room while the performance of "Richard III" was going on.

But from this dressing room I was unable to catch even a glimpse of the famous actor and I was bitterly disappointed. So mother hid me away in the first entrance, from which Booth had to take a cue. Breathlessly I waited. Then he came. In the clanking armor of his part he came and stood just beside me.

Of course, he didn't see me, but my lot was quite perfect without that. Here beside me, actually near enough for me to touch, stood the great Edwin Booth. Then my heart stood still, for the idol seemed about to speak. With an impatient hitch to some ill-fitted bit of armor, his lips parted, and I caught his soft exclamation: "God damn it!" [From the One and Only Chapter of Mrs. Fiske's Memoirs in Good Housekeeping.

FROM CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.

4/16/32

New York and the B. S. O.

By WINTHROP P. TRYON

New York

DISCUSSION holding its present course, remark may be safely made that the most impressive instrumental exploit of the spring here stands to the credit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Though currents of talk may shift in the remaining time of the season, people just now conversing upon musical happenings recall nothing with more enthusiasm than they do the performance by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men of an old-school piece for small ensemble, at the evening concert of the visit before the last in Carnegie Hall.

To say this is to take nothing from the praise of the two concerts of the final monthly tour; especially it does not diminish acclaim of the farewell matinée of April 9, when the program included the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, with the Harvard Glee Club assisting. Favorable comment on the directing, playing and singing of that afternoon will doubtless for a while roll and billow high, but probably not so as to overwhelm memory of the interpretation of Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, given by the conductor and a selected group of executants back on the evening of March 3.

For in that work, what conductor but Dr. Koussevitzky would expect the one double-bass player employed in the presentation to practice his part to such excellence as Mr. Kunze (presuming him, though unnamed on the program, to be the man) did? For the double-bass part subsists as the fine, the exalted thing in the whole matter. Without bass, there can be no realization of Bach; and this applies to a piece like the Chaconne for unaccompanied violin as well as to this Suite for flute and strings, since the melody of the Chaconne carries the implication of a bass. In further illustration, have a weak group of bass singers in a Bach choral work, and your cause is lost.

Nothing could be more tenuous than the tone brought out from the big fiddle by Mr. Kunze that night; at the same time, nothing could be firmer, stronger, more substantial. In fine, here was art; and after such a manifestation of technical exactitude over a slight study in eighteenth-century counterpoint, what was to be looked for when Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow musicians, presenting Liszt's grandiose "Faust" Symphony, bade good-by to the New York public until next autumn? Why, an occasion that would sum up for us the whole romance and sentiment of the period, or periods, of Goethe; and that would, besides, fix our standards high against the coming of the season of 1932-33.

That, indeed, is what happened. Nevertheless, tell the story how we will, the large effort shrinks in significance when compared with the small one. Possibly Liszt, after all, fails to go quite far enough, even if he does seem to traverse the realms of orchestral expression pretty widely in his three symphonic journeys in one. We might almost fancy that the division of his work entitled "Gretchen" shows him wandering beyond the borders of description, in the strict meaning, into the region of the impressionistic. But no; he is too confined to the notion of a theme harmonized on conventionally concordant notes for anything of that sort. Mainly, we find him preferring the doubts of geometric proof to the assurances, cherished by modern writers of tone poems, of downright guesswork.

Solemnity pervaded, through and through, the meeting of the Harvard Glee Club at the Town Hall on the evening of April 6, Dr. Archibald T. Davison in charge. Dignity and docility possessed the performers as never, surely, a group of students before. College singing has been developed into a serious business under Dr. Davison's methods; happily, too, let us grant. For difficult music well mastered and deftly presented has the effect of being simple, and so becomes pleasurable for people to hear. On the other hand easy pieces overstudied and painstakingly vocalized seem complex, and make tedious listening. Beethoven's "Hallelujah!"—well and good; but Sullivan's "Mikado" choruses—mercy's sake!

The biggest discount on male voices is that much of the music must be arranged and adapted for them. The gain for art is, that after a period of practice by themselves they can join an equal number of sopranos and altos in the rendition of a Palestrina motet, a Morley madrigal or a Bach cantata and accomplish something glorious.

LAST CONCERT OF THE SERIES

Symphony Repeats Liszt's Great "Faust Symphony"

Post Apr. 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The centenary of the death of Goethe, observed at the Symphony Concert some weeks ago by a performance of Wagner's "Faust" Overture and the "Faust Symphony" by Liszt, was recommemorated at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon at the final concert of the Tuesday series, but now Beethoven's Overture to the poet's play of "Egmont" replaced the "Faust" Overture of Wagner.

It is not too much to say that Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of the "Faust Symphony," in which the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Robison, tenor, added their eloquence, to that of the orchestra, is one of the outstanding achievements, not only of the present season or even of Dr. Koussevitzky's term as conductor, but of a quarter-century of Symphony Concerts. It is not easy to recall any other single piece in which the conductor, whoever he may have been, was more closely identified with the spirit of the composer and the inward nature of the composition, or a performance in which the band, in present or past estate, came more nearly to a full realization of all the possibilities and potentialities of orchestral performance whether from the interpretative or the technical side.

Thus to have restored and revived the work which is Liszt's masterpiece, and which is itself a sufficient and complete justification of the romantic movement and of the programmatic approach to musical composition, was to do service to a composer for whom the new generation of concert-goers might otherwise have felt no deep respect. Listening to the "Faust Symphony" it is easy to forget or to forgive Liszt's many offences against the canons of musical taste, his frequent bombast, sentimentality and empty rhetoric. The composer of the Gretchen movement of the "Faust Symphony" was poet in tone who need yield place to none, and there are few such exalted pages in the whole range of music as the final Andante mistico, in the performance of which yesterday college choir and solo tenor view with the orchestra itself in their voicings of the composer's raptures.

As on the two previous occasions the applause which yesterday greeted this performance was both worthy and merited tribute.

183

Apr 20 MUSIC Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music inspired by Goethe filled th program of the last Tuesday afternoo Symphony concert of the season yes terday. Dr Koussevitzky repeate Liszt's great "Faust" symphony which he revived here a month ago prefacing it with Beethoven's "Eg mont" overture.

Conflicting opinions about music i general—and this "Faust" symphon in particular—will fill the air as lon as music lasts, and many sensitive discerning souls doubtless never wil come to agreement. This seems likel because personal taste, a most im portant element in musical preference is subject neither to logic nor to th fact of a composition being skillfull or poorly constructed, sterile or preg nant in matter.

It does seem, however, that bu few, weighing the merits and short comings of Liszt's work—its crafts manship, its saliency of matter, it composer's avowed purpose in writin it, and his sincerity expressed in it—could hesitate to pronounce the sym phony a masterpiece of its type.

Certainly it accomplishes its pur pose in suggesting in tone the dispar ate spiritual elements of Goethe' poem. The restlessness, the menta upheaval of the "Faust" section, th gentle loveliness and inferred caln and purity of the "Gretchen" move ment, and the malice and the torturin mockery of the part called "Mephisto pheles" are made plain for all to see, if they will. But they must first be receptive.

As a work of art, the final two movements are, to one listener, by far the greater. The "Faust" section is bombastic, several of its themes are fatuous and empty. Only the so-called "Inquiry" theme awakens appreciation of sheer melodic beauty, and an emotional response to its poignancy.

This movement—like the others—is repetitious. Unlike the other two, it is wearisome. Liszt never knew when to stop; he never seemed to realize that something twice said is not necessarily made twice important in the mind of the listener.

For unalloyed beauty of melody and harmony, for sincerity, for freedom from all that is cheap and banal, the "Gretchen" movement can hold its own with any music. It is a truly sublime conception. Likewise, the "Mephistopheles" section is beyond reproach. This appeals chiefly by its intricacy, its sorcery of thematic manipulation, its peculiar force and brilliance. If ever an idea of Mephistopheles was fully expressed in music, it is here.

Many deprecate the choral ending of the "Faust" symphony, and not without reason, for it is undistinguished. The idea was all right and would have "come off" had Liszt been content to let his choir softly and briefly intone a benediction over all that had passed.

Dr Koussevitzky's performance was a marvel of euphony and technical resource. It had a definiteness of outline and an inner fire surpassing his interpretation of a month ago.

TRANS. APR 21

Two symphonies will fill the program at the final Symphony Concerts—for the season—on Friday and Saturday of next week: Beethoven's little and smiling Eighth, unheard through five years; Brahms's First, prime and familiar favorite for such occasions with both conductor and audiences.

Mindful of recent debate over cuts in the performance of Bruckner's symphonies, Dr. Koussevitzky, for once in a way, will play the Eighth, at the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday, from first note to last. Not even in the first movement or the finale will there be a single elision.

A Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, recently composed by Professor Hill as a jeu d'esprit in compliment to Mr. Sanromá, will be heard for the first time anywhere at the supplementary Symphony Concert next Monday. Mr. Sanromá, of course, will take the piano-part.

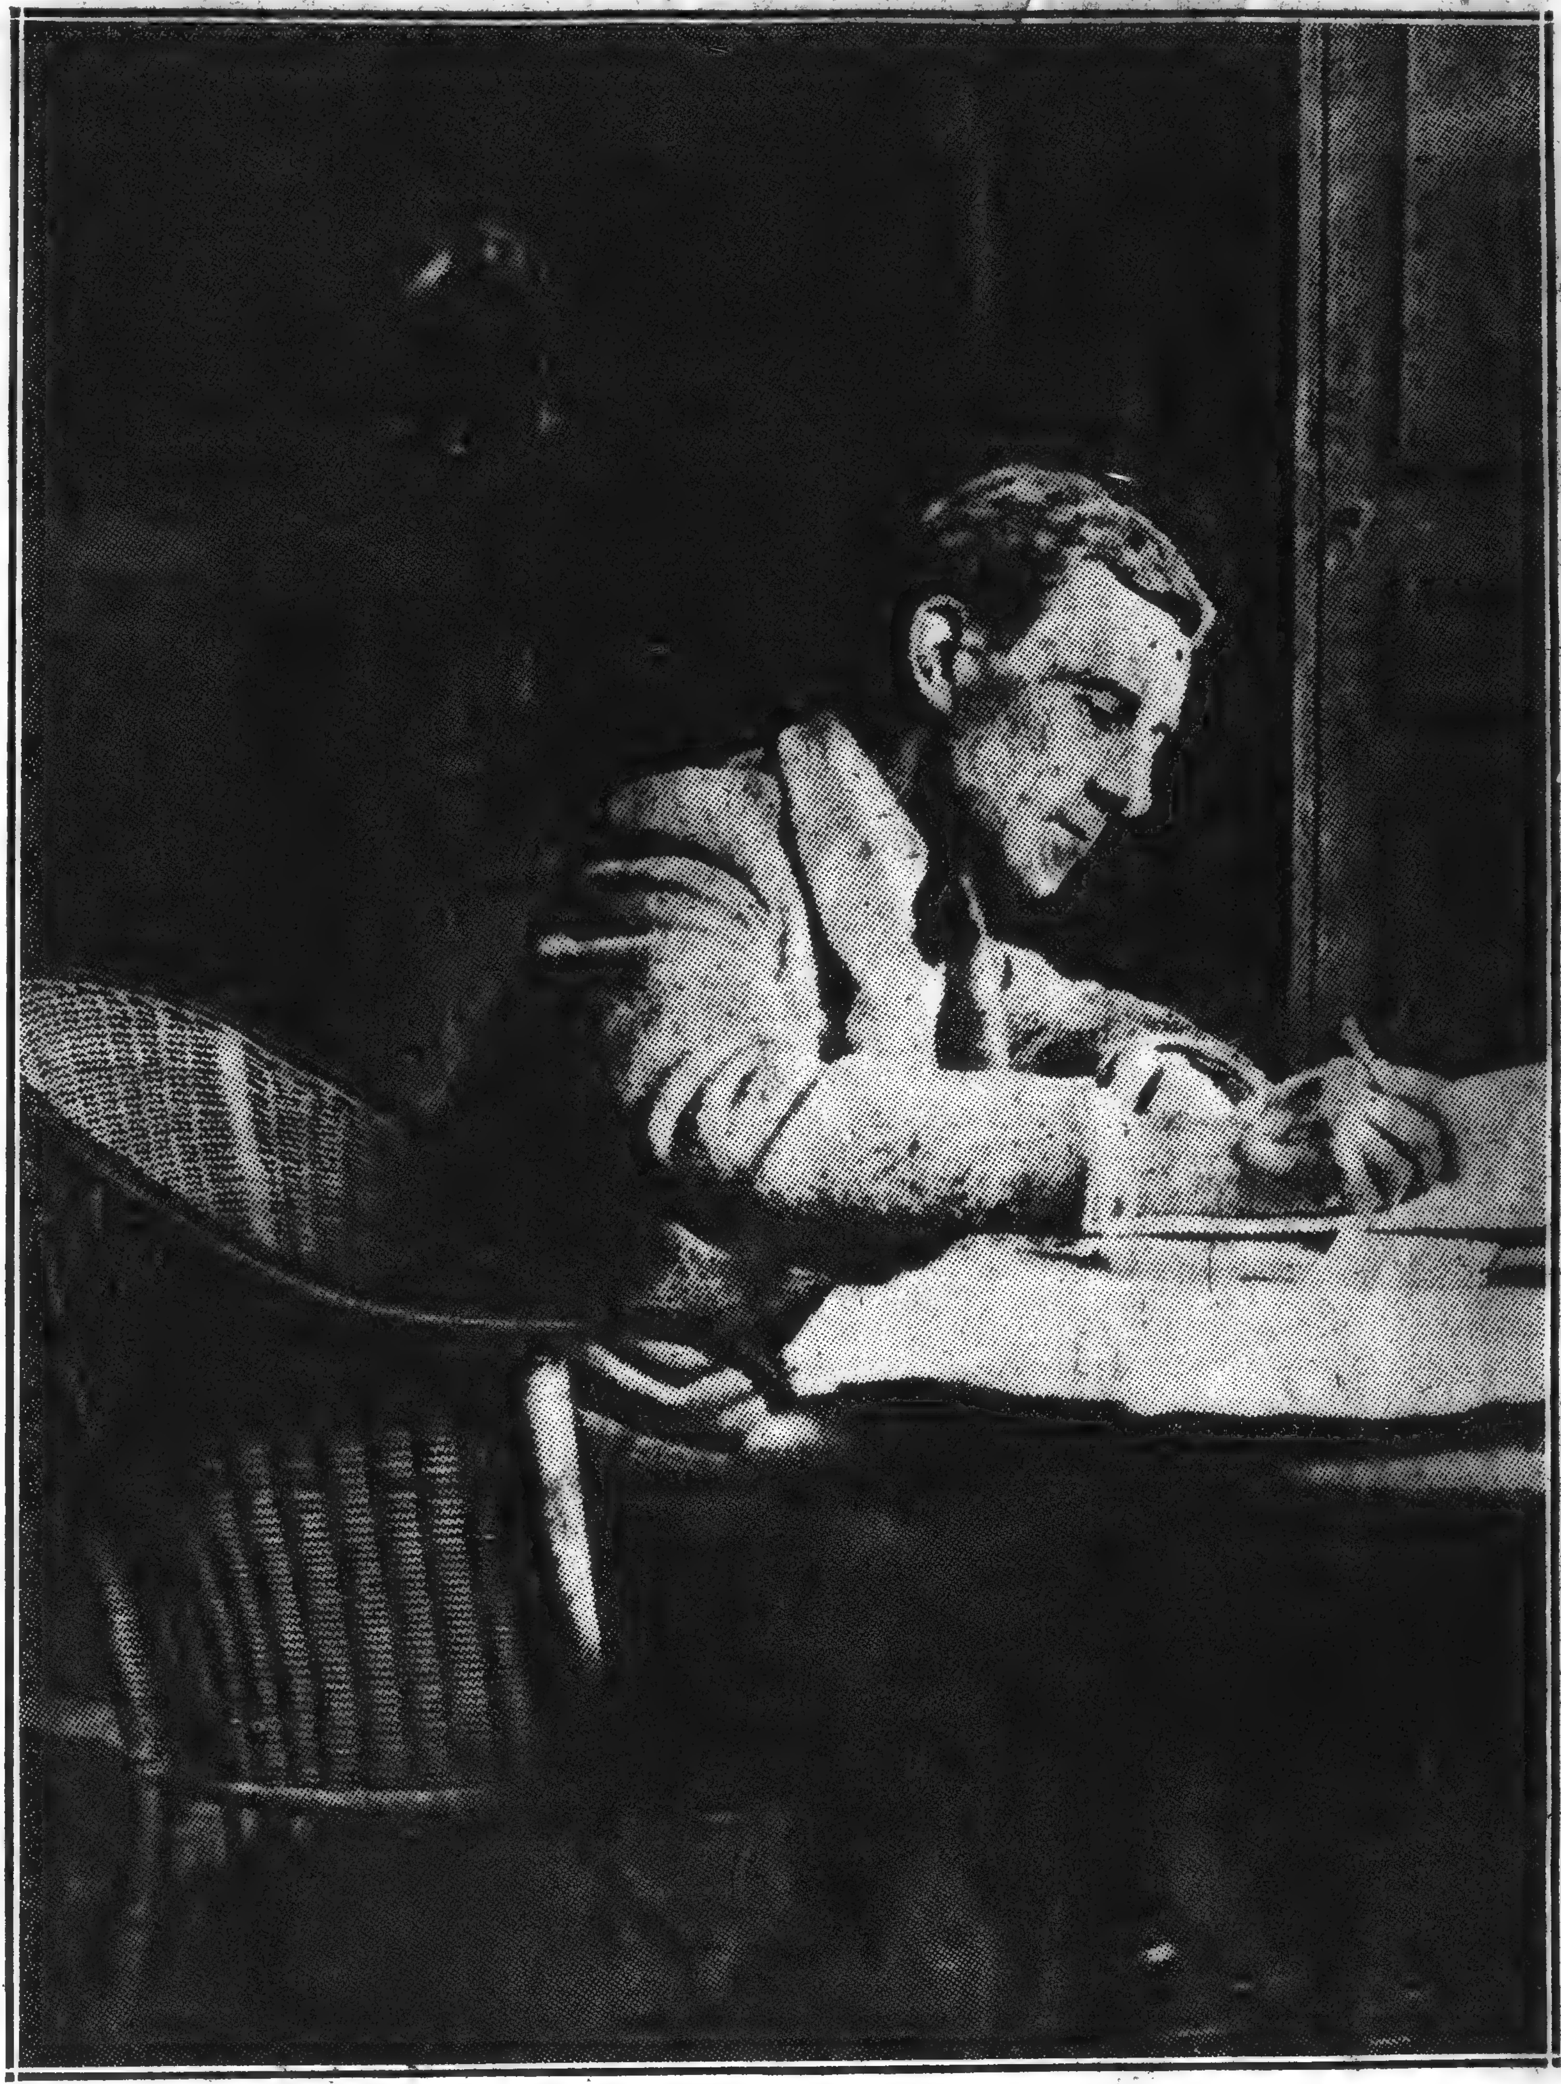
New Concerto From Ravel at Symphony Hall.

TRANS — APR. 21 —

Music for Glad Anticipation, Florent Schmitt's Account, Another Novel Piece

Apr 21

Quiet, Ease—and Work



Ravel in His Country House

From a Photograph Taken at Montfort l'Amaury, Village Within Striking Distance of Paris, Where He Does Most of His Composing. There, Through Two Years, the Piano-Concerto, Played Tomorrow and Saturday at Symphony Hall, Was Written

AT LAST, Ravel's new piano-concerto comes to Boston. London and Paris have already heard it. In American Boston and Philadelphia will share the honors of first performance; for in these two cities it will be played simultaneously tomorrow afternoon. In Boston Mr. Sanromá will be the pianist; in Philadelphia, Mr. Levin; of the Curtis Institute. The score is dedicated to Marguerite Long, the pianist who produced it in Paris on Jan. 14 last at an "all-Ravel" concert. Ravel himself conducted in the concerto. The score calls for an exceedingly modest orchestra; one piccolo, one flute, one oboe, one English horn, one E-flat clarinet, one B-flat clarinet, two bassoons, two horns, one trumpet, one trombone, a pair of kettle-drums, percussion enough to keep two players busy, harp, strings.

After the initial performance in Paris, Monsieur Florent Schmitt, the composer, wrote a review in Le Temps which will be largely quoted below. Monsieur Schmitt begins by citing "that mythical Concerto about which one had heard for so many years that one no longer believed it ever would be finished." He continues: "Let us say at once that it is a likeable and charming work, a hundred miles ahead of all Boleros, past, present and future; a work worthy of the composer of 'Daphnis,' 'Scarbo,' the 'Valses nobles,' a work which contains real music, a music that is authentically 'return to Ravel.' "

Beginning

The new Concerto runs in the conventional three movements. It is frequently bi-tonal. At the very beginning the solo-pianist plays broken chords, G major, with his right hand, and what is probably D-sharp minor with his left. But Monsieur Schmitt tells it more amusingly: "The Allegramente begins with the Arlelesque sonority of a music-box. Under colorful arpeggios (since it is the mode, white notes or the right hand, black for the left) on a sort of G major chord with its complementary appogiaturas, a gay fife launches its attractive, war-like rhythm—in the manner of a heroic march for tommies—which, proceeding from tonic to dominant, descends insensibly from the heights. The piano continues with its arpeggios and glissandos. The trumpet re-exposes the theme 'à la manière forte,' with solemnity establishing its character as a 'good fellow', and ending this time on the dominant (wait while I reflect) of the third degree, or, in the language of the schools, 'relative minor of the dominant.' But I assure you, it is less barbarous to hear than to tell.

"On this F-sharp pedal, the piano announces a major-minor theme of a 'nostalgie délicieuse', the page which I prefer out of all the fifty-seven." Probably many a harmonist would analyze this passage as F-sharp major in the accompaniment and D major in the melody; while the formalist would surely label it second theme. But to return to Monsieur Schmitt: "It is interrupted by the E-flat clarinet and piccolo, entwined in garlands from the piano. To the memory it is an evocation of times long past, and happy—of 'le Jardin fèerique,' of 'Chloë,' of 'Alborada del grazioso' . . ." The melody becomes expansive.

"There is a short rhythmic development for the piano." Almost entirely it consists of rhythmic figuration for that instrument, with the slenderest support from the orchestra. When the recapitulation comes, it does so, according to Schmitt, "with all its corollaries and drastic transpositions." Indeed the repetitions and transpositions of themes will have to be sought carefully; for they are mostly disguised in new rhythms and by new accentuations. They are introduced by a curious cadenza which consists of a sort of running passage for the piano, beginning in the depths and leading up to the heights. The recapitulation itself enters with the main theme fortissimo in the piano. Monsieur Schmitt writes of another set of cadenza-like passages which occur during the melodic phrases, as the "pleasant and unexpected diversion of the harp" (in glissandos) and the "exquisite acrobatics of the bassoon and its accomplices"—flute, piccolo, clarinet, oboe. These decorations lead into the cadenza for piano, which is in the main a much embroidered version of portions of the melodic second theme. After which there is more rhythmic figuration and a brisk statement of the main theme.

Middle and End

"The 'Adagio assai,' which follows, is a simple 'lied' in two periods containing simultaneously the lyricism of a Fauré and an ostinato impetuously Bacchic. A much extended melody, haunted too consciously by the Lisztian Marguerite . . . is first heard from the piano." Other reviewers, among them Henry Prunières, find these opening measures of the second movement "not without analogy to certain of the arias of Bach, whose melodic flow seems to reach out into the infinite." Still another is reminded "of Ravel's well-known taste for early and mid-Victorian gimcracks and of Chabrier's 'Valses bourgeoises.' " The present analyst has his opinion, but prefers discreet silence to the presumption of attempting to set the learned doctors right. But the excellent Schmitt has already suffered too long interruption, and the second movement will soon seem to be two pieces rather than one. On with more Schmidt: "Then the quartet enters, furtively, at a moment when one would least expect it, supporting a flute of strange charm, an oboe of emaciated saintliness. . . . After a short intermezzo, the first phrase is repeated by the English horn over a tapestry of strings, while the soloist generously weaves a tissue of fragile and seraphic sextolets. . . .

"The Presto returns to the luminous atmosphere of the first movement. It is the morrow of the daybreak in 'Daphnis,' splendid as that was." Monsieur Schmitt speaks of syncopated pizzicati, of "une clarinette matinale" as flute of Pan. But Monsieur Prunières writes in the New York Times: "The orchestra marks a syncopated rhythm while the piano, with arpeggios and rapid scales, leads the movement. Over the rhythm the orchestra plays a melody which reminds one of a jazz blues. The spirit of jazz animates this last movement. . . ., but with great discretion. Nothing could be more divorced from the spirit of the pasticcio. Nothing could be more French, more Ravel-like, than this sensational finale, in spite of the discreet allusions to jazz. One feels that the composer has long since absorbed and digested what could be of use to him in this exotic form. What he retains is now an integral part of his personality." Actually there are no less than four themes, or perhaps better, four groups of material, which follow each other in breathless succession; which are then the basis of kaleidoscopic development and modified restatement. It is probabily because of this quick succession of so large a number of themes that Monsieur Prunieres hastens to assure us that the whole does not sound like a "pasticcio." One may conclude the account of the concerto with the unrestrained words of a writer in The Chesterian who characterizes this last movement as "the most modern of jazzy finales with xylophones, Chinese woodblock and trombone-glissandi, a most surprising piece of work."

Modern and Ancient

At these concerts and also in first performance Martelli's Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 31, will be heard. The composer may be remembered as the Paris-trained young Corsican whose "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" were played at Symphony Hall two years ago. His present concerto runs in four movements: "Alerte, Vite, Modéré sans lenteur, Animé. The orchestra is the usual large orchestra of the present day. The score bears date "June to September, 1931."

Brass alone begins the first movement. The trumpet delivers a bold theme contraputally developed. It soon becomes apparent why the work has been called a concerto; for a bassoon and an oboe enter "concertante"—in the old phraseology. A new theme is theirs, which they pursue in contrapuntal imitation. This is answered by a tutti with the music of the beginning. Next a bass clarinet is added to the "concertino," with new musical material, not rigorously imitative. The conclusion is another tutti similar to that of the beginning, but interrupted here and there by short "concertante" phrases.

In the second movement, "Vite, 6-8" strings begin with a trill-like accompaniment figure which in itself swells to considerable proportions before the theme is heard. When it enters, it is carried by the 'cellos. Piccolo and bassoon at once imitate it. It is a curious, exceedingly active figure, with wide leaps. For first contrast, a clarinet sings a lyric phrase; other woodwinds join in, brass is added at the point of climax. The music of the beginning is then resumed. For the second contrast woodwinds have a lyrical imitative passage and are joined by a solo passage for 'cellos. After which the music of the beginning is once more heard, largely and expansively. A neat, crisp, vital, swiftly moving music.

The third movement, "moderate but not too slow," is scored for woodwinds, brass, two desks of 'cellos, double basses. It moves in 7-4 meter. In spite of its meter it is an almost march-like music in which the small 'cello group occasionally has solo-parts. . . .

The last movement, "Animé," is enchained with the third. It is a well developed, full-voiced fugue. Basses and 'cellos first announce the subject. The episodes occasionally recall previous movements; oftener develop matter taken from the subject itself. There is again a small "concertino" group, consisting this time of a single desk of violas and a solo-bassoon. The theme appears to be derived from the fugal subject. Eventually a small chamber-group of strings accompanies it. After which full strings are heard in a stretto on the fugal subject. Then there are more entries of the theme in woodwinds, leading to a strong climax. The whole is a brilliant piece of work, full of spirit, impressing the reader as exceedingly well made. Increasingly this youngest generation is learning its job.

A. H. M.

Apr 23 MUSIC Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music inspired by Goethe filled the program of the last Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert of the season yesterday. Dr Koussevitzky repeated Liszt's great "Faust" symphony, which he revived here a month ago, prefacing it with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Conflicting opinions about music in general—and this "Faust" symphony in particular—will fill the air as long as music lasts, and many sensitive, discerning souls doubtless never will come to agreement. This seems likely because personal taste, a most important element in musical preference, is subject neither to logic nor to the fact of a composition being skillfully or poorly constructed, sterile or pregnant in matter.

It does seem, however, that but few, weighing the merits and shortcomings of Liszt's work—its craftsmanship, its saliency of matter, its composer's avowed purpose in writing it, and his sincerity expressed in it—could hesitate to pronounce the symphony a masterpiece of its type.

Certainly it accomplishes its purpose in suggesting in tone the disparate spiritual elements of Goethe's poem. The restlessness, the mental upheaval of the "Faust" section, the gentle loveliness and inferred calm and purity of the "Gretchen" movement, and the malice and the torturing mockery of the part called "Mephistopheles" are made plain for all to see, if they will. But they must first be receptive.

As a work of art, the final two movements are, to one listener, by far the greater. The "Faust" section is bombastic, several of its themes are fatuous and empty. Only the so-called "Inquiry" theme awakens appreciation of sheer melodic beauty, and an emotional response to its poignancy.

This movement—like the others—is repetitious. Unlike the other two, it is wearisome. Liszt never knew when to stop; he never seemed to realize that something twice said is not necessarily made twice important in the mind of the listener.

For unalloyed beauty of melody and harmony, for sincerity, for freedom from all that is cheap and banal, the "Gretchen" movement can hold its own with any music. It is a truly sublime conception. Likewise, the "Mephistopheles" section is beyond reproach. This appeals chiefly by its intricacy, its sorcery of thematic manipulation, its peculiar force and brilliance. If ever an idea of Mephistopheles was fully expressed in music, it is here.

Many deprecate the choral ending of the "Faust" symphony, and not without reason, for it is undistinguished. The idea was all right and would have "come off" had Liszt been content to let his choir softly and briefly intone a benediction over all that had passed.

Dr Koussevitzky's performance was a marvel of euphony and technical resource. It had a definiteness of outline and an inner fire surpassing his interpretation of a month ago.

TRANS. APR 21

Two symphonies will fill the program at the final Symphony Concerts—for the season—on Friday and Saturday of next week: Beethoven's little and smiling Eighth, unheard through five years; Brahms's First, prime and familiar favorite for such occasions with both conductor and audiences.

Mindful of recent debate over cuts in the performance of Bruckner's symphonies, Dr. Koussevitzky, for once in a way, will play the Eighth, at the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday, from first note to last. Not even in the first movement or the finale will there be a single elision.

A Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, recently composed by Professor Hill as a jeu d'esprit in compliment to Mr. Sanromá, will be heard for the first time anywhere at the supplementary Symphony Concert next Monday. Mr. Sanromá, of course, will take the piano-part.

---

arter

Shine and Among

ege seniors ng students
S. J., dean honor list two of the
est. attain-
George W.
aptain of
V. Finne-
r on the Harry scholar, nes was f $50 on l excelner Mcverage ts, but ow the course.
rge A.
lahan,
Back
Mat-
Philip
oston;
.; R. rless,
Dor-
rleshill;
k T. vard
Nu-
Dor-
Bos-

its

the ent five stue's eld pon men
a n, he y
.;
M. d e;

---

at Hall.

R. 21-

icipation,
Account,
Piece

ew piano-concerto ton. London and ready heard it. In oston and Philadelhonors of first per-two cities it will be ly tomorrow after-
Sanromá will be the phia, Mr. Levin; of the
The score is dedicated ng, the pianist who pro-on Jan. 14 last at an "allavel himself conducted in score calls for an exceedhestra; one piccolo, one one English horn, one ne B-flat clarinet, two bas-ns, one trumpet, one trom-of kettle-drums, percussion ep two players busy, harp, nitial performance in Paris,

rent Schmitt, the composer, w in Le Temps which will be d below. Monsieur Schmitt iting "that mythical Concerto ch one had heard for so many one no longer believed it ever nished." He continues: "Let once that it is a likeable and work, a hundred miles ahead ros, past, present and future;
worthy of the composer of 'Scarbo,' the 'Valses nobles,' ch contains real music, a music entically 'return to Ravel.'"

Concerto runs in the convene movements. It is frequently
At the very beginning the solo-ays broken chords, G major, right hand, and what is prob-arp minor with his left. But Schmitt tells it more amusingly:
legramente begins with the e sonority of a music-box. Un-ful arpeggios (since it is the hite notes or the right hand, the left) on a sort of G major ith its complementary appogia-gay fife launches its attractive, rhythm—in the manner of a march for tommies—which, pro-from tonic to dominant, descends bly from the heights. The piano ues with its arpeggios and glissan-
The trumpet re-exposes the theme manière forte,' with solemnity es-ing its character as a 'good fellow', ending this time on the dominant while I reflect) of the third degree, in the language of the schools, 'relative minor of the dominant.' But I assure you, it is less barbarous to hear than to tell.

"On this F-sharp pedal, the piano announces a major-minor theme of a 'nostalgie délicieuse', the page which I prefer out of all the fifty-seven." Probably many a harmonist would analyze this passage as F-sharp major in the accompaniment and D major in the melody; while the formalist would surely label it second theme. But to return to Monsieur Schmitt: "It is interrupted by the E-flat clarinet and piccolo, entwined in garlands from the piano. To the memory it is an evocation of times long past, and happy—of 'le Jardin fèerique,' of 'Chloë,' of 'Alborada del grazioso' . . ." The melody becomes expansive.

"There is a short rhythmic development for the piano." Almost entirely it consists of rhythmic figuration for that instrument, with the slenderest support from the orchestra. When the recapitulation comes, it does so, according to Schmitt, "with all its corollaries and drastic transpositions." Indeed the repetitions and transpositions of themes will have to be sought carefully; for they are mostly disguised in new rhythms and by new accentuations. They are introduced by a curious cadenza which consists of a sort of running passage for the piano, beginning in the depths and leading up to the heights. The recapitulation itself enters with the main theme fortissimo in the piano. Monsieur Schmitt writes of another set of cadenza-like passages which occur during the melodic phrases, as the "pleasant and unexpected diversion of the harp" (in glissandos) and the "exquisite acrobatics of the bassoon and its accomplices"—flute, piccolo, clarinet, oboe. These decorations lead into the cadenza for piano, which is in the main a much embroidered version of portions of the melodic second theme. After which there is more rhythmic figuration and a brisk statement of the main theme.

Middle and End

"The 'Adagio assai,' which follows, is a simple 'lied' in two periods containing simultaneously the lyricism of a Fauré and an ostinato impetuously Bacchic. A much extended melody, haunted too consciously by the Lisztian Marguerite . . . is first heard from the piano." Other reviewers, among them Henry Prunières, find these opening measures of the second movement "not without analogy to certain of the arias of Bach, whose melodic flow seems to reach out into the infinite." Still another is reminded "of Ravel's well-known taste for early and mid-Victorian gimcracks and of Chabrier's 'Valses bourgeoises.'" The present analyst has his opinion, but prefers discreet silence to the presumption of attempting to set the learned doctors right. But the excellent Schmitt has already suffered too long interruption, and the second movement will soon seem to be two pieces rather than one. On with more Schmidt: "Then the quartet enters, furtively, at a moment when one would least expect it, supporting a flute of strange charm, an oboe of emaciated saintliness. . . . After a short intermezzo, the first phrase is repeated by the English horn over a tapestry of strings, while the soloist generously weaves a tissue of fragile and seraphic sextolets. . . .

"The Presto returns to the luminous atmosphere of the first movement. It is the morrow of the daybreak in 'Daphnis,' splendid as that was." Monsieur Schmitt speaks of syncopated pizzicati, of "une clarinette matinale" as flute of Pan. But Monsieur Prunières writes in the New York Times: "The orchestra marks a syncopated rhythm while the piano, with arpeggios and rapid scales, leads the movement. Over the rhythm the orchestra plays a melody which reminds one of a jazz blues. The spirit of jazz animates this last movement. . . ., but with great discretion. Nothing could be more divorced from the spirit of the pasticcio. Nothing could be more French, more Ravel-like, than this sensational finale, in spite of the discreet allusions to jazz. One feels that the composer has long since absorbed and digested what could be of use to him in this exotic form. What he retains is now an integral part of his personality." Actually there are no less than four themes, or perhaps better, four groups of material, which follow each other in breathless succession; which are then the basis of kaleidoscopic development and modified restatement. It is probably because of this quick succession of so large a number of themes that Monsieur Prunieres hastens to assure us that the whole does not sound like a "pasticcio." One may conclude the account of the concerto with the unrestrained words of a writer in The Chesterian who characterizes this last movement as "the most modern of jazzy finales with xylophones, Chinese woodblock and trombone-glissandi, a most surprising piece of work."

Modern and Ancient

At these concerts and also in first performance Martelli's Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 31, will be heard. The composer may be remembered as the Paris-trained young Corsican whose "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" were played at Symphony Hall two years ago. His present concerto runs in four movements: "Alerte, Vite, Modéré sans lenteur, Animé. The orchestra is the usual large orchestra of the present day. The score bears date "June to September, 1931."

Brass alone begins the first movement. The trumpet delivers a bold theme contrapuntally developed. It soon becomes apparent why the work has been called a concerto; for a bassoon and an oboe enter "concertante"—in the old phraseology. A new theme is theirs, which they pursue in contrapuntal imitation. This is answered by a tutti with the music of the beginning. Next a bass clarinet is added to the "concertino," with new musical material, not rigorously imitative. The conclusion is another tutti similar to that of the beginning, but interrupted here and there by short "concertante" phrases.

In the second movement, "Vite, 6-8" strings begin with a trill-like accompaniment figure which in itself swells to considerable proportions before the theme is heard. When it enters, it is carried by the 'cellos. Piccolo and bassoon at once imitate it. It is a curious, exceedingly active figure, with wide leaps. For first contrast, a clarinet sings a lyric phrase; other woodwinds join in, brass is added at the point of climax. The music of the beginning is then resumed. For the second contrast woodwinds have a lyrical imitative passage and are joined by a solo passage for 'cellos. After which the music of the beginning is once more heard, largely and expansively. A neat, crisp, vital, swiftly moving music.

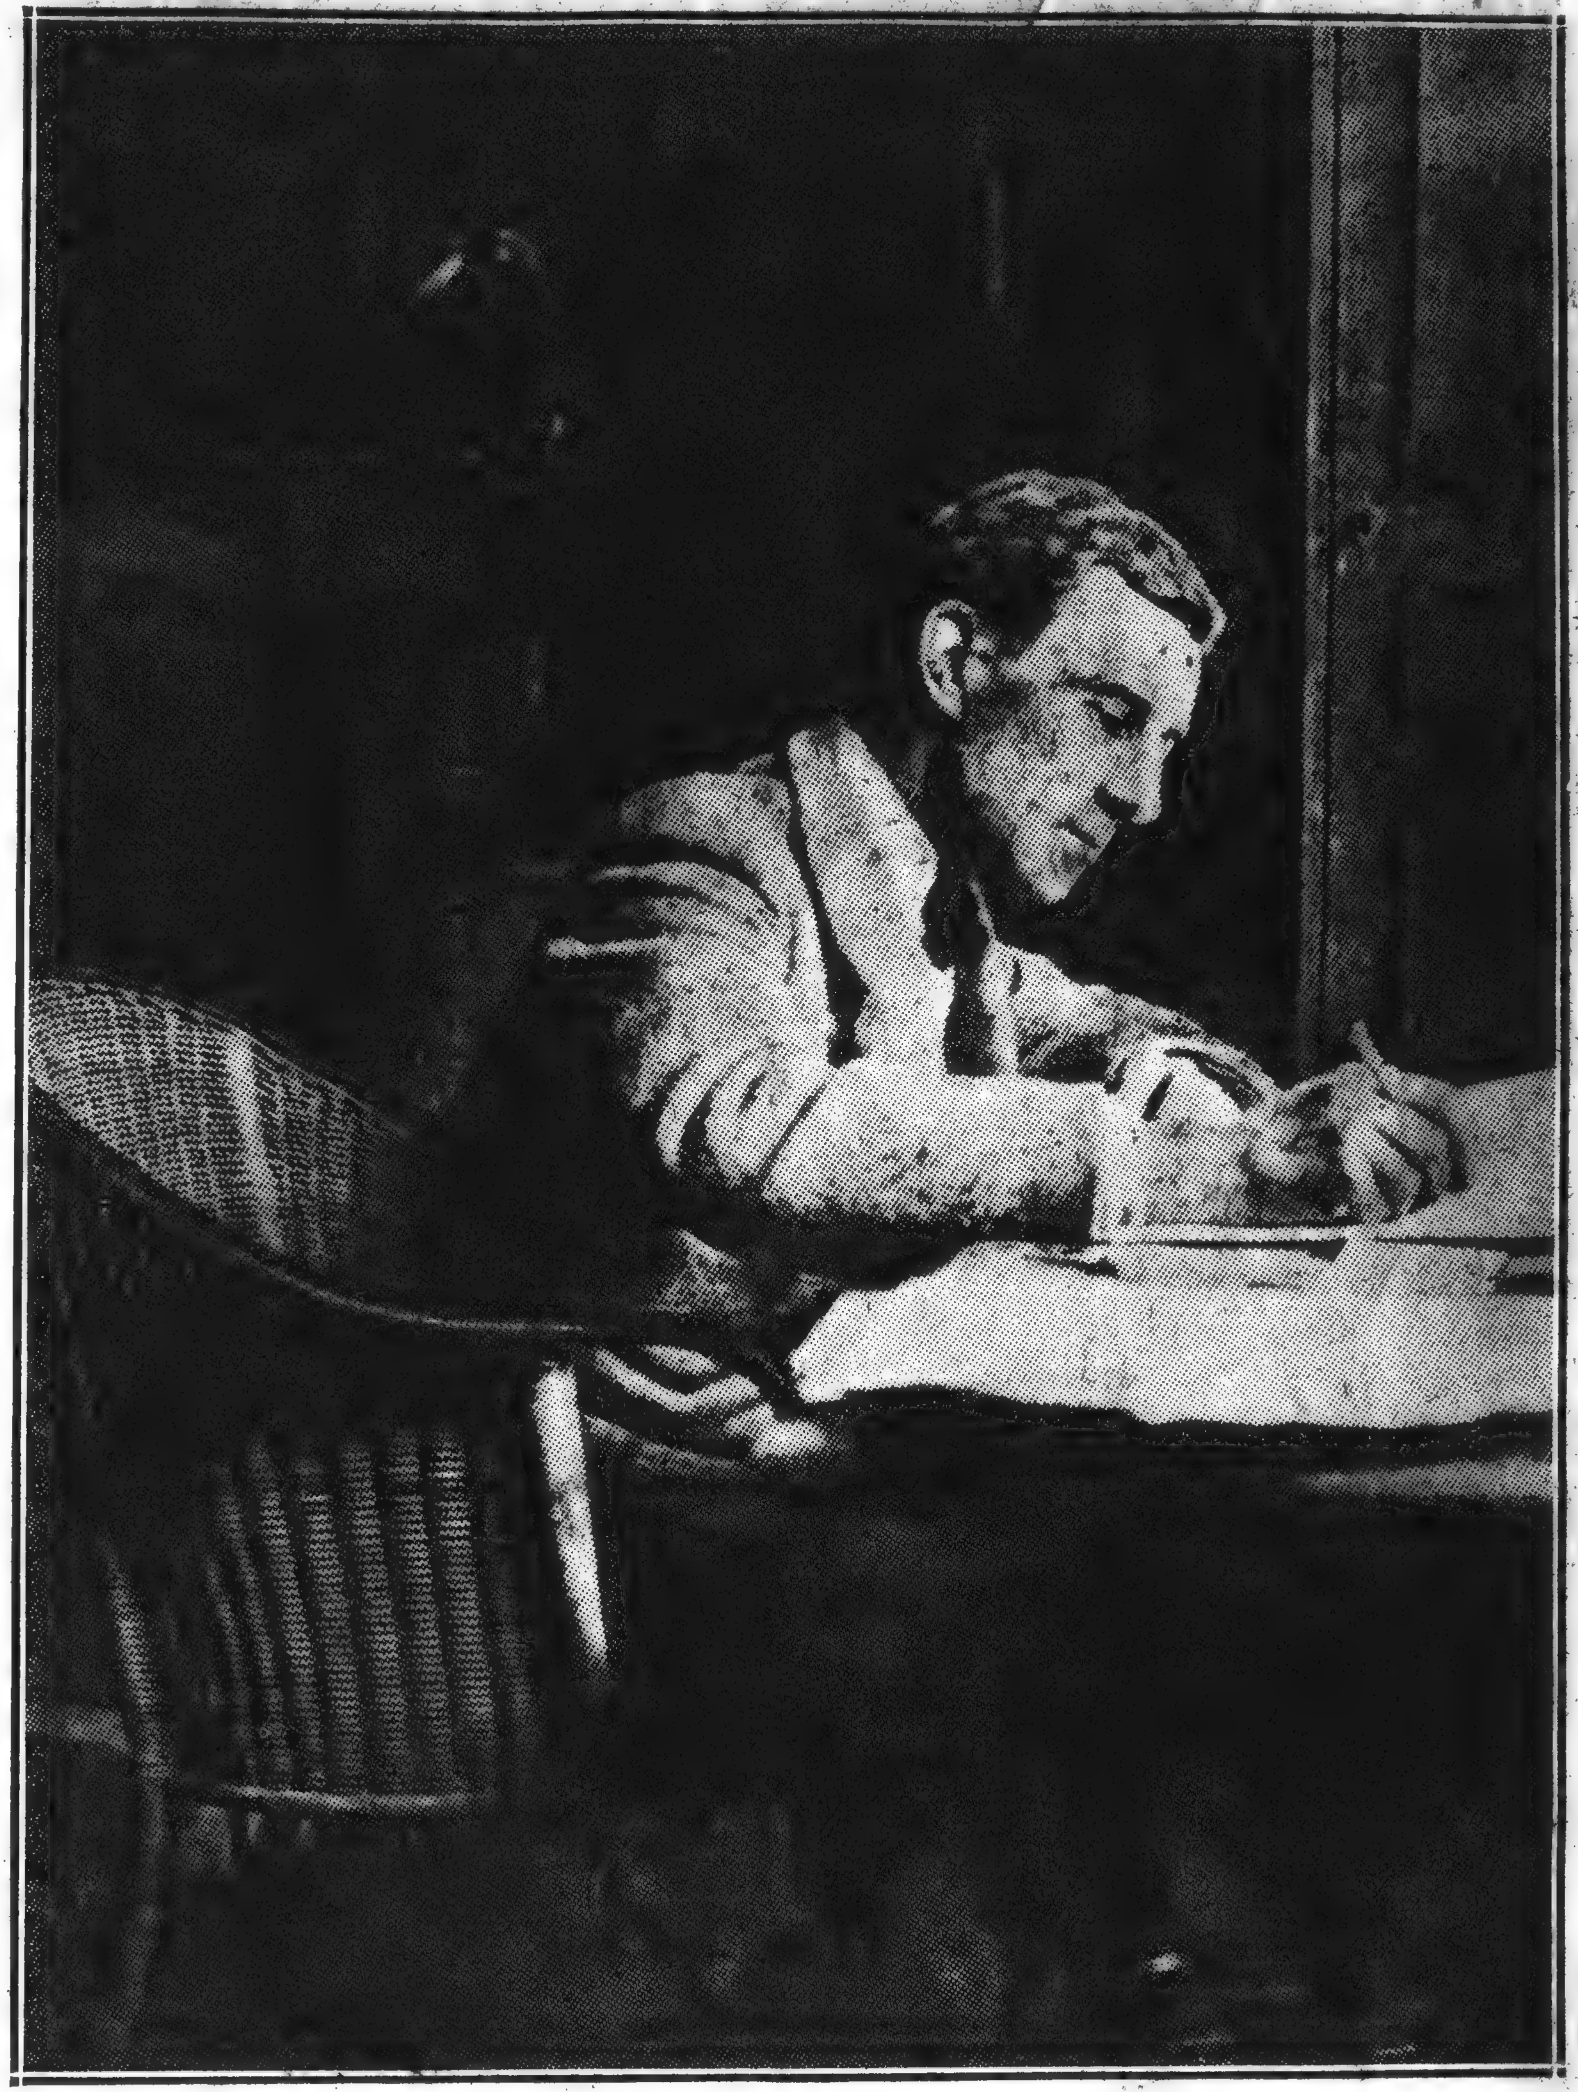
The third movement, "moderate but not too slow," is scored for woodwinds, brass, two desks of 'cellos, double basses. It moves in 7-4 meter. In spite of its meter it is an almost march-like music in which the small 'cello group occasionally has solo-parts. . . .

The last movement, "Animé," is enchained with the third. It is a well developed, full-voiced fugue. Basses and 'cellos first announce the subject. The episodes occasionally recall previous movements; oftener develop matter taken from the subject itself. There is again a small "concertino" group, consisting this time of a single desk of violas and a solo-bassoon. The theme appears to be derived from the fugal subject. Eventually a small chamber-group of strings accompanies it. After which full strings are heard in a stretto on the fugal subject. Then there are more entries of the theme in woodwinds, leading to a strong climax. The whole is a brilliant piece of work, full of spirit, impressing the reader as exceedingly well made. Increasingly this youngest generation is learning its job.

A. H. M.

Apr 21

Quiet, Ease—and Work



Ravel in His Country House

From a Photograph Taken at Montfort l' Amaury, Village Within Striking Distance of Paris, Where He Does Most of His Composing. There, Through Two Years, the Piano-Concerto, Played Tomorrow and Saturday at Symphony Hall, Was Written

Concert Of Symphonic Opposites

Trans Apr 23

A New Concerto from Ravel, Bruckner "In Entirety," Spring Afternoon

FIRST to write just praises of Mr. Sanromá in complement to the applause heaped on him, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, before and after he had played the piano-part in Ravel's new Concerto. No orchestra in the United States, perhaps none in Europe, has at command and in residence so able and willing a pianist. Mr. Sanromá can be soloist of the day, as he was on Friday, as he has been within memory in Stravinsky's "Caprice" or Toch's Concerto. He can assist with equal zest in symphonic pieces in which the piano is used obbligato, as in de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" and Lambert's "The Rio Grande." Or he can play as one more virtuoso in an orchestra of virtuosi when the piano is only an added instrument. No composer, however exacting his modernisms, has yet exhausted Mr. Sanromá's readiness and resource. Whatever the task a given piece has set for him, he has brought to it a keen musical and pianistic mind, a sympathetic spirit. a lively will to accomplish accordingly. Be it large or small, he has never slighted preparation of performed carelessly.

Mr. Sanromá has excelled conspicuously in music of our immediate day inviting his clear, bright, penetrating tone, his range of rhythmic energy, his sense of plastic phrase and counterpoint, his command of scintillant bravura, his alertness to the percussive piano. He can be as dry, hard, incisive as the most objective and dogmatic modernist; keep pace with the composer's caprice, feel his driving impetus. Yet seldom has he fallen short when his piano must pretend to be singing instrument or join with the orchestra in polished, subtilized euphonies. The Symphony Orchestra, the present conductor, have no more loyal and tireless coadjutor. Mr. Sanromá shares ably and with good will in the chamber concerts of the town. None is readier to aid in the introduction of novel, questionable, perilous music. Boston schooled him; gave him opportunity; has, so far, kept him—exception to the rule that it no longer breeds notable musicians; or, if it does, that they take flight to New York. Once more, yesterday, the public of the Symphony Concerts testified, with new reason, to its pride and pleasure in Sanromá.

Re-Enter Martelli

The first two numbers on Dr. Koussevitzky's program were of a sort to which many in the elder generation find it hard to accustom themselves—unless some illustrious name, like Ravel's, beguiles them along a more or less unwilling course. Long habit, ingrained predilection, the background of a nineteenth century that associated music with morals and philosophies, doctrines, preachments, and many another unrelated matter, that bade it be uplifting, ennobling, consoling and all that, make them mistrustful of music written and existing "merely" to entertain. (Yet Bach himself, and the Italians before him, were writing it two and three centuries ago). The romantic and the German tradition, too much assimilated discourse about "appreciation" and "spirituality," keep them equally wary of music that is its own excuse, however slight, for being.

Modernisms aside, hence the indifference or the distaste with which such listeners hear such a piece as Martelli's Concerto for Orchestra with which the concert began. It returns to an ancient form; adapts it elastically to present uses; fills it ingeniously with exercises in the current fashions of keys, dissonance, counterpoint, harmonies, timbres; prefers a full-voiced fugue (as in Martelli's finale) or a clean-cut canon to lyric or introspective dalliance; runs alert and cerebral crisp and vital, with next to never a hint of sentiment — bravura here, wit or impertinence there. In these qualities we listeners are to find our interest and take our pleasure. Martelli's Concerto, piece and performance, yielded both plentifully and engagingly. But the unaccustomed and therefore mistrustful, "cut it cold." Outside Stravinsky and, may be, Hindemith, whom the matinée audience has at last accepted, it prefers—for the present —not to go.

Ravel Renewed

But when Ravel, become at the end of his fifties almost a modern classic, conjures; when Mr. Sanromá takes his place at the piano; when Dr. Koussevitzky is plainly in happy vein over a new "première," how willingly and responsively that same audience goes along. Yet the new Piano-Concerto discloses not a connotation or an implication outside itself; has its being in its own virtuosity; exists primarily and persistently to interest and entertain. In the kind, within the self-imposed limitations, what a perfect piece of composition it is! In the designing, writing and adjusting of the piano-part, it is as though Ravel had re-assembled acquired experience, practised instinct, ripened invention and adroit resource from the days of the early "Miroirs" and "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," through "Le Tombeau de Couperin" to the more recent chamber-pieces—re-assembled, re-animated and refined. Not a note is spared or wasted. Everything falls into just place. Nothing fails of its purpose.

To the virtuoso, modernist, and sympathetic pianist, as indeed Mr. Sanromá's performance suggested, the piano-part must be pleasure to play, exactions included. Born of a light and fecund theme, it is alert, elastic, eager, radiant, at the beginning. Sentiment touches it with grace before the first movement ends in a sparkling foam of ornament. The slow movement, through the longer half virtually a piano-solo over a subdued and gently sustaining bass, is a simple, transparent, long-curved, undulating melody outspringing from the end of middle age, wistful, remembering, soft-spoken. A still, clear, autumn light unhardened plays over it. Gradually, the English horn summarizes, the orchestra severally and collectively joins in the song; the piano spins a lace-work of musing embroidery. Through the racing, outflinging, bedeviled finale, the piano runs a gamut of rhythmic agilities, kaleidoscopic ornament, thrusts and counter-thrusts with the orchestra; so to a fanfare-ish close. Hardly once does invention or exhilaration flag.

The orchestral part is companion-piece to the piano-part in economy and precision, in lightness, brightness and winged motion. Through the first division, it is usually vivacious and ornamental. Through the slow movement it is often softened into delicate and adroit euphonies, into a tender echoing of the melody while the piano twines it with fantasy. Through the finale hints of jazz recur, now in syncopated rhythms, again in momentary stunts, like the glissandi for trombones, in a "blues" quality that haunts the underlying melody. But all that is jazz assimilated, Ravelized, minding its Parisian P's and Q's. Writing for orchestra, Ravel maintains throughout his quick and life-long sensibility to individual timbres, his imagination with patterned sonorities, his ability to suffuse the pattern with light, so vitalize it. In such an orchestral part Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were as virtuosi excelling themselves for a composer and a music that stimulated such prowess. Once more, the conductor was, par excellence, the conductor for Ravel. With reason the composer originally intended the Concerto for initial production in Boston.

Uncut Bruckner

These experiences, interesting as they were, filled less than half the concert. One hour and a quarter of it fell to the performance of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony (in C minor) note for note from beginning unto the distant end. Asked to restore a cut in the slow movement where the composer's imagination rises high, clear, ecstatic, Dr. Koussevitzky took the Brucknerites at their word; "closed" every cut—allegro, scherzo and finale—from Mr. Fiedler's and Dr. Muck's day to his own. These restorations lengthened the performance by fifteen minutes; but it is doubtful whether a quarter hour less would have held those who cannot "abide Bruckner," either for matter or manner. On the other hand, the avowed Brucknerites were gratified at this unusual consideration for "the master" in one of his longest symphonies; while the major part of the listeners who held firm to the end and who asked only that Bruckner engross and stir them, seemed content. True, there were numerous departures; but once upon a time in Vienna only ten heard to the last note one of his earlier symphonies. True again, he is repetitious; but to reiterate was an impulse of his temperament and remains a part of his quality.

For those who are still studious of Bruckner, who would hear him without prejudice, who find pleasure from him increasing at each new occasion, this full performance of the Eighth Symphony brought better understanding and new sympathy. The finale fared least fortunately. There Bruckner would ascend to sonorous solemnities; sustain and intensify them. To him they connoted the churchly ceremonies that he had known at the great and rich abbey of St. Florian, the stately ecclesiastic pageants in which he had shared, under "his "Cardinal," in the cathedral at the neighboring Linz. When he would transfuse such solemnities into symphonic music, he seems to be haunted by the organ that he played in them as well as by his Baireuth-like trumpets, trombones and tubas. He fails to free himself from churchly accent and suggestion; so attain to the heighth and breadth of universal vision. Perhaps, for that reason, this finale of the Eighth Symphony seemed persistently striving, mannered, impotent. Though Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra urged him manfully, only in the upswelling and long held sonorities toward the end—the four themes of the Symphony upon one another piled—did Bruckner draw near his goal.

Profit and Loss

On the other hand, the Scherzo gained by completeness. Though full performance disclosed only the more clearly Bruckner's inability or indifference with varied or contrasted rhythms, it also evoked and sustained an atmosphere.

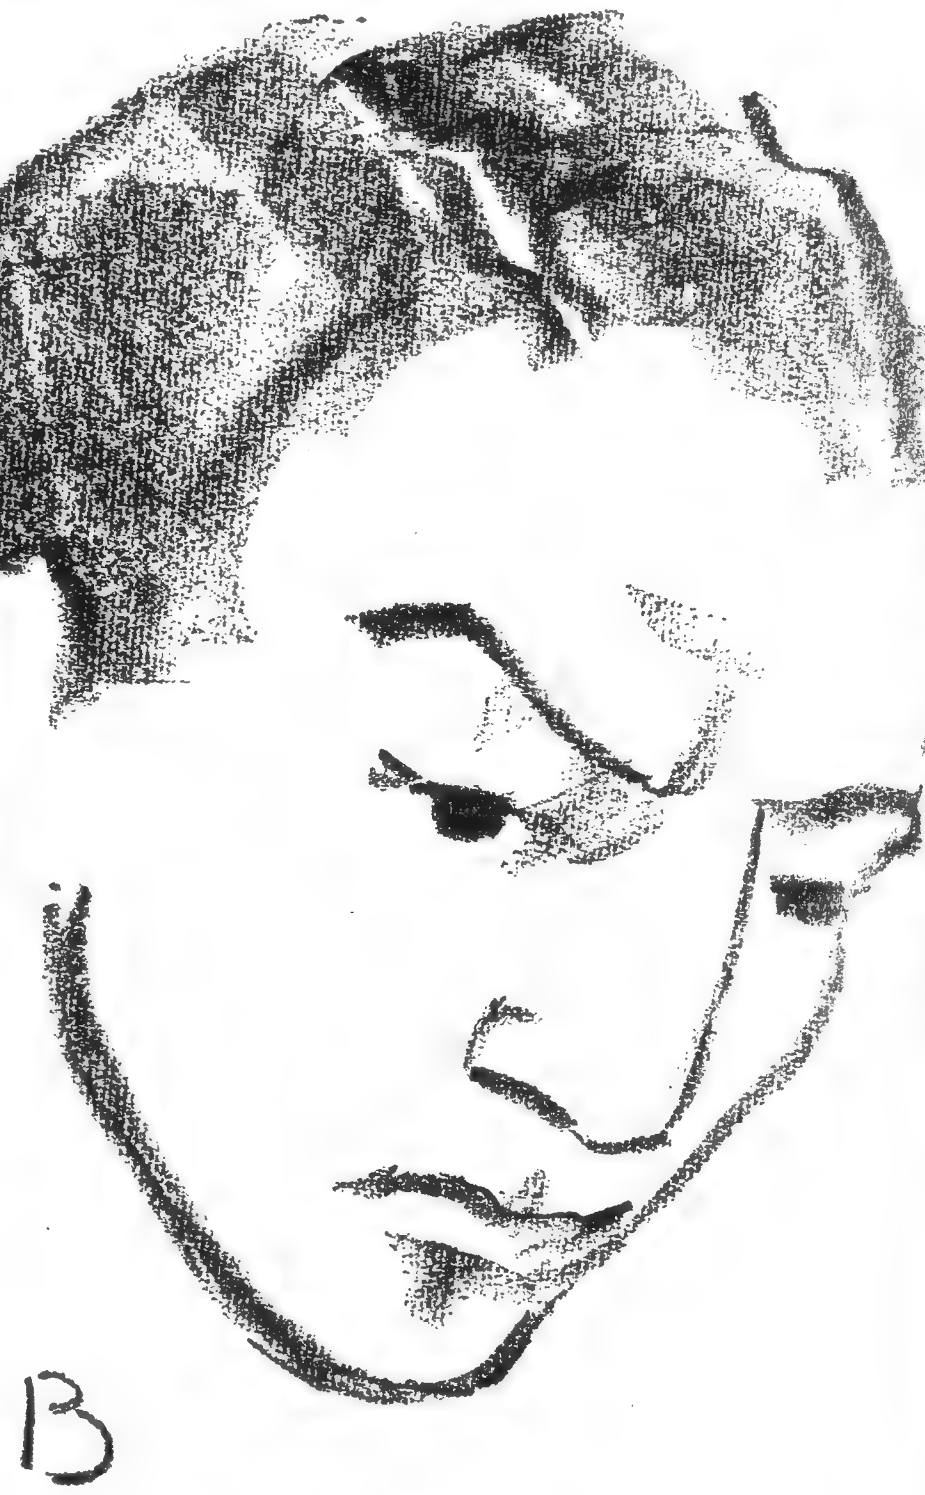
Doubtless by subconscious impulse this Scherzo sounds from the upper Austria where Bruckner was born and lived long —a smiling, sun-brightened, undulating, persistently rustic countryside, where trees line the roads, where at the end of a vista a great abbey may break the horizon, where the folk are a peasantry simple-minded, good-hearted, tranquil, pious, on occasion gay. The quiet melody of this Scherzo in the Eighth Symphony sings for them. The rhythm beats to their steps. Though he finally dwelt and worked in Vienna, Bruckner wrote scherzi of the countryside that he remembered. In urban America it is hard for us to feel this atmosphere. Dr. Koussevitzky, as romantic at heart as Bruckner with such recollection, divined and spun it.

The first movement gained likewise by complete performance. There if the hearer looks and listens for them, he may descry most of the shortcomings repeated to weariness against Bruckner: prolixity and platitudes; sequences and inversions until they become mannerisms; grandiose vesture for shrunken matter; musical paragraphs innocent of transition; indifference to choice; disdain of self-discipline; so forth through a list dressed already a hundred times. On the other hand out of this music "in entirety" rise more than one of his distinctions—the fervor with which he wrote to kindle an equal fervor in performers and listeners; the faith he kept in his own forms and procedures, his upswelling ascents and leaping descents, his rests and resumptions; the simplicity of his musical ideas as from a mind and spirit unsuspectingly naive; the complexities in which he arrayed them as though that same mind and spirit had absorbed the baroque luxuriance of the church at St. Florian's; in sonorities, the richness of his woodwinds and horns, the heroical voice of his plangent brass, the glowing depths of his strings; above all the intensifying of his music, reiteration upon reiteration, until it rises to vision, ecstasy and illumination. It is Dr. Koussevitzky's sense of this tonal texture and intensive process, these fervors, exaltations and momentary sublimities that make him, above most conductors, discerning, and eloquent with Bruckner.

In the slow movement of the Eighth Symphony this aspiration ascends to attainment. Through page upon page the long adagio coils and uncoils, ultimately and ever mounting heavenward. Four themes engender it into hymn-like instrumental song; reiteration enforces it; deeper and deeper sonorities enrich it, or a more shimmering texture gilds it as with an halo. Presently the heavens open and Bruckner—the mysticism of the Roman church pulsing within him—beholds and sounds the joys of Paradise. A thousand times at St. Florian's or in Linz Cathedral he has played the Sanctus upon his organ. Now the host of the redeemed are singing it apocalyptically. Of a sudden the hymn stays ,and stills. And God said: "Let there be peace." And there was peace. . . . It is by his deepest fervors, his spellbound visions, his celestial felicities, and the music he made of them, that Bruckner should be judged—to stand unique, thus far, among the diviners who have written black notes upon white paper ruled in staves.

H. T. P.

Keen—Mind, Spirit, Hand



J. M. Sanroma

Pianist Yesterday and Today in Ravel's New Concerto at Symphony Hall

Tr Apr 23

RDAY, APRIL 23,

BRUCKNER'S EIGHTH BY SYMPHONY

Ravel's Concerto With Sanroma at Piano Pleases

Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In response to the urgings of certain ardent Brucknerites who, with some right on their side, asked for all or nothing, Dr. Koussevitzky presented at yesterday's Symphony Concert an uncut version of the Austrian master's Eighth Symphony—and that on top of new pieces by Martelli and Ravel. A considerable exodus before the Finale of the Symphony was the not unnatural result.

THREE SUPERB MOVEMENTS

There is enough music, whether regarded vertically or horizontally, in Bruckner's Eighth, a symphony vast both in scope and in content, to fill a concert. An overture or other short piece might serve as curtain-raiser and an intermission divide the symphony itself. But those who are indifferent to Bruckner's music, which is hardly the speech of our nervous and epigrammatic day, might then feel themselves cheated; so possibly Dr. Koussevitzky pursued, after all, the wisest course.

Those who chose to hear but three movements of the symphony yesterday, at least, heard the best of it. Is there any finale of any symphony that would not come as anti-climax after that solemn and sublime Adagio, to which Dr. Koussevitzky, yesterday, restored measures unjustly excised in the performance of three years ago?

Ravel's Concerto

Those who like music terse to the point of abruptness could at least have found that quality to commend in the generally insignificant Concerto for orchestra by the Corsican-born Martelli, which proved a sharp disappointment to certain admirers of his imaginative Assyrian Bas reliefs of two seasons ago. And surely each and every member of yesterday's audience must have found something to his or her liking in the Pianoforte Concerto of Ravel, so brilliantly played by Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra.

Beyond question this new concerto, which was designed for performance at last year's jubilee season, is entertaining, often charming, and at times expressive music. Here and there it skirts close to triviality. The future historian, surveying Ravel's work as a whole, will probably rank it among his less consequential efforts. But if the Ravel of today seeks to do no more than entertain, he achieves this result with a distinction and an address, a verve and a finesse, denied to any other composer who is similarly minded.

Martelli Fails to Please

The applause yesterday testified to one audienece's instant pleasure in this music, as well as to its endorsement of the performance. The faithful who remained to the end in like manner recognized the masterly and exalted setting forth of the symphony, one of the more notable achievements of conductor and orchestra. But Mr. Martelli's piece brought hardly a handclap.

Seldom, indeed, has a new composition been so slightingly received.

To suit the times, general admission to The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will be cut, this spring, from fifty to twenty-five cents—that is, to the price in prewar days.

Trans Apr 23

Herald Apr 23

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Martelli, concerto for orchestra; Ravel, concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Sanroma, pianist); Bruckner, symphony No. 8, C minor.

Martelli's concerto was performed for the first time; Ravel's concerto for the first time in Boston. The former was known here by his suite "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," brought out at a symphony concert in March, 1930. As he is a Corsican by birth, one might hope for a certain wildness, a ferocity in his music, but he was undoubtedly tamed in spirit by the orthodox teachers at the Paris conservatory, and softened by the Parisian atmosphere. The music for his "Bas-Reliefs" was not as barbaric as each subject. His concerto is wilder, yet in a scholastic manner, for he indulges himself gaily in contrapuntal exercises and is not afraid of the canon form. The opening (for brass instruments), is effective, as are the measures that follow. In fact, the whole development is interesting, while here and in the movements that followed there are many evidences of sound workmanship which serves original thought. One misses a decidedly contrasting slow movement. There is little or nothing of a sensuously emotional quality, and, after all, this quality, though the sensuousness be only latent, is greatly to be desired. In this concerto, it is not found even in the blended timbres of the instruments. One might say that the instrumentation is—Corsican?

Ravel's first movement is delightful in its spirit and in the orchestration. The themes, exposed, now have a Spanish flavor—the haunting melancholy of gypsy airs; and now as if the Demon of jazz was eager to pervert them or to give voice to his own ideas in his own way. The orchestration, now super-refined, and now approximating the treatment of an American "Blues," is fascinating, the piano part is chiefly one of embroidery. But in the slow movement, the piano gives out a long cantilena—the Parisian critics say "after the manner of Bach"—a cantilena which has a monotonous charm in spite of its inherently dry spirit; not a spontaneous song; it is said that Ravel worked continuously for two years on this concerto; it is possible that this cantilena took a year and a half for its invention. The third movement is disappointing in every way. There is an utter absence of musical ideas. Is it possible that Ravel's invention is "running emptins"? And nothing in this finale atones for the paucity of ideas. The orchestra and Mr. Sanroma gave a brilliant performance but they could not transmute pinch-beck glitter into solid gold.

The ways of Bruckner are long and tedious. He has so much to say, and so much of it is vain babbling, intolerable repetition of idle chatter. The closing measures of the adagio would be beautiful in their serenity if the beauty were not frittered away by his unwillingness to stop. And so the magnificent outburst just before these closing measures loses majesty, because there are so many outburts preceding it, that the tired listener says to himself, "Why, here's another climax. Please God, may it be the last!" Here and there in the symphony are evidences of Bruckner's worship of Wagner; not similar phrases in full, but hints at phrases, beginnings by Wagner, endings by Bruckner.

As for the other movements, a few noble musical thoughts, a few impressive pages—but not continuous—are in a desert of commonplaces, or trivialities. The man himself is more interesting than his music; yet a nature compounded of childlike simplicity and peasant cunning is not one from which one may reasonably expect great works.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week, the last of the 51st season, comprises Beethoven's eighth symphony and the lrst symphony of Johannes Brahms.

LOEW'S ORPHEUM

Neil Golden and his orchestra are stellar attractions on the vaudeville bill on the stage at Loew's Orpheum. They have a spirited offering of novel band arrangements and musical novelties. Hill and Hoffman in a comedy singing and dancing skit are another highlight of the bill. Included among other acts are Angus and Searle in their familiar Pullman comedy sketch; Verna Harworth and company in a miniature musical comedy presentation, and Donia and White in a singing and dancing comedy skit. "Night Court," the picture on the screen, featuring Walter Huston, Phillips Holmes, Anita Page and Lewis Stone, is a dramatic, sordid tale of corrupt courts and crooked judges.

Boston Symphony

Monitor Apr 23

For the 23d subscription program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season (April 22-23), Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had selected Martelli's Concerto for Orchestra, op. 31, Ravel's Piano Concerto and Bruckner's Eighth Symphony. Mr. J. M. Sanromá was the soloist.

M. Henri Martelli had been known to us through his Suite, "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," heard two years ago at Symphony Hall. This Concerto for Orchestra was played for the first time in the United States at the concert under review. We shall be surprised if it achieves a second American performance, for its only interest is that which attaches to permutations and combinations. It is an exercise untransmuted by the creative fire.

M. Ravel's Piano Concerto, on the other hand, though slight, is full of wit and charm, and very French in its restrained animation and its controlled sentiment. The jazz which is employed in the last movement is of a most refined nature, a sort of distilled essence of syncopated blues. And the tenderness of the slow movement is really classic. Mr. Sanromá played the solo part with conspicuous virtuosity and élan, and he was supported with fine elasticity by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. Mr. L. Speyer came in for a special bow in tribute to his charming playing of the English horn part.

There could hardly have been greater contrast for the second part of the program than the Bruckner symphony, heavy with the Teutonic virtues. It was said that Dr. Koussevitzky, in response to requests, would play the symphony without cuts. As its performance occupied an hour and a quarter, we assume he did so. This was no doubt a courteous concession on the part of the conductor, but it was no kindness to Bruckner, the garrulous.

L. A. S.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Apr 23

Temporal Arithmetic

TO BEGIN with the idle splitting of an hair. This afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Sanromá in Boston, Mr. Levin in Philadelphia, are playing for the first times in America Ravel's new Piano-Concerto. In Symphony Hall and in the Academy of Music it is second item on the program. The Bostonian conductor's first piece is a Concerto for Orchestra by Martelli, relatively brief; the Philadelphian conductor's Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, appreciably longer. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanromá will sound the first measures of Ravel's Concerto ten or fifteen minutes before Messrs. Stokowski and Levin do likewise. They will sound the last while the Philadelphians are still dallying with the middle periods. Therefore in Boston Ravel's Concerto will be heard for the first time in America, Q. E. D. Which is also "right and proper," since the piece was once intended for the jubilee year, 1930-31, at Symphony Hall. In short, the Boston Orchestra has lost a composer's dedication but won—by a nose—a première!

Ourselves and Others

For the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow Dr. Koussevitzky sets this program:

Concerto for Orchestra, Op. 31 .... Martelli
Concerto in G major for Piano and Orchestra .... Ravel
(Pianist: Mr. Sanromá)
Symphony, No. 8, in C major .... Bruckner

Dr Koussevitzky, together with Willem Mengelberg, will be judges at an international vocal and violin contest to be held as a part of the annual Festival Fortnight in Vienna in June. Each will also conduct a special concert of the Vienna Philharmonic.

Globe Apr 24

Herald Apr 26

$3963 VERDICT AGAINST BOSTON SYMPHONY

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

LOWELL, April 21—A Middlesex superior court jury this afternoon returned a verdict of $3963 against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. The award was in favor of Mrs. James H. Shrigley of Lowell, who sued both the orchestra and the New Boston Music hall as a result of injuries she received in a fall in Symphony hall, Boston, June 10, 1930.

Judge Greenhalge ordered a directed verdict for the New Boston Music hall.

Fine Performance by Sanroma Features Symphony Concert

By MOSES SMITH

Amer Apr 23

The long-awaited Ravel piano concerto, which was commissioned and begun for the Jubilee rites of the Boston Symphony Orchestra two years ago, but which Ravel could not finish in time, was finally heard at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, under the baton of the indefatigable Serge Koussevitzky, and with Boston's brilliant young pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, as soloist.

It is the rule in such matters that as the artist's labor increases in the production of his work, the result shrinks in stature. Fortunately here we have an exception, for on the basis of a single hearing (which is always indecisive) the composition seems one of Ravel's masterpieces.

By masterpiece we do not mean the usual connotation of heaviness and seriousness. No, this Concerto is essentially light music—but so delightful, so charmingly sentimental, so Gallic in spirit as only Ravel at his best can be.

The Concerto has three movements, of which the middle one is slow in tempo and beautifully melodic, with just a dash of spice in the form of dissonance. In the other movements the piano is going almost continuously, sounding elaborate and brilliant passage-work and chords, mocking the orchestra, occasionally supplementing it. Now and again jazz rears up its head—but "rears" is scarcely the word for Ravel's ingenious irony.

The performance was an excellent one, as it seemed, especially the work of Mr. Sanroma, who was awarded an unusually long and enthusiastic round of applause at the close. The audience was pleased, also, with the Concerto itself—an unusual condition in the case of modern novelties.

Previously this same audience had heard uncomprehendingly another novelty—a Concerto for orchestra by Henri Martelli, which we found as meaningless a jargon as we have ever heard in the concert hall. While the second part of the program brought the masterly—and prodigiously long—eighth symphony of Bruckner, heard in able and often eloquent performance.

Concert-Chronicle

Second Hearings

Transcript Apr 25

REPORT, private or public, of a prospective hour and a quarter of Bruckner did not discoverably lessen the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday. Here and there subscribers left vacant chairs, but no more numerously than is the custom on spring evenings after the suburban migration has begun. As the Bostonian elect, fifty years ago, gradually accustomed themselves to Wagner and to Brahms, as within much nearer time, they have yielded inch by inch to Stravinsky, so now they must reconcile themselves to occasional Bruckner or Mahler at characteristic, insistent, but not unprofitable, lengths. For no two composers, up and down the world, have conductors fought more manfully. Now at last, in Europe and in America, this persistence is prevailing.

For there were fewer departures from Bruckner than on Friday; while the final applause, well after ten-thirty, was widerspread and heartier. Likewise, at the beginning of the season with the Ninth Symphony of Mahler. No one who listens to either composer can be deaf to his faults; but his compensating, interlocked and distinctive merits are conquering an assumed rather than an actual American distaste. In New York, Boston and Chicago, reviewers oftener than lay listeners have been the antagonists. Now, more accustomed, audiences are hearing for themselves.

As on Friday, the new Piano-Concerto of Ravel from Mr. Sanromá, Dr. Koussevitzky and their orchestra—a relatively small orchestra as the composer proportione it—carried all before it. Hearing the performance in Paris at which Miss Long played "like a piano-teacher" and Ravel left something to be desired as conductor, the all-wise Monsieur Prunières waited for "a Gieseking, a Horowitz and one of those incomparable American orchestras" to undertake the Concerto. "What a winged poem it would be under the baton of a Koussevitzky, a Stokowski!" How nearly Mr. Sanromá would have fulfilled these anticipations none may say. Certainly he outdid himself with the manifold first movement, the slow song of wistful, middle-aged musing, the fantasy and bravura of the finale. Certainly again, Dr. Koussevitzky seemed not a whit less content with the pianist than did the audience. As for those venerable sages in London and in Boston who reproach the Concerto with lack of serious matter, can it be that Ravel found such substance at odds with a lighter purpose; conceived and wrote accordingly? It is not Parisian to be a pedant or a prig.

H. T. P.

Fiedler Begins 47th "Pops" Season May 4

Arthur Fiedler will begin the 47th season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall, and the third under his conductorship, a week from Wednesday evening, May 4.

Programs of special interest are being prepared for the first Sunday evening concert, May 8, and other evenings of the first two weeks. Refreshments and smoking at the tables will of course be an integral feature of the "Pops." The orchestra will, as before, consist of 85 players. There will be seats available at the reduced price of 25 cents.

The initial program, which combines music known and loved at past "Pop" concerts, with modern works and classic compositions, is as follows:

"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Variations on the Austrian National Anthem, from the String Quartet, Op. 76, No. 3, Haydn; Excerpts from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner; "Virginia, a Southern Rhapsody," Haydn-Wood; "Facade," Walton; 'Overture Solennelle, 1812," Tchaikovsky; 'Band Wagon," Selection, Schwartz; "Perpetuum Mobile," Strauss; "Girls of Baden," Waltz, Komzak.

Globe Apr 26 32

LOWELL WOMAN WINS SUIT AGAINST BOSTON SYMPHONY

LOWELL, April 21—A jury in the Superior Civil Court this afternoon returned a verdict of $3960 for the plaintiff in the case of Mrs James Shrigley of this city against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

Directed verdict was ordered in favor of the New Boston Music Hall, codefendant in the case. Mrs Shrigley brought suit to recover damages for injuries suffered when she fell in Symphony Hall on the night of June 10, 1930, while she was attending the M. I. T. graduation exercises, her son, George, being a member of the class.

Stephen Appleby.

HILL'S WORK BY SYMPHONY

New Piano Concert With Sanroma as Soloist

Post Apr 26

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

New piano concertos come thick and fast at the Symphony Concerts these days. Last Friday and Saturday brought Ravel's long-awaited work in this form, with Mr. Sanroma as pianist, and last evening the final concert of the Monday series was the occasion of the first performance anywhere of Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for piano and orchestra, again with Mr. Sanroma, to whom the piece is dedicated, as soloist.

The task of preparing two new concertos for performance in such unprecedentedly rapid succession must have been a severe one, and it is not to be wondered at that Mr. Sanroma last evening had upon the rack of his piano the full score of the new Concertino, though its purpose was evidently merely that of an occasional reminder. For modern music, whether the composer be Ravel, Till, Toch, or whom you will, Mr. Sanroma has a decided flair; few if any pianists known to this city are his equal in that particular field. Last evening, as at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mr. Sanroma was most warmly received. No visiting virtuoso could have evoked more spontaneous and enthusiastic plaudits. And Mr. Hill, finally discovered in his place in the auditorium, was obliged to rise and bow, and then to make his way to the front of the hall, where he shook hands with Mr. Sanroma and with Dr. Koussevitzky. All in all an "occasion" of a sort not often granted the subscribers to the Monday series.

The new Concerto begins portentously with measures that vaguely suggest the corresponding portion of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. After this almost severe introduction the music assumes more genial contours; there are hints on jazz in the Allegro that follows and in the final section there are more decided references to an idiom in which Mr. Hill has always taken a lively interest. Between times comes a warmly lyrical slow division which is joined both to that which precedes and that which follows it. In other words the Concertino, like the Concerto of Liszt, passes in a single movement.

His Concertino for Its First Hearing

Mr. Hill's New Piece at the Last of the Monday Symphonies

Apr 26 Trans

THE various series of Symphony concerts are this year ending in the brightest possible blaze of glory. Last week the Tuesday concerts concluded on the high level of the Lisztian "Faust." Friday and Saturday the main series will culminate in Brahms's exalted "First." Last evening (as also at Cambridge on Thursday) Chaikovsky's thrilling "Fifth" occupied final place. One uses the overworked word "thrill" advisedly; for if this symphony in Dr. Koussevitzky's version of last evening did one thing above any other, it was to give the listener such a thrill as he will long remember. As is well known, the symphony (save in the waltz of the third movement) is almost continually on the heights. From the depths of the beginning it quickly ascends, and once it has established its eloquence, maintains it in one way or another, be it the heights of such an emotion as is indicated by the horn solo of the slow movement, or the excitements of the climaxes of the second and last movements. What Chaikovsky had written, whatever he had hoped it would achieve in expressing or stimulating mood or emotion, that the conductor got out of it to the nth degree. And an audience responded with tumultuous applause. Before it was over, after Dr. Koussevitzky had several times entered to bow, after he had the orchestra on its feet, the audience also rose and continued the expressions of approval, the season's farewells.

But the main interest of the evening by no means centered exclusively in Chaikovsky's symphony. At this eleventh hour the conductor was still presenting a première. The new piece was Professor Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 36. It is dedicated to Mr. Sanromá and was played by him last evening. It seems as if it were not only dedicated to him but written specifically for him. Indeed it glorifies the things in which he excels. Feats of brilliant, actively rhythmed technic here take on thematic value.

The Concertino is a short piece requiring relatively few minutes for performance. If, as is said, brevity is the soul of wit, then this piece is both very soulful and very witty. But it is the only way in which it is "soulful." For that essentially romantic quality it avoids as it avoids all the other trappings of the Romantic school. For this reason there will be those who find that the Concertino is not profound—or that it is not something else which it never intended to be. But for us of the twentieth century it is something better than profound. It is tremendously vital: it breathes the spirit of the day in which it arose; it is as bracing as a cold day in sunshiny spring. Further—which will be a point for many—it accomplishes its purposes with out forsaking the paths of tonal pleasantness.

The Concertino is cast into a single movement. Yet, according to the composer, "there are the usual three sections of a concerto." After the principal theme transitional measures lead to slower music which might be taken either as "second theme" or slow movement. The composer prefers to view it as "slow movement." Then a cadenza leads to a rondo as finale. This according to Mr. Hill's own analysis. The principal themes are all aggressive, full of the joy of living, themes that make one straighten one's back, sit squarely, in one's seat. The slow division relaxes the mood, brings measures almost wistful. The rondo opens with martial music from the orchestra, with martellato passages in the piano. Four times in slightly different guises this music is heard. Between are the episodes, sometimes again slightly wistful, sometimes incidentally making a bow to jazz, once gently suggesting a scherzo mood, once giving the piano particular prominence. At the end there are references to the music of the very beginning. The rhythm is often free and exuberantly tricky. The transitions are ramarkably smooth, making of the whole thing a single, long undulating curve, rather than a jointure of several parts. With this music Mr. Sanromá was in his element as it was intended he should be. And the orchestra joined him in the manner which both he and Mr. Hill deserved.

The concert began with Haydn's "Surprise" symphony. The performance was in every way subtly Haydnesque. But one was greatly amused that the "surprise" chord in this year 1932 still creates a definite ripple throughout the length and breadth of the audience in Symphony Hall. And one began wondering whether Haydn might not have been astonished by it himself had he heard it last evening. For he himself in all probability never heard it as loudly or as incisively as it can come from a modern group of players.

The season's concerts have brought no little variety. German and Germanic composers have been decidedly in the lead, seven composers, with eleven pieces. The French and the Russians have come next, with three each, both composers and works. Of Americans there have been two, Italians and Finns each one. There were three concertos, two groups of vocal solos. The division into historical classifications proved to be remarkably even—six for the classics; seven romantic; eight modern. A. H. M.

Memoranda

The return of Miss Myra Hess, the pianist, for an American tour next season is announced. In the course of it Boston should receive its customary two concerts instead of the one meagerly bestowed on it last

---

MUSIC

Herald Apr. 26

MONDAY EVENING SYMPHONY

The sixth and final concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Monday evening series, took place last evening before a large and responsive audience, which greeted Dr. Koussevitzky with enthusiastic ardor. The following program was performed: Haydn, Symphony in G major (Surprise), B. and H. No. 6; Hill, concertino for piano and orchestra, opus 36 (first performance); Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor, opus 64. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist.

Mr. Hill's new concertino pleased last night's audience mightily and earned a demonstration both for its composer, who was present, and for Mr. Sanroma, who played it with characteristic verve and brilliance. The concertino is in a single movement, but falls clearly into three sections corresponding to the three movements of the traditional concerto, of which it is, so to speak, a tabloid version. Both the vigorous figure of its main theme (which reappears in various guises throughout the concertino) and its peculiarly brittle brilliance suggest the 18th century Italian harpsichord style. The harmonic idiom, however, particularly in the elaborately decorative development section, is of far more recent vintage. Indeed, exception can be taken to the conflict between the early classic style of the first statement of the main theme by the orchestra in unison, the recondite elaboration and Gallic flavor of the harmonies which follow and the florid, almost Lisztian exuberance of much of the pianoforte part. But all this may be too solemn a reaction to a piece so gay in mood and so admirably concise in form. The well-written and interesting orchestral score was skilfully played.

Haydn's Surprise symphony, of which a marvelously neat and finished performance opened the concert, is none the less delightful for being heard in an age which is not easily surprised. But then its famous Paukenschlag, the loud drumbeat which once startled listeners to the naively soothing andante (and which even yesterday drew a ripple of laughter), is not its sole excuse for survival. The speed and clarity with which the last movement was played last night was a brilliant tour de force; yet a tempo slightly less extreme might have produced more graceful and sparkling an effect.

Hearing once again Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony, in a performance as richly compelling as one may well hope to hear, one could hardly fail to agree with Brahms that the last movement is by far the weakest. Nor can it be denied that, despite its ostensible freedom from a conscious program, and hence from the self-pitying pathos of the fourth and sixth, it is fraught with deep psychological significance. Dr. Koussevitzky drew from it all that it had to offer of beauty and expressive force. S. S.

APRIL 26, 1932

Music

Monitor

Final Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the final concert of the current Monday evening series in Symphony Hall last night. For novelty, Dr. Koussevitzky proffered in first performance Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 36. The concert opened with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and closed with Tchaikovsky's Fifth.

The concertino is dedicated to Mr. J. M. Sanromá, who was the soloist last night. The work, which is very short, is in one movement, which, however, follows roughly the three-movement concerto form. Evidently designed as a sort of playful compliment to Mr. Sanromá's crisp and brilliant technique, it differs widely in style from most of the composer's other works. It has none of the impressionistic charm of the symphonies and the "Lilacs," but speaks rather in the staccato voice of the modernists, though in form it is classical. Of the earlier compositions of Mr. Hill it is perhaps most closely related to the Scherzo for two pianos and orchestra, but it steers clear of the jazz idiom, which was not very successfully employed in that opus. The concertino was played with great virtuosity by soloist and orchestra and was received with exceptional enthusiasm.

The effulgent proclamation of the Tchaikovsky symphony closed a series of exceptional worth. Acclamations were heaped upon conductor and men. L. A. S.

To Cambridge For A New Concertino

Trans Apr 29

THE usual rites marked, last evening, the final concert, for the season, of the Boston Orchestra at Harvard College. That is to say, the customary full and distinguished house received Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra with more than common warmth before they began Haydn's "Surprise Symphony"; waxed yet warmer when it took leave of them after they had played Chaikovsky's Symphony in E minor. Between ran agreeable and applausive intermezzo. Professor Hill's new Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, produced at Symphony Hall last Monday, was now repeated in his own domain. Mr. Sanromá, dedicatee and destination of the piece, was again the pianist. The audience welcomed him eagerly; renewed its plaudits at the end; called the composer from seat to stage joined the conductor to the other two clapped all three to the echo. The University audience does these things with an ingratiating courtesy and a heart warming honesty.

Sanders Theater, next to Paine Hal the most resonant concert-room within Bostonian reach, favored Haydn and put the players of his Symphony to their mettle. Every note sounded clear and full Every shading and transition went unblurred. Once more the conductor and his diminished orchestra were sympathetic and dexterous masters of an eighteenth-century music that is oftener serious or felicitous than playful and obvious. As for the Chaikovskian intensities, within the wooden walls of Sanders they sound less from orchestra to audience than from man to man, say with Dr. Koussevitzky as full-voiced interpreter between. Both these symphonies have been active repertory pieces of late at Symphony Hall. There is no need t recur to them.

Rather, the new Concertino drew th casual reviewer to Sanders Theater. Two American composers, writing for piano and orchestra, have chosen the form Mr. Carpenter using it, twelve years and more ago, for intimate discourse unti both voices become as one in the rising warmth of the tonal conversation; now Mr. Hill, preferring it as means to a dis playful music of pattern and progress in scintillant musical sound. He exposes a principal theme that accepts the contemporary convention of the piano as primarily a percussive instrument. He unfolds it in upstanding and richly figure measures for the pianist against an orchestra setting in a subtilized or a vivid background, sonority for sonority, decorative always. He lingers briefly over a tabloidal slow division, as one who would keep the modern faith of a self-contained, objective music. Then whirls away, via a cadenza, into a Rondo-Finale that may catch Liszt's ear in the Elysian Fields and remind him that even his "transcendental" bravura can now be transcended. Rhythm indeed has gone a long way since the Weimar day. Meanwhile a bold figure that from the start has caught ear and fancy recurringly ties the whole together.

By these means and in this fashion Mr. Hill has written a virtuoso-piece that is neither dry, mechanical nor cold blooded; that he animates with spirited turns, or darts of tonal wit; that is expansive where Mr. Sanromá most excel and brief where he is less excellent Therefore the pianist played both col amore and con slancio, as old scores use to put it. As for the audience, Mr. Hi had not written twenty measures befor he was persuading it that to be scintillant and amusing gives reason to a Concertin that was a summer's jeu d'esprit.

H. T. P.

Orchestra in Blaze of Glory

Apr 26 By MOSES SMITH Amer

The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, closed its Monday evening series of concerts in a blaze of glory. The program was excellently arranged; the orchestral performance was uniformly excellent; and Jesus Maria Sanroma contributed his dazzling virtuosity at the piano.

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony began the concert. It was amusing to note that a large portion of the audience—in this year of 1932—was startled by the sudden orchestral outburst in the slow moment.

For further contrast there was a new concertino for piano and orchestra by Professor Hill of Harvard. Here is a short work in three connected sections, exposing lively and vigorous thematic material, or, in the case of the slow section, charmingly sentimental; a work in which this material is developed not too elaborately nor too self-consciously, with neat and effective transitions. Structurally the work seemed to offer not a flaw. There were some rude orchestral and pianistic dissonances and what might be called rhythmic dissonances. But the whole thing went off very enjoyably, especially with Mr. Sanroma performing with perfectly alarming bravura.

After Many Days Trans Apr

In the long courses of time all thing are said to come to those who wait. Perhaps Boston is present and convenient instance. Three years ago Weinberger's folk-opera, "Schwanda the Bagpiper," went up and down Central Europe. For concert-purposes orchestras immediately detached a Polka and Fugue. They are still indispensables in a German afternoon or evening of light music. Last autumn the Metropolitan Opera House rubbed its eyes, opened its ears, and discovered "Schwanda." Forthwith the Polka and Fugue began a tour of our concert-halls. It will end on Thursday evening of next week when they will be heard—at last—at The Pops. . . . Mr. Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, produced last February at the Symphony Concerts, also has place on the program. This time Mr. Sanromá will play the piano-part.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Apr 29

Overlooked Loeffler

TEN years ago, almost to a month, three "Irish Fantasies," composed by Mr. Loeffler, were produced at the Symphony Concerts. There were five in all—settings of verses from Irish folklore or poetry for tenor voice and orchestra. Mr. Monteux was the conductor; Mr. McCormack, the singer. Soon the Bostonians carried them to New York. Possibly there were performances in other cities. At the time these three Irish Fantasies made appreciable stir. They were set high among Mr. Loeffler's works. Mr. McCormack's singing added rich flavors. Admittedly they were difficult to produce. They also required collaboration. Consequently, no sooner were they known than they were put by and more than half forgotten.

Both Mr. Loeffler and Mr. McCormack are now older men. Fewer new works come from the composer. The singer begins to husband his powers. Soon it will be impossible to join them together in the original three, or all five, Irish Fantasies. Since music and performance have outlasted ten years in many memories, the time seems ripe for revival. Possibly Mr. Loeffler would hand the Fantasies to Dr. Koussevitzky as he originally handed them to Mr. Monteux. Possiby the conductor would view them with a favoring eye as item on his programs next season. Possibly Mr. McCormack could be also persuaded. The summer is the time, and Europe is often the place, where Symphonic plans are laid.

Ourselves and Others

Two of the major orchestras—the Philharmonic in New York and Mr. Stock's in Chicago—have ended their concerts until autumn. Today and tomorrow the other two, in Boston and in Philadelphia, are closing the season. Here at home two Symphonies fill Dr. Koussevitzky's program, viz.:

Symphony, No. 8, in F major	Beethoven
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor	Brahms

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski, whose operatic inclinations seem more and more irrepressible, is drawing his program from Wagner's music-dramas of "The Ring," presumably with assisting singers. These are the excerpts.

From "Das Rheingold":
  Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla
  Alberich's Invocation to the Nibelungs
From "Die Walküre":
  Ride of the Valkyrs
  Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Charm
From "Siegfried":
  Forest Murmurs
  Ascent of Siegfried to Brünnhilde's Rock
From "Götterdämmerung":
  Siegfried's Rhine-Journey
  Siegfried's Death
  Brünnhilde's Immolation

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky, his work at Symphony Hall done for the season, leave Boston for New York on Monday Tuesday and embarks next Wednesda on the Berengaria for Cherbourg a Paris. The Symphony Concerts will b gin anew, for the fifty-second year, Oct. 7 and 8.

This year at The Pops Mr. Fiedler w return to an uncut version of Gershwi "Rhapsody in Blue." Mr. Sanromá w play it for the first time with the orch tra on Sunday evening, May 8.

H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Trans. Apr 30

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Art, whether expressed in paintin sculpture or music, is said to be a refle tion of the period in which it is p duced. This reason is given, sometime to explain why modern sculpture c never compete with that of Ancie Greece. The present disturbed condition of the world, its restlessness and depression, all seem to be reflected in much of the modern music, and these conditions may be responsible in part, at least, for the discords and seeming confusion. The times and the music that act and react upon each other, creating a vicious circle. We who have attended the concerts since their inception find it difficult to express adequately our admiration of the genius of Mr. Koussevitzky, and the splendid technique of the orchestra. Of course he wishes to produce some of the work of modern composers but many of his admirers wish that he might give more frequently compositions of the classical masters.

TWO INTERESTED SUBSCRIBERS

Boston, April 29.

, 1932 Globe

MUSIC

Apr 30

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

To end the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky cnose two familiar masterpieces, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Brahms' First Symphony. They made a short concert. Each number was heartily applauded. There were the usual demonstrations by way of leave-taking at the end. At the beginning of the concert the players gave the signal for an ovation by rising as Dr Koussevitzky came on the platform. The audience applauded loudly and long, but remained seated.

Beethoven's Eighth is commonly regarded as a "little symphony," to use his own phrase about it. Its relative brevity, its lightness and grace contrast sharply with the other masterpieces from the "Eroica" to the Ninth. The 19th century, obsessed with bigness and with emotional intensity, was inclined to deem the Eighth Symphony a minor work, though its best judges, such as Berlioz and Wagner knew better.

This F major symphony is Beethoven's nearest approach to Mozart, though it lacks the elegance of style and the undercurrent of pathos that make his work inimitable. Beethoven has not tried to copy Mozart here. He has written a work more classic than romantic. Now that we are wearying of the 19th century and turning back with renewed admiration and joy to the best work of the 18th, this symphony of Beethoven is coming into its own.

Dr Koussevitzky's conception of the Eighth Symphony, as illustrated by his reading of it yesterday, does not, it must be said, correspond with that stated above. He tried to make it big, dramatic, eloquent, planning his effects very carefully; carrying them out with too obvious care, and a certain lack of emotional warmth.

Brahms' C minor Symphony is a favorite with Dr Koussevitzky. He has conducted no familiar classic here more frequently. Yet yesterday, as so often before, he was himself obviously carried away by the music. The warmth, the intensity, the breadth of style he imparted to it again roused and stirred his hearers.

Brahms, like the poet Gray according to Matthew Arnold, never really "spoke out." There is something sluggish about his emotions, something turgid in his style. But when Koussevitzky conducts, this sluggishness and turgidity vanish into clear and noble eloquence, except when the conductor becomes excited, as he did yesterday in the magnificent finale. Then he failed to keep the tempi even, to build up the climaxes majestically from afar.

After the first entrance of the choral theme, for instance, he hurried the tempo many measures before the first "animato" marked in the score. Before the grand climax of all he hurried with a frenzied and stumbling pace, so that the impressive outburst in which trombones dominate sounded too much like Tchaikovsky bewailing his harsh fate.

The playing of the orchestra yesterday illustrated once more the new pitch of perfection to which Dr Koussevitzky has in many respects brought it. The perfection in ensemble which distinguished the Boston Symphony under Dr Muck has not, to be sure, been regained to the full extent. Attacks are not perfectly clean cut, inner voices are sometimes obscured, and sometimes obtruded. But the tone of the orchestra, especially of the strings and brass, is once more magnificently sonorous. The principal players, with one or two exceptions, such as the kettle drummer, are, taking them by and large, equal to those who were here in 1915. Some of them, like the first clarinet, Mr Polatschek, are as fine as one could hope to hear anywhere. Nor is a better orchestra now to be heard either in this country or in Europe.

The warning from the trustees, prominently displayed in yesterday's program that $37 000 is still needed toward the deficit now certain on the present season, and their earnest appeal for contributions, however, small, to insure the continuance of the concerts should meet a warm response. More than $60,000 has already been subscribed by hundreds of donors. Further gifts should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon st, Boston.

P. R.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

His Concertino for Its First Hearing

Mr. Hill's New Piece at the Last of the Monday Symphonies

Apr 26 Trans

THE various series of Symphony concerts are this year ending in the brightest possible blaze of glory. Last week the Tuesday concerts concluded on the high level of the Lisztian "Faust." Friday and Saturday the main series will culminate in Brahms's exalted "First." Last evening (as also at Cambridge on Thursday) Chaikovsky's thrilling "Fifth" occupied final place. One uses the overworked word "thrill" advisedly; for if this symphony in Dr. Koussevitzky's version of last evening did one thing above any other, it was to give the listener such a thrill as he will long remember. As is well known, the symphony (save in the waltz of the third movement) is almost continually on the heights. From the depths of the beginning it quickly ascends, and once it has established its eloquence, maintains it in one way or another, be it the heights of such an emotion as is indicated by the horn solo of the slow movement, or the excitements of the climaxes of the second and last movements. What Chaikovsky had written, whatever he had hoped it would achieve in expressing or stimulating mood or emotion, that the conductor got out of it to the nth degree. And an audience responded with tumultuous applause. Before it was over, after Dr. Koussevitzky had several times entered to bow, after he had the orchestra on its feet, the audience also rose and continued the expressions of approval, the season's farewells.

But the main interest of the evening by no means centered exclusively in Chaikovsky's symphony. At this eleventh hour the conductor was still presenting a première. The new piece was Professor Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 36. It is dedicated to Mr. Sanromá and was played by him last evening. It seems as if it were not only dedicated to him but written specifically for him. Indeed it glorifies the things in which he excels. Feats of brilliant, actively rhythmed technic here take on thematic value.

The Concertino is a short piece requiring relatively few minutes for performance. If, as is said, brevity is the soul of wit, then this piece is both very soulful and very witty. But it is the only way in which it is "soulful." For that essentially romantic quality it avoids as it avoids all the other trappings of the Romantic school. For this reason there will be those who find that the Concertino is not profound—or that it is not something else which it never intended to be. But for us of the twentieth century it is something better than profound. It is tremendously vital; it breathes the spirit of the day in which it arose; it is as bracing as a cold day in sunshiny spring. Further—which will be a point for many—it accomplishes its purposes with out forsaking the paths of tonal pleasantness.

The Concertino is cast into a single movement. Yet, according to the composer, "there are the usual three sections of a concerto." After the principal theme transitional measures lead to slower music which might be taken either as "second theme" or slow movement. The composer prefers to view it as "slow movement." Then a cadenza leads to a rondo as finale. This according to Mr. Hill's own analysis. The principal themes are all aggressive, full of the joy of living, themes that make one straighten one's back, sit squarely, in one's seat. The slow division relaxes the mood, brings measures almost wistful. The rondo opens with martial music from the orchestra, with martellato passages in the piano. Four times in slightly different guises this music is heard. Between are the episodes, sometimes again slightly wistful, sometimes incidentally making a bow to jazz, once gently suggesting a scherzo mood, once giving the piano particular prominence. At the end there are references to the music of the very beginning. The rhythm is often free and exuberantly tricky. The transitions are ramarkably smooth, making of the whole thing a single, long undulating curve, rather than a jointure of several parts. With this music Mr. Sanromá was in his element as it was intended he should be. And the orchestra joined him in the manner which both he and Mr. Hill deserved.

The concert began with Haydn's "Surprise" symphony. The performance was in every way subtly Haydnesque. But one was greatly amused that the "surprise" chord in this year 1932 still creates a definite ripple throughout the length and breadth of the audience in Symphony Hall. And one began wondering whether Haydn might not have been astonished by it himself had he heard it last evening. For he himself in all probability never heard it as loudly or as incisively as it can come from a modern group of players.

The season's concerts have brought no little variety. German and Germanic composers have been decidedly in the lead, seven composers, with eleven pieces. The French and the Russians have come next, with three each, both composers and works. Of Americans there have been two, Italians and Finns each one. There were three concertos, two groups of vocal solos. The division into historical classifications proved to be remarkably even—six for the classics; seven romantic; eight modern.

A. H. M.

Memoranda

The return of Miss Myra Hess, the pianist, for an American tour next season is announced. In the course of it Boston should receive its customary two concerts instead of the one meagerly bestowed on it last

---

MUSIC

Herald Apr 26

MONDAY EVENING SYMPHONY

The sixth and final concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Monday evening series, took place last evening before a large and responsive audience, which greeted Dr. Koussevitzky with enthusiastic ardor. The following program was performed: Haydn, Symphony in G major (Surprise), B. and H. No. 6; Hill, concertino for piano and orchestra, opus 36 (first performance); Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor, opus 64. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist.

Mr. Hill's new concertino pleased last night's audience mightily and earned a demonstration both for its composer, who was present, and for Mr. Sanroma, who played it with characteristic verve and brilliance. The concertino is in a single movement, but falls clearly into three sections corresponding to the three movements of the traditional concerto, of which it is, so to speak, a tabloid version. Both the vigorous figure of its main theme (which reappears in various guises throughout the concertino) and its peculiarly brittle brilliance suggest the 18th century Italian harpsichord style. The harmonic idiom, however, particularly in the elaborately decorative development section, is of far more recent vintage. Indeed, exception can be taken to the conflict between the early classic style of the first statement of the main theme by the orchestra in unison, the recondite elaboration and Gallic flavor of the harmonies which follow and the florid, almost Lisztian exuberance of much of the pianoforte part. But all this may be too solemn a reaction to a piece so gay in mood and so admirably concise in form. The well-written and interesting orchestral score was skilfully played.

Haydn's Surprise symphony, of which a marvelously neat and finished performance opened the concert, is none the less delightful for being heard in an age which is not easily surprised. But then its famous Paukenschlag, the loud drumbeat which once startled listeners to the naively soothing andante (and which even yesterday drew a ripple of laughter), is not its sole excuse for survival. The speed and clarity with which the last movement was played last night was a brilliant tour de force; yet a tempo slightly less extreme might have produced more graceful and sparkling an effect.

Hearing once again Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony, in a performance as richly compelling as one may well hope to hear, one could hardly fail to agree with Brahms that the last movement is by far the weakest. Nor can it be denied that, despite its ostensible freedom from a conscious program, and hence from the self-pitying pathos of the fourth and sixth, it is fraught with deep psychological significance. Dr. Koussevitzky drew from it all that it had to offer of beauty and expressive force.

S. S.

, APRIL 26, 1932

Music

Monitor

Final Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the final concert of the current Monday evening series in Symphony Hall last night. For novelty, Dr. Koussevitzky proffered in first performance Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill's Concertino for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 36. The concert opened with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and closed with Tchaikovsky's Fifth.

The concertino is dedicated to Mr. J. M. Sanromá, who was the soloist last night. The work, which is very short, is in one movement, which, however, follows roughly the three-movement concerto form. Evidently designed as a sort of playful compliment to Mr. Sanromá's crisp and brilliant technique, it differs widely in style from most of the composer's other works. It has none of the impressionistic charm of the symphonies and the "Lilacs," but speaks rather in the staccato voice of the modernists, though in form it is classical. Of the earlier compositions of Mr. Hill it is perhaps most closely related to the Scherzo for two pianos and orchestra, but it steers clear of the jazz idiom, which was not very successfully employed in that opus. The concertino was played with great virtuosity by soloist and orchestra and was received with exceptional enthusiasm.

The effulgent proclamation of the Tchaikovsky symphony closed a series of exceptional worth. Acclamations were heaped upon conductor and men.

L. A. S.

To Cambridge For A New Concertino

Tran Apr 29

THE usual rites marked, last evening, the final concert, for the season, of the Boston Orchestra at Harvard College. That is to say, the customary full and distinguished house received Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra with more than common warmth before they began Haydn's "Surprise Symphony"; waxed yet warmer when it took leave of them after they had played Chaikovsky's Symphony in E minor. Between ran agreeable and applausive intermezzo. Professor Hill's new Concertino for Piano and Orchestra, produced at Symphony Hall last Monday, was now repeated in his own domain. Mr. Sanromá, dedicatee and destination of the piece, was again the pianist. The audience welcomed him eagerly; renewed its plaudits at the end; called the composer from seat to stage joined the conductor to the other two clapped all three to the echo. The University audience does these things with an ingratiating courtesy and a heart warming honesty.

Sanders Theater, next to Paine Hall the most resonant concert-room within Bostonian reach, favored Haydn and put the players of his Symphony to their mettle. Every note sounded clear and full. Every shading and transition went unblurred. Once more the conductor and his diminished orchestra were sympathetic and dexterous masters of an eighteenth-century music that is oftener serious or felicitous than playful and obvious. As for the Chaikovskian intensities, within the wooden walls of Sanders they sound less from orchestra to audience than from man to man, say with Dr. Koussevitzky as full-voiced interpreter between. Both these symphonies have been active repertory pieces of late at Symphony Hall. There is no need to recur to them.

Rather, the new Concertino drew the casual reviewer to Sanders Theater. Two American composers, writing for piano and orchestra, have chosen the form: Mr. Carpenter using it, twelve years and more ago, for intimate discourse until both voices become as one in the rising warmth of the tonal conversation; now Mr. Hill, preferring it as means to a displayful music of pattern and progress in scintillant musical sound. He exposes a principal theme that accepts the contemporary convention of the piano as primarily a percussive instrument. He unfolds it in upstanding and richly figured measures for the pianist against an orchestra setting in a subtilized or a vivid background, sonority for sonority, decorative always. He lingers briefly over a tabloidal slow division, as one who would keep the modern faith of a self-contained, objective music. Then whirls away, via a cadenza, into a Rondo-Finale that may catch Liszt's ear in the Elysian Fields and remind him that even his "transcendental" bravura can now be transcended. Rhythm indeed has gone a long way since the Weimar day. Meanwhile a bold figure that from the start has caught ear and fancy recurringly ties the whole together.

By these means and in this fashion Mr. Hill has written a virtuoso-piece that is neither dry, mechanical nor cold-blooded; that he animates with spirited turns, or darts of tonal wit; that is expansive where Mr. Sanromá most excels and brief where he is less excellent. Therefore the pianist played both con amore and con slancio, as old scores used to put it. As for the audience, Mr. Hill had not written twenty measures before he was persuading it that to be scintillant and amusing gives reason to a Concertino that was a summer's jeu d'esprit.

H. T. P.

Orchestra in Blaze of Glory

Apr 26 By MOSES SMITH Amer.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, closed its Monday evening series of concerts in a blaze of glory. The program was excellently arranged; the orchestral performance was uniformly excellent; and Jesus Maria Sanroma contributed his dazzling virtuosity at the piano.

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony began the concert. It was amusing to note that a large portion of the audience—in this year of 1932—was startled by the sudden orchestral outburst in the slow moment.

For further contrast there was a new concertino for piano and orchestra by Professor Hill of Harvard. Here is a short work in three connected sections, exposing lively and vigorous thematic material, or, in the case of the slow section, charmingly sentimental; a work in which this material is developed not too elaborately nor too self-consciously, with neat and effective transitions. Structurally the work seemed to offer not a flaw. There were some rude orchestral and pianistic dissonances and what might be called rhythmic dissonances. But the whole thing went off very enjoyably, especially with Mr. Sanroma performing with perfectly alarming bravura.

After Many Days Trans Apr 2

In the long courses of time all things are said to come to those who wait. Perhaps Boston is present and convenient instance. Three years ago Weinberger's folk-opera, "Schwanda the Bagpiper," went up and down Central Europe. For concert-purposes orchestras immediately detached a Polka and Fugue. They are still indispensables in a German afternoon or evening of light music. Last autumn the Metropolitan Opera House rubbed its eyes, opened its ears, and discovered "Schwanda." Forthwith the Polka and Fugue began a tour of our concert-halls. It will end on Thursday evening of next week when they will be heard—at last—at The Pops. . . . Mr. Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, produced last February at the Symphony Concerts, also has place on the program. This time Mr. Sanromá will play the piano-part.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Apr 27

Overlooked Loeffler

TEN years ago, almost to a month, three "Irish Fantasies," composed by Mr. Loeffler, were produced at the Symphony Concerts. There were five in all—settings of verses from Irish folklore or poetry for tenor voice and orchestra. Mr. Monteux was the conductor; Mr. McCormack, the singer. Soon the Bostonians carried them to New York. Possibly there were performances in other cities. At the time these three Irish Fantasies made appreciable stir. They were set high among Mr. Loeffler's works. Mr. McCormack's singing added rich flavors. Admittedly they were difficult to produce. They also required collaboration. Consequently, no sooner were they known than they were put by and more than half forgotten.

Both Mr. Loeffler and Mr. McCormack are now older men. Fewer new works come from the composer. The singer begins to husband his powers. Soon it will be impossible to join them together in the original three, or all five, Irish Fantasies. Since music and performance have outlasted ten years in many memories, the time seems ripe for revival. Possibly Mr. Loeffler would hand the Fantasies to Dr. Koussevitzky as he originally handed them to Mr. Monteux. Possiby the conductor would view them with a favoring eye as item on his programs next season. Possibly Mr. McCormack could be also persuaded. The summer is the time, and Europe is often the place, where Symphonic plans are laid.

urselves and Others

wo of the major orchestra: —the Phil- onic in New York and Mr. Stock's icago—have ended their concerts utumn. Today and tomorrow the two, in Boston and in Philadelphia, g the season. Here at home phonies fill Dr. Koussevitzky's viz.:

No. 8, in F major	Beethoven
No. 1, in C minor	Brahms

ladelphia Mr. Stokowski, whose inclinations seem more and more ible, is drawing his program Vagner's music-dramas of "The presumably with assisting sing- nese are the excerpts.

as Rheingold":
ne of the Gods into Valhalla
ch's Invocation to the Nibelungs Die Walküre": of the Valkyrs
n's Farewell and Fire-Charm
'Siegfried": t Murmurs
nt of Siegfried to Brünnhilde's Rock
"Götterdämmerung":
fried's Rhine-Journey
fried's Death
nnhilde's Immolation

dents and Prospects

. Koussevitzky, his work at Symony Hall done for the season, leaves ton for New York on Monday or esday and embarks next Wednesday the Berengaria for Cherbourg and Paris. The Symphony Concerts will begin anew, for the fifty-second year, on Oct. 7 and 8.

This year at The Pops Mr. Fiedler will return to an uncut version of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." Mr. Sanromá will play it for the first time with the orchestra on Sunday evening, May 8.

H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Trans. Apr 30

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Art, whether expressed in painting, sculpture or music, is said to be a reflection of the period in which it is produced. This reason is given, sometimes, to explain why modern sculpture can never compete with that of Ancient Greece. The present disturbed condition of the world, its restlessness and depression, all seem to be reflected in much of the modern music, and these conditions may be responsible in part, at least, for the discords and seeming confusion. The times and the music that act and react upon each other, creating a vicious circle. We who have attended the concerts since their inception find it difficult to express adequately our admiration of the genius of Mr. Koussevitzky, and the splendid technique of the orchestra. Of course he wishes to produce some of the work of modern composers but many of his admirers wish that he might give more frequently compositions of the classical masters.

Two Interested Subscribers

Boston, April 29.

, 1932 Globe

MUSIC

Apr 30

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

To end the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky chose two familiar masterpieces, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Brahms' First Symphony. They made a short concert. Each number was heartily applauded. There were the usual demonstrations by way of leave-taking at the end. At the beginning of the concert the players gave the signal for an ovation by rising as Dr Koussevitzky came on the platform. The audience applauded loudly and long, but remained seated.

Beethoven's Eighth is commonly regarded as a "little symphony," to use his own phrase about it. Its relative brevity, its lightness and grace contrast sharply with the other masterpieces from the "Eroica" to the Ninth. The 19th century, obsessed with bigness and with emotional intensity, was inclined to deem the Eighth Symphony a minor work, though its best judges, such as Berlioz and Wagner knew better.

This F major symphony is Beethoven's nearest approach to Mozart, though it lacks the elegance of style and the undercurrent of pathos that make his work inimitable. Beethoven has not tried to copy Mozart here. He has written a work more classic than romantic. Now that we are wearying of the 19th century and turning back with renewed admiration and joy to the best work of the 18th, this symphony of Beethoven is coming into its own.

Dr Koussevitzky's conception of the Eighth Symphony, as illustrated by his reading of it yesterday, does not, it must be said, correspond with that stated above. He tried to make it big, dramatic, eloquent, planning his effects very carefully; carrying them out with too obvious care, and a certain lack of emotional warmth.

Brahms' C minor Symphony is a favorite with Dr Koussevitzky. He has conducted no familiar classic here more frequently. Yet yesterday, as so often before, he was himself obviously carried away by the music. The warmth, the intensity, the breadth of style he imparted to it again roused and stirred his hearers.

Brahms, like the poet Gray according to Matthew Arnold, never really "spoke out." There is something sluggish about his emotions, something turgid in his style. But when Koussevitzky conducts, this sluggishness and turgidity vanish into clear and noble eloquence, except when the conductor becomes excited, as he did yesterday in the magnificent finale. Then he failed to keep the tempi even, to build up the climaxes majestically from afar.

After the first entrance of the choral theme, for instance, he hurried the o many measures before the first nato" marked in the score. Be the grand climax of all he hur with a frenzied and stumbling so that the impressive outburst ich trombones dominate sounded uch like Tchaikovsky bewailing rsh fate.

playing of the orchestra yester- llustrated once more the new f perfection to which Dr Kousse- has in many respects brought e perfection in ensemble which uished the Boston Symphony Dr Muck has not, to be sure, gained to the full extent. At- re not perfectly clean cut, inner are sometimes obscured, and nes obtruded. But the tone of hestra, especially of the strings ss, is once more magnificen s. The principal players, wi two exceptions, such as the rummer, are, taking them e, equal to those who we y 1915. Some of them, like the rinet, Mr Polatschek, are one could hope to hear any Nor is a better orchestra now nard either in this country or th dawarning from the trustees rt atly displayed in yesterday's Me that $37,000 is still needed t he deficit now certain on the eason, and their earnest ap- contributions, however, small, the continuance of the con- ers would meet a warm response. n $60,000 has already been his ld by hundreds of donors. ore gifts should be sent to E. B. easurer, at 6 Beacon st.

F. R.

SYMPHONY ENDS YEAR OF MUSIC

Two Familiar Works Make Up Closing List

P..T — APR 30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As compensation perhaps for the lengths and exactions of that of a week ago, the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the final matinee of the season, offered two familiar symphonies, Beethoven's little, and lesser, Eighth and the First of Brahms, now in the heyday of its popularity.

RECALLS AT THE END

The rites that mark the season's end were yesterday duly observed. When Dr. Koussevitzky first came upon the stage, the orchestra rose in greeting, and some members of the audience followed suit. The applause was long continued. The performance of Beethoven's Symphony, admirable saving some roughness in the first movement, was enthusiastically received. And when Dr. Koussevitzky, as is his wont, swelled the close of Brahms' Symphony to an apotheosis less Brahmsian than Lisztian or Tchaikovskian, the hall rang with applause to which was added the sound of stamping feet. Many were the recalls, and a deserving orchestra was called upon to bow.

Thus ended a symphony season, the 51st, in which the orchestral performance has been, on the whole, at a level extremely high, in which the programmes have ranged widely and have included much of interest and gratifyingly little of negligible value; a season that notably introduced to us the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, that renewed our acquaintance with the Eighth of Bruckner and the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt (the last-named in a singularly glamorous performance), and that deservedly restored to the repertory Strauss' "Don Quixote" and the noble "Istar" of the late Vincent d'Indy.

Two distinguished European composers appeared here for the first time in person during this season, the Russian Nicolai Tcherepnin and the Englishman Gustav Holst, each conducting his own music. The Americans, Morris and Gershwin and the Austrian Toch, were soloists in their own pieces for piano and orchestra. The Bach Cantata Club, the Harvard Glee Club and the Cecilia Society severally assisted at one or another concert. Anniversaries of Haydn and of Goethe were appropriately commemorated.

Nor does this complete the tale of what may be described of as eventful occasions through the season of 1931-32. Not always were the Symphony concerts so rich in such things, so agreeably diversified. That Dr. Koussevitzky has much of interest in store for us next season is a foregone conclusion. No sooner has a year of these concerts ended than one may begin to anticipate the excitements and satisfaction of the one that is to come.

FINAL CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season of Brilliant Accomplishment Brought to an End

Herald Apr 30

With Brahms and Beethoven, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought to a close the Friday afternoon season in brilliant performance yesterday. But for a repetition of the program this evening, Dr. Koussevitzky disbands his orchestra until the fall, having achieved what must be regarded as the most notable season of the past decade.

Seldom, if ever, has the organization reached such pinnacles of perfection. Not only in Boston, but in New York and elsewhere, Dr. Koussevitzky is hailed as a genius among program makers, lending a sympathetic ear to the new and rejuvenating the old in music.

Space does not permit a resume of the many interesting high lights of the entire season. Perhaps the most outstanding of the concerts have been the Gershwin premiere, with the youthful composer as the soloist in the second of his Rhapsodies, and the recent program which presented the distinguished pianist, Myra Hess, together with the Cecelia Society Chorus.

Of extraordinary interest, too, was the revival after eight years of the Liszt Faust Symphony, which was acclaimed at the New York concert as well as here as one of the most magnificent orchestral contributions to the musical season. Another memorable concert was in memory of Vincent d'Indy, noted French composer whose death occurred last December.

Forty-five composers found representation on the season's programs a goodly proportion for the first time. Many of the scores were discovered by Dr. Koussevitzky during his last Parisian pilgrimage, and certainly of his selections of the untried work of young composers, there were few that, whatever their deficiencies, lacked interest and vigor. It is all very well for the musical die-hards to grumble at the frequent appearance on the programs of such names as Berezowsky, Frid, Sowerby and others. But it is well to reflect, too, that when the magnificent Brahms C Minor Symphony, which shared honors on yesterday afternoon's program, was brought to its first performance in 1878, one musical commentator referred to it as "coldly elaborated, artificial; not to be mentioned in the same day with any symphony by Schumann, Mendelssohn, or . . . Beethoven."

Of the Brahms, and the Beethoven 8th Symphony which had their place on yesterday's program, everything has been said before. They are not new to concert-goers, or to Dr. Koussevitzky's audience. Yet each rehearing at the hands of this excellent and balanced group of instrumentalists, lends them new enchantment. The short and for the most part merry Eighth Symphony, with the great master sketching great things with the perfect light touch, with artistry and charm, was given an inspiriing reading, while the lofty C Minor of Brahms was once more a masterly interpretation of true Brahms greatness.

Only the gay Pop concerts remain to console the concert lover until fall. Yet surely we may look forward with pleasant anticipation to another inspired and inspiring season, when we shall be assured of another year of brilliantly conceived and executed symphonic music.

J. D.

Boston Symphony Season

Monitor Apr. 30

By L. A. SLOPER

WITHOUT benefit of a festival such as the several preceding springs have seen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is closing its fifty-first season with the concerts of April 29-30. But it should not be deduced that the season has therefore been devoid of interest, or even of memorial observances. For a program was devoted to the music of Haydn in honor of his bicentennial, and another paid tribute to Goethe through the playing of Wagner's "Faust" Overture and of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. The revival of the Liszt score was one of the events of the musical year.

Obviously, neither of these anniversaries called for a week of music; and there can be little doubt that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was well advised not to attempt to make an annual custom of an undertaking which is likely to be successful only when occasion demands it. Next spring, probably, another festival may be looked for, in celebration of the Brahms centenary.

The main series of 24 pairs of concerts, just ending, has brought forth the customary number of novelties. If these have not all proved epochal, nobody need be astonished. Conductors perform new music; they do not as a rule write it. They cannot be blamed, therefore, if a new masterpiece is not available for each program.

Of the novelties which Dr. Koussevitzky has disclosed this season, however, a reasonable proportion have seemed to be additions of some importance to the symphonic repertory. At least two of the works which appeared on a first hearing to possess value were penned—Europeans will be surprised to hear—by Americans. These were the "Symphonic Ode" of Mr. Aaron Copland and the Piano Concerto of Mr. Harold Morris. Another new American piece which received a great deal of publicity—Mr. George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for orchestra with piano—did not impress the present chronicler as indispensable.

The same comment applies to some of the European works which were performed for the first time in public, such as the Dukelsky "Epitaph" or the Martelli "Concerto." Some of the compositions which had their first American hearing in this series, on the other hand, held much of interest. Such were the Ravel Piano Concerto, and the Ninth Symphony of Mahler. Items of lesser concern in this class were the disappointing Stravinsky Violin Concerto and Toch's "Bunte" Suite.

The close of Dr. Koussevitzky's eighth year of dictatorship finds the orchestra a superb instrument, capable of amazing feats of execution. These qualities were displayed conspicuously in the final Friday afternoon concert, at which Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the Brahms First made up the program.

The Beethoven was delectably etched, the Brahms nobly proclaimed. There were warm demonstrations, at the beginning and at the close of the Friday concert, for Dr. Koussevitzky, who shared the tribute with the orchestra.

It was a tribute well deserved by conductor and men. The present artistic stature of this orchestra, and its apparent material security, justify the traditional policy of the management in entrusting the organization to one conductor, who remains in active direction of a body of musicians of his own choosing and molding

---

Her. Apr. 30 MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Beethoven's eighth symphony and Johannes Brahms' first. The former has now been played 29 times in the course of 51 seasons; the latter has now had 30 performances at these concerts. "So much has been said and well said" by deep thinkers about these two works, that it would be superfluous in 1932 to inquire curiously about their structure or emotional quality.

Dr. Koussevitzky was greeted warmly when he came on the platform, and he and the orchestra were applauded enthusiastically and for a long time after the magnificent performance of Brahms's symphony. By those who worship Johannes as the great god of music, Dr. Koussevitzky is justly reverenced as his prophet.

With the repetition of the concert tonight the 51st season will end. The 52d season will begin on Oct. 7.

In the course of the season now ending Brahms and Ravel were each represented five times; Beethoven, Haydn, Holst, Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky and Wagner, four times each; Debussy, Tcherepnin and Toch, three times; Sebastian Bach, l'Indy, Liszt, Sibelius, twice each.

Forty-five composers were represented: Berezowsky, Mabel Daniels, Frid, Gershwin, Morris, Sowerby, Vogel, for the first time at these concerts.

The American composers were Copland, Miss Daniels, Gershwin, Griffes, Loeffler, Morris, Sowerby, Deems Taylor.

There were memorable performances; among them, the first symphony and first piano concerto of Brahms; Debussy's "Blessed Damozel"; Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Ravel's suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade"; tone-poems by Strauss; Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms"; Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

Among the orchestral "novelties" that interested or gave genuine pleasure were the works by Frid, Holst's "Hammersmith," Morris's piano concerto, Toch's "Little Theatre Suite" and "Bunta Suite," Hindemith's "Konzertmusik."

Among the disappointments, and in some cases provoking the question why they were thought worthy of performance were the works by Copland, Dukelsky, Gershwin, Pick-Mangiagalli; Ravel's piano concerto and Stravinsky's violin concerto, Sowerby's "Prairie," Vogel's Two Etudes, Debussy's Rhapsody for English horn.

It is needless to say that the music by the two Bachs, Beethoven, Corelli, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, was admirably performed, for Dr. Koussevitzky delights in the old masters, as he is open-minded and if anything too generous towards the contemporaneous, experimenting younger school.

23, 1932 Jan. Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ravel's new concerto for piano, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist, was the outstanding item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. A concerto for orchestra by Martelli, played for the first time in this country, was eclipsed by Ravel's brilliant composition. The remaining number, Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, was also cordially applauded.

Ravel had promised to dedicate this concerto for piano to the Boston Symphony, for its 50th anniversary, but he did not finish it in time. It was first performed in Paris at a Ravel festival last January, and produced in London in February.

No doubt Dr Koussevitzky hoped for the honor, dear to his heart, of conducting the first performance in the United States, the "world premiere" having been denied him. But Mr Stokowski in Philadelphia is equally keen on the rather empty and futile distinction of conducting "first performances in the United States." So the prudent M Ravel arranged that the piano concerto should be performed in both Philadelphia and Boston yesterday, leaving honors even between the two leading conductors in America. Boston heard half a first performance, so to speak, with Philadelphia enjoying the other half.

This concerto is written, according to the composer, "in the tradition of Mozart and of Saint-Saens." Ravel has said of it that in this composition he has expressed himself most completely, pouring his thought into the exact mold he had dreamed. A listener hearing it for the first time was inclined to deem the composer's judgment of his work accurate. This music is not only brilliantly written, with an exquisite feeling for the orchestra and the piano, but it has an emotional warmth and an appearance of spontaneity not always found in Ravel's music.

The first movement begins with a vivacious theme, unforced in its gaiety. An ensuing andante section is so frankly melodious as to recall, of all things, Dvorak's "New World" symphony. There is a brilliant close. The slow movement, a long flowing song-like melody given first to the piano, then shifting almost imperceptibly into the orchestra, has the distinction of style, the delicacy of mood one associates with the music of Gabriel Faure.

The finale, plainly influenced by American jazz, succeeds in transmuting the "barbaric yawps" of our popular music into something elegant and Parisian, but with a certain lack of vitality. This movement falls below the other two in quality. This concerto seems likely to prove Ravel's masterpiece. But, like all he has written, it betrays beneath a surface finished with impeccable craftsmanship an eclecticism of style that is in itself a confession of poverty of imagination.

Martelli's concerto for orchestra seemed yesterday the work of a composer lacking in originality and subtlety, inclined to make "modernism" an excuse for clumsy workmanship. Its chief merit is brevity.

Bruckner's symphony contrasted strikingly with Ravel's concerto. This is the music of a pious peasant, who adored Beethoven and Wagner. It is prolix and diffuse in substance, yet not devoid of genuine grandeur. Ravel's music shows what perfect taste and impeccable technique can accomplish with a very little creative imagination. Bruckner's work is the triumph of sheer genius over a total lack of elegance, and an imperfect craftsmanship. Its defects are, in exaggerated form, the defects of Beethoven and of Wagner. Its merit is to have caught something of the nobility of mood, the selfless devotion to music for its own sake that is Beethoven's rarest gift. Bruckner, with Ravel's sense of style, would have been among the geniuses of all but the highest order. Ravel, without Bruckner's "soul," to use an old-fashioned word, cannot rise so high.

Mr Sanroma and Dr Koussevitzky interpreted Ravel admirably. The performance of Bruckner's symphony, especially in its slow movement, was too rhetorical. An outburst of applause came after this third movement, and when the conductor, contrary to his custom, acknowledged it, about 200 people departed, thinking the concert was over.

Next week the final program of the season includes Beethoven's Eighth and Brahms' First Symphony. P. R.

188

Symphony Concert

Beethoven, Brahms And Leave-Taking

TRANS.

Superlative Performances Of Contrasted Classics Gild The Farewell Rites

apr 30

THE PURISTS of the Symphony Concerts are the young persons who frequent the "rush seats" on Friday afternoons. They are not many because nowadays the seats are few; but, for their part, they are austere, detached, exacting; an unsentimental tribe, as becomes sophisticated youth in this spring of 1932. Well in advance they scrutinize the pending program; weigh compositions and composers; consider the "assisting artist"; establish a scale of interest and values; decide whether the sum total warrants attendance. Incidental or semi-extraneous circumstances influence them little or nothing. Like the great, the good, the only perfect Monsieur Romain Rolland through the late war, they are "above the mêlée."

The final afternoon concert of the fifty-first year of the orchestra (which happened to befall yesterday) is no more and no less to these than, say, the ninth matinée of the forty-fifth. The speculative mind sees and hears them in imagination. "Two symphonies, huh! What a program!" (One might believe them disciples of the venerable editor of the program-book itself.) "Beethoven's Eighth and Brahms's First." Or, if they wear the learned sock, "Beethoven in F"—as though he were a church-service—and "Brahms in C minor." Under whatever designation old and repetitious "hat." (Probably not one in twenty of them has heard "the little Eighth" twice in her young life.) Better the tea-room, the cigarettes and a deal of prattle on the side—if Friday afternoon must be misspent.

Consequently those "rush seats," yesterday, were rather thinly peopled; while in the balcony below and on the floor beneath the full numbers and the general animation of a final matinée were in pleasing evidence. "It's smart to be thrifty," as the monitors of fashion daily tell us. Perhaps for that good reason, bright spring millinery was less on view than it has often been through an April afternoon in Symphony Hall. For certain, spring was in the air—strong enough to disperse the blended brands of cigarette-smoke in the corridors; while here and there august matrons examining out of the experience of a generation the conductorial apparel, discovered in it also signs of the season.

It is the merest convention to call spring the renewal of life, the annual miracle of the stirring of the sap within us. All that may have passed muster when mankind and womankind lived in a state of Rousseau-like nature. Long since, we substituted the life of urban artifice. In that state, to which not Heaven but we ourselves have called us, spring is the breaking-up time, the happy promise and foretaste of the drowsy idleness, the grateful irresponsibility of summer. "Breaking-up times," as most learned at school, are eminently cheerful occasions. They are such also at Symphony Hall on the final Friday—only to be matched in liveliness by the autumn reassembling, set for October the seventh next.

Besides, there were the annual rites to renew and in one detail to alter. No sooner had Dr. Koussevitzky appeared in the doorway at the right of the stage than Mr. Burgin gave the signal and the orchestra rose in salute. For once, however, the assemblage did not rise with it. A few drifted up here and there; then, discovering their relative solitude, sat summarily down. Can it be that audiences at Symphony Hall are at last outgrowing that superfluity and provinciality of deference, in which they used indiscriminately to abound, reserving it, say, for the septuagenarian Paderewski. Certainly, the common will to stay sitting was no indifference to the eminent and cherished conductor. Old hands, plying the measuring stick of memory, affirmed that none of the seven preceding adieux had been warmer.

As it was, the audience clapped long and lustily; the standing orchestra, with anything from a trombone to a violin to hold safely, did what they might; while the conductor exhibited a pleasing blend of pleasure, embarrassment and honorable inclination to smile first at the men who have worked with him; second at the audience that these six months had taken the pleasure of both. Needless, also, to say, these rites were resumed at the end of the first Symphony; renewed and lengthened at the close of the second and the concert. Indeed, the last vision was like the first—the conductor in the midst of his standing orchestra; all before them the applauding company. But a matinée audience is not long to be stayed. The homing instinct speeds it forth. On Saturday nights—good New-Englanders that we are!—we dawdle.

And those two Symphonies? For once the reviewer cries his readers for mercy and remission. If they would have him analytic (which is his infirmity) they may turn to another page of this paper and read him in meditative discourse upon the symphonic season tout compris. When he can see and feel the velvet of the spring night outside his study windows; when his eyes wander gratefully across the table to the figures "24" on the cover of the final program-book, need he rack his brain to find something fresh, iluminating and engaging to say about "Beethoven in F" and "Brahms in C minor"? God bless us all! The little symphony of the great Ludwig was played for the first time one hundred and eighteen years ago and pens—and typewriters—have been pottering over it ever since, as though its humors and simplicities and happy inventions did not flow along quite able to bubble and babble for themselves. And how much fair white paper has "Brahms in C minor" scrawled with gallons of ink since he—or it—burst upon a half-expectant, half-mistrustful world at Karlsruhe in 1876? After all the reviewer is only a glorified and in this instance, an undutiful reporter; whereas the German "interpreters" of music are always dutiful and sometimes love a roseate mist of streaming words.

"This little Eighth," says Herr Bekker looking through protuberant spectacles across a thick piled study-table "is a symphonic rondo, the crown of a ripe philosophy, which sees joyous play and glad activity as the goal of life, as absolute truth. . . . This clarity this purity, this sunshine, this freedom from earthly burdens, this absolute conquest of matter, is found through humor—the saving gift of laughter, which rings clear above all questions, all cries of pain, strife or triumph. The symphony in F major preaches a speculative wisdom, a Zarathustran philosophy, stron and forceful, so that we feel it could b revealed through a very great and exceptional spirit.

Yes: through more than a century th notion has spread abroad that Beethove was really that; also the notion that a deal of "cultural" philosophizing has bee wasted upon such a self-contained an clear-spoken symphony as "Beethoven i F major." . . . And, if all that will no content the chance reader who "take concert-going seriously," he may rea also the blood-brother of Herr Bekker—to wit Herr Niemann, discoursing o Brahms in C minor. "It is only whe we are not content merely to hea Brahms's First Symphony played, but a it were, live with it and into it, tha Bülow's mot about the Tenth Symphon becomes comprehensible and finds som solid basis. It is only then that it awaken in us the consciousness of a deepl stirring and even shattering inward experience. It is only when, for instanc an Arthur Nikisch succeeds by his magic spells in converting this reserve low-spirited Low German, intellectu rather than sensuous, into a Southerne with intense, passionate emotions, an fanning the latent ardor of feeling an passion glimmering beneath the ashe into a devouring fire which has something at once terrifying and ravishing about it, that this grandiose symphonic cartoon becomes an oil painting full of glowing colors. Such power is only granted to a very few elect and great among conductors." And how is that for High?

"Such power" dwelt yesterday in Dr. Koussevitzky; went forth from him upon his orchestra; from both upon their audience. Out of "Brahms in C minor" they wrought a veritable pageant of the power and the beauty of music when there are diviners to hear the composer winging thought with emotion; when there are executants to transform black notes upon white paper into the musing loveliness, the driving tumults, the marching splendors of engendered sound. Upon the Finale, or rather upon the pages that are introduction to the ultimate entrance of, the triumphant hymn, conductor and orchestra could wreak themselves. Once more they did the miracle that transfuses the skill of the horn-player upon his curved and hollowed brass into a Brahmsian poetry of tone; that from the rhythmed impact of bows upon strings above reverberant wood evokes the Brahmsian will to power.

But again there shall be no dwelling upon these sensations. Enough that all the six performances of this Symphony from Dr. Koussevitzky upon Bostonian ears seemed now in the seventh concentrated and consummated. Nor is there reason to expatiate upon the luminous tone, the keen, bright phrasing, the touch-and-go pace and accent, the humor here, the light felicity there, that wrought "the little Eighth" into a music that left only elation behind. At Symphony Hall to many an auditor, these are matters of course, yielding agreeable sensations on a symphonic Friday. To others, blessedly unborn to Bostonian self-complacence or timely escaped from it, they are signs and wonders. H. T. P.

Another Semester of Music

Adv May 1

By Morris Hastings

THE soaring finale of Brahms' First Symphony had sounded full and clear. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's final rehearsal of the season was over. Dr. Koussevitzky laid down his baton and warmly thanked the great orchestra for its work this year. Then, throwing his cloak, boulevardier-fashion, about his shoulders he swept from the stage while the orchestra to a man arose and cheered him.

A moment later, the dynamic conductor, his mobile face still flushed with excitement, appeared at the door of his dressing room and cordially ushered in this visitor.

"A great season. A superb orchestra," were his first words. "It has never played so beautifully as it has this past year."

To talk with Dr. Koussevitzky is to marvel at and to admire his enthusiasm. It is to understand the fire of his interpretations. It is, above all, to be completely captivated by his charm and friendliness, which make one forget the austerity of the huge room, barren except for a piano, couch and a few chairs.

A Busy Summer

Far from taking a complete rest this summer, Dr. Koussevitzky will go first to Paris, the only city in the world where he owns a home. Then, he is to make a trip to Vienna where he will conduct a number of concerts and act as judge in an international music competition.

When the first of August rolls around, he will get out his double-bass and begin practicing for the recital he is to give here next season. Too, there are the piles of new manuscripts to be examined, always in the hope of finding a masterpiece for the Boston Symphony to present.

Dr. Koussevitzky had much to say concerning the difficult art of program-making, an art at which he has shown his aptitude this past year more markedly than before.

"One must restrain his enthusiasm for the moderns and not devote a whole program to them. After all, a symphony orchestra is not a laboratory for experimentation." As he talked his sensitive hands described graceful curves and angles.

"These moderns, rather, must be put along with recognized classics, such as Bach or Beethoven, or with classics whose recognition has been long-delayed, such as Bruckner and Mahler.

"We no longer need devote time to moderns who have nothing to say. Now that their storm and stress period is ended, we know the gold from the dross. Perhaps there is not much gold, but it does exist and that is encouraging."

The hotly debated question of

Continued on Page 8, Column 8

GOODBYES FROM KOUSSEVITZKY

Continued From Page 6.

the American composer and his reception in this country entered the conversation. Dr. Koussevitzky smiled and tilted his head as he recalled the complaint that American composers find it difficult to get a hearing in America.

"But only this past year, we have played here in Boston a concerto by Harold Morris, one by Gershwin, another by Hill as well as symphonic works by Copland and Sowerby. If an American composer writes something that I consider striking, I will not hesitate to play it."

"How greatly does a knowledge of a composer's life and character influence your interpretation of his music?" Dr. Koussevitzky was asked.

"Hardly at all," was his reply. "Beethoven and Wagner, we all know, were thoroughly disagreeable persons. And yet their music does not mirror that fact. And so it goes."

It is a pleasure to know that Dr. Koussevitzky will return next fall. His devotion to the art of music and his superb gifts as conductor have brought the Boston Symphony to its present enormously high peak. Boston is proud of him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAY 3 - 1932

Musical Notes

TRIBUTE TO DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Without benefit of a festival such as the several preceding springs have seen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is closing its 51st season with the concerts of April 29-30. But it should not be deduced that the season has therefore been devoid of interest, or even, of memorial observances. For a program was devoted to the music of Haydn in honor of his bicentennial, and another paid tribute to Goethe through the playing of Wagner's "Faust" Overture and of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. The revival of the Liszt score was one of the events of the musical year.

Obviously, neither of these anniversaries called for a week of music; and there can be little doubt that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was well advised not to attempt to make an annual custom of an undertaking which is likely to be successful only when occasion demands it. Next spring, probably, another festival may be looked for, in celebration of the Brahms centenary.

The main series of 24 pairs of concerts, just ending, has brought forth the customary number of novelties. If these have not all proved epochal, nobody need be astonished. Conductors perform new music; they do not as a rule write it. They cannot be blamed, therefore, if a new masterpiece is not available for each program.

Of the novelties which Dr. Koussevitzky has disclosed this season, however, a reasonable proportion have seemed to be additions of some importance to the symphonic repertory. At least two of the works which appeared on a first hearing to possess value were penned—Europeans will be surprised to hear—by Americans. These were the "Symphonic Ode" of Mr. Aaron Copland and the Piano Concerto of Mr. Harold Morris. Another new American piece which received a great deal of publicity—Mr. George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for orchestra with piano—did not impress the present chronicler as indispensable.

The same comment applies to some of the European works which were performed for the first time in public, such as the Dukelsky "Epitaph" or the Martelli "Concerto."

Some of the compositions which had their first American hearing in this series, on the other hand, held much of interest. Such were the Ravel Piano Concerto, and the Ninth Symphony of Mahler. Items of lesser concern in this class were the disappointing Stravinsky Violin Concerto and Toch's "Bunte" Suite.

The close of Dr. Koussevitzky's eighth year of dictatorship finds the orchestra a superb instrument, capable of amazing feats of execution. These qualities were displayed conspicuously in the final Friday afternoon concert, at which Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the Brahms First made up the program.

The Beethoven was delectably etched, the Brahms nobly proclaimed. There were warm demonstrations, at the beginning and at the close of the Friday concert, for Dr. Koussevitzky, who shared the tribute with the orchestra.

It was a tribute well deserved by conductor and men. The present artistic stature of this orchestra, and its apparent material security, justify the traditional policy of the management in entrusting the organization to one conductor, who remains in active direction of a body of musicians of his own choosing and molding.—C. S. Moni-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
SUNDAY LEADER

MAY 1 1932

PERFECT TONE FOR ORCHESTRAS.

"I was much intrigued by one instrument that was used in the Boston Symphony concert," said a man who came in from 'the sticks' to attend.

"It was stationed down front in the extreme right side of the stage, next to the harps, and it looked like something that had been manufactured at home. Its dull gray paint looked like a home-made job, too. There was so much to see that I didn't notice it until the player took his seat at it for the third number, the Ravel ballet suite. Then I became curious to learn what sort of sound might come out of it. But I didn't find out, for every time the player got busy, which was infrequently, it was when forked lightnings of sound were darting and the thunder of instrumentation bulging the Auditorium walls. So whether it gave out a squeak or a roar I shall never know. Doubtless, Dr. Koussevitzky and perhaps the neighboring harpists heard it, but I am certain no one else did, except perhaps the man who played it and who, I noted, 'doubled' as a violinist in the other numbers.

"It all goes to show how hard a great orchestra leader will struggle to get a perfect tone effect. Here was this thing, which must have taken two men to move and taken up considerable space in a baggage car, imported from Boston merely to give a few toots, or whatever they were that blended all but indistinguishably with the ensemble.

"O yes, I learned next day that the thing is a 'celesta' and that it is really a sort of little organ." — Springfield Union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

MAY [illegible] 1932

Ravel Race

The start was even. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky came out on Boston's Symphony Hall stage last week at precisely the same moment that Leopold Stokowski appeared on the Philadelphia Academy of Music stage. Koussevitzky's entrance was dignified, unflurried. Stokowski fairly flew from the wings. But then Stokowski had a longer first lap. He had the gloomy Fourth Symphony of Finnish Jan Sibelius to get through with, whereas Koussevitzky had only a trifling piece by Corsican Henri Martelli. Stokowski's pace was brisk but with odds so against him it was not surprising that Koussevitzky was ready first to start on the first U. S. performance of Maurice Ravel's new Piano Concerto.

Koussevitzky deserved to win. Composer Ravel had promised him the première to help celebrate the Boston Symphony's semi-centennial (TIME, Oct. 13, 1930). Ravel claimed then that he was "aiming less at profundity than at setting in relief the pianist's virtuosity." Just the same he could not get his Concerto finished last year. It took him two years to write it, working ten and twelve hours a day. When it was done, his contract with Koussevitzky was already broken. Conductor Stokowski was also a potent leader with a penchant for doing "first times." What could be more diplomatic than to have both conductors present the Concerto simultaneously?

Stokowski's performance and Koussevitzky's were typical. Stokowski's was brilliant, electric. Koussevitzky's had more elegance, more finesse. Ravel's music was equally characteristic. There was a gay, light beginning in which the piano took the lead while the orchestra shimmered all around it, a slow movement lengthily developed and embroidered, a quick finale discreetly syncopated. All of it was the glittering, impersonal kind of music that people have come to associate with the Ravel so notedly fastidious about his neckties, his pastries, his home-grown hot-house flowers. Bostonians liked the soloing of Pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma. Philadelphians were just as pleased with Pianist Sylvan Levin. In both cities the urbane Ravel has become so popular that his Concerto was accepted unquestioningly as a big event of the season.

188

Symphony Concert

Beethoven, Brahms And Leave-Taking

TRANS.

Superlative Performances Of Contrasted Classics Gild The Farewell Rites

apr 30

THE PURISTS of the Symphony Concerts are the young persons who frequent the "rush seats" on Friday afternoons. They are not many because nowadays the seats are few; but, for their part, they are austere, detached, exacting; an unsentimental tribe, as becomes sophisticated youth in this spring of 1932. Well in advance they scrutinize the pending program; weigh compositions and composers; consider the "assisting artist"; establish a scale of interest and values; decide whether the sum total warrants attendance. Incidental or semi-extraneous circumstances influence them little or nothing. Like the great, the good, the only perfect Monsieur Romain Rolland through the late war, they are "above the mêlée."

The final afternoon concert of the fifty-first year of the orchestra (which happened to befall yesterday) is no more and no less to these than, say, the ninth matinée of the forty-fifth. The speculative mind sees and hears them in imagination. "Two symphonies, huh! What a program!" (One might believe them disciples of the venerable editor of the program-book itself.) "Beethoven's Eighth and Brahms's First." Or, if they wear the learned sock, "Beethoven in F"—as though he were a church-service—and "Brahms in C minor." Under whatever designation old and repetitious "hat." (Probably not one in twenty of them has heard "the little Eighth" twice in her young life.) Better the tea-room, the cigarettes and a deal of prattle on the side—if Friday afternoon must be misspent.

Consequently those "rush seats," yesterday, were rather thinly peopled; while in the balcony below and on the floor beneath the full numbers and the general animation of a final matinée were in pleasing evidence. "It's smart to be thrifty," as the monitors of fashion daily tell us. Perhaps for that good reason, bright spring millinery was less on view than it has often been through an April afternoon in Symphony Hall. For certain, spring was in the air—strong enough to disperse the blended brands of cigarette-smoke in the corridors; while here and there august matrons examining out of the experience of a generation the conductorial apparel, discovered in it also signs of the season.

It is the merest convention to call spring the renewal of life, the annual miracle of the stirring of the sap within us. All that may have passed muster when mankind and womankind lived in a state of Rousseau-like nature. Long since, we substituted the life of urban artifice. In that state, to which not Heaven but we ourselves have called us, spring is the breaking-up time, the happy promise and foretaste of the drowsy idleness, the grateful irresponsibility of summer. "Breaking-up times," as most learned at school, are eminently cheerful occasions. They are such also at Symphony Hall on the final Friday—only to be matched in liveliness by the autumn reassembling, set for October the seventh next.

Besides, there were the annual rites to renew and in one detail to alter. No sooner had Dr. Koussevitzky appeared in the doorway at the right of the stage than Mr. Burgin gave the signal and the orchestra rose in salute. For once, however, the assemblage did not rise with it. A few drifted up here and there; then, discovering their relative solitude, sat summarily down. Can it be that audiences at Symphony Hall are at last outgrowing that superfluity and provinciality of deference, in which they used indiscriminately to abound, reserving it, say, for the septuagenarian Paderewski. Certainly, the common will to stay sitting was no indifference to the eminent and cherished conductor. Old hands, plying the measuring stick of memory, affirmed that none of the seven preceding adieux had been warmer.

As it was, the audience clapped long and lustily; the standing orchestra, with anything from a trombone to a violin to hold safely, did what they might; while the conductor exhibited a pleasing blend of pleasure, embarrassment and honorable inclination to smile first at the men who have worked with him; second at the audience that these six months had taken the pleasure of both. Needless, also, to say, these rites were resumed at the end of the first Symphony, renewed and lengthened at the close of the second and the concert. Indeed, the last vision was like the first—the conductor in the midst of his standing orchestra; all before them the applauding company. But a matinée audience is not long to be stayed. The homing instinct speeds it forth. On Saturday nights—good New-Englanders that we are!—we dawdle.

And those two Symphonies? For once the reviewer cries his readers for mercy and remission. If they would have him analytic (which is his infirmity) they may turn to another page of this paper and read him in meditative discourse upon the symphonic season tout compris. When he can see and feel the velvet of the spring night outside his study windows; when his eyes wander gratefully across the table to the figures "24" on the cover of the final program-book, need he rack his brain to find something fresh, iluminating and engaging to say about "Beethoven in F" and "Brahms in C minor"? God bless us all! The little symphony of the great Ludwig was played for the first time one hundred and eighteen years ago and pens—and typewriters—have been pottering over it ever since, as though its humors and simplicities and happy inventions did not flow along quite able to bubble and babble for themselves. And how much fair white paper has "Brahms in C minor" scrawled with gallons of ink since he—or it—burst upon a half-expectant, half-mistrustful world at Karlsruhe in 1876? After all the reviewer is only a glorified and in this instance, an undutiful reporter; whereas the German "interpreters" of music are always dutiful and sometimes love a roseate mist of streaming words.

"This little Eighth," says Herr Bekker looking through protuberant spectacles across a thick piled study-table "is a symphonic rondo, the crown of a ripe philosophy, which sees joyous play and glad activity as the goal of life as absolute truth. . . . This clarity, this purity, this sunshine, this freedom from earthly burdens, this absolute conquest of matter, is found through humor—the saving gift of laughter, which rings clear above all questions, all cries of pain, strife or triumph. The symphony in F major preaches a speculative wisdom, a Zarathustran philosophy, stron and forceful, so that we feel it could b revealed through a very great and exceptional spirit.

Yes: through more than a century th notion has spread abroad that Beethove was really that; also the notion that deal of "cultural" philosophizing has bee wasted upon such a self-contained an clear-spoken symphony as "Beethoven i F major." . . . And, if all that will no content the chance reader who "take concert-going seriously," he may rea also the blood-brother of Herr Bekker—to wit Herr Niemann, discoursing o Brahms in C minor. "It is only whe we are not content merely to hea Brahms's First Symphony played, but a it were, live with it and into it, tha Bülow's mot about the Tenth Symphon becomes comprehensible and finds som solid basis. It is only then that it awaken in us the consciousness of a deepl stirring and even shattering inward experience. It is only when, for instanc an Arthur Nikisch succeeds by his magic spells in converting this reserve low-spirited Low German, intellectu rather than sensuous, into a Southerne with intense, passionate emotions, an fanning the latent ardor of feeling an passion glimmering beneath the ashe into a devouring fire which has something at once terrifying and ravishing about it, that this grandiose symphonic cartoon becomes an oil painting full of glowing colors. Such power is only granted to a very few elect and great among conductors." And how is that for High?

"Such power" dwelt yesterday in Dr. Koussevitzky; went forth from him upon his orchestra; from both upon their audience. Out of "Brahms in C minor" they wrought a veritable pageant of the power and the beauty of music when there are diviners to hear the composer winging thought with emotion; when there are executants to transform black notes upon white paper into the musing loveliness, the driving tumults, the marching splendors of engendered sound. Upon the Finale, or rather upon the pages that are introduction to the ultimate entrance of the triumphant hymn, conductor and orchestra could wreak themselves. Once more they did the miracle that transfuses the skill of the horn-player upon his curved and hollowed brass into a Brahmsian poetry of tone; that from the rhythmed impact of bows upon strings above reverberant wood evokes the Brahmsian will to power.

But again there shall be no dwelling upon these sensations. Enough that all the six performances of this Symphony from Dr. Koussevitzky upon Bostonian ears seemed now in the seventh concentrated and consummated. Nor is there reason to expatiate upon the luminous tone, the keen, bright phrasing, the touch-and-go pace and accent, the humor here, the light felicity there, that wrought "the little Eighth" into a music that left only elation behind. At Symphony Hall to many an auditor, these are matters of course, yielding agreeable sensations on a symphonic Friday. To others, blessedly unborn to Bostonian self-complacence or timely escaped from it, they are signs and wonders. H. T. P.

Another Semester of Music

adv May 1

By Morris Hastings

THE soaring finale of Brahms' First Symphony had sounded full and clear. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's final rehearsal of the season was over. Dr. Koussevitzky laid down his baton and warmly thanked the great orchestra for its work this year. Then, throwing his cloak, boulevardier-fashion, about his shoulders he swept from the stage while the orchestra to a man arose and cheered him.

A moment later, the dynamic conductor, his mobile face still flushed with excitement, appeared at the door of his dressing room and cordially ushered in this visitor.

"A great season. A superb orchestra," were his first words. "It has never played so beautifully as it has this past year."

To talk with Dr. Koussevitzky is to marvel at and to admire his enthusiasm. It is to understand the fire of his interpretations. It is, above all, to be completely captivated by his charm and friendliness, which make one forget the austerity of the huge room, barren except for a piano, couch and a few chairs.

A Busy Summer

Far from taking a complete rest this summer, Dr. Koussevitzky will go first to Paris, the only city in the world where he owns a home. Then, he is to make a trip to Vienna where he will conduct a number of concerts and act as judge in an international music competition.

When the first of August rolls around, he will get out his double-bass and begin practicing for the recital he is to give here next season. Too, there are the piles of new manuscripts to be examined, always in the hope of finding a masterpiece for the Boston Symphony to present.

Dr. Koussevitzky had much to say concerning the difficult art of program-making, an art at which he has shown his aptitude this past year more markedly than before.

"One must restrain his enthusiasm for the moderns and not devote a whole program to them. After all, a symphony orchestra is not a laboratory for experimentation." As he talked his sensitive hands described graceful curves and angles.

"These moderns, rather, must be put along with recognized classics, such as Bach or Beethoven, or with classics whose recognition has been long-delayed, such as Bruckner and Mahler.

"We no longer need devote time to moderns who have nothing to say. Now that their storm and stress period is ended, we know the gold from the dross. Perhaps there is not much gold, but it does exist and that is encouraging."

The hotly debated question of

Continued on Page 8, Column 3

GOODBYES FROM KOUSSEVITZKY

Continued From Page 6.

the American composer and his reception in this country entered the conversation. Dr. Koussevitzky smiled and tilted his head as he recalled the complaint that American composers find it difficult to get a hearing in America.

"But only this past year, we have played here in Boston a concerto by Harold Morris, one by Gershwin, another by Hill as well as symphonic works by Copland and Sowerby. If an American composer writes something that I consider striking, I will not hesitate to play it."

"How greatly does a knowledge of a composer's life and character influence your interpretation of his music?" Dr. Koussevitzky was asked.

"Hardly at all," was his reply. "Beethoven and Wagner, we all know, were thoroughly disagreeable persons. And yet their music does not mirror that fact. And so it goes."

It is a pleasure to know that Dr. Koussevitzky will return next fall. His devotion to the art of music and his superb gifts as conductor have brought the Boston Symphony to its present enormously high peak. Boston is proud of him.

THE CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAY 3 - 1932

Musical Notes

TRIBUTE TO DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Without benefit of a festival such as the several preceding springs have seen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is closing its 51st season with the concerts of April 29-30. But, it should not be deduced that the season has therefore been devoid of interest, or even, of memorial observances. For a program was devoted to the music of Haydn in honor of his bicentennial, and another paid tribute to Goethe through the playing of Wagner's "Faust" Overture and of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. The revival of the Liszt score was one of the events of the musical year.

Obviously, neither of these anniversaries called for a week of music; and there can be little doubt that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was well advised not to attempt to make an annual custom of an undertaking which is likely to be successful only when occasion demands it. Next spring, probably, another festival may be looked for, in celebration of the Brahms centenary.

The main series of 24 pairs of concerts, just ending, has brought forth the customary number of novelties. If these have not all proved epochal, nobody need be astonished. Conductors perform new music; they do not as a rule write it. They cannot be blamed, therefore, if a new masterpiece is not available for each program.

Of the novelties which Dr. Koussevitzky has disclosed this season, however, a reasonable proportion have seemed to be additions of some importance to the symphonic repertory. At least two of the works which appeared on a first hearing to possess value were penned—Europeans will be surprised to hear—by Americans. These were the "Symphonic Ode" of Mr. Aaron Copland and the Piano Concerto of Mr. Harold Morris. Another new American piece which received a great deal of publicity—Mr. George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for orchestra with piano—did not impress the present chronicler as indispensable.

The same comment applies to some of the European works which were performed for the first time in public, such as the Dukelsky "Epitaph" or the Martelli "Concerto."

Some of the compositions which had their first American hearing in this series, on the other hand, held much of interest. Such were the Ravel Piano Concerto, and the Ninth Symphony of Mahler. Items of lesser concern in this class were the disappointing Stravinsky Violin Concerto and Toch's "Bunte" Suite.

The close of Dr. Koussevitzky's eighth year of dictatorship finds the orchestra a superb instrument, capable of amazing feats of execution. These qualities were displayed conspicuously in the final Friday afternoon concert, at which Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the Brahms First made up the program.

The Beethoven was delectably etched, the Brahms nobly proclaimed. There were warm demonstrations, at the beginning and at the close of the Friday concert, for Dr. Koussevitzky, who shared the tribute with the orchestra.

It was a tribute well deserved by conductor and men. The present artistic stature of this orchestra, and its apparent material security, justify the traditional policy of the management in entrusting the organization to one conductor, who remains in active direction of a body of musicians of his own choosing and molding.—C. S. Monitor

---

SUND

MAY 1 1932

PERFECT TONE FOR ORCHESTRAS.

"I was much intrigued by one instrument that was used in the Boston Symphony concert," said a man who came in from 'the sticks' to attend.

"It was stationed down front in the extreme right side of the stage, next to the harps, and it looked like something that had been manufactured at home. Its dull gray paint looked like a home-made job, too. There was so much to see that I didn't notice it until the player took his seat at it for the third number, the Ravel ballet suite. Then I became curious to learn what sort of sound might come out of it. But I didn't find out, for every time the player got busy, which was infrequently, it was when forked lightnings of sound were darting and the thunder of instrumentation bulging the Auditorium walls. So whether it gave out a squeak or a roar I shall never know. Doubtless, Dr. Koussevitzky and perhaps the neighboring harpists heard it, but I am certain no one else did, except perhaps the man who played it and who, I noted, 'doubled' as a violinist in the other numbers.

"It all goes to show how hard a great orchestra leader will struggle to get a perfect tone effect. Here was this this thing, which must have taken two men to move and taken up considerable space in a baggage car, imported from Boston merely to give a fe toots, or whatever they wer that blended all but indisti guishably with the ensemble.

"O yes, I learned next da hat the thing is a 'celesti nd that it is really a sort ttle organ." — Springfiel nion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

MAY 2 1932

Ravel Race

The start was even. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky came out on Boston's Symphony Hall stage last week at precisely the same moment that Leopold Stokowski appeared on the Philadelphia Academy of Music stage. Koussevitzky's entrance was dignified, unflurried. Stokowski fairly flew from the wings. But then Stokowski had a longer first lap. He had the gloomy Fourth Symphony of Finnish Jan Sibelius to get through with, whereas Koussevitzky had only a trifling piece by Corsican Henri Martelli. Stokowski's pace was brisk but with odds so against him it was not surprising that Koussevitzky was ready first to start on the first U. S. performance of Maurice Ravel's new Piano Concerto.

Koussevitzky deserved to win. Composer Ravel had promised him the première to help celebrate the Boston Symphony's semi-centennial (TIME, Oct. 13, 1930). Ravel claimed then that he was "aiming less at profundity than at setting in relief the pianist's virtuosity." Just the same he could not get his Concerto finished last year. It took him two years to write it, working ten and twelve hours a day. When it was done, his contract with Koussevitzky was already broken. Conductor Stokowski was also a potent leader with a penchant for doing "first times." What could be more diplomatic than to have both conductors present the Concerto simultaneously?

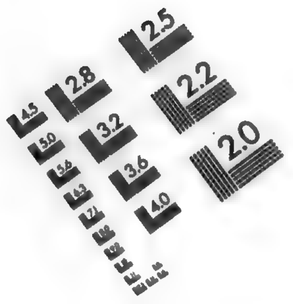
Stokowski's performance and Koussevitzky's were typical. Stokowski's was brilliant, electric. Koussevitzky's had more elegance, more finesse. Ravel's music was equally characteristic. There was a gay, light beginning in which the piano took the lead while the orchestra shimmered all around it, a slow movement lengthily developed and embroidered, a quick finale discreetly syncopated. All of it was the glittering, impersonal kind of music that people have come to associate with the Ravel so notedly fastidious about his neckties, his pastries, his home-grown hot-house flowers. Bostonians liked the soloing of Pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma. Philadelphians were just as pleased with Pianist Sylvan Levin. In both cities the urbane Ravel has become so popular that his Concerto was accepted unquestioningly as a big event of the season.

REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

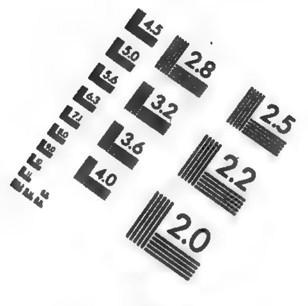
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

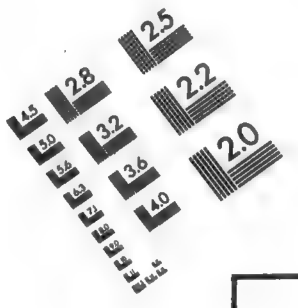


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

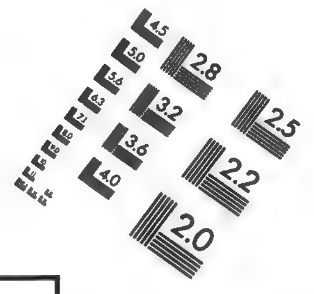


2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0

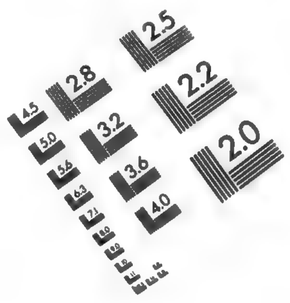


2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0

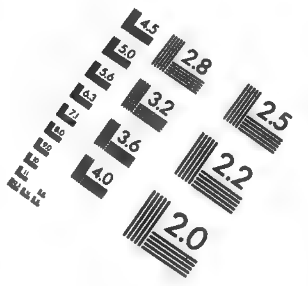
200 mm

150 mm

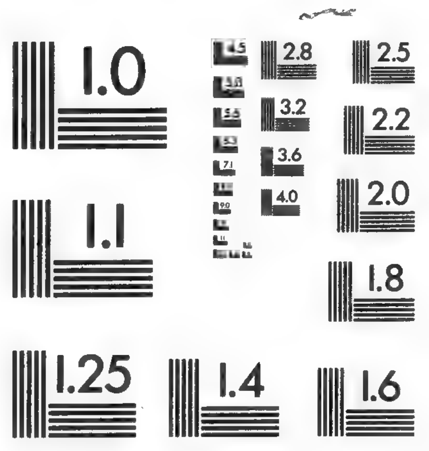
100 mm



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0



2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0



1.0
2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
2.0
4.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
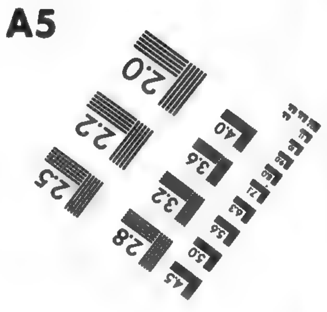
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
2.5 mm

A5

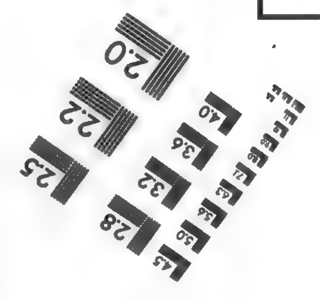


2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8

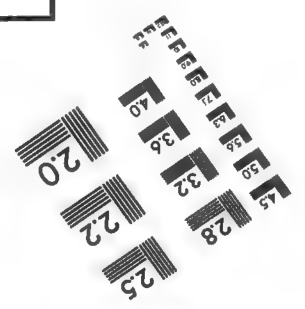
4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



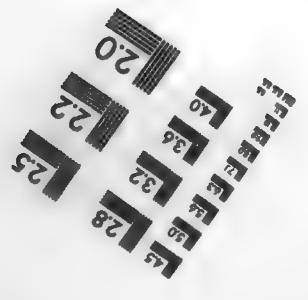
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8



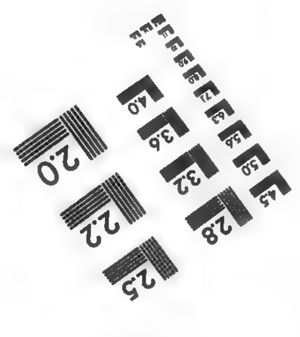
4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
2.2
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8



4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Problem of Programs, Perils to Performance

To Close the Symphonic Year Give a Thought To the Balance of Koussevitzky's Repertory And To the Orchestral Prowess He Must Now Maintain

THE PROBLEM pressing hardest upon the ambitious conductor and the ambitious hearers of the Symphony Concerts is the problem of room upon the programs. Unless there is a festival afoot, like that for Bach last spring or for Brahms next spring, the twenty-four pairs of long-standing subscription concerts determine the range of the symphonic year. From them come almost all the pieces played on the supplementary Mondays or Tuesdays; while the additions, if any, are usually unimportant. In fact, however, Dr. Koussevitzky has only twenty-two programs at disposal; since the other two are filled by the guest-conductor and the guest-conductor-composer of each recurring January. For those twenty-two there is annual list of indispensables.

A just number of time-honored symphonies, overtures, concertos and miscellaneous pieces must have place. There must be room also for hallowed or generally accepted music from the elder generation. Debussy, Ravel, Strauss, Sibelius, even Stravinsky, are convenient examples. The public of Symphony Hall expects to hear new works by eminent composers. Sometimes they are handed directly to the orchestra, like the new Eighth Symphony of Sibelius announced for performance next season. Sometimes they spring upon the conductor out of the air, like Ravel's Piano-Concerto a few weeks ago. Somtimes dates are set for them long in advance, as with Stravinsky's Violin-Concerto last January. In any case, once accepted, they must be fitted into an appropriate program.

It is now the warrantable and established policy of trustees and conductor, it is also the just wish of their more open-minded public, to encourage new or neglected composers, each according to his deserts, by the performance of their music. Hence in the season now ended the Suite of Frid, the Suites of Toch, the Studies by Vogel, the Concerto of Martelli. Whether these "novelties" succeed or fail, whether the conductor's choice is justified or questionable, so much more of his twenty-two programs is filled. It is the particular policy of the present régime to encourage such composers if they happen also to be native or resident Americans. Hence, through the closing season, music of Mr. Copland, Mr. Morris, Mr. Sowerby, Mr. Gershwin. Again the program-space is lessened.

There are Bostonian composers customarily heard in old works or new—say Mr. Loeffler or Mr. Hill. There are composers whose lengthy and exacting symphonies may be played only at long intervals—Mahler's or Bruckner's for example. In October and again in April, Dr. Koussevitzky made room for each. There are outcropping centenaries to be marked, like Goethe's, last March, who deeply influenced music; like Haydn's, a few weeks later, for his quality and place as composer. Usually the rites fill a whole program. Along comes an unexpected and deserving guest, as Herr Toch, and half a concert is his allotment. Such eminent virtuosi as Mr. Busch or Miss Hess may not be ignored, or there is grumbling among subscribers and loss of prestige to the concerts. The end in death of a long and illustrious career, like d'Indy's, demands one or two memorial pieces. There are the virtuoso-numbers, the spécialités de la maison, in which the orchestra must from time to time be exhibited. The Second Suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphne and Chloë" is typical instance at Symphony Hall.

So it goes through such a season as this of 1931-32. At intervals the conductor bethinks himself of the music he would gladly play. How long since that Brandenburg Concerto of Bach had place on a program? Or the eighteenth-century Symphony, even of Mozart or Haydn, that he chanced upon the other day as he fingered the library catalogue? He remembers semi-classic overtures to which he would return, that the orchestra could sound to perfection. In an unromantic time and fashion, there is still romantic nineteenth-century music that would bear re-hearing. Above all, he recalls the modern works played once, twice or three times to his own satisfaction and the general pleasure; then somehow fallen into neglect. Or the novel pieces that proved their worth at production; that he would establish by recurring performance in the active repertory.

Questionings and grumblings from his audiences echo into his ears. "Why does he not give us Stravinsky's 'Sacre' or 'Œdipus' again instead of the relatively minor 'Pulcinella'?" . . . "Will he never remember Debussy's 'Rondes de Printemps'?" . . "How long we had to wait for Strauss's 'Don Quixote'!" . . . "Has he quite forgotten Beethoven's choice little, gay little, Eighth Symphony?" And Schubert, and Schumann, and what not? In fact, the conductor grumbles at himself more than we grumble at him; would play twenty pieces where we ask for two; would re-assemble "novelty" after "novelty" that deserves familiarizing performance.

If only there were room upon programs under the conditions above set forth! As it is, the treasury of symphonic music is now far too full for those who would administer it amply and variously. Unless they are cribbed in routine or hidebound with prejudice, they chafe under constant self-denial. The burden of choice and distribution is upon every other ambitious and broad-minded conductor no less than upon Dr. Koussevitzky. He at least may congratulate himself upon the return of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," Chausson's Symphony, Franck's "Daughters of Æolus," d'Indy's "Istar," Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles." Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass,"' in this ended musical year of 1931-32. For the first times Mozart's "Requiem" was sung at the Symphony Concerts; while within a year of production Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" was repeated.

There is reason to cite these conditions not only because they expose the difficulties that beset Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making; but also because they bear witness to the open mind, the even hand, the endless consideration, with which he accomplishes a testing task. In New York, in other cities, those that speak with authority count him the most judicious, catholic and dependable program-maker in the American field. But here in Boston, where his programs—and changes of program—almost weekly praise him, he is reproached by Aunt Emily because she cannot abide the modernists; by Master Jack who fondly fancies that Beethoven and Wagner are old hat; by the Fuddy-Duddies who cannot remember how they first acquired their prejudice against Brahms or Bruckner or Mahler, but stick to it for all that. Mean while the content and exhilarated majority have come, under long habit, to take these Koussevitzkian programs as matter of course. Think back over twenty or thirty years of the Symphony Concerts. Within that time, were the programs ever maintained, season in and season out, at such a pitch or range and proportion, of diversity and vitality, as under Dr. Koussevitzky?

Another care, another obligation, incessantly pre-occupy the conductor. By common consent at home and abroad, he has restored the Boston Orchestra to the standards of performance that it practised, to the prestige that it enjoyed, at the zenith of Dr. Muck. In some respects he may even have bettered them. Such work, if progress seasonally rewards it, is immensely exhilarating—the prideful upbuilding, the nearer and nearer approach to the beckoning ideal. Now Dr. Koussevitzky must maintain the orchestra at that pitch—a task that demands unremitting vigilance, unrelaxing will, an integrity of spirit permitting no self-content and no self-deception.

These three years the orchestra has been a homogeneous body made in the conductor's image, reciprocal choir to choir, group to group, man to man. By close exaction upon every individual, by instant susceptibility to the whole effect he must now keep it such. The moment in which it ceases to be this unified and mutually sensitive body, the standard will decline, the prestige begin to wane. Often Dr. Koussevitzky returns to Mozart, to Strauss, to Ravel—three touchstones of orchestral performance. Perhaps by such tests he reassures himself of continuing homogeniety and sensibility.

The conductor and the orchestra excel in the vitalizing of the classics. The masterpieces of Beethoven—the "Eroica" or the Ninth Symphony, the Third "Leonore" Overture—sound from their hands and lips as great music; as great music, moreover, newly born into a hearing world. They fuse the romanticism and the introspection of Brahms, the rugged surface, the meditated procedures, the inner and poetizing warmths, into single and highly individualized impression. Not often for sonority's sake do they overdo him. Their Mozart is transparent and luminous, precise yet plastic, felicitous always. Again comes the illusion of a music new-born upon the waiting ear. Their phrasing and accent make the too songful Schubert bearable; clarify and set free the clumsy Schumann. The rich and glowing tonal textures of Strauss and Wagner, the iridescent and sparkling tonal textures of Debussy and Ravel are equally at their command. From them the modernists sound, each according to his kind and purpose; yet keep the semblance of a new and sharp-set musical speech, of a restless and adventuring musical time.

No orchestra within memory ranges so widely—and so equally; is susceptible and projecting master of so many styles. Even the chameleon-like Stravinsky cannot evade it. The price of such achievement, as has been intimated, is tireless vigilance, inexhaustible ambition, undeviating integrity. Dr. Koussevitzky still pays it, willingly, whole-mindedly, whole-heartedly. More and more he masters—even with Chaikovsky—his own exuberances of zeal. There were concerts, last autumn, last winter, this spring, in which the beauty and the power of the performance—whatever the program in itself—were incomparable upon Bostonian ears; when music strode the listening earth; was clothed in splendor; throbbed with vital and irresistible force.

At the end of these eight years under Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Concerts, and the two supplementary series, have waxed again into an aristocratic institution. They are intrinsically such, though temporary circumstance or ill-judged experiment may occasionally overcloud or diminish them. They are frequented and maintained by an élite, numerically small, widely separated in possessions, in social station, in ways and interests of life. Yet bound together at Symphony Hall by a common pleasure in the best possible performance of the best available music, without condescension or relaxation; by a common zeal, and often a common sacrifice, for such standards and continuance. In America or for that matter almost anywhere else, there is no more egregious nonsense and futility than to prattle about the popularizing of symphonic music, to see in editorial vision the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing, say, in the Boston Garden while a vast radio mob flocks to hear.

Symphonic music can never be popularized amongst us Americans because in no America that we know, or are likely to know, is it within the understanding and the interest of the rank and file. A few examples and a few individuals aside, it gives them no pleasure, not because they are unaccustomed to it, but because they are alien from it. The whole cast of their minds, the whole caurse of their lives, are at odds with the standards by which it must be chosen and performed. Symphonic music, intrinsically and in performance, must remain the pleasure and preoccupation of the few—perhaps no more than ten thousand in any populous city. (In such a cosmopolis as New York the number is set no higher.)

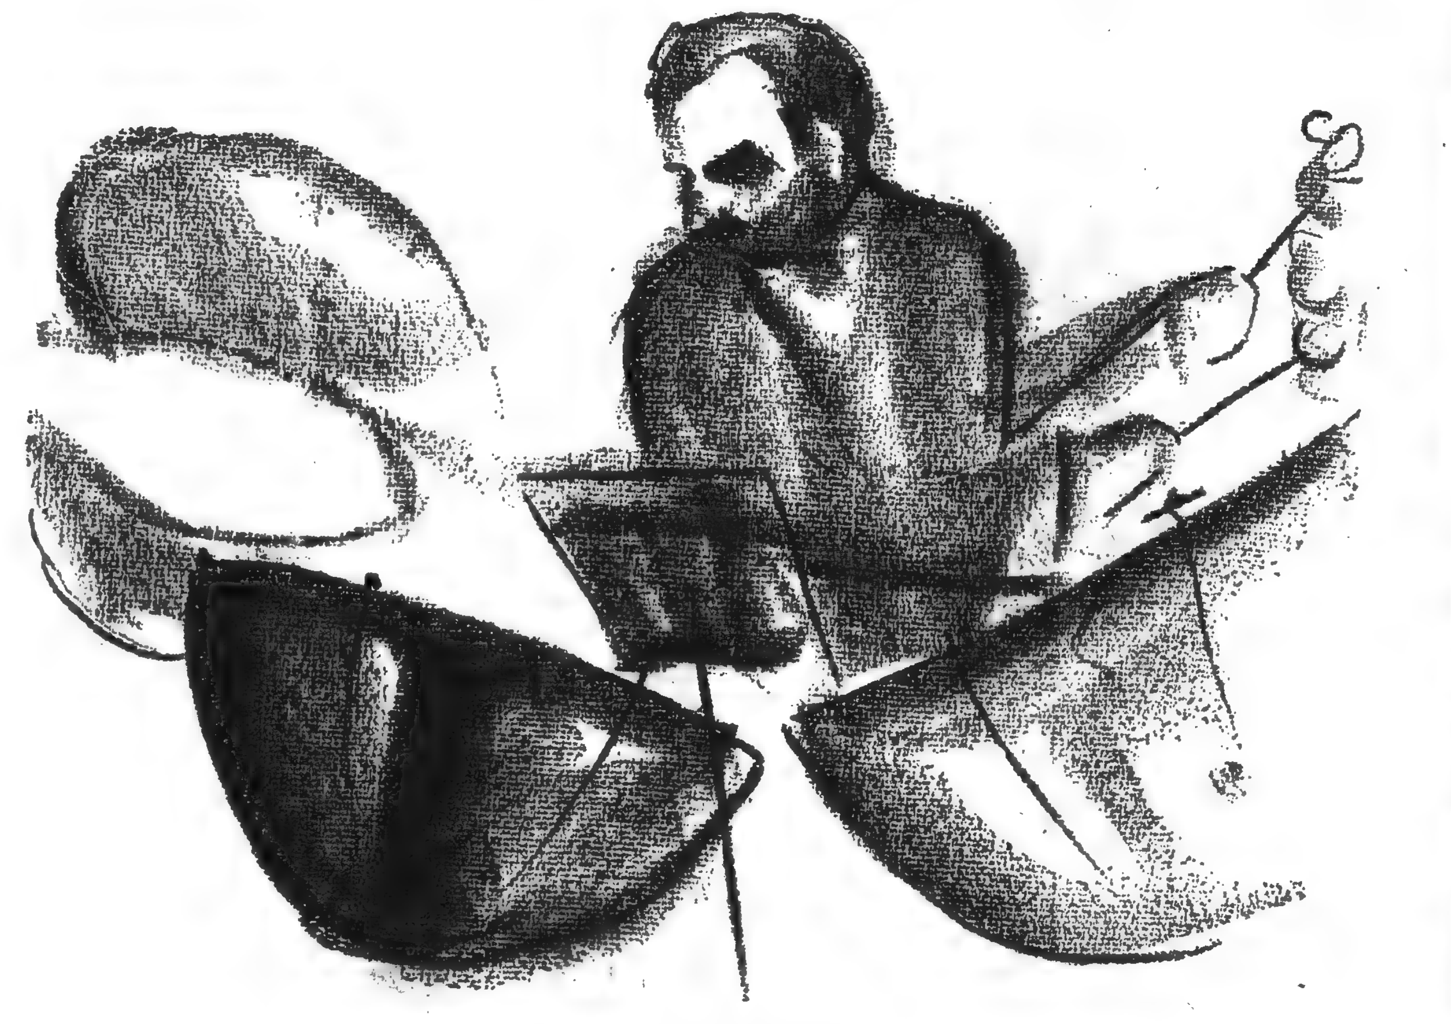
But those few can pour $60,000 as guarantee fund into the treasury of Symphony Hall in a year of general economies; contribute as well to endowment funds; renew subscriptions as though no apprehension sat on their shoulders. They can also count the Symphony Orchestra one of Boston's choicest possessions and set Dr. Koussevitzky, with Nikisch and Muck, in the first rank of its conductors. . . . Why not blurt out the truth now and again? The America in which we shall all be reduced to a common denominator of the lower pleasures is a delusion of the base.

H. T. P.

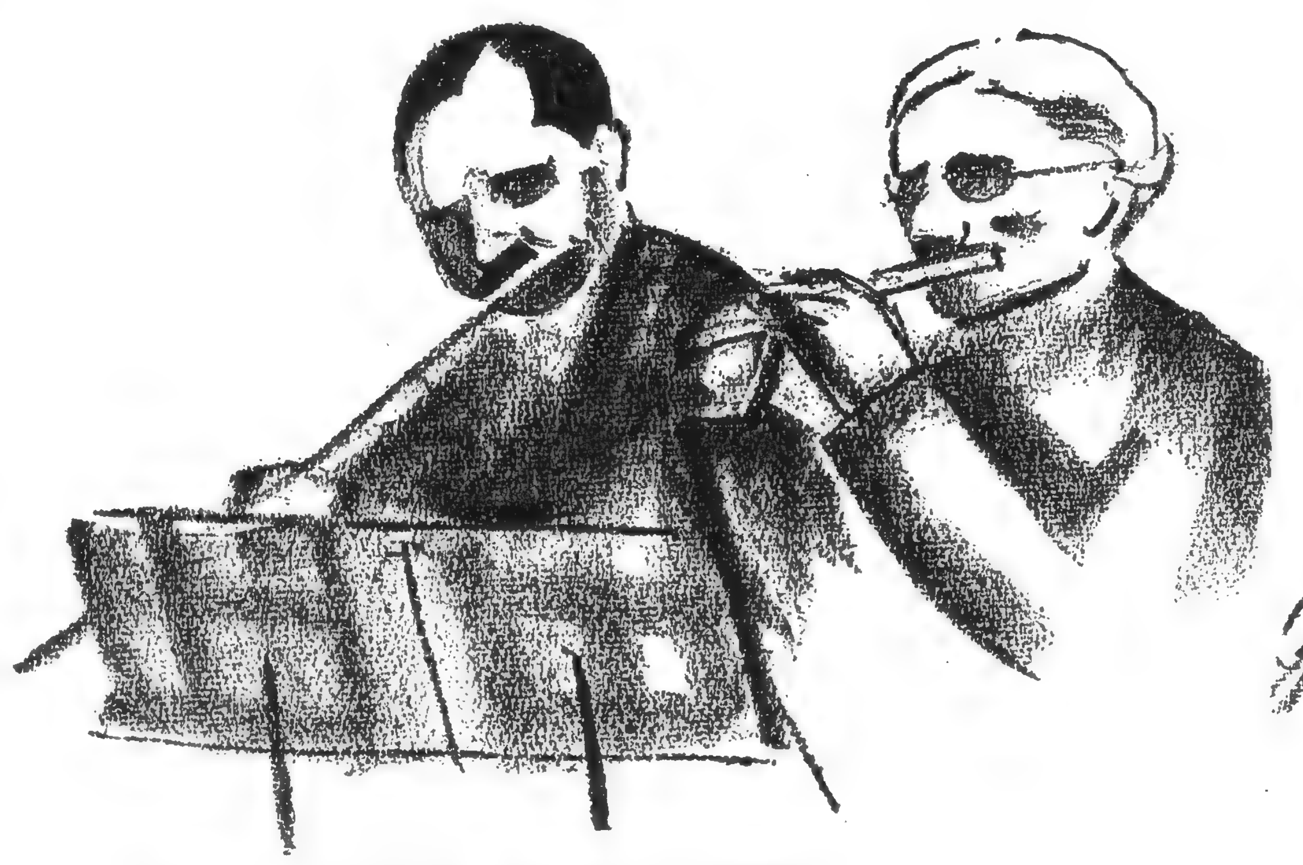
Art, Nature, Music

When the Symphony Concerts Run Full Tide

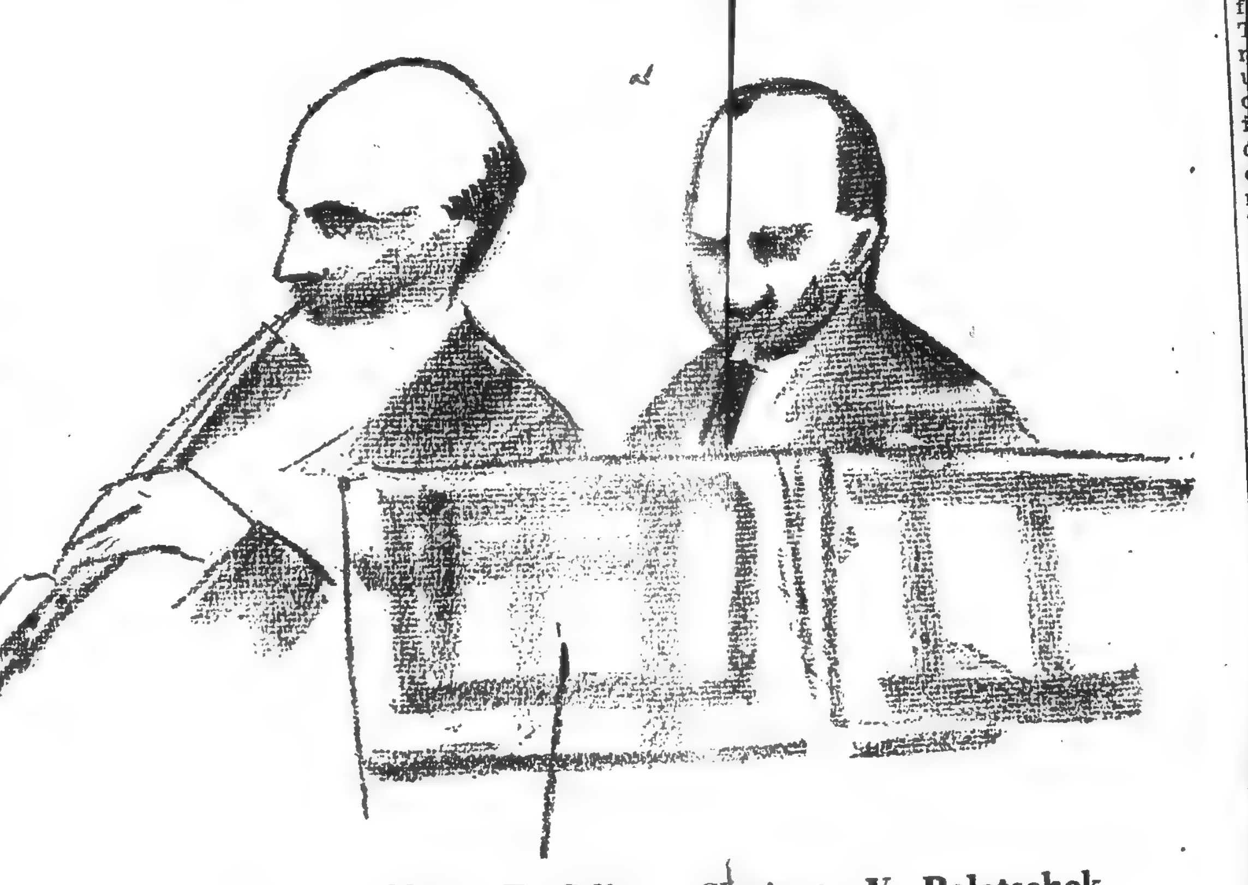
The Sketches by Emma Bourne



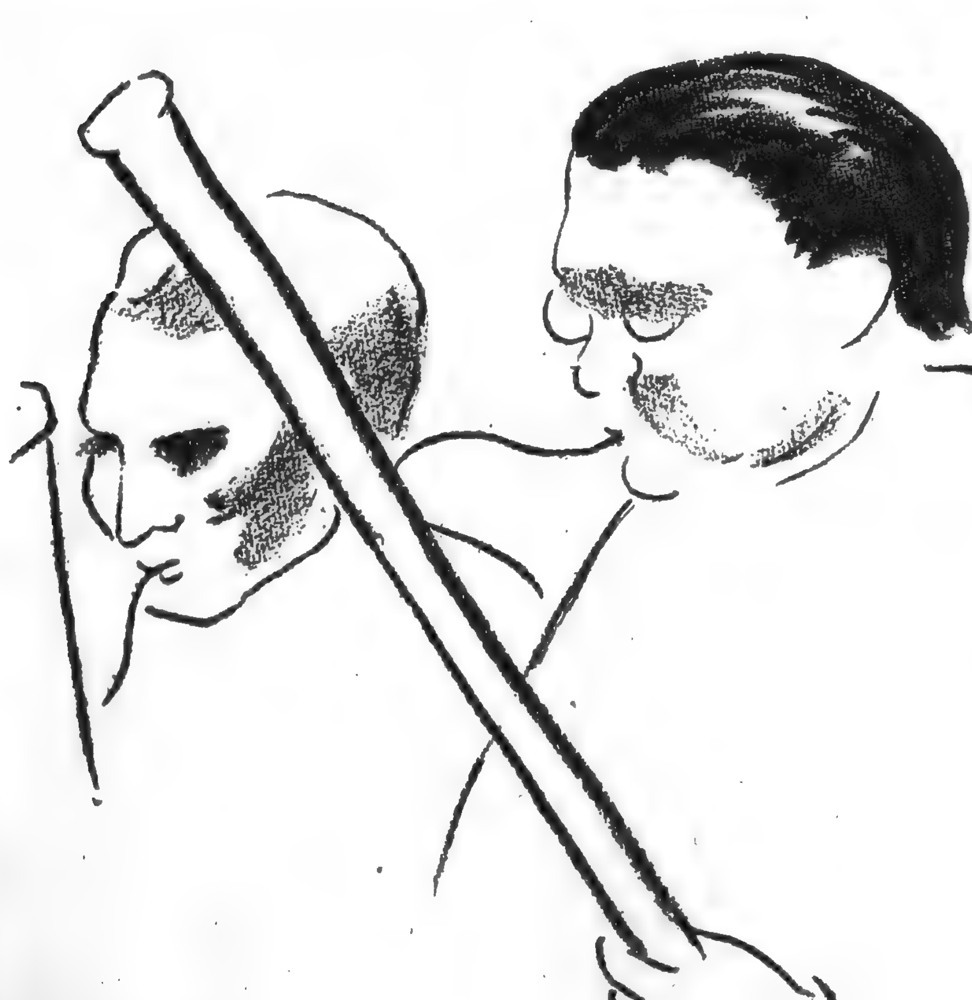
Timpani: A. Ritter



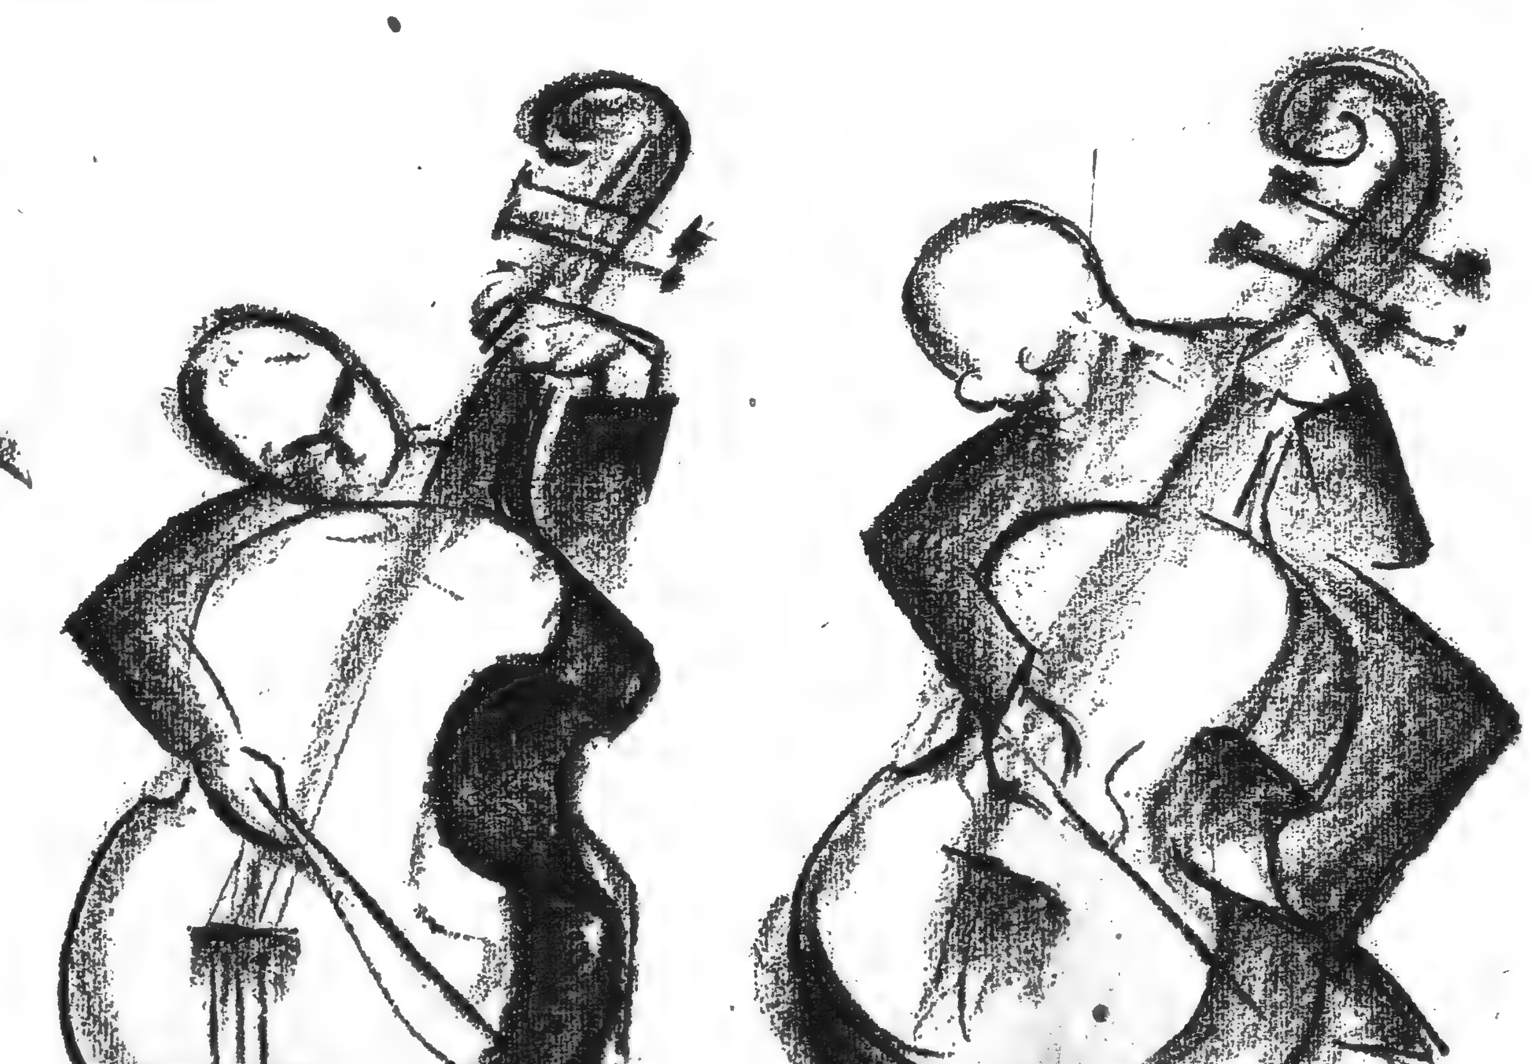
Flute: G. Laurent. Piccolo: A. Battles



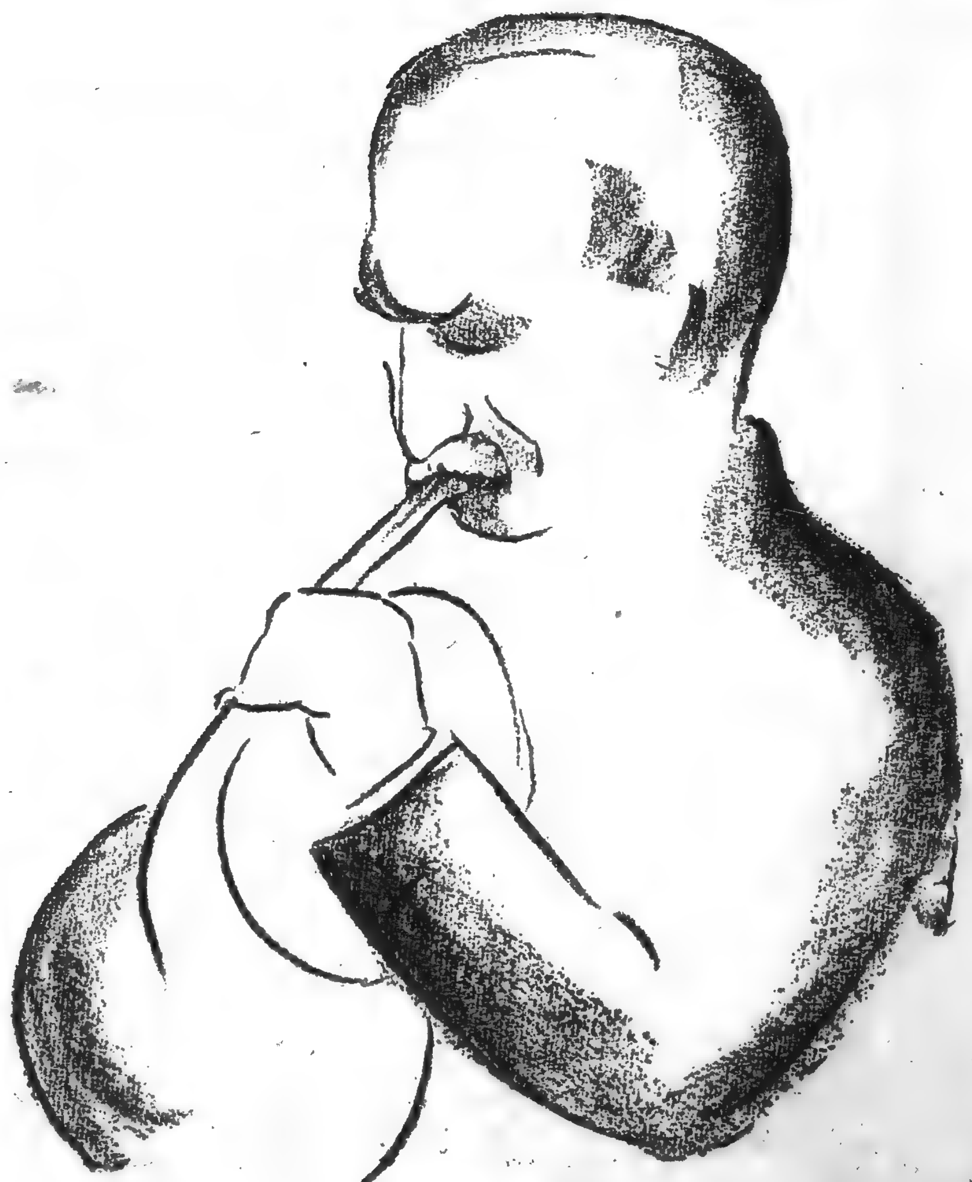
Oboe: F. Gillet. Clarinet: V. Polatschek



Bassoons: E. Panenka; A. Laus



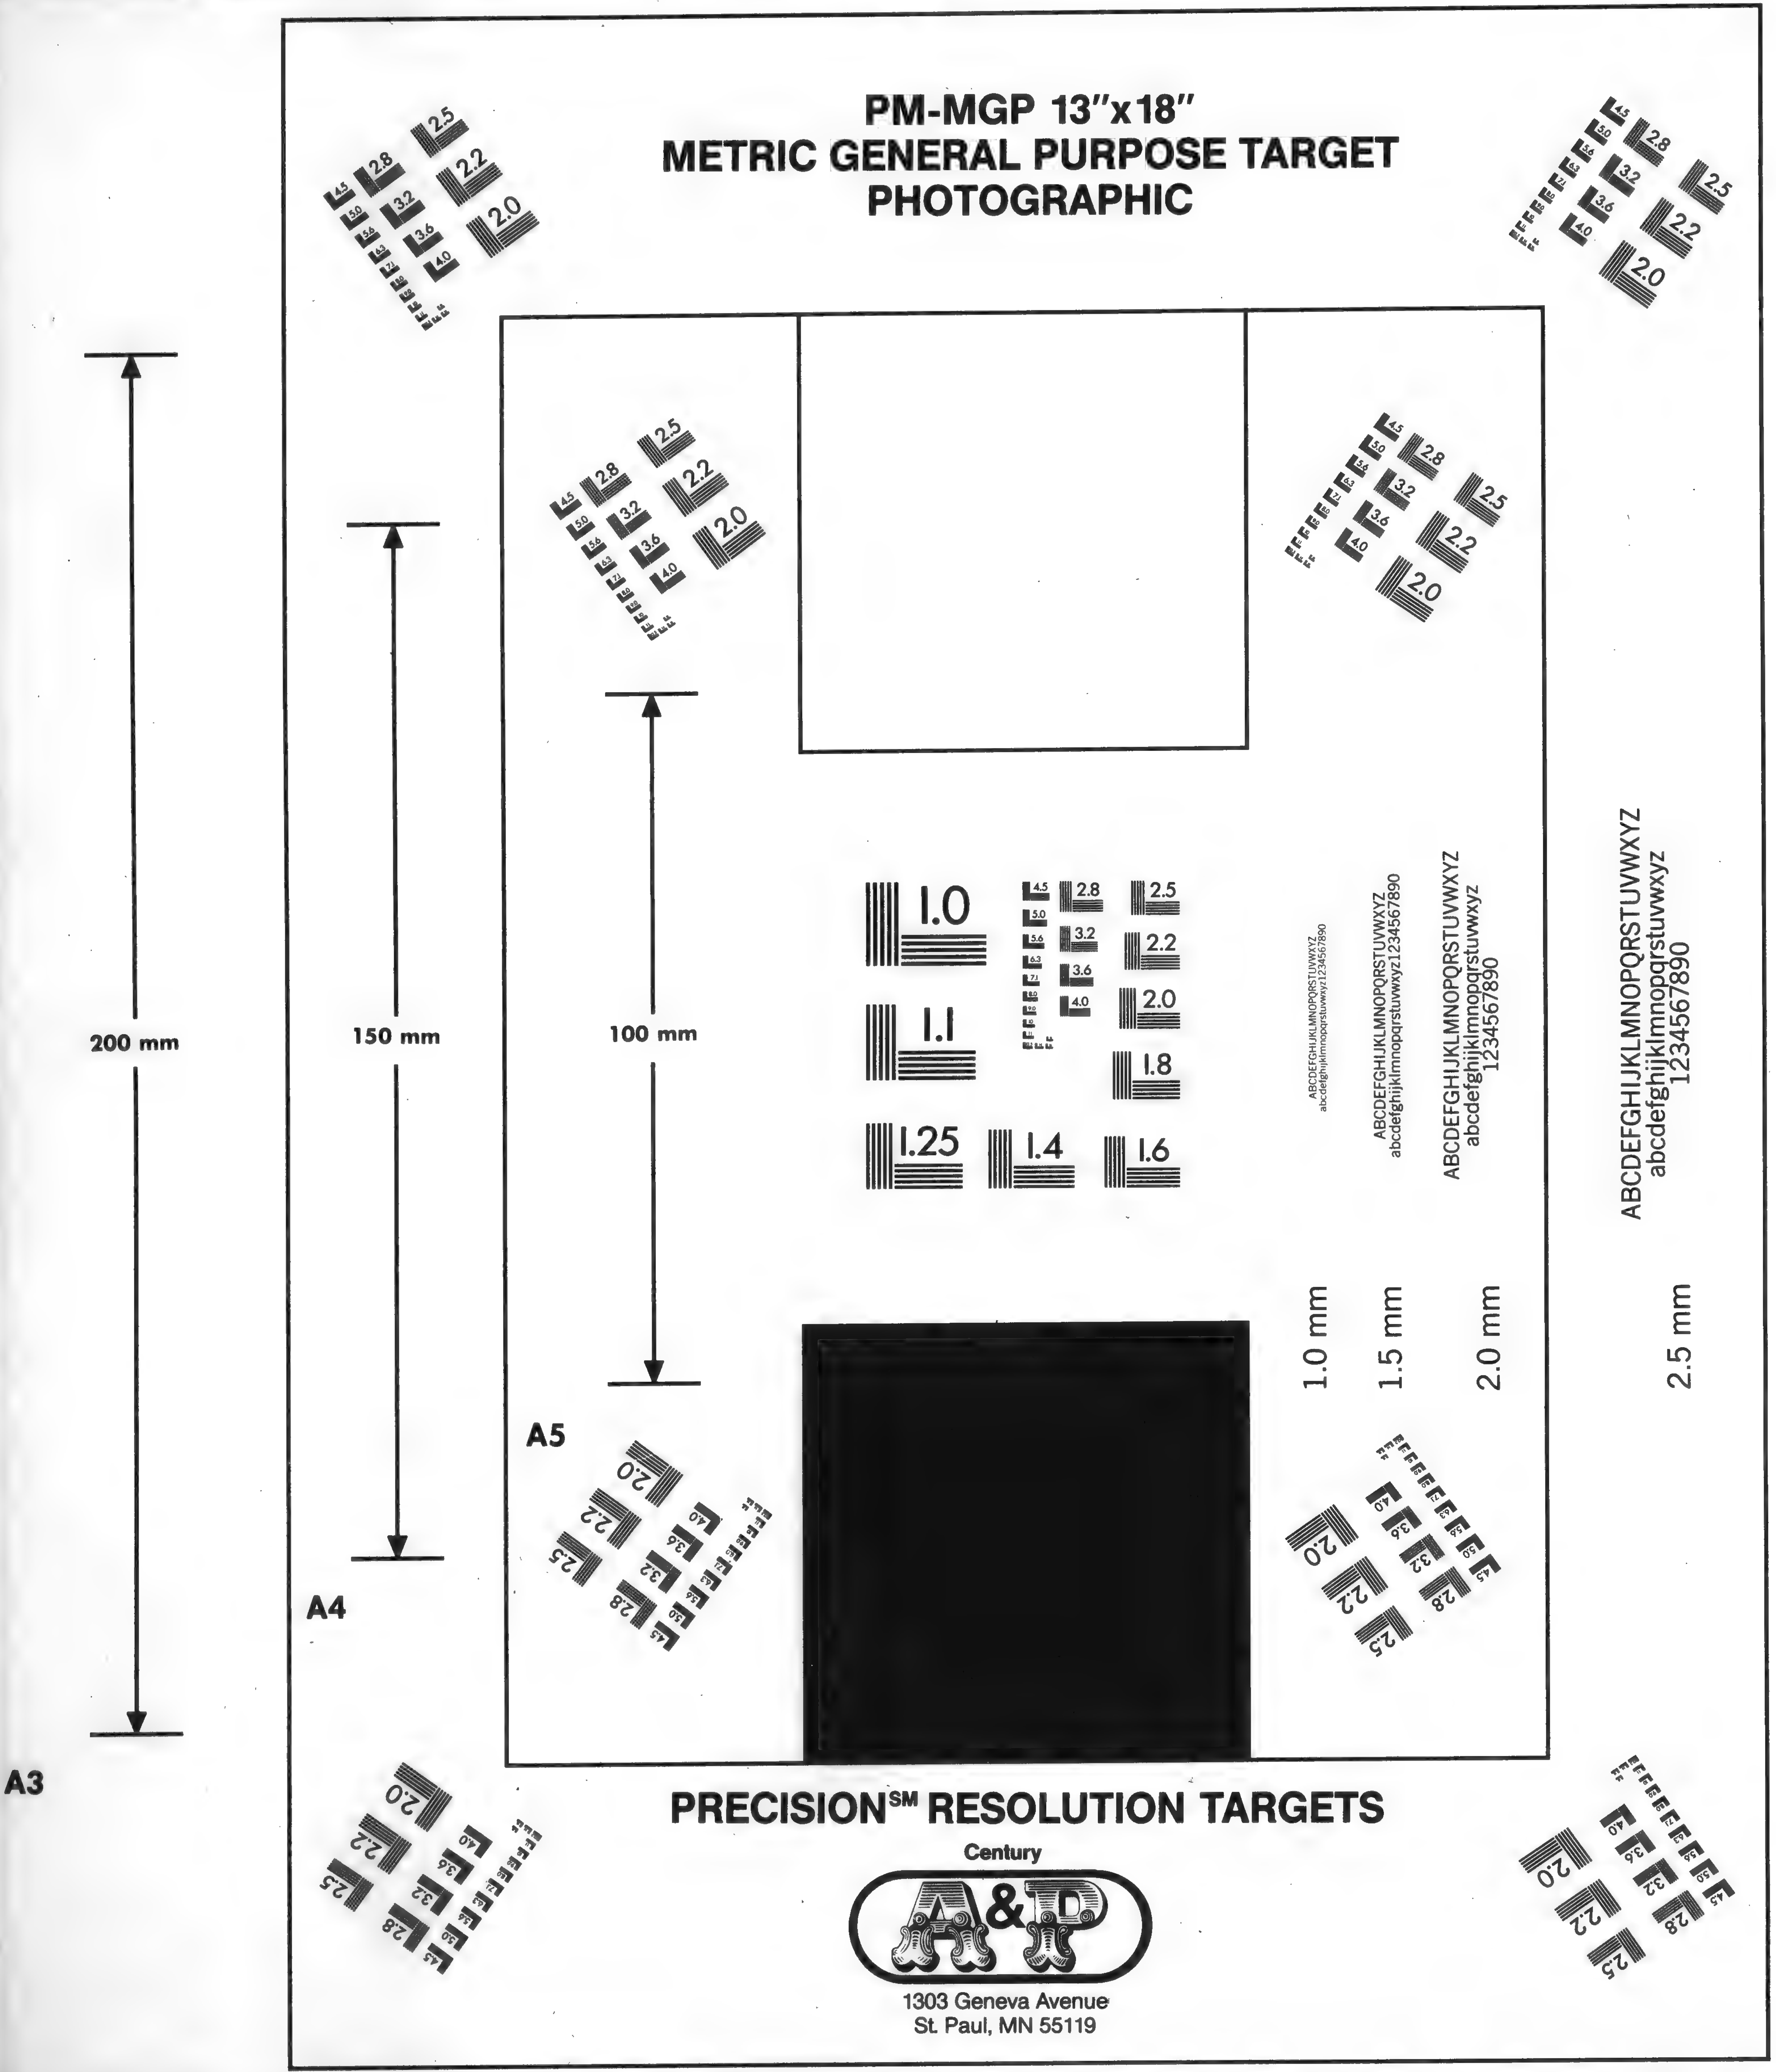
Foundation Stones: Two Basses



Horn: H. Lorbeer

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

189

Problem of Programs, Perils to Performance

To Close the Symphonic Year Give a Thought To the Balance of Koussevitzky's Repertory And To the Orchestral Prowess He Must Now Maintain

THE PROBLEM pressing hardest upon the ambitious conductor and the ambitious hearers of the Symphony Concerts is the problem of room upon the programs. Unless there is a festival afoot, like that for Bach last spring or for Brahms next spring, the twenty-four pairs of long-standing subscription concerts determine the range of the symphonic year. From them come almost all the pieces played on the supplementary Mondays or Tuesdays; while the additions, if any, are usually unimportant. In fact, however, Dr. Koussevitzky has only twenty-two programs at disposal; since the other two are filled by the guest-conductor and the guest-conductor-composer of each recurring January. For those twenty-two there is annual list of indispensables.

A just number of time-honored symphonies, overtures, concertos and miscellaneous pieces must have place. There must be room also for hallowed or generally accepted music from the elder generation. Debussy, Ravel, Strauss, Sibelius, even Stravinsky, are convenient examples. The public of Symphony Hall expects to hear new works by eminent composers. Sometimes they are handed directly to the orchestra, like the new Eighth Symphony of Sibelius announced for performance next season. Sometimes they spring upon the conductor out of the air, like Ravel's Piano-Concerto a few weeks ago. Somtimes dates are set for them long in advance, as with Stravinsky's Violin-Concerto last January. In any case, once accepted, they must be fitted into an appropriate program.

* * *

It is now the warrantable and established policy of trustees and conductor, it is also the just wish of their more open-minded public, to encourage new or neglected composers, each according to his deserts, by the performance of their music. Hence in the season now ended the Suite of Frid, the Suites of Toch, the Studies by Vogel, the Concerto of Martelli. Whether these "novelties" succeed or fail, whether the conductor's choice is justified or questionable, so much more of his twenty-two programs is filled. It is the particular policy of the present régime to encourage such composers if they happen also to be native or resident Americans. Hence, through the closing season, music of Mr. Copland, Mr. Morris, Mr. Sowerby, Mr. Gershwin. Again the program-space is lessened.

There are Bostonian composers customarily heard in old works or new—say Mr. Loeffler or Mr. Hill. There are composers whose lengthy and exacting symphonies may be played only at long intervals—Mahler's or Bruckner's for example. In October and again in April, Dr. Koussevitzky made room for each. There are outcropping centenaries to be marked, like Goethe's, last March, who deeply influenced music; like Haydn's, a few weeks later, for his quality and place as composer. Usually the rites fill a whole program. Along comes an unexpected and deserving guest, as Herr Toch, and half a concert is his allotment. Such eminent virtuosi as Mr. Busch or Miss Hess may not be ignored, or there is grumbling among subscribers and loss of prestige to the concerts. The end in death of a long and illustrious career, like d'Indy's, demands one or two memorial pieces. There are the virtuoso-numbers, the spécialités de la maison, in which the orchestra must from time to time be exhibited. The Second Suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphne and Chloë" is typical instance at Symphony Hall.

* * *

So it goes through such a season as this of 1931-32. At intervals the conductor bethinks himself of the music he would gladly play. How long since that Brandenburg Concerto of Bach had place on a program? Or the eighteenth-century Symphony, even of Mozart or Haydn, that he chanced upon the other day as he fingered the library catalogue? He remembers semi-classic overtures to which he would return, that the orchestra could sound to perfection. In an unromantic time and fashion, there is still romantic nineteenth-century music that would bear re-hearing. Above all, he recalls the modern works played once, twice or three times to his own satisfaction and the general pleasure; then somehow fallen into neglect. Or the novel pieces that proved their worth at production; that he would establish by recurring performance in the active repertory.

Questionings and grumblings from his audiences echo into his ears. "Why does he not give us Stravinsky's 'Sacre' or 'Œdipus' again instead of the relatively minor 'Pulcinella'?" . . . "Will he never remember Debussy's 'Rondes de Printemps'?" . . "How long we had to wait for Strauss's 'Don Quixote'!" . . . "Has he quite forgotten Beethoven's choice little, gay little, Eighth Symphony?" And Schubert, and Schumann, and what not? In fact, the conductor grumbles at himself more than we grumble at him; would play twenty pieces where we ask for two; would re-assemble "novelty" after "novelty" that deserves familiarizing performance.

* * *

If only there were room upon programs under the conditions above set forth! As it is, the treasury of symphonic music is now far too full for those who would administer it amply and variously. Unless they are cribbed in routine or hidebound with prejudice, they chafe under constant self-denial. The burden of choice and distribution is upon every other ambitious and broad-minded conductor no less than upon Dr. Koussevitzky. He at least may congratulate himself upon the return of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," Chausson's Symphony, Franck's "Daughters of Æolus," d'Indy's "Istar," Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles." Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass,'" in this ended musical year of 1931-32. For the first times Mozart's "Requiem" was sung at the Symphony Concerts; while within a year of production Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" was repeated.

There is reason to cite these conditions not only because they expose the difficulties that beset Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making; but also because they bear witness to the open mind, the even hand, the endless consideration, with which he accomplishes a testing task. In New York, in other cities, those that speak with authority count him the most judicious, catholic and dependable program-maker in the American field. But here in Boston, where his programs—and changes of program—almost weekly praise him, he is reproached by Aunt Emily because she cannot abide the modernists; by Master Jack who fondly fancies that Beethoven and Wagner are old hat; by the Fuddy-Duddies who cannot remember how they first acquired their prejudice against Brahms or Bruckner or Mahler, but stick to it for all that. Mean while the content and exhilarated majority have come, under long habit, to take these Koussevitzkian programs as matter of course. Think back over twenty or thirty years of the Symphony Concerts. Within that time, were the programs ever maintained, season in and season out, at such a pitch or range and proportion, of diversity and vitality, as under Dr. Koussevitzky?

Another care, another obligation, incessantly pre-occupy the conductor. By common consent at home and abroad, he has restored the Boston Orchestra to the standards of performance that it practised, to the prestige that it enjoyed, at the zenith of Dr. Muck. In some respects he may even have bettered them. Such work, if progress seasonally rewards it, is immensely exhilarating—the prideful upbuilding, the nearer and nearer approach to the beckoning ideal. Now Dr. Koussevitzky must maintain the orchestra at that pitch—a task that demands unremitting vigilance, unrelaxing will, an integrity of spirit permitting no self-content and no self-deception.

These three years the orchestra has been a homogeneous body made in the conductor's image, reciprocal choir to choir, group to group, man to man. By close exaction upon every individual, by instant susceptibility to the whole effect he must now keep it such. The moment in which it ceases to be this unified and mutually sensitive body, the standard will decline, the prestige begin to wane. Often Dr. Koussevitzky returns to Mozart, to Strauss, to Ravel—three touchstones of orchestral performance. Perhaps by such tests he reassures himself of continuing homogeniety and sensibility.

The conductor and the orchestra excel in the vitalizing of the classics. The masterpieces of Beethoven—the "Eroica" or the Ninth Symphony, the Third "Leonore" Overture—sound from their hands and lips as great music; as great music, moreover, newly born into a hearing world. They fuse the romanticism and the introspection of Brahms, the rugged surface, the meditated procedures, the inner and poetizing warmths, into single and highly individualized impression. Not often for sonority's sake do they overdo him. Their Mozart is transparent and luminous, precise yet plastic, felicitous always. Again comes the illusion of a music new-born upon the waiting ear. Their phrasing and accent make the too songful Schubert bearable; clarify and set free the clumsy Schumann. The rich and glowing tonal textures of Strauss and Wagner, the iridescent and sparkling tonal textures of Debussy and Ravel are equally at their command. From them the modernists sound, each according to his kind and purpose; yet keep the semblance of a new and sharp-set musical speech, of a restless and adventuring musical time.

No orchestra within memory ranges so widely—and so equally; is susceptible and projecting master of so many styles. Even the chameleon-like Stravinsky cannot evade it. The price of such achievement, as has been intimated, is tireless vigilance, inexhaustible ambition, undeviating integrity. Dr. Koussevitzky still pays it, willingly, whole-mindedly, whole-heartedly. More and more he masters—even with Chaikovsky—his own exuberances of zeal. There were concerts, last autumn, last winter, this spring, in which the beauty and the power of the performance—whatever the program in itself—were incomparable upon Bostonian ears; when music strode the listening earth; was clothed in splendor; throbbed with vital and irresistible force.

At the end of these eight years under Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Concerts, and the two supplementary series, have waxed again into an aristocratic institution. They are intrinsically such, though temporary circumstance or ill-judged experiment may occasionally overcloud or diminish them. They are frequented and maintained by an élite, numerically small, widely separated in possessions, in social station, in ways and interests of life. Yet bound together at Symphony Hall by a common pleasure in the best possible performance of the best available music, without condescension or relaxation; by a common zeal, and often a common sacrifice, for such standards and continuance. In America or for that matter almost anywhere else, there is no more egregious nonsense and futility than to prattle about the popularizing of symphonic music, to see in editorial vision the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing, say, in the Boston Garden while a vast radio mob flocks to hear.

Symphonic music can never be popularized amongst us Americans because in no America that we know, or are likely to know, is it within the understanding and the interest of the rank and file. A few examples and a few individuals aside, it gives them no pleasure, not because they are unaccustomed to it, but because they are alien from it. The whole cast of their minds, the whole caurse of their lives, are at odds with the standards by which it must be chosen and performed. Symphonic music, intrinsically and in performance, must remain the pleasure and preoccupation of the few—perhaps no more than ten thousand in any populous city. (In such a cosmopolis as New York the number is set no higher.)

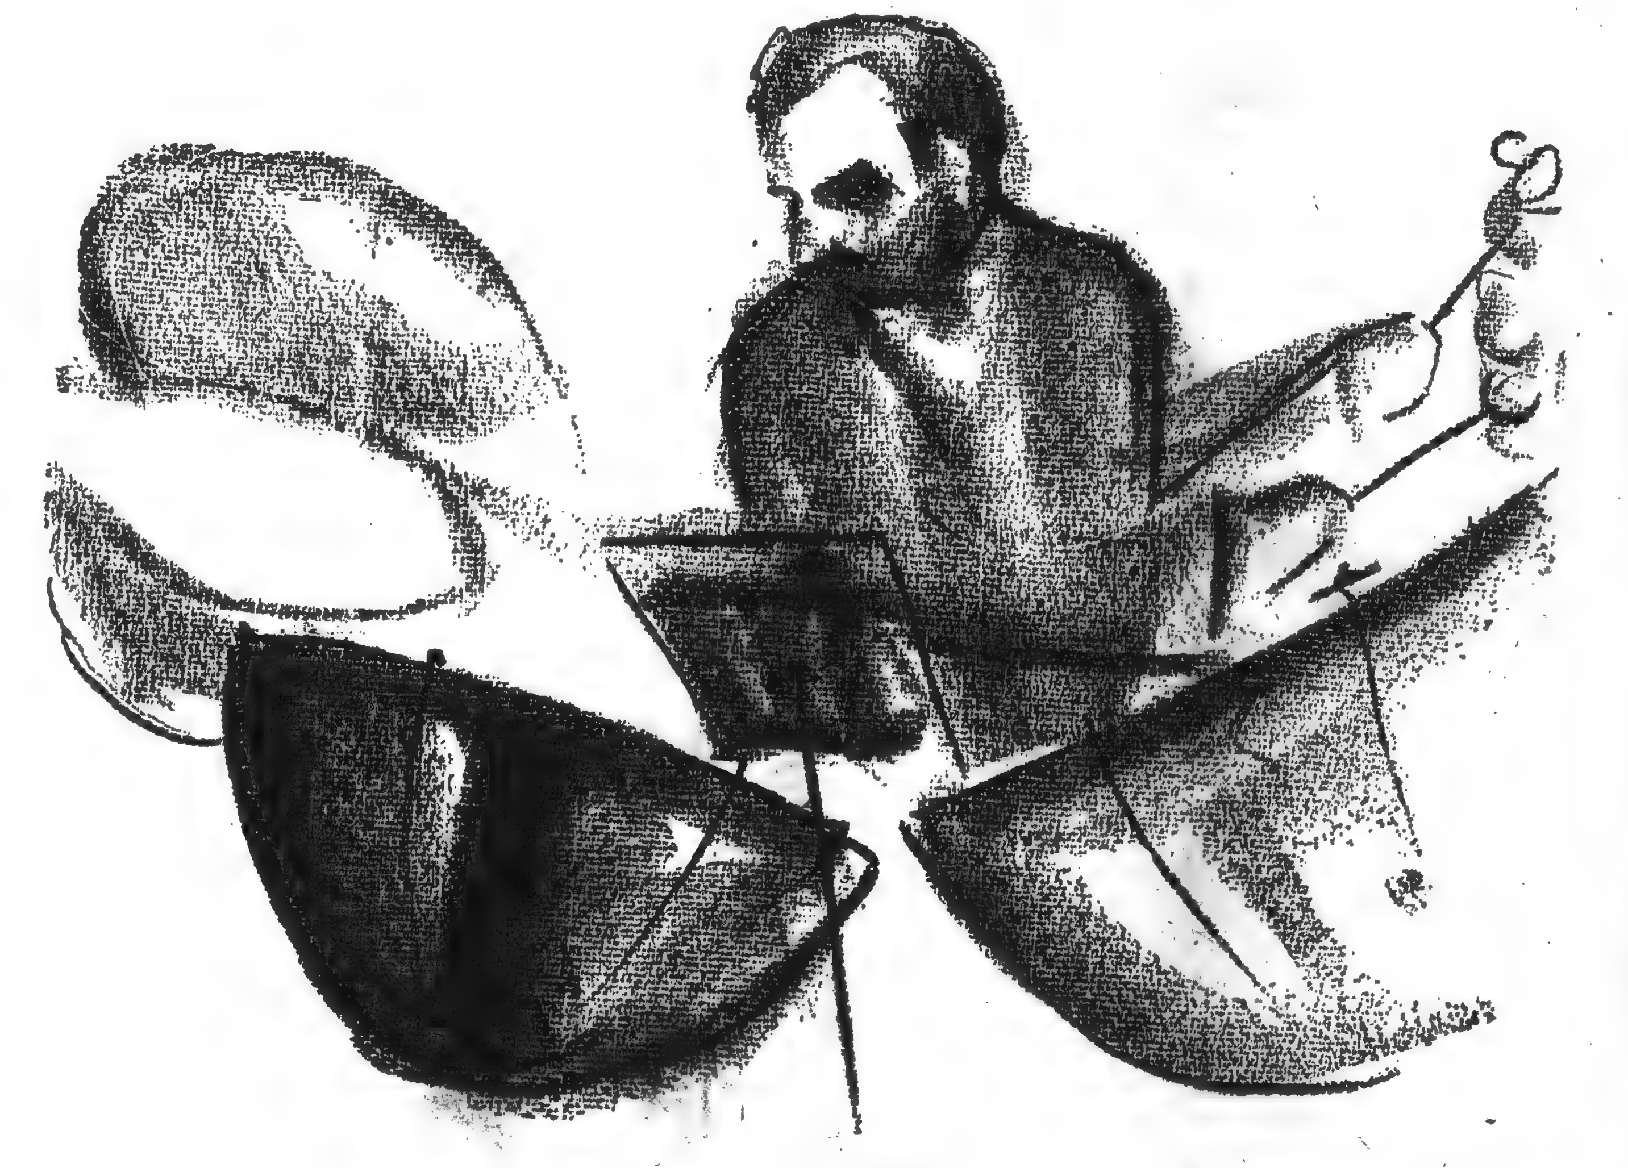
But those few can pour $60,000 as guarantee fund into the treasury of Symphony Hall in a year of general economies; contribute as well to endowment funds; renew subscriptions as though no apprehension sat on their shoulders. They can also count the Symphony Orchestra one of Boston's choicest possessions and set Dr. Koussevitzky, with Nikisch and Muck, in the first rank of its conductors. . . . Why not blurt out the truth now and again? The America in which we shall all be reduced to a common denominator of the lower pleasures is a delusion of the base.

H. T. P.

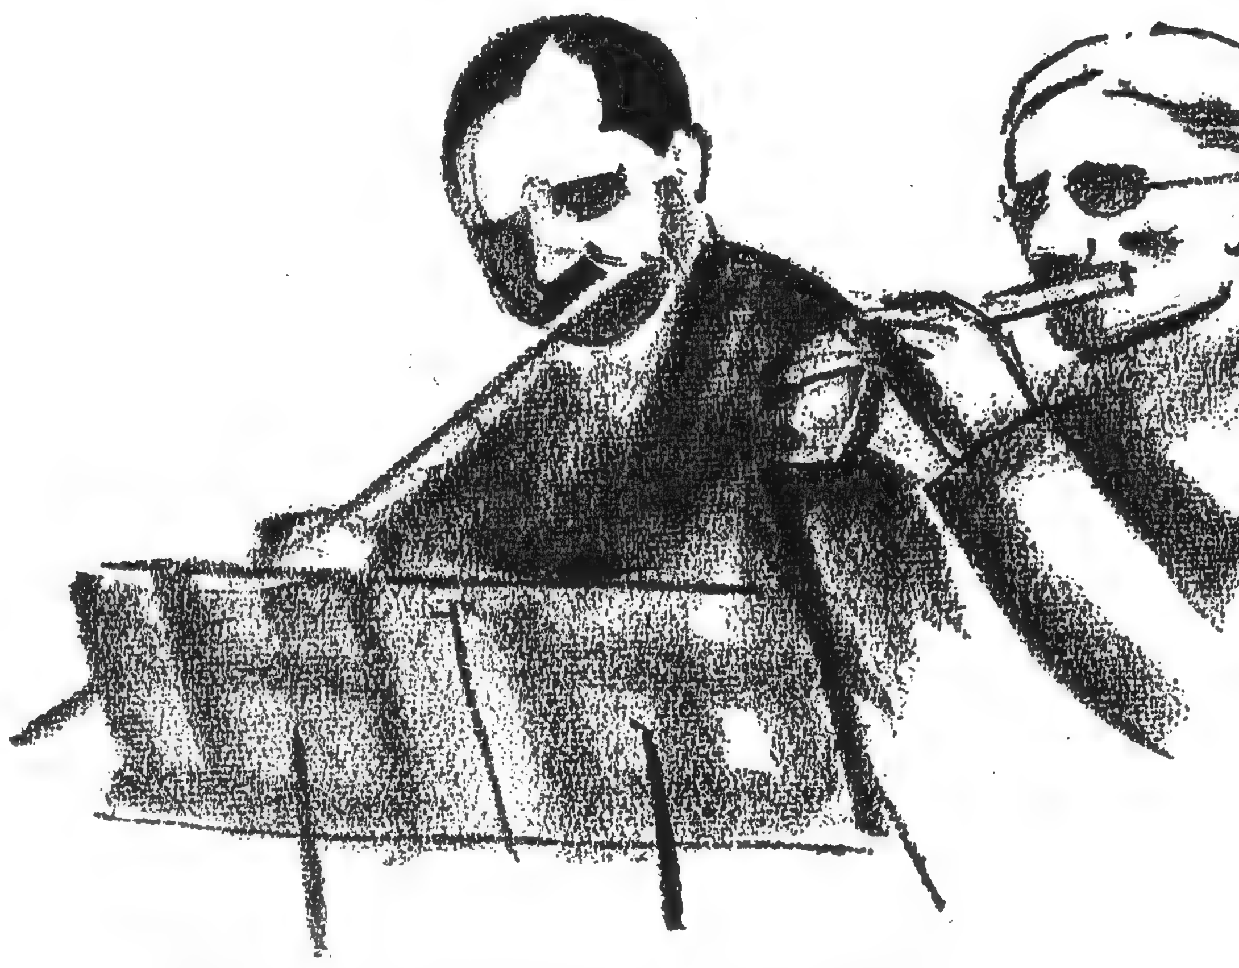
Art, Nature, Music

When the Symphony Concerts Run Full Tide

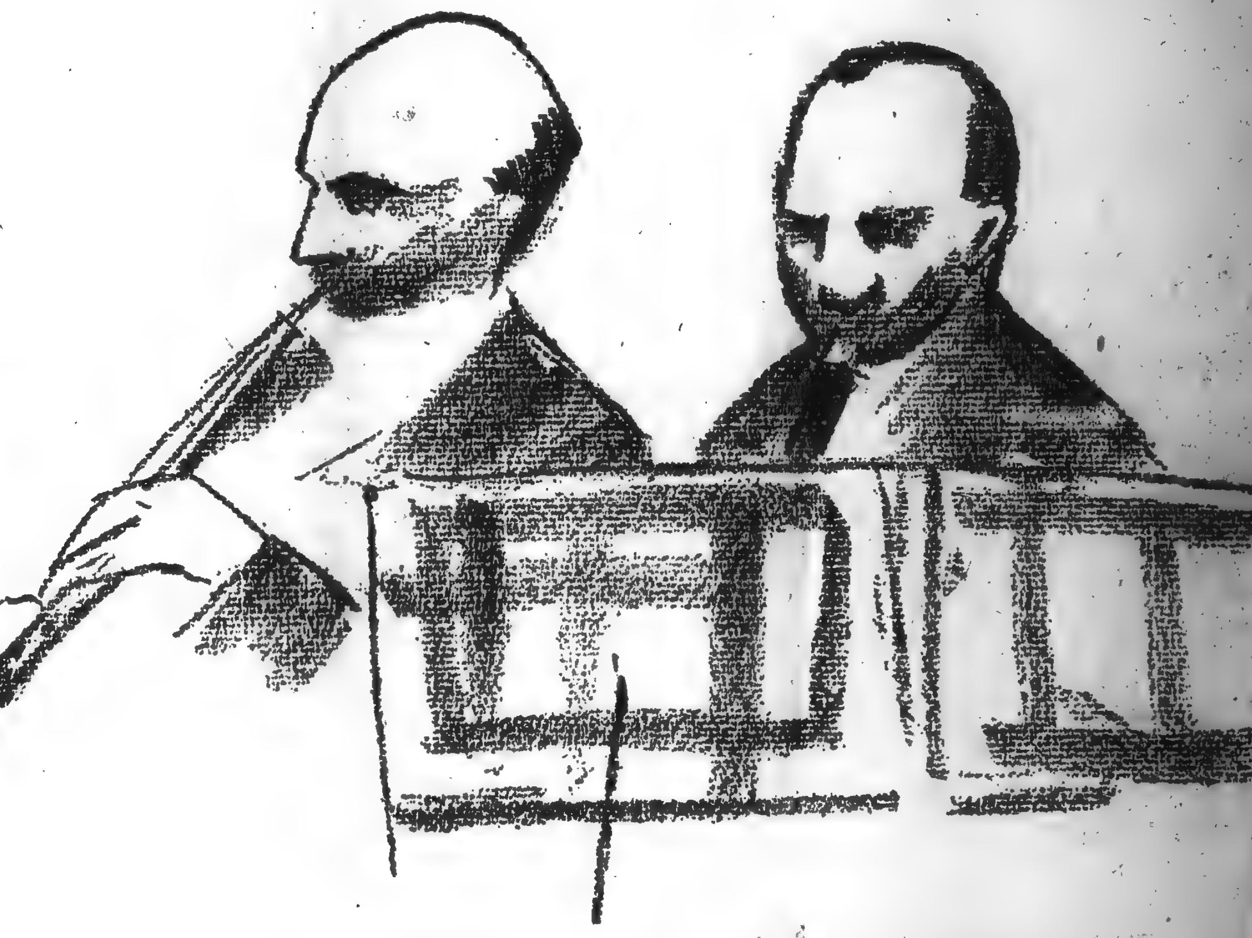
The Sketches by Emma Bourne



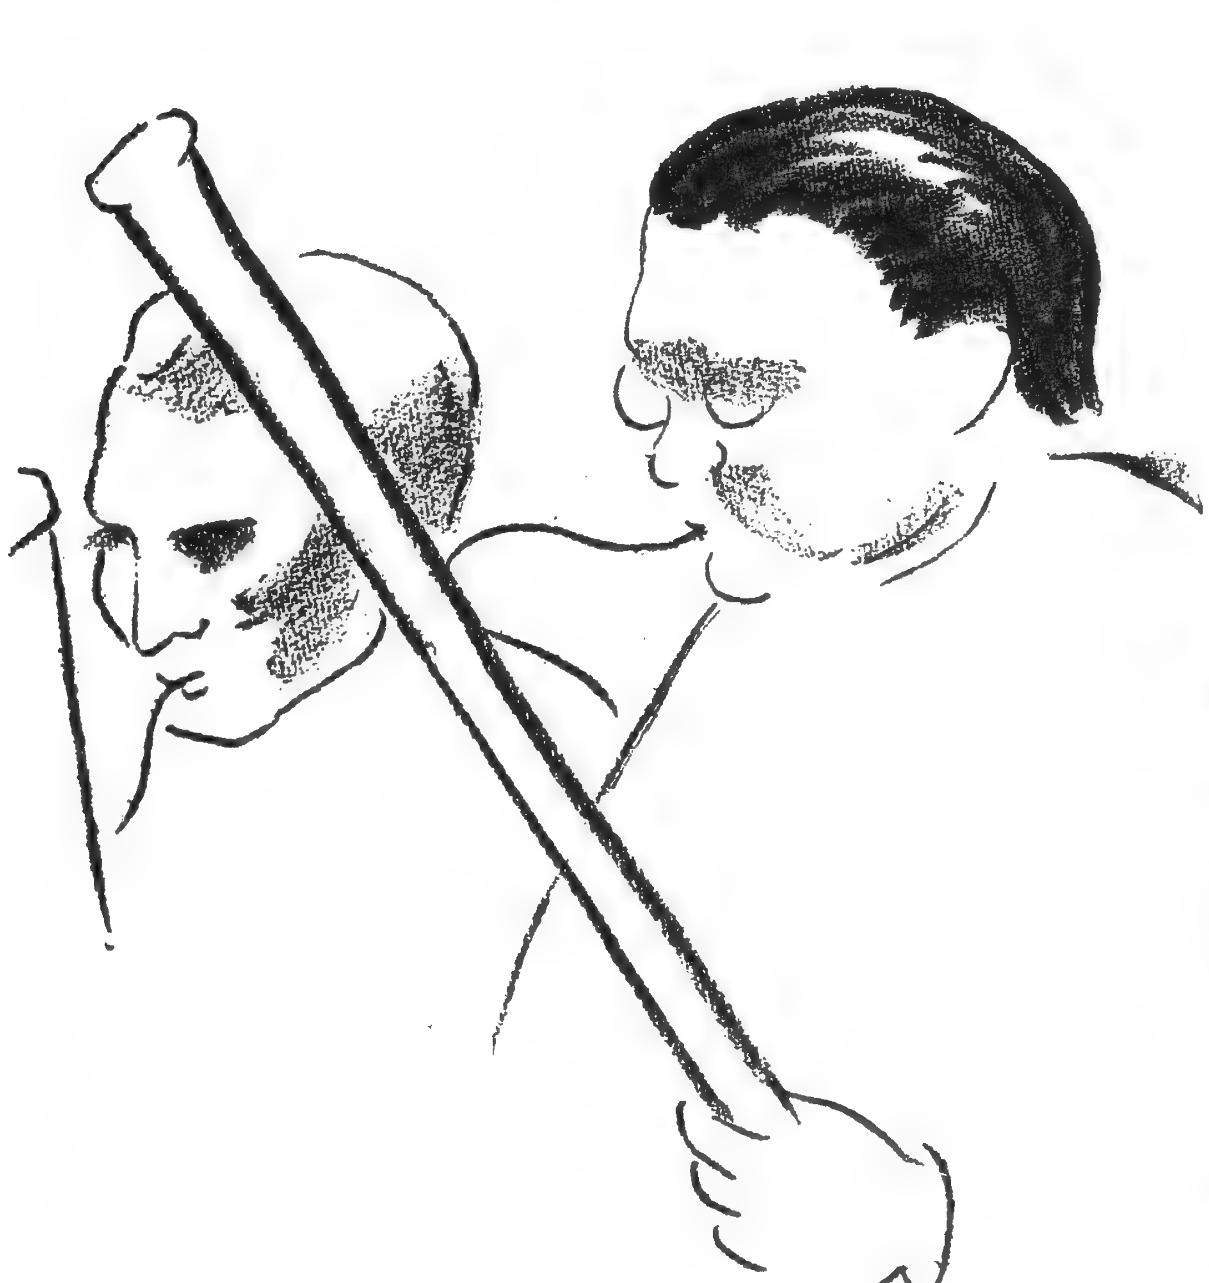
Timpani: A. Ritter



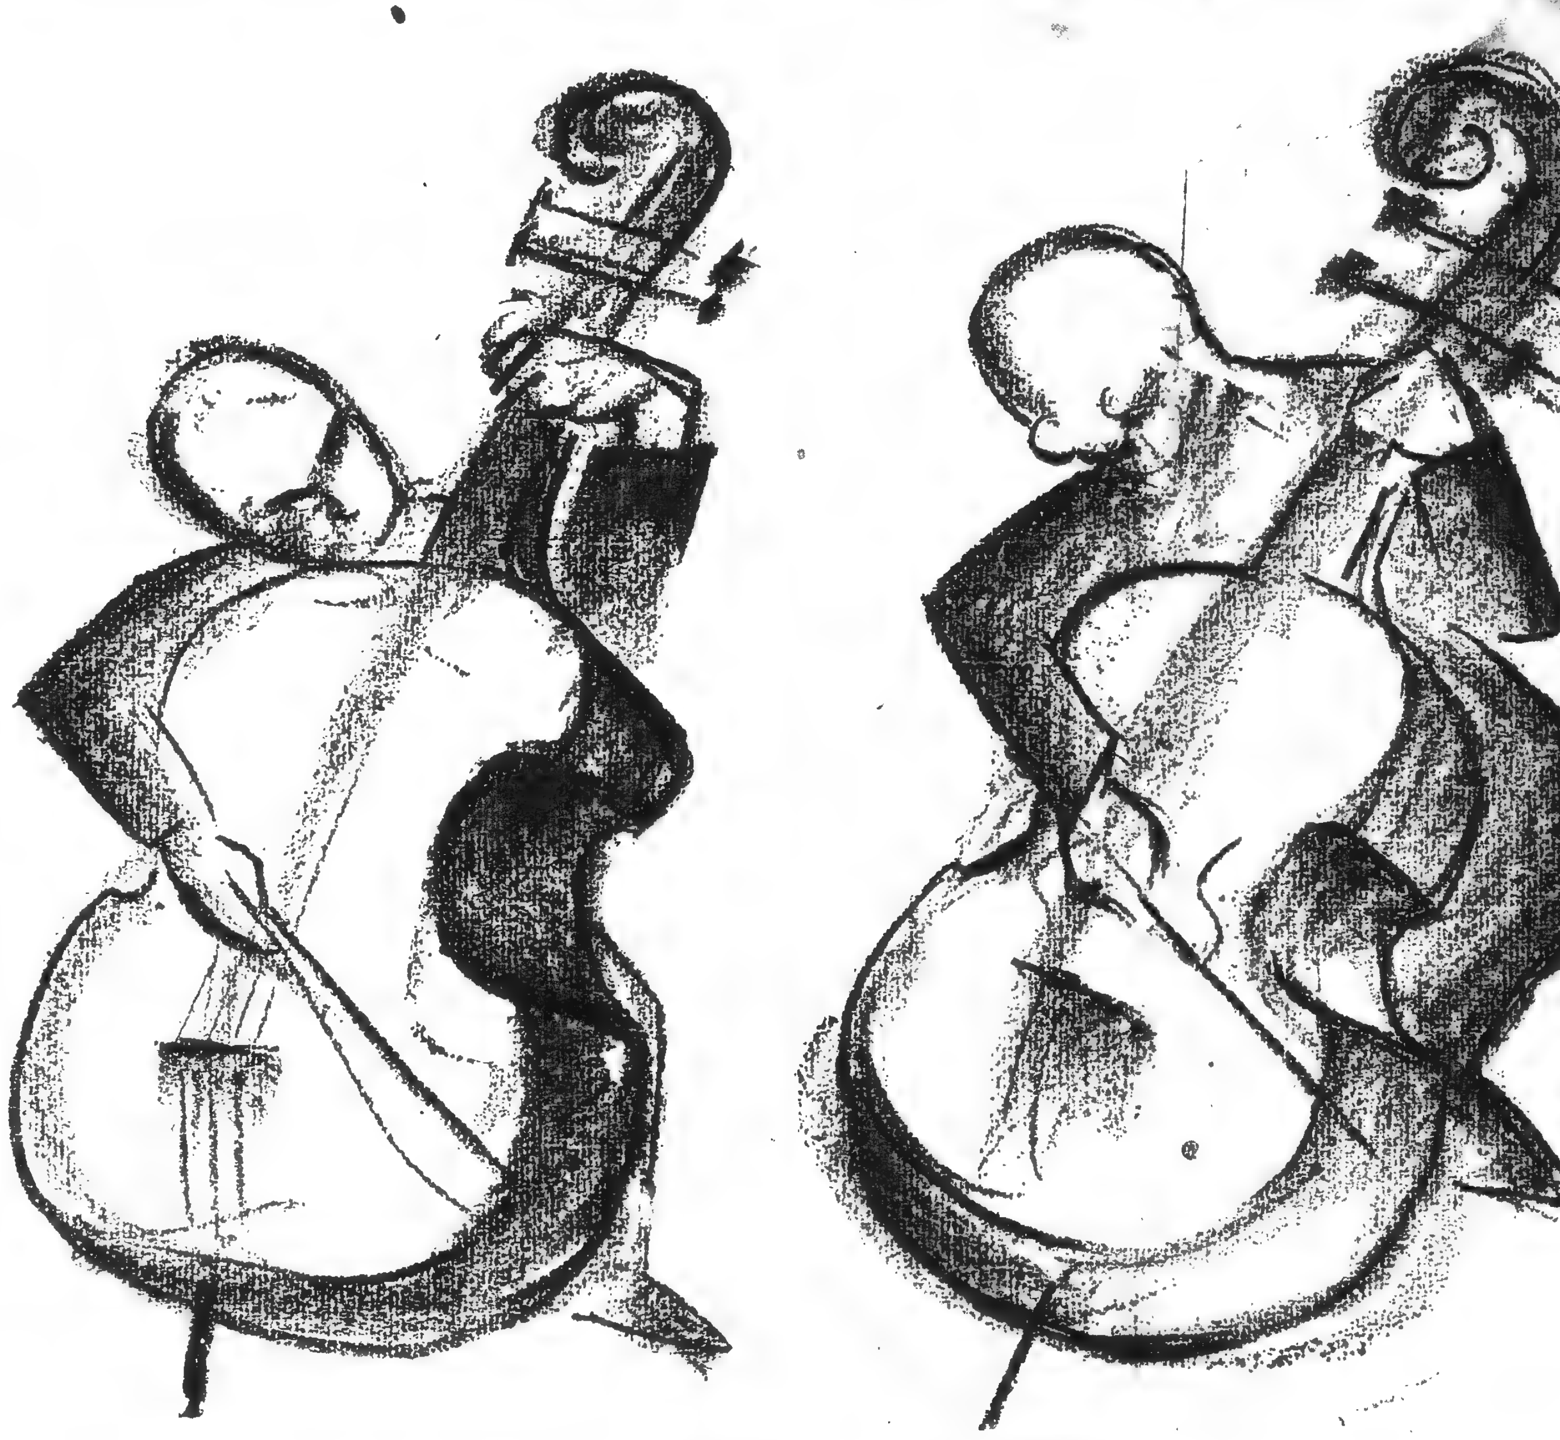
Flute: G. Laurent. Piccolo: A. Battles



Oboe: F. Gillet. Clarinet: V. Polatschek



Bassoons: E. Panenka; A. Laus



Foundation Stones: Two Basses

Horn:

Problem of Programs, Perils to Performance

To Close the Symphonic Year Give a Thought To the Balance of Koussevitzky's Repertory And To the Orchestral Prowess He Must Now Maintain

THE PROBLEM pressing hardest upon the ambitious conductor and the ambitious hearers of the Symphony Concerts is the problem of room upon the programs. Unless there is a festival afoot, like that for Bach last spring or for Brahms next spring, the twenty-four pairs of long-standing subscription concerts determine the range of the symphonic year. From them come almost all the pieces played on the supplementary Mondays or Tuesdays; while the additions, if any, are usually unimportant. In fact, however, Dr. Koussevitzky has only twenty-two programs at disposal; since the other two are filled by the guest-conductor and the guest-conductor-composer of each recurring January. For those twenty-two there is annual list of indispensables.

A just number of time-honored symphonies, overtures, concertos and miscellaneous pieces must have place. There must be room also for hallowed or generally accepted music from the elder generation. Debussy, Ravel, Strauss, Sibelius, even Stravinsky, are convenient examples. The public of Symphony Hall expects to hear new works by eminent composers. Sometimes they are handed directly to the orchestra, like the new Eighth Symphony of Sibelius announced for performance next season. Sometimes they spring upon the conductor out of the air, like Ravel's Piano-Concerto a few weeks ago. Somtimes dates are set for them long in advance, as with Stravinsky's Violin-Concerto last January. In any case, once accepted, they must be fitted into an appropriate program.

◆

It is now the warrantable and established policy of trustees and conductor, it is also the just wish of their more open-minded public, to encourage new or neglected composers, each according to his deserts, by the performance of their music. Hence in the season now ended the Suite of Frid, the Suites of Toch, the Studies by Vogel, the Concerto of Martelli. Whether these "novelties" succeed or fail, whether the conductor's choice is justified or questionable, so much more of his twenty-two programs is filled. It is the particular policy of the present régime to encourage such composers if they happen also to be native or resident Americans. Hence, through the closing season, music of Mr. Copland, Mr. Morris, Mr. Sowerby, Mr. Gershwin. Again the program-space is lessened.

There are Bostonian composers customarily heard in old works or new—say Mr. Loeffler or Mr. Hill. There are composers whose lengthy and exacting symphonies may be played only at long intervals—Mahler's or Bruckner's for example. In October and again in April, Dr. Koussevitzky made room for each. There are outcropping centenaries to be marked, like Goethe's, last March, who deeply influanced music; like Haydn's, a few weeks later, for his quality and place as composer. Usually the rites fill a whole program. Along comes an unexpected and deserving guest, as Herr Toch, and half a concert is his allotment. Such eminent virtuosi as Mr. Busch or Miss Hess may not be ignored, or there is grumbling among subscribers and loss of prestige to the concerts. The end in death of a long and illustrious career, like d'Indy's, demands one or two memorial pieces. There are the virtuoso-numbers, the spécialités de la maison, in which the orchestra must from time to time be exhibited. The Second Suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphne and Chloë" is typical instance at Symphony Hall.

◆

So it goes through such a season as this of 1931-32. At intervals the conductor bethinks himself of the music he would gladly play. How long since that Brandenburg Concerto of Bach had place on a program? Or the eighteenth-century Symphony, even of Mozart or Haydn, that he chanced upon the other day as he fingered the library catalogue? He remembers semi-classic overtures to which he would return, that the orchestra could sound to perfection. In an unromantic time and fashion, there is still romantic nineteenth-century music that would bear re-hearing. Above all, he recalls the modern works played once, twice or three times to his own satisfaction and the general pleasure; then somehow fallen into neglect. Or the [illegible] pieces that proved their worth at production; that he would establish by recurring performance in the active repertory.

Questionings and grumblings from his audiences echo into his ears. "Why does he not give us Stravinsky's 'Sacre' or 'Œdipus' again instead of the relatively minor 'Pulcinella'?" . . . "Will he never remember Debussy's 'Rondes de Printemps'?" . . "How long we had to wait for Strauss's 'Don Quixote'!" . . . "Has he quite forgotten Beethoven's choice little, gay little, Eighth Symphony?" And Schubert, and Schumann, and what not? In fact, the conductor grumbles at himself more than we grumble at him; would play twenty pieces where we ask for two; would re-assemble "novelty" after "novelty" that deserves familiarizing performance.

◆

If only there were room upon programs under the conditions above set forth! As it is, the treasury of symphonic music is now far too full for those who would administer it amply and variously. Unless they are cribbed in routine or hidebound with prejudice, they chafe under constant self-denial. The burden of choice and distribution is upon every other ambitious and broad-minded conductor no less than upon Dr. Koussevitzky. He at least may congratulate himself upon the return of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," Chausson's Symphony, Franck's "Daughters of Æolus," d'Indy's "Istar," Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles." Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass,'" in this ended musical year of 1931-32. For the first times Mozart's "Requiem" was sung at the Symphony Concerts; while within a year of production Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" was repeated.

There is reason to cite these conditions not only because they expose the difficulties that beset Dr. Koussevitzky's program-making; but also because they bear witness to the open mind, the even hand, the endless consideration, with which he accomplishes a testing task. In New York, in other cities, those that speak with authority count him the most judicious, catholic and dependable program-maker in the American field. But here in Boston, where his programs—and changes of program—almost weekly praise him, he is reproached by Aunt Emily because she cannot abide the modernists; by Master Jack who fondly fancies that Beethoven and Wagner are old hat; by the Fuddy-Duddies who cannot remember how they first acquired their prejudice against Brahms or Bruckner or Mahler, but stick to it for all that. Mean while the content and exhilarated majority have come, under long habit, to take these Koussevitzkian programs as matter of course. Think back over twenty or thirty years of the Symphony Concerts. Within that time, were the programs ever maintained, season in and season out, at such a pitch or range and proportion, of diversity and vitality, as under Dr. Koussevitzky?

Another care, another obligation, incessantly pre-occupy the conductor. By common consent at home and abroad, he has restored the Boston Orchestra to the standards of performance that it practised, to the prestige that it enjoyed, at the zenith of Dr. Muck. In some respects he may even have bettered them. Such work, if progress seasonally rewards it, is immensely exhilarating—the prideful upbuilding, the nearer and nearer approach to the beckoning ideal. Now Dr. Koussevitzky must maintain the orchestra at that pitch—a task that demands unremitting vigilance, unrelaxing will, an integrity of spirit permitting no self-content and no self-deception.

These three years the orchestra has been a homogeneous body made in the conductor's image, reciprocal choir to choir, group to group, man to man. By close exaction upon every individual, by instant susceptibility to the whole effect he must now keep it such. The moment in which it ceases to be this unified and mutually sensitive body, the standard will decline, the prestige begin to wane. Often Dr. Koussevitzky returns to Mozart, to Strauss, to Ravel—three touchstones of orchestral performance. Perhaps by such tests he reassures himself of continuing homogeniety and sensibility.

The conductor and the orchestra excel in the vitalizing of the classics. The masterpieces of Beethoven—the "Eroica" or the Ninth Symphony, the Third "Leonore" Overture—sound from their hands and lips as great music; as great music, moreover, newly born into a hearing world. They fuse the romanticism and the introspection of Brahms, the rugged surface, the meditated procedures, the inner and poetizing warmths, into single and highly individualized impression. Not often for sonority's sake do they overdo him. Their Mozart is transparent and luminous, precise yet plastic, felicitous always. Again comes the illusion of a music new-born upon the waiting ear. Their phrasing and accent make the too songful Schubert bearable; clarify and set free the clumsy Schumann. The rich and glowing tonal textures of Strauss and Wagner, the iridescent and sparkling tonal textures of Debussy and Ravel are equally at their command. From them the modernists sound, each according to his kind and purpose; yet keep the semblance of a new and sharp-set musical speech, of a restless and adventuring musical time.

No orchestra within memory ranges so widely—and so equally; is susceptible and projecting master of so many styles. Even the chameleon-like Stravinsky cannot evade it. The price of such achievement, as has been intimated, is tireless vigilance, inexhaustible ambition, undeviating integrity. Dr. Koussevitzky still pays it, willingly, whole-mindedly, whole-heartedly. More and more he masters—even with Chaikovsky—his own exuberances of zeal. There were concerts, last autumn, last winter, this spring, in which the beauty and the power of the performance—whatever the program in itself—were incomparable upon Bostonian ears; when music strode the listening earth; was clothed in splendor; throbbed with vital and irresistible force.

At the end of these eight years under Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Concerts, and the two supplementary series, have waxed again into an aristocratic institution. They are intrinsically such, though temporary circumstance or ill-judged experiment may occasionally overcloud or diminish them. They are frequented and maintained by an élite, numerically small, widely separated in possessions, in social station, in ways and interests of life. Yet bound together at Symphony Hall by a common pleasure in the best possible performance of the best available music, without condescension or relaxation; by a common zeal, and often a common sacrifice, for such standards and continuance. In America or for that matter almost anywhere else, there is no more egregious nonsense and futility than to prattle about the popularizing of symphonic music, to see in editorial vision the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing, say, in the Boston Garden while a vast radio mob flocks to hear.

Symphonic music can never be popularized amongst us Americans because in no America that we know, or are likely to know, is it within the understanding and the interest of the rank and file. A few examples and a few individuals aside, it gives them no pleasure, not because they are unaccustomed to it, but because they are alien from it. The whole cast of their minds, the whole caurse of their lives, are at odds with the standards by which it must be chosen and performed. Symphonic music, intrinsically and in performance, must remain the pleasure and preoccupation of the few—perhaps no more than ten thousand in any populous city. (In such a cosmopolis as New York the number is set no higher.)

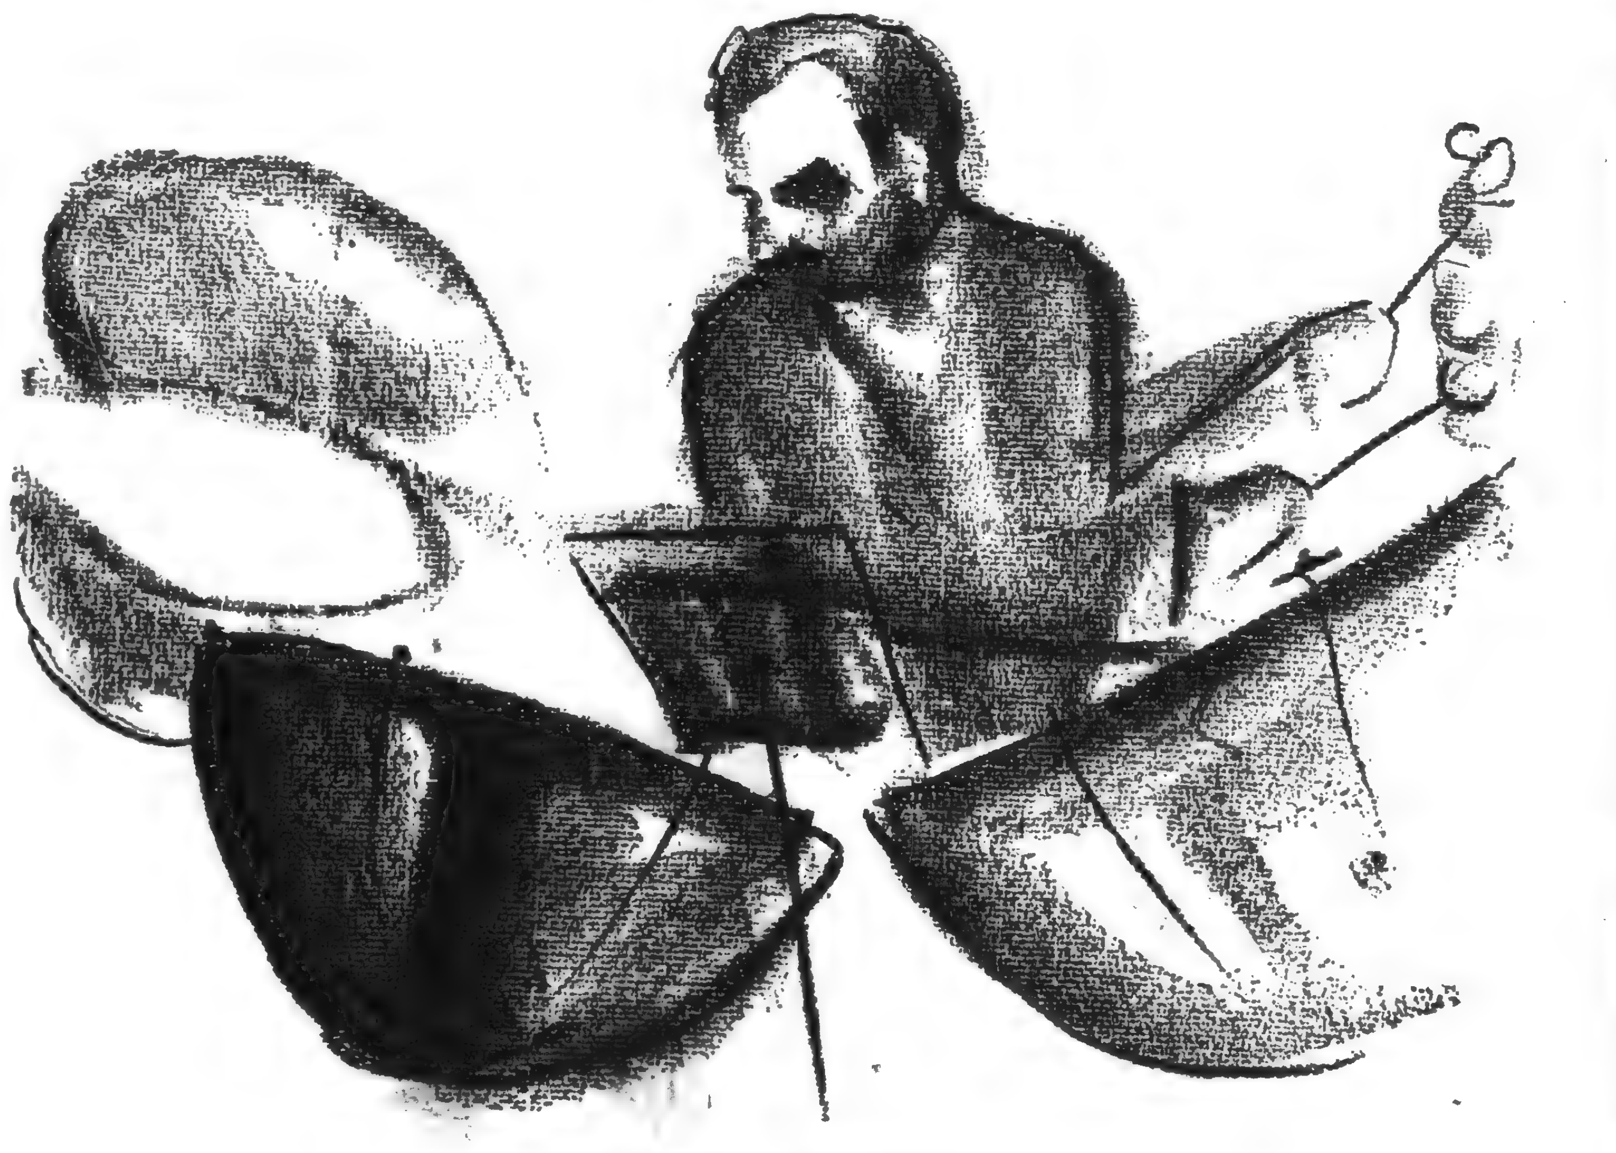
But those few can pour $60,000 as guarantee fund into the treasury of Symphony Hall in a year of general economies; contribute as well to endowment funds; renew subscriptions as though no apprehension sat on their shoulders. They can also count the Symphony Orchestra one of Boston's choicest possessions and set Dr. Koussevitzky, with Nikisch and Muck, in the first rank of its conductors. . . . Why not blurt out the truth now and again? The America in which we shall all be reduced to a common denominator of the lower pleasures is a delusion of the base.

H. T. P.

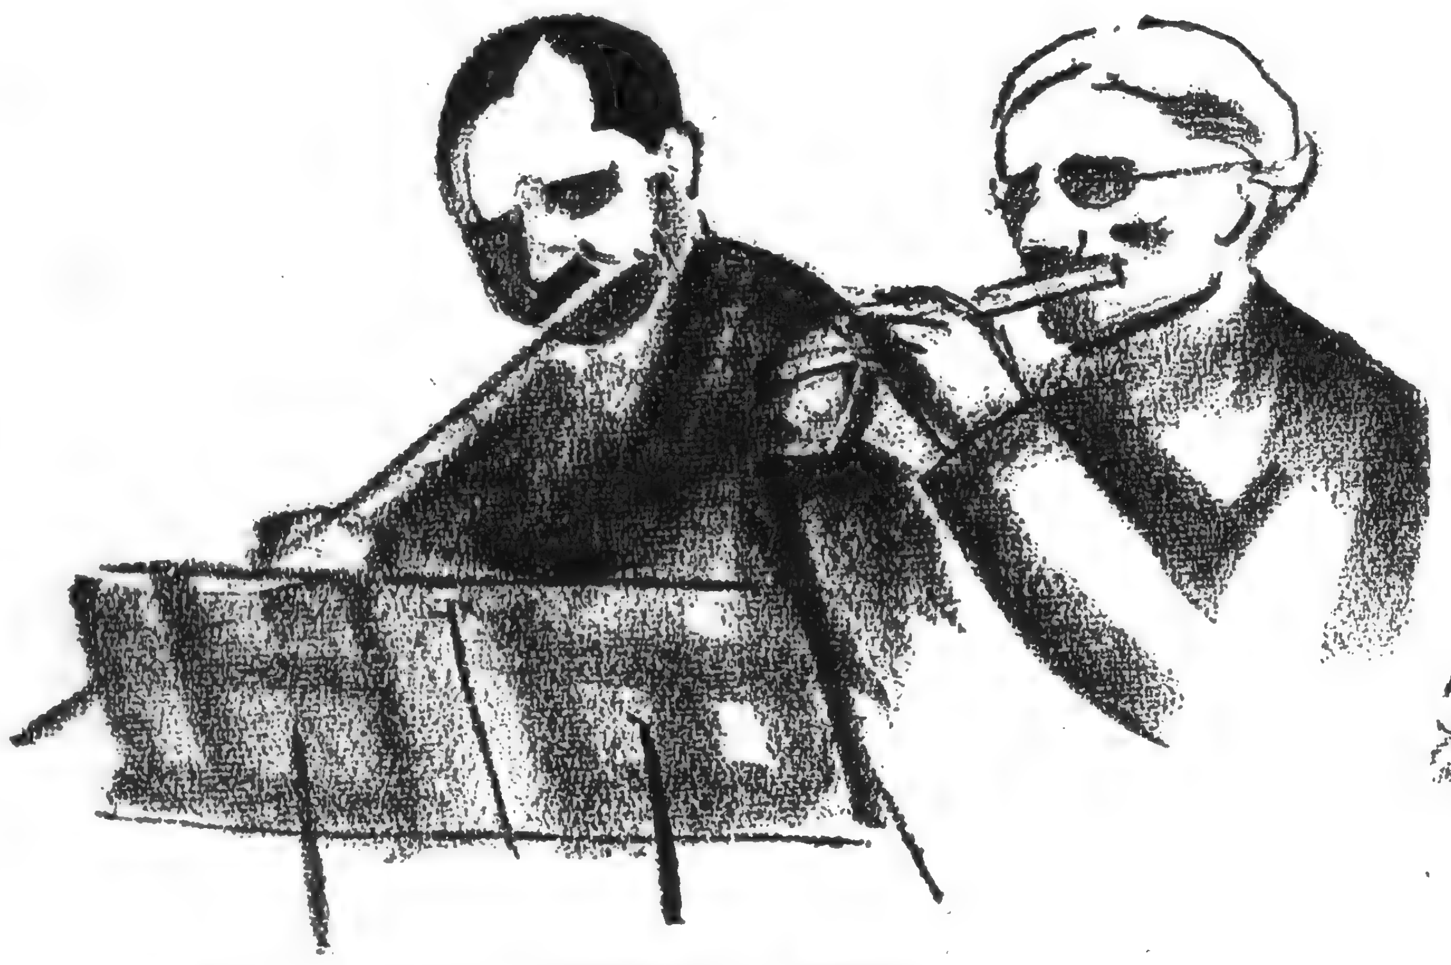
Art, Nature, Music

When the Symphony Concerts Run Full Tide

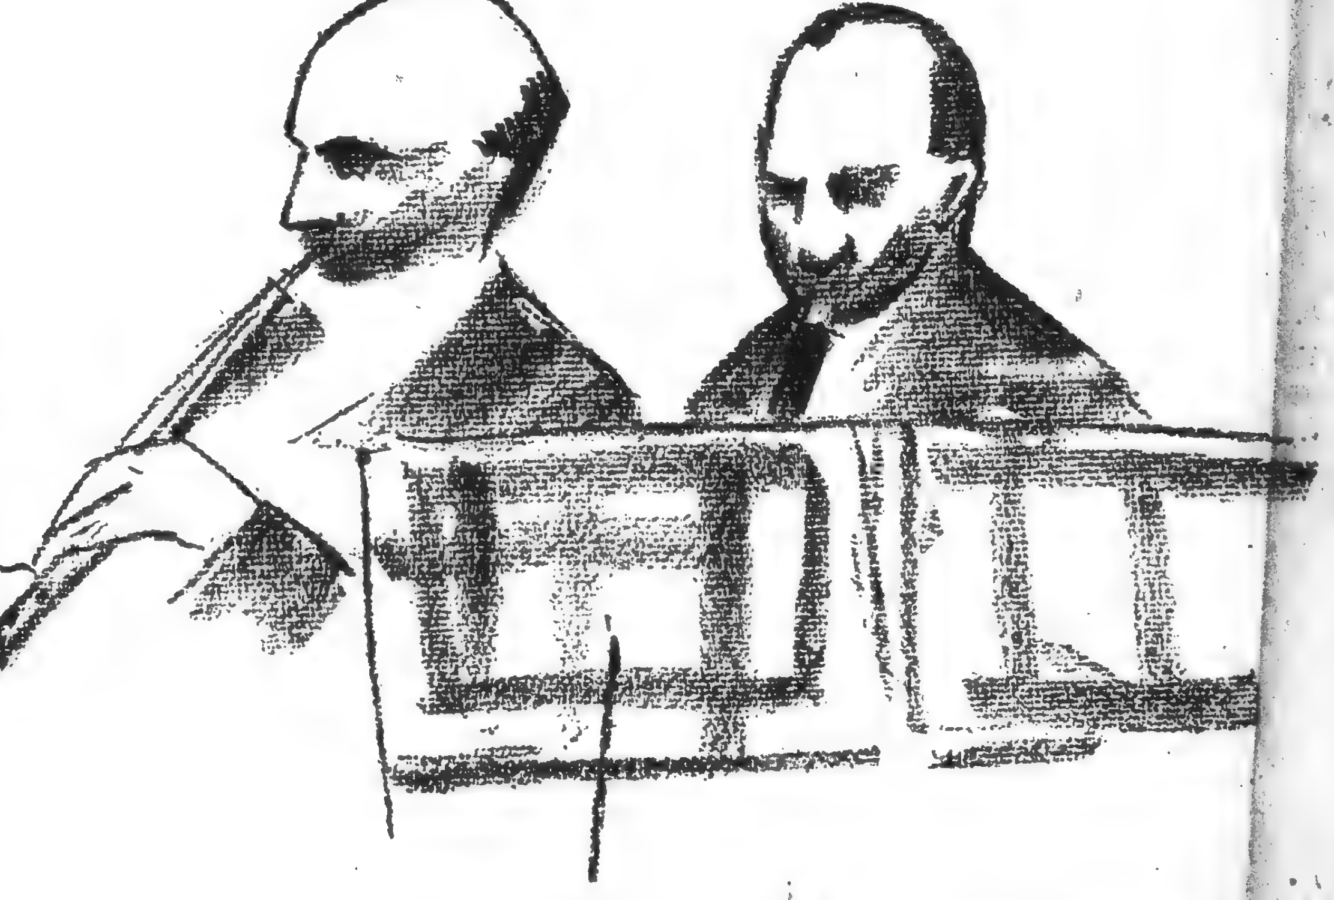
The Sketches by Emma Bourne



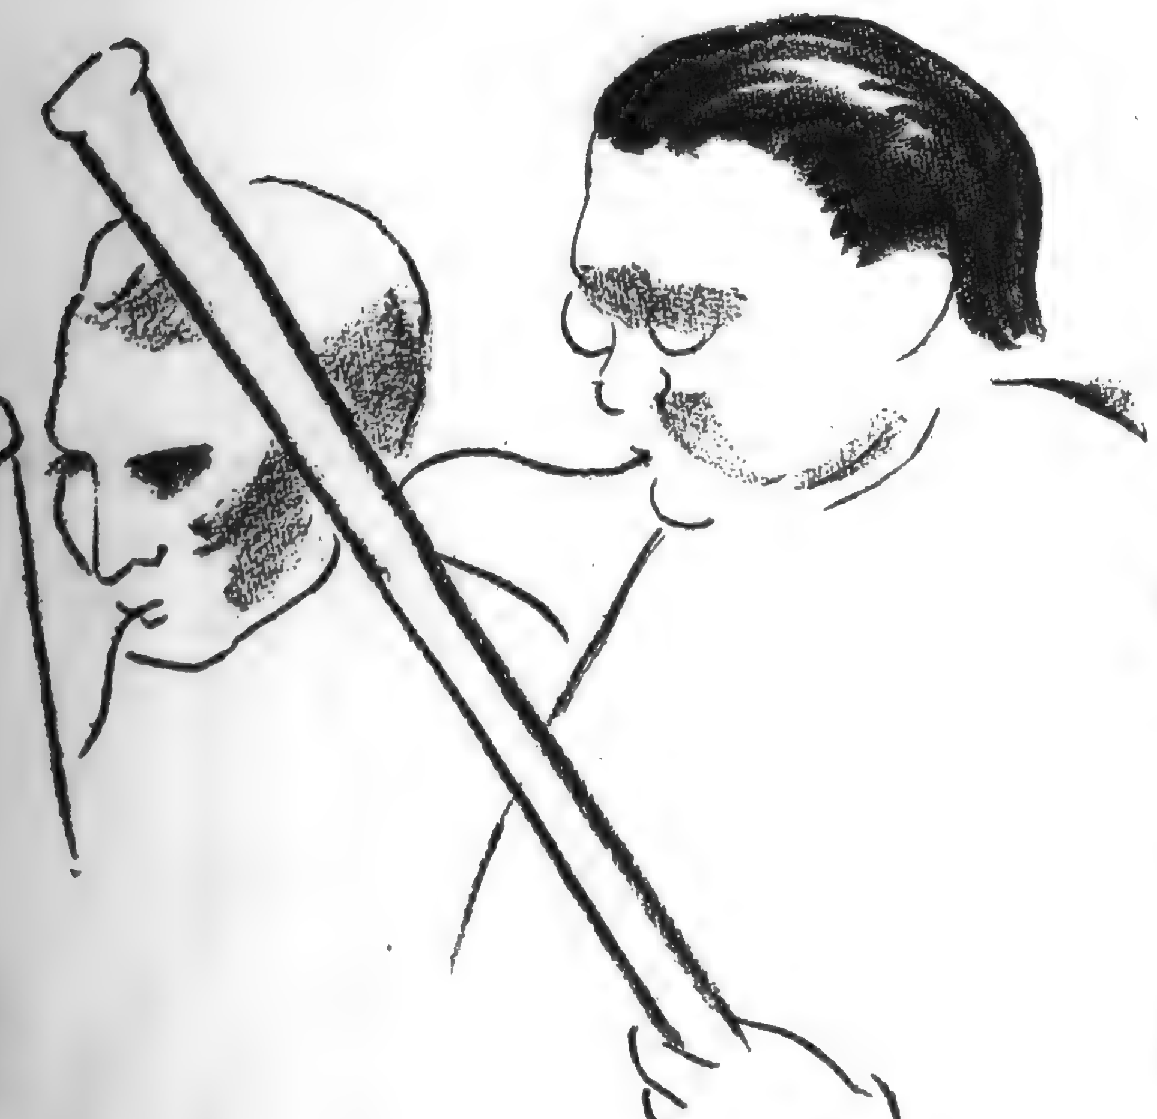
Timpani: A. Ritter



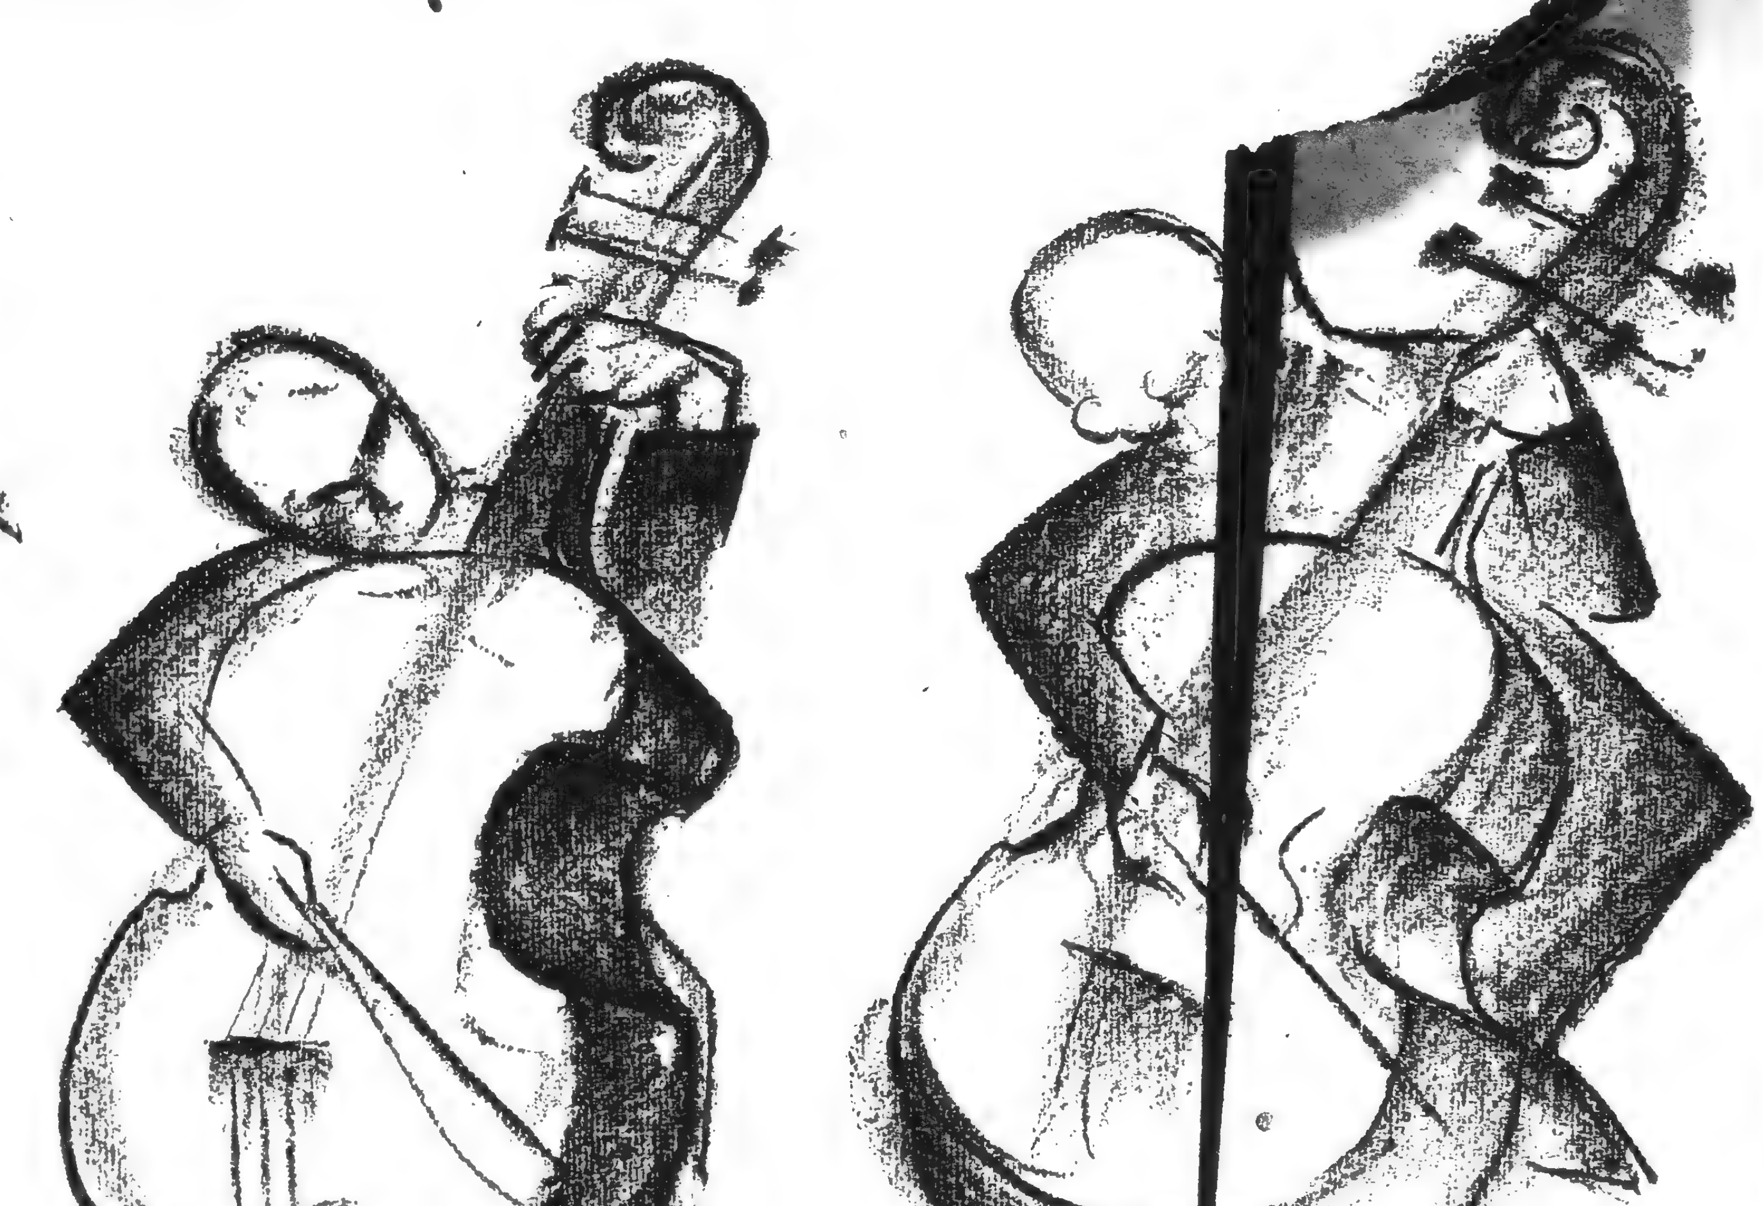
Flute: G. Laurent. Piccolo: A. Battles



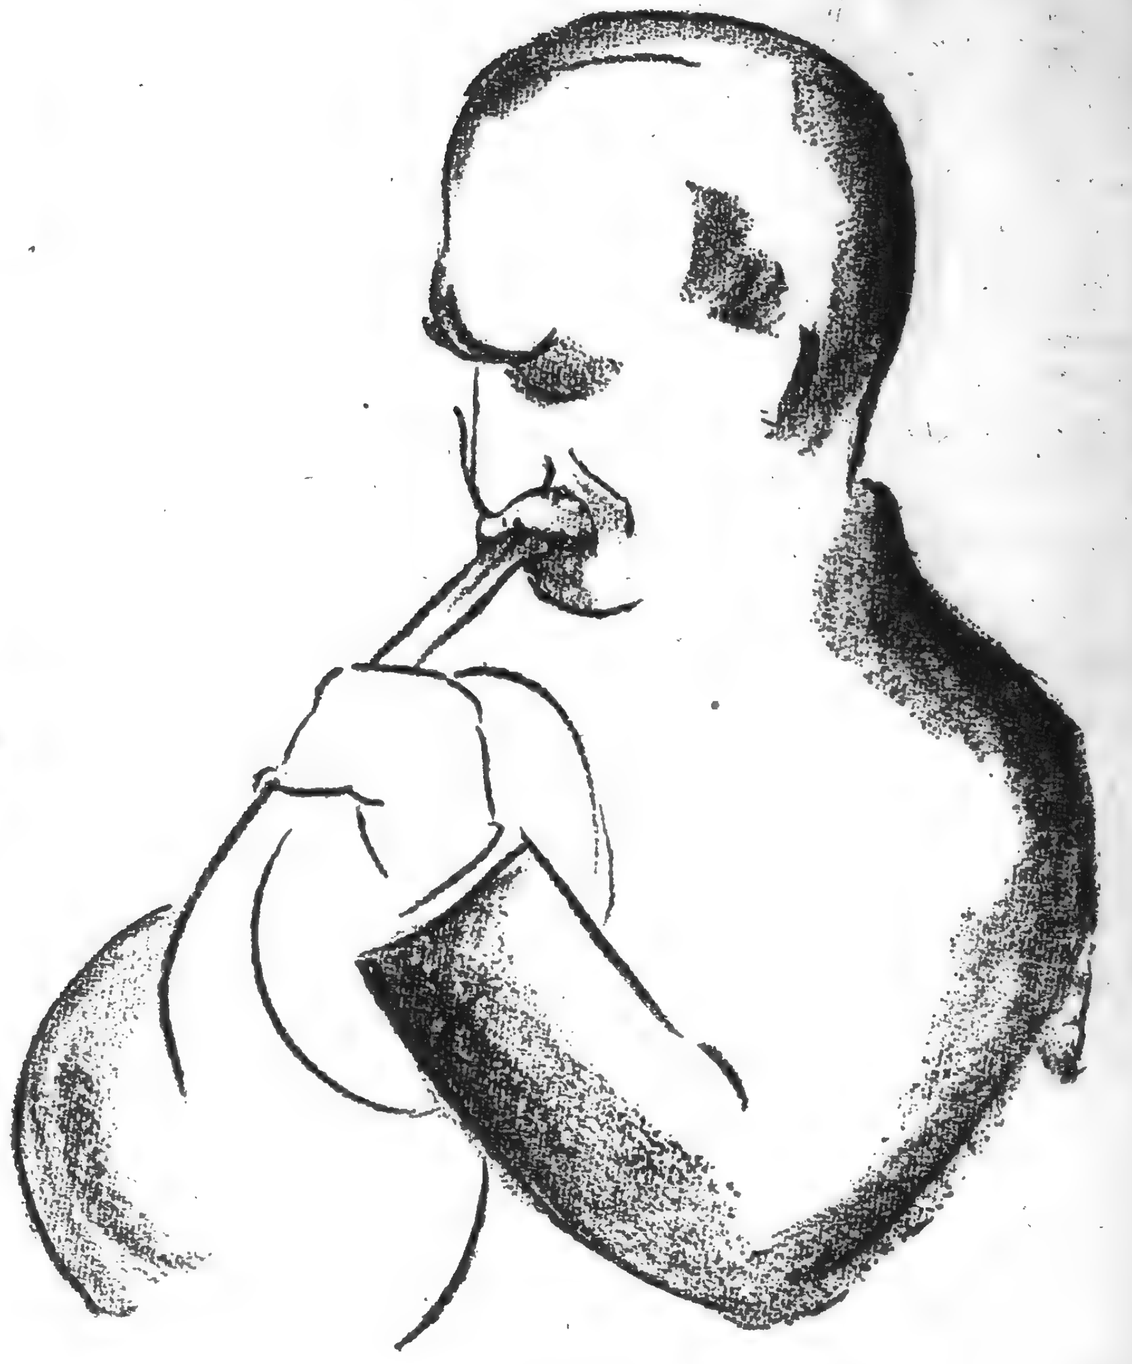
Oboe: F. Gillet. Clarinet: V. Polatschek



Bassoons: E. Panenka; A. Laus



Foundation Stones: Two Basses



Horn: H. Lorbeer

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

APR 17 1932

Koussewitsky's Programs

By EDWARD CUSHING

Reasons for Concluding That the Season's Most Interesting Series of Concerts Was That Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

WITH performances of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra recently concluded the most interesting series of concerts heard in New York this season. Not the most brilliant, necessarily, nor the most rewarding, but indisputably the most interesting. We have often thought that if circumstance permitted us to hear no more than one series of orchestral concerts in a season we should choose those, 15 in number, given here each Fall and Winter by the Bostonians and their distinguished leader. We should, of course, be sacrificing a great deal, and sacrificing it unwillingly, to say the least: Mr. Toscanini's concerts, and Mr. Stokowski's. But if sacrifice were obligatory, this is the way we should choose to make it, for it is our notion that one attends concerts first of all for the sake of the music performed at them and that other considerations—the virtuosity of orchestras, the celebrity of their conductors—should be secondary to this.

* * *

Koussewitsky's Programs

Now, there can be no question of the fact that, taken as a series, the 15 programs performed under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction in Brooklyn and Manhattan during the last season have been more interesting than those of other orchestras, similarly considered. In arranging his programs, a conductor must naturally proceed on the theory that his audience is entirely dependent upon him for its musical experience and must do his best to make that experience as comprehensive, enlightening and significant as he can. Mr. Koussewitsky's programs could not, in this respect, have been better planned. There is no reason for reprinting all 15 of them to prove the point. To indicate the manner in which Mr. Koussewitsky covered the ground from Bach to Gershwin, we need only remind the reader of his performances of symphonies by Haydn, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, Tschaikowsky, Sibelius (the Second and Fourth), Mahler (the Ninth) and Strauss ("Ein Heldenleben"), of music by Corelli, Handel, C. P. E. Bach, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakow, Scriabin, Debussy, Ravel, Prokofiew and Strawinsky—and of the fact that, with few exceptions, he chose the most significant work or works of each of these composers for presentation.

Few conductors, we may feel sure, would disclose a taste similarly catholic or equally sound in arranging their programs if they were limited to the number that Mr. Koussewitsky annually conducts in this city. Few conductors, for that matter, giving twice as many concerts within the same period, could be counted on to include symphonies by Sibelius and Mahler, or such a work as Liszt's "Faust Symphony," among their offerings, though it is obvious that an acquaintance with these masterpieces (for they are that) is essential to the development of an audience's musical background, to the rounding out of its musical experience. It is possible, of course, to point to the omissions in Mr. Koussewitsky's repertory: Mozart is not represented in it, nor Schubert, nor half a dozen other classic and modern masters. But 15 programs are too few in which to achieve a complete survey of the musical literature of three centuries, and it must also be borne in mind that Mr. Koussewitsky's 15 concerts are addressed not to one, but the three audiences, inevitably involving a certain amount of duplication in the programs arranged for them. (Thus, for example, the Mahler Ninth, Sibelius Second and Liszt "Faust" symphonies were each performed twice at Boston Orchestra concerts given in New York this season.)

* * *

A Record for Eight Seasons

Reflecting on the excellence of Mr. Koussewitsky's programs and upon the unusually interesting character of the novelties that they have included during the season past (the Mahler Ninth Symphony, Copland's Symphonic Ode, Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, the Morris Piano Concerto, pieces by Frid and Toch and Hindemith), we have gone to the trouble of compiling a complete list of works which Mr. Koussewitsky has introduced to New York during the eight years of his connection with the Boston Orchestra. It seems to us unusually revealing, and in the belief that the reader will find it equally so, we reprint it here without omissions:

Bach-Schoenberg: Prelude and Fugue in E-flat minor.
Bax: Symphony in E minor, No. 2.
Bloch: Concerto Grosso, for piano and strings. "Four Episodes," for orchestra.
Copland: Jazz Concerto for piano and orchestra. "Music for the Theater." Symphonic Ode.
Eichheim: A Chinese Legend.
De Falla: Concerto for harpsichord and chamber orchestra.
Frid: Suite, for orchestra.
Frederick the Great: Symphony in D.
Galliard-Steinberg: Sonata in G, arr. for orchestra.
Gershwin: Second Rhapsody, for piano and orchestra.
Gilbert: Symphonic Piece.
Gruenberg: "The Enchanted Isle," symphonic poem. Jazz Suite, for orchestra.
Hill: Symphony in C. Symphony in B-flat. "Lilacs," poem for orchestra.
Hindemith: Concerto for orchestra. Konzertmusik, for orchestra.
Honegger: Symphony.
Ibert: "Escales," suite for orchestra.
Lazar: Music for orchestra.
Mahler: Ninth Symphony.
Malipiero: Suite, "La Cimarosiana."
Martinu: "La Bagarre," piece for orchestra.
Morris: Concerto for piano and orchestra.
Moussorgsky-Ravel: "Pictures at an Exposition."
Nabokov: Lyric Symphony.
Pick-Mangiagalli: Prelude and Fugue.
Prokofiew: Suite from "The Love of Three Oranges." Cantata, "Sept, ils sont sept " Scythian Suite. Piano Concerto No. 2.
Purcell-Wood: Trumpet Voluntary.
Rachmaninoff-Respighi: Etudes Tableaux, arr. for orchestra.
Respighi: "Ventrate de Chiesa," suite.
Riegel: Symphony.
Roussel: Suite in F, for orchestra. Suite from "Padmavti." Symphony in G, op. 42.
Sibelius: Sixth Symphony. Seventh Symphony.
Strawinsky: "Oedipus Rex." opera oratorio. Symphonie de Psaumes, for chorus and orchestra. "Apollon Musagete," ballet. Capriccio, for piano and orchestra.
Tailleferre: "Jeux de Plein Air," for orchestra.
Tansman: Second Piano Concerto.
Tcherepnine: Eight Miniatures, for orchestra.
Toch: Piano Concerto. "Bunte," Suite.
Vaughan-Williams: A Norfolk Rhapsody, for orchestra.
Walton: Overture, "Portsmouth Point." Sinfonia Concertante.

* * *

Enterprise And Judgment

The broad range of Mr. Koussewitsky's taste, or at least of his tolerance, is indicated by this list, which may also be interpreted as evidence that he has not shirked a conductor's primary obligation, that of extending our musical horizons by the performance of new works representing comprehensively contemporary developments in the art. Furthermore, the list includes at least 15 works which, since their introduction to us at concerts of the Boston Symphony, have become staples of the modern orchestral repertory. This is a good record for any conductor, a tribute to his judgment as well as to his enterprise, but we are even more impressed, in reading the list, by the realization that of the 56 works comprising it, not more than 16 involved a total waste of the conductor's, the orchestra's or the audience's time. Mr. Koussewitsky is good at picking winners, but even when he fails to do so (and the failure must often be deliberate), his selection of novelties is almost invariably justified by the necessity of acquainting us with this or that phase of contemporary musical thought in this country and abroad.

New York to Hear

Koussewitsky's Programs

By EDWARD CUSHING

Reasons for Concluding That the Season's Most Interesting Series of Concerts Was That Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Brooklyn Eagle Ap17

WITH performances of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, and Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra recently concluded the most interesting series of concerts heard in New York this season. Not the most brilliant, necessarily, nor the most rewarding, but indisputably the most interesting. We have often thought that if circumstance permitted us to hear no more than one series of orchestral concerts in a season we should choose those, 15 in number, given here each Fall and Winter by the Bostonians and their distinguished leader. We should, of course, be sacrificing a great deal, and sacrificing it unwillingly, to say the least: Mr. Toscanini's concerts, and Mr. Stokowski's. But if sacrifice were obligatory, this is the way we should choose to make it, for it is our notion that one attends concerts first of all for the sake of the music performed at them and that other considerations—the virtuosity of orchestras, the celebrity of their conductors—should be secondary to this.

* * *

Koussewitsky's Programs

Now, there can be no question of the fact that, taken as a series, the 15 programs performed under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction in Brooklyn and Manhattan during the last season have been more interesting than those of other orchestras, similarly considered. In arranging his programs, a conductor must naturally proceed on the theory that his audience is entirely dependent upon him for its musical experience and must do his best to make that experience as comprehensive, enlightening and significant as he can. Mr. Koussewitsky's programs could not, in this respect, have been better planned. There is no reason for reprinting all 15 of them to prove the point. To indicate the manner in which Mr. Koussewitsky covered the ground from Bach to Gershwin, we need only remind the reader of his performances of symphonies by Haydn, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt, Tschaikowsky, Sibelius (the Second and Fourth), Mahler (the Ninth) and Strauss ("Ein Heldenleben"), of music by Corelli, Handel, C. P. E. Bach, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakow, Scriabin, Debussy, Ravel, Prokofiew and Strawinsky—and of the fact that, with few exceptions, he chose the most significant work or works of each of these composers for presentation.

Few conductors, we may feel sure, would disclose a taste similarly catholic or equally sound in arranging their programs if they were limited to the number that Mr. Koussewitsky annually conducts in this city. Few conductors, for that matter, giving twice as many concerts within the same period, could be counted on to include symphonies by Sibelius and Mahler, or such a work as Liszt's "Faust Symphony," among their offerings, though it is obvious that an acquaintance with these masterpieces (for they are that) is essential to the development of an audience's musical background, to the rounding out of its musical experience. It is possible, of course, to point to the omissions in Mr. Koussewitsky's repertory: Mozart is not represented in it, nor Schubert, nor half a dozen other classic and modern masters. But 15 programs are too few in which to achieve a complete survey of the musical literature of three centuries, and it must also be borne in mind that Mr. Koussewitsky's 15 concerts are addressed not to one, but the three audiences, inevitably involving a certain amount of duplication in the programs arranged for them. (Thus, for example, the Mahler Ninth, Sibelius Second and Liszt "Faust" symphonies were each performed twice at Boston Orchestra concerts given in New York this season.)

* * *

A Record for Eight Seasons

Reflecting on the excellence of Mr. Koussewitsky's programs and upon the unusually interesting character of the novelties that they have included during the season past (the Mahler Ninth Symphony, Copland's Symphonic Ode, Gershwin's Second Rhapsody, the Morris Piano Concerto, pieces by Frid and Toch and Hindemith), we have gone to the trouble of compiling a complete list of works which Mr. Koussewitsky has introduced to New York during the eight years of his connection with the Boston Orchestra. It seems to us unusually revealing, and in the belief that the reader will find it equally so, we reprint it here without omissions:

Bach-Schoenberg: Prelude and Fugue in E-flat minor.
Bax: Symphony in E minor, No. 2.
Bloch: Concerto Grosso, for piano and strings. "Four Episodes," for orchestra.
Copland: Jazz Concerto for piano and orchestra. "Music for the Theater." Symphonic Ode.
Eichheim: A Chinese Legend.
De Falla: Concerto for harpsichord and chamber orchestra.
Frid: Suite, for orchestra.
Frederick the Great: Symphony in D.
Galliard-Steinberg: Sonata in G, arr. for orchestra.
Gershwin: Second Rhapsody, for piano and orchestra.
Gilbert: Symphonic Piece.
Gruenberg: "The Enchanted Isle," symphonic poem. Jazz Suite, for orchestra.
Hill: Symphony in C. Symphony in B-flat. "Lilacs," poem for orchestra.
Hindemith: Concerto for orchestra. Konzertmusik, for orchestra.
Honegger: Symphony.
Ibert: "Escales," suite for orchestra.
Lazar: Music for orchestra.
Mahler: Ninth Symphony.
Malipiero: Suite, "La Cimarosiana."
Martinu: "La Bagarre," piece for orchestra.
Morris: Concerto for piano and orchestra.
Moussorgsky-Ravel: "Pictures at an Exposition."
Nabokov: Lyric Symphony.
Pick-Mangiagalli: Prelude and Fugue.
Prokofiew: Suite from "The Love of Three Oranges." Cantata, "Sept, ils sont sept " Scythian Suite. Piano Concerto No. 2.
Purcell-Wood: Trumpet Voluntary.
Rachmaninoff-Respighi: Etudes Tableaux, arr. for orchestra.
Respighi: "Ventrate de Chiesa," suite.
Riegel: Symphony.
Roussel: Suite in F, for orchestra. Suite from "Padmavti." Symphony in G, op. 42.
Sibelius: Sixth Symphony. Seventh Symphony.
Strawinsky: "Oedipus Rex." opera oratorio. Symphonie de Psaumes, for chorus and orchestra. "Apollon Musagete," ballet. Capriccio, for piano and orchestra.
Tailleferre: "Jeux de Plein Air," for orchestra.
Tansman: Second Piano Concerto.
Tcherepnine: Eight Miniatures, for orchestra.
Toch: Piano Concerto. "Bunte," Suite.
Vaughan-Williams: A Norfolk Rhapsody, for orchestra.
Walton: Overture, "Portsmouth Point." Sinfonia Concertante.

* * *

Enterprise And Judgment

The broad range of Mr. Koussewitsky's taste, or at least of his tolerance, is indicated by this list, which may also be interpreted as evidence that he has not shirked a conductor's primary obligation, that of extending our musical horizons by the performance of new works representing comprehensively contemporary developments in the art. Furthermore, the list includes at least 15 works which, since their introduction to us at concerts of the Boston Symphony, have become staples of the modern orchestral repertory. This is a good record for any conductor, a tribute to his judgment as well as to his enterprise, but we are even more impressed, in reading the list, by the realization that of the 56 works comprising it, not more than 16 involved a total waste of the conductor's, the orchestra's or the audience's time. Mr. Koussewitsky is good at picking winners, but even when he fails to do so (and the failure must often be deliberate), his selection of novelties is almost invariably justified by the necessity of acquainting us with this or that phase of contemporary musical thought in this country and abroad.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

APR 17 1932

Symphonies Hold Center Of Interest

New York Hears Concerts By Philharmonic, Boston And The "Musicians'" Orchestras

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

AGAIN, symphony concerts have given New York the most vital music of the week, the Philharmonic going full tilt, a visit from the Boston Symphony and the weekly concert by the huge Musicians' Symphony.

Hearing Sir Thomas Beecham again, one comes to the conclusion that he is a less good conductor than we thought him on his previous visit here. The fact that he has one of the great orchestras of the world under his baton is much in his favor, but his programs have not been of startling interest and his conducting without a score, while it may impress the groundlings, nearly brought him to grief, once at least, in the Handel Concerto Grosso in E minor last week.

His playing of music by Bax, Delius and Elgar is good propaganda for contemporary British composers, but aside from that the music as a whole is not of thrilling interest.

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAMS

Mr. Koussevitzky outdid himself at his final two concerts of the season. At the first of these he gave a New York premiere of a Suite by Toch, the modernist composer who is in New York at the present time on a visit. The program also contained Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and the old chestnut Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky.

Mr. Toch's suite, which he calls a "bunte" suite; that is to say, "many colored," fulfills expectations. It is many-colored in more senses than one and while interesting and even of some beauty in spots, is not music which could be taken very near to one's heart.

NO LONGER RADICAL

The Strauss work, which even in our memories used to be thought so dissonant and radical, is conservative enough now and need startle no one. With the Tchaikowsky, Mr. Koussevitzky did wonderful things not only by his sharply pointed playing of it, but also by the careful shading which gave it a vigor it does not inherently possess, and robbed it of much of its sentimentality.

At the second concert he gave the Egmont Overture of Beethoven and Liszt's Faust Symphony with the Harvard Glee Club singing the choral part, and the tenor solo capably done by Rulon Y. Robison.

There would be no point in making a discussion of this work of Liszt which, too, in its day, was considered somewhat unorthodox. If we accept the hypothesis of Liszt as a composer at all, it has its place in the gallery of musical delineations of Goethe's legend, or rather the legend which Goethe made famous. The performance was excellent in every respect and so caught the fancy of the audience that it remained long after the end of the program to applaud.

MUSICIANS' SYMPHONY

The Musicians' Symphony had Sandor Harmati at the baton for its concert and John McCormack as soloist. The program began with the Abert transcription of the great G minor organ fugue of Bach, to which Mr. Abert, for reasons best known to himself, put a prelude of his own invention. Perhaps he thought to go Bach one better. If so he made a poor choice of main subjects, for even though some of the Bach fugues are dull stuff this particular one is, to your correspondent's way of thinking, the greatest fugue ever written.

But all that is beside the question. The Brahms-Haydn Variations were played (the three hundred and eighty millionth set of variations heard this season), Charles T. Griffes' Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan and other things. Mr. McCormack gave pleasure by his delivery of an aria from Mozart's cantata, Penitent David, and some Irish songs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

APR 10 1932

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony Given an Impressive Performance by Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Liszt's "Faust" symphony, preceded by Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, made the program of the last New York concert of this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and also served, with Beethoven's overture, as a musical observation of the Goethe commemoration.

The choice of these compositions, both inspired by creations of Goethe, was very suggestive. Beethoven's short and pregnant overture, notwithstanding its avowed subject, is after all music without a story. It follows a classic form and interprets certain general moods of a drama without attempting to underscore or delineate its events. It is therefore technically to be classified as absolute music of concentrated power and pathos, surcharged with the newborn democratic spirit of Beethoven's era.

Liszt's symphony is program music, but in the broadest sense, and far ahead of its time. The three movements, "Faust," "Gretchen," "Mephistopheles," and the concluding passages for the chorus do not tell us that Faust wore a beard and was attired in doublet and hose, or that Marguerite went marketing every morning, or that Mephistopheles was a good swordsman who went about in fancy dress costume. There these movements are not at all musical realism. They are intended as expressive of character; they attempt psychological delineation; they have roots in philosophic conceptions, this being especially true of the Mephistopheles movement, the spirit that denies, with its belittling and distortion of the Faust themes. When the orchestral sky clears it is the simple and touching motive of Marguerite which leads to the apotheosis, "upward and on." Faust, philosopher, dreamer, seeker of the absolute; the innocent Gretchen, and the divine simplicity of her love; Mephistopheles, apostle of negation—these ideas permeate Liszt's music and color it very significantly.

It is easy to say that the "Faust" symphony falls short of saying thes things and that the music does n come up to its program. But re peated hearings of this astonishin work, which constantly grows upo this writer, cause him to conclud that it is after all the presence c precisely the philosophic concepts and the brilliant genius of Liszt which give the music such origina ity, and prophetic idiom, and sugges tive power. Of all the symphoni works of Liszt, including th "Dante" symphony and the sym phonic poems, this "Faust" sym phony is in all probability the great est, and the richest, in ideas of whic Liszt's posterity has availed itself.

The indebtedness of Wagner t Liszt was certainly great, althoug it would be hard to prove that theme discovered in the second a of "Walküre"—the theme with au mented intervals—was taken fro the first movement of the "Faust symphony. The scores are almo synchronous, though Liszt revise the "Faust" symphony in 1857, two years after the composition of "Walküre." But the intervals so strongly suggestive of "Tristan" are another matter; likewise Wagner's letter to von Bulow, in which he acknowledges, though with some irritation, his indebtedness to Liszt for certain developments of his harmonic style. These things are not to be minimized, with the influence of Liszt's music upon later generations, from Borodin to Franck, from Strauss to Mahler.

But if we only found in the "Faust" symphony ideas which other composers put to better use than Liszt, it would not entitle the work to the position it occupies. It is to other factors we must turn to find the explanation of its durability, despite its faults. For the symphony is too long for its development. Liszt's weaknesses of structure, and his tendency, constsantly to transform rather than to develop and elongate themes, and fertilize them with the counterpoint that gives Wagner's music its magnificent substratum, are perfectly obvious. But this creation of a great genius is not to be judged by what it lacks; it is to be valued by what it contains.

The "Faust" movement is perhaps the weakest of the three, yet very fecund in its themes, very dramatic and delineative of ideas and character. The phases of Faust's nature are implied in this music. Sometimes the expression of theme has a degree of superficiality and bombast, but these are excrescences. By and large it is highly sincere music, full of ideas and rich in feeling. The Gretchen movement is the only portrayal of Goethe's heroine that we know of in music. Berlioz's Marguerite is a passionate and sophisticated woman, burning with memories. Wagner's Gretchen music has the "Senta-Sentimentality" of which Nietzsche justly complained. Schumann drips with sentiment.

The Gretchen movement of the Faust symphony is beautiful, tender music, full of poetry and the innocence of a first passion. The passing reference, or the suggestion of the thought of Marguerite with the flower—"he loves me, he loves me not"—is a poetical simile, not a literalism. The music is infinitely touching in its real naïveté and the occasional burst of impulsive and sensuous emotion. Perhaps nothing is more moving than the reappearance, in this movement, of certain of the Faust themes—the one, of a passionate and introspective nature, made gentler and more poetical in the transformation; the otner, a theme of haughtier and more grandiose nature, seeming to pass by, mirrored in the orchestra, as Marguerite, looking in her own mirror, saw the face of Faust, and his proud bearing before her.

The portrayal of Mephistopheles is not melodramatic, but intellectual, and was doubtless an origin of Boito's music of "Mefistofele," feeble as that is by the side of Liszt's. Here we have the savage, jeering transformation of Faust's nobler themes, the sardonic reference to Gretchen's music, the belittling of everything. No doubt Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony had to do with this, but Liszt, in his hint not of damnation, but negation, goes deeper, and much further into the future.

If the end, with its choral conclusion, is more of a symbol and a ceremony than a climax of musical creativeness, it nevertheless fulfills the form and the composer's conception. And if this symphony is archtype of those spurious artistic creations of the nineteenth century which confused music and literature, music and philosophy, painting, drama, what you please, let us admit that, and then see what we have. We have a most stimulating and imaginative and potential piece of music.

Mr. Koussevitzky is much to be thanked for performing the "Faust" symphony and giving it a very thoughtful and effective performance. The end was made particularly impressive by the pianissimo beginning of the chorus; by the vocal quality and the sincerity of the singers of the Harvard Glee Club and by Rulon Robinson's earnest and expressive treatment of the tenor solo part. The audience remained in the hall, applauding long after the last note of the symphony had sounded, recalling the conductor and showing by every sign its response to the occasion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 13 1932

OF MUSIC,
Season

Appreciation of Artistry of Presented by Boston Hails Dr. Koussevitzky.

Angels Through the Sky" and a number of other examples where creative art failed because it did not have the tools with which to work.

At all events, last night's concert marshalled these modernistic forces in the delicate touches of pictoral artistry and in the full panoply of war, death and destruction. As played by the superb tonal artistry of this orchestra, these works were immensely impressive and to those interested in the technique of a large orchestra with the moderns, most revealing.

One cannot but note the superiority of the orchestra of today and its writing over that of Beethoven, its larger voices and the opportunities for orchestral richness offered by the addition of the English horn, the bass clarinet, the double bassoon, and by the greater freedom of musical thought made possible by elaborate orchestral scoring for virtuosi.

Whereas the Debussy "Nocturnes" allowed more opportunity for the appreciation of orchestral tone coloring in slower measure and contemplative manner, "Till" fascinated from the bravura of bravado and made the senses keen and taut in one's endeavor to keep pace with the composer's kaleidoscopic changes of mood and color. One can hardly recall any composition more afire with orchestral scintillation, more rich in varied tone color, more intense in its musical emotions than this composition as played by this orchestra and as directed by Dr. Koussevitzky. Nor can greater technical perfection on the part of the orchestra be imagined than this, one of its most successful "showpieces."

Although Tchaikovsky accomplishes his purpose in tonal expression with simpler and less involved figures and invokes greater variety and wealth of thematic material, his efforts are no less impressive.

Serious musical thought is everywhere evident; it is idealistic, esthetic and more in the classic style. It is an epic rather than a fantasy, a volume rather than a short story, philosophic instead of comic. From the first announcement of the principal theme, offered plainly without preamble, to the tremendous finale, it is in the heights of tonal nobility without hint of mediocrity. One noted the splendor of the brass choir which has many opportunities for the display of its powers, the richness of the woodwind, its flexibility of articulation and beauty of tone color, and the perfection of ensemble of the strings. Into this work Dr. Koussevitzky projects the tremendous vitality of his personality; he holds his forces in reserve, yet releases them when occasion requires. He is sensitive to the finer nuances and delicacies of expression, but does not stress them unduly or oversentimentalize.

Neither director nor orchestra seemed jaded from the tremendous activities of the season just closing. Fit and in the prime of condition there were no evidences of technical uncertainty, weariness or lack of interest.

Conspicuous among the many superb tonal effects achieved were the exquisite nuances in the "Waltz" of the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the dramatic impressions of muted French horns and trumpets in "Till Eulenspiegel" and the atmospheric and visionary iridescence of the stately "Nuages" of Debussy. Nor should one forget the agility and tone colors of the woodwind, the unity of ensemble and the telling extremes of sforzando and pianissimo of the entire orchestra and the perfection of the string choir in its many episodes and configurations. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the "Andante Cantabile" will be long remembered for its rare sympathy and feeling, as will Mr. Boettcher's splendid tone study of the leading theme of this now famous movement.

The capacity audience was quick to appreciate the artistry of this concert and called both conductor and orchestra to their feet to acknowledge its applause. Ane one rejoices in the interest ~~shown~~ Debussy and Richard Strauss, composers, who have not always been so readily accepted or understood.

With the closing of this season's offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one notes with more than ordinary interest the musical and popular appeal of its well planned programs, the consistently perfect performances and the capacity attendance which has greeted each performance.

The program:

Beethoven ....
....Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
a. Nuages.
b. Fetes.
Strauss .. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner," —in Rondo Form, Op. 28
Tchaikovsky ....
......Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op., 64
I. Andante: allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

DR. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

FINANCIAL AID SOUGHT TO CONTINUE CONCERTS

$4500 Must Be Raised; Guarantors Asked To Enroll

A plea for financial support to assure continuance of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next year was made last night by Harry Parsons

Cross at the orchestra's final appearance in Providence this season, the 50th the organization has visited this city.

Mr. Cross, speaking during an intermission in the concert at the Albee Theatre, urged Providence music-lovers to enroll as guarantors of the 1932-33 concerts as soon as possible. To assure the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next year, he said $4500 must be raised.

"The visits of this magnificent organization are our most precious and most important musical event," he declared "Nothing in the musical year of Providence has ever equalled them in importance and musical significance, and I feel certain that I voice the feelings of everyone present when I express our deep appreciation of the great cultural value of these concerts and bespeak your support and assistance for their continuance."

He congratulated the orchestra on "its 51 years of superb music and brilliant performance," Dr. Koussevitzky, the director, for "his high musical ability and ideals which have brought the orchestra to fresh heights of achievement and fame," and this community "for having been able to enjoy these concerts for the past 50 years."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

APR 13 1932

CONTINUED SUPPORT URGED FOR SYMPHONY

An appeal for continued support of the Boston Symphony "our most precious and important musical event," was made by Harry Parson Cross during an Intermission in the final concert of the orchestra's 50th season here.

A total of $4500 must be guaranteed if the orchestra is to return to Providence next season. "I feel certain," said Cross, "that I voice the feelings of everyone present when I express our deep appreciation of the great cultural value of these concerts and bespeak your support and assistance for their continuance."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 12 1932

CONCERT SERIES FUTURE IN PERIL

Boston Symphony Appearances Next Season Depend Upon Raising $4500.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS SOUGHT

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe Appeals in Behalf of Music Association for Public Support

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give another series of concerts in this city next season, Music Association guarantors will have to subscribe the $4500 necessary for buying out the RKO-Albee theatre for four nights, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, said last night. The last concert this season is to be given tonight.

"Concerts like the one to be heard tonight," Mrs. Sharpe said, "have been made possible for thousands of Rhode Island music-lovers through the generosity of about 150 men and women who annually subscribe the $4500 necessary to buy out the theatre where the concerts are given. Today the Music Association sent out its annual letters of appeal to these generous sponsors with the hope that all pledges will be renewed and that some additional sponsors may be recruited to take the place of those who this year cannot afford to continue their subscriptions."

Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight will insert statements in the programs of the concert informing members of the audience that the concerts are made possible only through the co-operation of the Music Association sponsors. Mrs. Sharpe said last night that persons desiring to sponsor the symphony's reappearance next season in this city can do so by writing to Miss Gertrude F. Murphy, assistance secretary of the Music Association, 100 North Main street.

"Several years ago," Mrs. Sharpe said last night, "the Music Association carried on an ambitious program of sponsoring not only the Boston Symphony concerts but also arranging a number of other excellent concerts to delight those who enjoy good music. More recently the Music Association inaugurated the Community Concert Association series and started the first annual campaign for members. After two successful membership campaigns and one successful Community concert season, we feel confident that the additional music of a high order will be continued. Our only concern now, then, is making certain that we keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra with us.

"The concerts of the Boston Symphony this season have been excellent and Providence, I am sure, will not permit them to be discontinued. Responses from the campaign for the necessary $4500 will determine the future of the concert series. Those enthusiastic symphony supporters who desire to hear the Boston orchestra next season have only to send in their pledges and the return of this excellent concert organization will be guaranteed."

Officers of the Music Association which is making the appeal for funds are: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Robert S. Holding, Jr., treasurer, and Hugh F. MacColl, secretary.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 17 1932

◆ ◆ ◆

A capacity audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre, Tuesday evening, when the last concert of the season was presented. The program was varied and interesting and the audience gave enthusiastic applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegra

APR 19 1932

Ravel's new piano concerto will be heard for the first time in America at simultaneous concerts in Boston and Philadelphia Friday afternoon. Jesus Maria Sanroma is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which the work was to have been dedicated had Ravel completed it in time for the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary last season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

APR 13 1932

-:- MUSIC -:-

THE SEASON CLOSES

In the Albee Theatre last night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended the latest Providence season in a blaze of glory. There was a finely balanced programme, finely played and more warmly received than any which we can just now recall. The house was packed, with standees numerous; it was one of those occasions which do infinite credit to the musical taste of this city.

Two classical and two modern composers were represented, Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, Debussy and Richard Strauss. To that classification the very young may, indeed, object on the ground that neither Debussy nor Strauss is any longer to be considered modern. The Frenchman, to be sure, is dead and his place is secure; the German is still happily alive and his place is equally secure. Fashion today is no longer what it was in their heyday, so much we concede, but, by contrast, we insist they are still moderns.

The concert opened with the overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven, not one of the master's greatest achievements but still typical enough and always good to hear. Its technical requirements are within easy reach of Dr. Koussevitzky, but, in less conscientious hands, that very fact might make the playing of it dangerous. There was no disposition to take it easy last night; all its beauties were made manifest and manifestly satisfying.

Dr. Koussevitzky played two Debussy ~~"Nocturnes" with a deep and~~ delicate understanding of their moods. He was as certain in his interpretation of their emotional subtlety as he was in the interpretation of "Till Eulinspiegel," Strauss's magnificent tonal comedy, that followed them. Sometimes we have found Dr. Koussevitzky less colorfully robust in his interpretation of the fun, and its ulterior significance, than we have known Herr Strauss himself to be. The Slav, long in contact with Latin influences, has shown some lack of sympathy with Teutonic boisterousness. To some extent that still remains true of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation yet, far from invalidating it, it makes the performance all the more interesting; we see two geniuses at work instead of one.

The concert closed with the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, and we can say without reserve that never to our knowledge has it been more magnificently played. Since Dr. Koussevitzky discovered the profoundities of Brahms, of which at one time he seemed not wholly aware, he has been acknowledged as one of the most versatile of all orchestra leaders and one of the most penetrating in his understanding. But it seems to us that his greatest work is done when he leads a Tschaikowsky masterpiece; there the common racial consciousness of the composer and the interpreter, enlightened by the genius of both, forms a soil from which blossoms always an almost unapproachable achievement. It was so last night.

J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

APR 29 1932

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY NOW ON THE PAN

But, alas, this is a day when the Boston Symphony's conductor wastes his [illegible] audience's time, too) on things like Mr. Gershwin's latest rhapsody, rather than on works of unquestioned merit like those of Griffes.

—Musical America

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
APR 10 1932

he Sloan

Three-Piece

come up to its program. But repeated hearings of this astonishin work, which constantly grows upo this writer, cause him to conclud that it is after all the presence c precisely the philosophic concepts and the brilliant genius of Liszt which give the music such origina ity, and prophetic idiom, and sugges tive power. Of all the symphoni works of Liszt, including th "Dante" symphony and the sym phonic poems, this "Faust" sym phony is in all probability the great est, and the richest, in ideas of which Liszt's posterity has availed itself.

The indebtedness of Wagner to Liszt was certainly great, although it would be hard to prove that a theme discovered in the second act of "Walküre"—the theme with augmented intervals—was taken from the first movement of the "Faust" symphony. The scores are almost synchronous, though Liszt revised the "Faust" symphony in 1857, two years after the composition of "Walküre." But the intervals so strongly suggestive of "Tristan" are another matter; likewise Wagner's letter to von Bulow, in which he acknowledges, though with some irritation, his indebtedness to Liszt for certain developments of his harmonic style. These things are not to be minimized, with the influence of Liszt's music upon later generations, from Borodin to Franck, from Strauss to Mahler.

But if we only found in the "Faust" symphony ideas which other composers put to better use than Liszt, it would not entitle the work to the position it occupies. It is to other factors we must turn to find the explanation of its durability, despite its faults. For the symphony is too long for its development. Liszt's weaknesses of structure, and his tendency, constsantly to transform rather than to develop and elongate themes, and fertilize them with the counterpoint that gives Wagner's music its magnificent substratum, are perfectly obvious. But this creation of a great genius is not to be judged by what it lacks; it is to be valued by what it contains.

The "Faust" movement is perhaps the weakest of the three, yet very fecund in its themes, very dramatic and delineative of ideas and character. The phases of Faust's nature are implied in this music. Sometimes the expression of theme has a degree of superficiality and bombast, but these are excrescences. By and large it is highly sincere music, full of ideas and rich in feeling. The Gretchen movement is the only portrayal of Goethe's heroine that we know of in music. Berlioz's Marguerite is a passionate and sophisticated woman, burning with memories. Wagner's Gretchen music has the "Senta-Sentimentality" of which Nietzsche justly complained. Schumann drips with sentiment.

The Gretchen movement of the Faust symphony is beautiful, tender music, full of poetry and the innocence of a first passion. The passing reference, or the suggestion of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 13 1932

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience Shows Appreciation of Artistry of Season's Final Concert Presented by Boston Symphony Orchestra; Hails Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave the last concert of its season last night in the Albee Theatre, presenting as varied and interesting a program as could be well imagined or designed. To remind of Goethe, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was played. For sterner fare, the brilliant and massively grand Symphony No. 5 of Tchaikovsky was offered and, lest we forget the tremendous inroads of modern musical speech, representative examples were very much in evidence in the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss and two "Nocturnes" by Debussy.

The musical worth of these compositions is so great in each case that one may not hold one against the other for invidious comparison, but rather praise each in its manner and kind and allow it to be accepted as exemplary of its composer. In the short "Overture to Egmont" one hears features very characteristic of Beethoven, his remarkable use of comparatively simple thematic material, the manner in which he forms moods and sentiment with only few themes and their variants and what we feel to be highly legitimate and orthodox orchestration. Few opportunities for great virtuosity on the part of orchestra or conductor are offered by this overture, yet it interests by its straightforwardness and by the contrast it offers with the extremely modern idioms to follow.

Comparison of two modernists would be facilitated by greater similarity of works. Surely no more diverse sentiment could be offered than a tone poem upon clouds and the helter-skelter scamperings of a shameless rascal. The comic or grotesque has no place in the former and the delicate refinements of tone color are entirely out of place in Till's cavortings.

The analysis of Strauss's methods of musical expression, very similar to other compositions of Debussy, but not to this one, would seem to show that disgust, horror and dread can be expressed better by modern harmonic devices than by those to which we are more accustomed. One recalls the failure of Handel to instill fear and dread into the "horrid thought" of his beautiful "Waft Her Angels Through the Sky" and a number of other examples where creative art failed because it did not have the tools with which to work.

At all events, last night's concert marshalled these modernistic forces in the delicate touches of pictoral artistry and in the full panoply of war, death and destruction. As played by the superb tonal artistry of this orchestra, these works were immensely impressive and those interested in the technique of a orchestra with the moderns, most ing.

nnot but note the superiority hestra of today and its writing Beethoven, its larger voices portunities for orchestral d by the addition of the e bass clarinet, the dou nd by the greater freedom thought made possible by elaborate orchestral scoring for virtuosi.

Whereas the Debussy "Nocturnes" allowed more opportunity for the appreciation of orchestral tone coloring in slower measure and contemplative manner, "Till" fascinated from the bravura of bravado and made the senses keen and taut in one's endeavor to keep pace with the composer's kaleidoscopic changes of mood and color. One can hardly recall any composition more afire with orchestral scintillation, more rich in varied tone color, more intense in its musical emotions than this composition as played by this orchestra and as directed by Dr. Koussevitzky. Nor can greater technical perfection on the part of the orchestra be imagined than this, one of its most successful "showpieces."

Although Tchaikovsky accomplishes his purpose in tonal expression with simpler and less involved figures and invokes greater variety and wealth of thematic material, his efforts are no less impressive.

Serious musical thought is everywhere evident; it is idealistic, esthetic and more in the classic style. It is an epic rather than a fantasy, a volume rather than a short story, philosophic instead of comic. From the first announcement of the principal theme, offered plainly without preamble, to the tremendous finale, it is in the heights of tonal nobility without hint of mediocrity. One noted the splendor of the brass choir which has many opportunities for the display of its powers, the richness of the woodwind, its flexibility of articulation and beauty of tone color, and the perfection of ensemble of the strings. Into this work Dr. Koussevitzky projects the tremendous vitality of his personality; he holds his forces in reserve, yet releases them when occasion requires. He is sensitive to the finer nuances and delicacies of expression, but does not stress them unduly or oversentimentalize.

Neither director nor orchestra seemed jaded from the tremendous activities of the season just closing. Fit and in the prime of condition there were no evidences of technical uncertainty, weariness or lack of interest.

Conspicuous among the many superb tonal effects achieved were the exquisite nuances in the "Waltz" of the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the dramatic impressions of muted French horns and trumpets in "Till Eulenspiegel" and the atmospheric and visionary iridescence of the stately "Nuages" of Debussy. Nor should one forget the agility and tone colors of the woodwind, the unity of ensemble and the telling extremes of sforzando and pianissimo of the entire orchestra and the perfection of the string choir in its many episodes and configurations. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the "Andante Cantabile" will be long remembered for its rare sympathy and feeling, as will Mr. Boettcher's splendid tone study of the leading theme of this now famous movement.

The capacity audience was quick to appreciate the artistry of this concert and called both conductor and orchestra to their feet to acknowledge its applause. Ane one rejoices in the interest shown Debussy and Richard Strauss, composers, who have not always been so readily accepted or understood.

With the closing of this season's offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one notes with more than ordinary interest the musical and popular appeal of its well planned programs, the consistently perfect performances and the capacity attendance which has greeted each performance.

The program:

Beethoven ....
...Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
a. Nuages.
b. Fetes.
Strauss .. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner," —in Rondo Form, Op. 28
Tchaikovsky ....
......Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op., 64
I. Andante: allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

DR. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

FINANCIAL AID SOUGHT TO CONTINUE CONCERTS

$4500 Must Be Raised; Guarantors Asked To Enroll

A plea for financial support to assure continuance of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next year was made last night by Harry Parsons Cross at the orchestra's final appearance in Providence this season, the 50th the organization has visited this city.

Mr. Cross, speaking during an intermission in the concert at the Albee Theatre, urged Providence music-lovers to enroll as guarantors of the 1932-33 concerts as soon as possible. To assure the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next year, he said $4500 must be raised.

"The visits of this magnificent organization are our most precious and most important musical event," he declared "Nothing in the musical year of Providence has ever equalled them in importance and musical significance, and I feel certain that I voice the feelings of everyone present when I express our deep appreciation of the great cultural value of these concerts and bespeak your support and assistance for their continuance."

He congratulated the orchestra on "its 51 years of superb music and brilliant performance," Dr. Koussevitzky, the director, for "his high musical ability and ideals which have brought the orchestra to fresh heights of achievement and fame," and this community "for having been able to enjoy these concerts for the past 50 years."

FROM
, R. I.
BUNE
3 1932

PORT YMPHONY

ed support of ur most preusical event," Parson Cross
in the final 50th season

guaranteed rn to Prov-el certain,"
he feelings
I express the great ncerts and assistance

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 17 1932

◆ ◆ ◆

A capacity audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Albee Theatre, Tuesday evening, when the last concert of the season was presented. The program was varied and interesting and the audience gave enthusiastic applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegra
APR 19 1932

Ravel's new piano concerto will be heard for the first time in America at simultaneous concerts in Boston and Philadelphia Friday afternoon. Jesus Maria Sanroma is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which the work was to have been dedicated had Ravel completed it in time for the orchestra's fiftieth anniversary last season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 12 1932

CONCERT SERIES FUTURE IN PERIL

Boston Symphony Appearances Next Season Depend Upon Raising $4500.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS SOUGHT

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe Appeals in Behalf of Music Association for Public Support

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give another series of concerts in this city next season, Music Association guarantors will have to subscribe the $4500 necessary for buying out the RKO-Albee theatre for four nights, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, said last night. The last concert this season is to be given tonight.

"Concerts like the one to be heard tonight," Mrs. Sharpe said, "have been made possible for thousands of Rhode Island music-lovers through the generosity of about 150 men and women who annually subscribe the $4500 necessary to buy out the theatre where the concerts are given. Today the Music Association sent out its annual letters of appeal to these generous sponsors with the hope that all pledges will be renewed and that some additional sponsors may be recruited to take the place of those who this year cannot afford to continue their subscriptions."

Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight will insert statements in the programs of the concert informing members of the audience that the concerts are made possible only through the co-operation of the Music Association sponsors. Mrs. Sharpe said last night that persons desiring to sponsor the symphony's reappearance next season in this city can do so by writing to Miss Gertrude F. Murphy, assistance secretary of the Music Association, 100 North Main street.

"Several years ago," Mrs. Sharpe said last night, "the Music Association carried on an ambitious program of sponsoring not only the Boston Symphony concerts but also arranging a number of other excellent concerts to delight those who enjoy good music. More recently the Music Association inaugurated the Community Concert Association series and started the first annual campaign for members. After two successful membership campaigns and one successful Community concert season, we feel confident that the additional music of a high order will be continued. Our only concern now, then, is making certain that we keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra with us.

"The concerts of the Boston Symphony this season have been excellent and Providence, I am sure, will not permit them to be discontinued. Responses from the campaign for the necessary $4500 will determine the future of the concert series. Those enthusiastic symphony supporters who desire to hear the Boston orchestra next season have only to send in their pledges and the return of this excellent concert organization will be guaranteed."

Officers of the Music Association which is making the appeal for funds are: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president; William S. Innis, vice president; Robert S. Holding, Jr., treasurer, and Hugh F. MacColl, secretary.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
APR 13 1932

-:- MUSIC -:-

THE SEASON CLOSES

In the Albee Theatre last night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended the latest Providence season in a blaze of glory. There was a finely balanced programme, finely played and more warmly received than any which we can just now recall. The house was packed, with standees numerous; it was one of those occasions which do infinite credit to the musical taste of this city.

Two classical and two modern composers were represented, Beethoven, Tchaikowsky, Debussy and Richard Strauss. To that classification the very young may, indeed, object on the ground that neither Debussy nor Strauss is any longer to be considered modern. The Frenchman, to be sure, is dead and his place is secure; the German is still happily alive and his place is equally secure. Fashion today is no longer what it was in their heyday, so much we concede, but, by contrast, we insist they are still moderns.

The concert opened with the overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven, not one of the master's greatest achievements but still typical enough and always good to hear. Its technical requirements are within easy reach of Dr. Koussevitzky, but, in less conscientious hands, that very fact might make the playing of it dangerous. There was no disposition to take it easy last night; all its beauties were made manifest and manifestly satisfying.

Dr. Koussevitzky played two Debussy "Nocturnes" with a deep and delicate understanding of their moods. He was as certain in his interpretation of their emotional subtlety as he was in the interpretation of "Till Eulinspiegel," Strauss's magnificent tonal comedy, that followed them. Sometimes we have found Dr. Koussevitzky less colorfully robust in his interpretation of the fun, and its ulterior significance, than we have known Herr Strauss himself to be. The Slav, long in contact with Latin influences, has shown some lack of sympathy with Teutonic boisterousness. To some extent that still remains true of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation yet, far from invalidating it, it makes the performance all the more interesting; we see two geniuses at work instead of one.

The concert closed with the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, and we can say without reserve that never to our knowledge has it been more magnificently played. Since Dr. Koussevitzky discovered the profoundities of Brahms, of which at one time he seemed not wholly aware, he has been acknowledged as one of the most versatile of all orchestra leaders and one of the most penetrating in his understanding. But it seems to us that his greatest work is done when he leads a Tschaikowsky masterpiece; there the common racial consciousness of the composer and the interpreter, enlightened by the genius of both, forms a soil from which blossoms always an almost unapproachable achievement. It was so last night.

J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
APR 29 1932

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY NOW ON THE PAN

But, alas, this is a day when the Boston Symphony's conductor wastes his time (and his audience's time, too) on things like Mr. Gershwin's latest rhapsody, rather than on works of unquestioned merit like those of Griffes.

—Musical America

192

Symphony Offers Superb Program

Dr. Koussevitzky Selects "Brilliant Galaxy" of Composers

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

On Tuesday evening the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Albee Theatre. No more enjoyable and improving program has been offered during the season than this nor could there be a more brilliant and glowing galaxy of composers than Beethoven of the great classicists, and Debussy, Richard Strauss, and Tschaikowski of our own time.

The Overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven, not only offers a splendid illustration of the composer's solid, substantial and rugged genius, and an example of tonal contrasts and dramatic character, but also serves as a reminder of his friendship with Goethe and of the anniversary of the latter's death, now being memorialized by the whole world of letters. It begins, as did so many of Beethoven's works with a commanding unison forte in stately and dignified tempo which is followed by equally impressive massive chords in F-minor by the entire string band. The woodwind replies, in less solemn strains, which are imitated by the strings and lead into the portentous and tragic tones of the introduction. Then follows in 3-4 time less ominous sentiments, by the strings, followed by the entire orchestra with interesting dialogue between the string and woodwind choirs, with suggestions of questioning mystery.

In this overture Beethoven does not attempt to recount the events of the tragedy but follows his well known dictum of the creation of an atmosphere by suggestion rather than by the exposition of an actual picture. Quite the opposite of the intent of "program music" so much in vogue at the present time, and so much easier to create. It is easy to see that creative artistry such as this is of a far higher esthetic type and upon an entirely different plane from that of the obvious and the definite.

Debussy, although of a century later, followed this high ideal of musical treatment and created ideals of musical impressionism which persisted throughout his life. Even with stage, scenery and operatic libretto, Debussy's genius of composition creates atmosphere and sentiment rather than definite portrayal, which is undoubtedly the secret of his high position among the great composers of all time.. Even with a stated subject, his music is luminous and mystic rather than direct and definite. Those who would correlate visual color with musical timbre will find in this superb tone poem upon cloud effects remarkable material for such association. Yet beyond the domain of suggestiveness they cannot go. They cannot properly align tonal keys with colors or shades, nor may the voices of orchestral instruments be assigned to definite emotions or impressions. We should not attempt to unite the real and the actual too closely or turn all poetry into prose. But try as one will, Debussy's luminous dust can never be brought down to earth.

In "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" we have an entirely different kind of music, one in which the mood is not of tragic and dramatic prophecy or of fleecy clouds slowly and lazily rolling across the sky. Here is quick action, the rake's progress, cavortings and adventure, and all at top speed. Strauss himself refused to assign a program to the work. The story in the program book is highly suggestive and cannot fail to interest, and many of its surmises go very well indeed with the shrieking of the high D clarinet, the whirlwind chromatics of the flutes, onward rushing of rapid strings and the sinister bleatings of the French horns. It is a veritable study of virtuoso orchestra because of the technical difficulties of the parts.

None but orchestras of the highest technical and artistic attainments should attempt the performance of this work—nor do they. It is a marvellous orchestral fantasy: invested with the gruesome story, it is a phantasmagoria and it is one of the greatest works of that colossal genius of our own time Richard Strauss. The tired business man will not slumber nor sleep during this portrayal and should he read a few chapters of Francois Villon with this music still ringing in his ears after the concert its effect will not be lessened.

In the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowski we have a return to more serious and profound moods. One might read into this symphony an infinite variety of poetic thoughts. Its movements might have application to the great events in the lives of individuals or peoples, for into the work are poured thoughts of melody and harmony which may be construed in many ways. One hears with much interest the "borrowing" of many of the finest musical thoughts of Tschaikowski for the "talking" screen and often the music is far better than the picture. So far no name has been given to this symphony which is to many the finest of all of Tschaikowski's works. From the first utterance of the low rich chalumeau of the clarinet to the final "allegro vivace" with its suggestion of clanging bells and the onward tramping of a peasant nation, it is absorbing and gripping, its fierce intensities. Strongly rhythmic, persuasive in orchestral voices, grand and massively impressive in its use of the brass choir, and colossal in its tonal climaxes, its fascination is irresistible.

The second movement contains the famous horn solo which offers opportunity for familiarity with this potent orchestral voice with the exquisite musical material of the composer. At times horn sings alone, at others the clarinet enters with pleasing obligato. Again the 'cellos take up the same melody and with typical Tschaikowski idiom the solo oboe may in turn take it from the strings. The motive is graceful, stately and contemplative. The composer handles this theme with the greatest skill and esthetic artistry and leads it to a thunderous climax with the full orchestra only to part with it in the softest possible pianissimo. This movement is a veritable gem of graceful legato in which the solo instruments have many opportunities for their individual and characteristic speech. Attention must be called to the delicious waltz which is heard before the finale.

Tschaikowsky is not often thought of as a "Waltz King" yet this title is fully deserved when one considers the beautiful 3-4 movements in the piano trio, Opus. 50, that in the "Serenade for Strings," Opus 48, in the "Valse des Fleurs" of the Nutcracker Suite, and this movement of the symphony. The violins first announce a charming theme punctuated off beat by horns, bassoons and the other strings pizzicato. This is answered by bassoons and clarinets to which the

---

FROM Sun

Baltimore Md

APR 17 1932

Symphonies Hold Center Of Interest

New York Hears Concerts By Philharmonic, Boston And The "Musicians'" Orchestras

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

AGAIN, symphony concerts have given New York the most vital music of the week, the Philharmonic going full tilt, a visit from the Boston Symphony and the weekly concert by the huge Musicians' Symphony.

Hearing Sir Thomas Beecham again, one comes to the conclusion that he is a less good conductor than we thought him on his previous visit here. The fact that he has one of the great orchestras of the world under his baton is much in his favor, but his programs have not been of startling interest and his conducting without a score, while it may impress the groundlings, nearly brought him to grief, once at least, in the Handel Concerto Grosso in E minor last week.

His playing of music by Bax, Delius and Elgar is good propaganda for contemporary British composers, but aside from that the music as a whole is not of thrilling interest.

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAMS

Mr. Koussevitzky outdid himself at his final two concerts of the season. At the first of these he gave a New York premiere of a Suite by Toch, the modernist composer who is in New York at the present time on a visit. The program also contained Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and the old chestnut Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky.

Mr. Toch's suite, which he calls a "bunte" suite; that is to say, "many colored," fulfills expectations. It is many-colored in more senses than one and while interesting and even of some beauty in spots, is not music which could be taken very near to one's heart.

NO LONGER RADICAL

The Strauss work, which even in our memories used to be thought so dissonant and radical, is conservative enough now and need startle no one. With the Tchaikowsky, Mr. Koussevitzky did wonderful things not only by his sharply pointed playing of it, but also by the careful shading which gave it a vigor it does not inherently possess, and robbed it of much of its sentimentality.

At the second concert he gave the Egmont Overture of Beethoven and Liszt's Faust Symphony with the Harvard Glee Club singing the choral part, and the tenor solo capably done by Rulon Y. Robison.

There would be no point in making a discussion of this work of Liszt which, too, in its day, was considered somewhat unorthodox. If we accept the hypothesis of Liszt as a composer at all, it has its place in the gallery of musical delineations of Goethe's legend, or rather the legend which Goethe made famous. The performance was excellent in every respect and so caught the fancy of the audience that it remained long after the end of the program to app

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 13 1932

Boston Symphony's Final Program Proves Interesting

Capacity Audience Shows Appreciation of Artistry as Season Ends.—Varied Offerings Include Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting brilliant and massively grand Symphony No. 5 of Tchaikovsky was offered and, lest we forget the tremendous inroads of modern musical speech, representative examples were very much in evidence in the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss and two "Nocturnes" by Debussy.

Neither director nor orchestra seemed jaded from the tremendous activities of the season just closing. Fit and in the prime of condition there were no evidences of technical uncertainty, weariness or lack of interest.

Conspicuous among the many superb tonal effects achieved were the exquisite nuances in the "Waltz" of the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the dramatic impressions of muted French horns and trumpets in "Till Eulenspiegel" and the atmospheric and visionary iridescence of the stately "Nuages" of Debussy. Nor should one forget the agility and tone colors of the woodwind, the unity of ensemble and the telling extremes of sforzando and pianissimo of the entire orchestra and the perfection of the string choir in its many episodes and configurations. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the "Andante Cantabile" will be long remembered for its rare sympathy and feeling, as will Mr. Boettcher's splendid tone study of the leading theme of this now famous movement.

The capacity audience was quick to appreciate the artistry of this concert and called both conductor and orchestra to their feet to acknowledge its applause. Ane one rejoices in the interest shown Debussy and Richard Strauss, composers, who have not always been so readily accepted or understood.

With the closing of this season's offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one notes with more than ordinary interest the musical and popular appeal of its well planned programs, the con- perfect performances and the attendance which has greeted formance.

ogram:

n ....

rture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

.... Two Nocturnes

Nuages.

Fetes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

APR 22 1932

Orchestralities

A LONG telegram has come from the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra relating items of interest concerning the season's-end activities of the great organization which will open the Symphony Club's series here next fall.

Dr. Koussevitzky, it develops, will sail on the Ile de France May 4, and among his summer tasks is that of serving as guest conductor for a time with the Vienna Philharmonic.

This Friday afternoon the American premier of Ravel's new piano concerto is scheduled in Boston—Philadelphia has it for an evening concert on the same date — with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist.

On the last Boston programs, April 29 and 30, stands the first symphony of Brahms. As I remember, the Fourth was scheduled for the season's opening concerts. The New York series closed last week with a performance of the Liszt "Faust Symphony," hailed there as Manhattan's only musical celebration of the Goethe centenary. The

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN EAGLE

APR 24 1932

Schoenberg and Stokowski

By EDWARD CUSHING

A Postscript to a Review of the 'Gurrelieder' and a Table of Novelties Introduced Here by an Enterprising Conductor

"NOT long ago," Puzzled Reader embarrassingly reminds us, "you referred to Schoenberg as 'a romanticist of the deepest dye.' Today in your review of the 'Guerrelieder' performance you tell me that 'Schoenberg was not born to be a romanticist.' The inconsistency is striking because it is not characteristic of your opinions. I should like to know which you believe before expressing * * * agreement or disagreement with you."

The inconsistency, we hasten to assure Puzzled Reader, is verbal. As a man Schoenberg is a romanticist, as an artist he was not born to be one; the distinction is between temperament and talent, between the nature of Schoenberg's experience, as conditioned by the former, and his ability to express it, as limited by the latter. What, essentially, he lacks is the gift of expression; it is this deficiency which accounts for the ineffectualness of both his early and his later works. In the former it was emphasized, homever, by his inability to personalize the romantic idiom which he borrowed from Wagner. Probably he realized this. With the completed score of the "Gurrelieder" before him, it may be that he recalled Spontini's words to Wagner on hearing a performance of "Rienzi": "Young man, you should stop composing; you have done better than you can." Schoenberg was not born to be a Wagner any more than Wagner was born to be a Meyerbeer, but, unlike Wagner, he was not, we think, born to be very much of anything else, for the gift of expression which Wagner possessed, and needed only to develop in another direction than that to which "Rienzi" pointed, was and remains lacking in Schoenberg's equipment.

For this reason his later works as well as his earlier ones are unrealized masterpieces. In them the idiom has become personalized to an amazing degree, but still the thought, the feeling which Schoenberg seeks to convey, remain unclear and unintelligible; still Schoenberg cannot say, so that the rest of us will understand, what is on his mind and in his heart, though to this end he has developed a technique of expression startling in its novelty, and rich in possibilities which other men than he—Alban Berg, conspicuously — have better realized.

* * *

Stokowski's Novelties

The publication in these columns of a complete list of novelties introduced in New York by Serge Koussewitsky during the past eight seasons (the full term, to date, of his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra) has led to requests from readers for similar tables of new music brought to the attention of New York audiences by other conductors. Willing to oblige, the writer has compiled a list of works whose first performances here have been conducted by Mr. Stokowski at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The list, which is printed below, does not include novelties introduced here by other conductors—Mr. Reiner, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Mr. Molinari, Mr. Krauss—under whose leadership the Philadelphians have played in New York:

Albeniz-Stokowski: "Fete Dieu a Seville."
Bach-Stokowski: Chorale-preludes: "Wir Glauben All"; "Aus der Tiefe"; "Wachet Auf"; "Ich ruf' zu dir." Preludes in E-flat minor and B minor from Book 1 of the Well-Tempered Clavier. Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor. Toccata and Fugue in D minor. Fantasy and Fugue in G minor.
Balakirew-Caselle: "Islamey" fantasy.
Braunfels: Fantastic Variations, for orchestra.
Caplet: "Epiphanie," for 'cello and orchestra.
Carpenter: "A Pilgrim Vision."
Carrillo: Music for quarter- and eighth-tone instruments.
de la Casinier: "Hercule et les Centaures."
Casella: "Italia," rhapsody for orchestra. "A Notte Alta."
Caturla: Two Cuban Dances.
Debussy-Stokowski: "La Cathedral Engloutie."
Eichheim: Oriental Impressions, suite. Japanese Nocturne.
Elgar: Concerto for 'cello and orchestra.
Harmati: Prelude to a Drama.
Hindemith: "Nuschi Nuschi" dances.
Hofmann: "Chromaticon," for piano and orchestra (*). Tone poem, "The Haunted Castle." Concerto in A-flat for piano and orchestra.
Holst: Japanese Suite.
Illiashenko: Dyptique Mongol.
Jacobi: Indian Dances.
Joslyn: War Dance.
Kaminsky: Concerto Grosso.
Knipper: "Tale of a Plaster God."
Krein: Ode to the Memory of Lenin.
Levidis: Symphonic poem for electrical instruments and orchestra.
Loeffler: "Canticle to the Sun," for soprano and orchestra.
Mahler: Eighth Symphony (*).
Medtner: Concerto for piano and orchestra.
Miaskowsky: Fifth Symphony; Sixth Symphony; Tenth Symphony.
Milhaud: Concerto for percussion instruments and orchestra.
Moor: Concerto for string quartet and orchestra.
Moussorgsky: Entr'acte from "Khowantschina."
Ornstein: Concerto for piano and orchestra.
Pingoud: "Le Prophete," orchestral piece.
Prokofiew: Third Symphony. Ballet, "Pas d'Acier" (*). Overture in B-flat.
Rachmaninoff: Symphony, "The Bells." Fourth piano concerto. Three Russian songs, for orchestra.
Riegger: Study in Sonority for 40 violins.
Rimsky-Korsakow: Suite, "Tale of the Invisible City of Kitesch."
Scott: Piano Concerto. Two Passacaglias, for orchestra.
Schelling: "A Victory Ball."
Schoenberg: Five Orchestral Pieces. "Gurrelieder." Variations for orchestra. Opera, "Die Glueckliche Hand" (*).
Strawinsky: Symphonies a Instruments a Vent. "Renard." Volga Boatmen's Song. Violin Concerto. "Les Noces" (*).
Szostakowicz: Symphony in D.
Szymanowski: Violin Concerto.
Tailleferre: Piano Concerto.
Varese: "Hyperprism" (*). "Ameriques." "Arcanes."
Villa-Lobos: Dansas Caracteristicas de Indios Africanos.
Wassilenko: "Hyrcus Nocturnus," orchestral piece.
von Webern: Passacaglia, for orchestra.
Zimbalist: "Daphnis and Chloe," tone-poem.

* * *

This list covers in full a 16-year period, beginning with the first New York concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra (given under the auspices of the Society of the Friends of Music), at which Mahler's Eight Symphony was introduced here, and ending with the concert at which, last Tuesday evening, Mr. Stokowski conducted the first New York performance of Schoenberg's "Gurrelieder." A number of the works included on it were heard at concerts which Mr. Stokowski conducted for the Friends of Music, the International Composers' Guild and the League of Composers. These are starred on the list.

The most obvious difference between Mr. Koussewitsky's and Mr. Stokowski's novelties, as revealed by a comparison of the two lists (that published last Sunday and that above), is the frequently experimental character of the latter. The appearance among Mr. Stokowski's novelties of numerous works intended to demonstrate or employ new musical instruments (various types of theremins, of instruments for producing intervals of less than half-tone), of works illustrating the efforts of various modern composers to extend musical resources, may serve as an indication of the nature and direction of Mr. Stokowski's interest in new music. Few of the works that he has introduced here have found place in the standard symphonic repertory because few were chosen, to judge from this record, on a basis of intrinsic musical value. We are indebted to Mr. Stokowski principally, for his introduction here of various of Schoenberg's important works, of music by the contemporary Russian composers (despite the fact that nothing of value has been forthcoming from the latter quarter), and for what he has done to keep us informed on the latest developments, of an experimental and technical nature, in contemporary music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 24 1932

SYMPHONY FUND CLIMBS TO $3293

More Than Two-Thirds of Sum Necessary Already Has

000 and $150,000.

SAYS TAX INCOME UNCERTAIN

Finance Chairman Says "We Must Go Slow Until We Know What We Are About"

Additional large appropriations for the construction of highways and sewers this year must be given careful consid-a letter sent out last week by Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association.

Subscriptions received to date from 71 persons, to whom Mrs. Sharpe appealed for the $4500 necessary, total $3293.

There are still a few regular sponsors of the Boston Symphony to be heard from, Mrs. Sharpe said last night, but it is doubtful whether their subscriptions will bring the total up to $4500.

"This means," Mrs. Sharpe pointed out, "that additional sponsors must be found. Several have decreased the amount of their former subscriptions and some who have given in former years are not able to give at all this year. It would be a pity if the Boston Symphony concerts had to be discontinued because of our failure to raise $4500 necessary to pay the expenses of the theatre on the four nights when it is leased. I am hopeful that during the next few days the total will be substantially increased either by replies from original sponsors or by the addition of new names to the list of guarantors."

Subscriptions should be sent to the office of the Music Association, 100 North Main street.

Those who have already sent in their subscriptions include:

$300—John Nicholas Brown, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell; $250—Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf; $150—Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Callender, Mrs. George Hail, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Samuel M. Nicholson; $100—Mrs. Peter G. Gerry, Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Herbert W. Rice, Mrs. Walter Callender, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe; $75—Mr. and Mrs. R. Clinton Fuller. $50—Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Chaminade Club of Providence, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Gammell Cross.

$30—Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh; $25—Helen C. Robertson, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson G. Wing, Edith Edwards, Irene B. Butler, Mrs. Harrison B. Huntoon, W. W. Dempster, William Fly, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin T. Peck,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

APR 27 1932

Boston Programs.

With the programs on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week the Boston Symphony orchestra's 51st season comes to close. On the programs for the final concerts Mr. Koussevitzky has set Beethoven's Eight Symphony in F major and Brahm's First Symphony in C minor. Thus the season will end on the classic note with an orchestra that has never been more sensitive to the demands upon it.

At the final concert of the supplementary series last Monday the orchestra gave Haydn's Surprise Symphony; Hill's new Concertino for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanroma as pianist; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

According to the Boston Globe's music critic, Professor Hill's concertino was composed in July and August of last summer. The score is dedicated to Jesus Maria Sanroma, who played the solo part. Fundamentally in the concerto form, inasmuch as there are three distinct sections, the work nevertheless is constructed in one movement. The orchestration requires a small array of percussion instruments.

On the whole the piano part is more interesting than the orchestral portions. It has more variety, more vitality, more point. Although affording ample opportunity for technical display, this part is neither superficial nor lacking in musical feeling. In addition, there is a certain pithiness of ideas, a certain breezy vitality that makes it stand in memory.

Some of the harmony is mildly modern, and extensive use is made of jazz rhythms. In this last respect the concertino is to be counted among the more sincere and least self-conscious specimens of such symphonic writing.

Mr. Sanroma, who seems the ideal pianist for modern music, imparted his own brilliance of execution to an already brilliantly written part. There was most enthusiastic applause for all concerned; conductor, soloist, composer and orchestra.

192

Symphony Offers Superb Program

Dr. Koussevitzky Selects "Brilliant Galaxy" of Composers

BY DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

On Tuesday evening the last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Albee Theatre. No more enjoyable and improving program has been offered during the season than this nor could there be a more brilliant and glowing galaxy of composers than Beethoven of the great classicists, and Debussy, Richard Strauss, and Tschaikowski of our own time.

The Overture to "Egmont," by Beethoven, not only offers a splendid illustration of the composer's solid, substantial and rugged genius, and an example of tonal contrasts and dramatic character, but also serves as a reminder of his friendship with Goethe and of the anniversary of the latter's death, now being memorialized by the whole world of letters. It begins, as did so many of Beethoven's works with a commanding unison forte in stately and dignified tempo which is followed by equally impressive massive chords in F-minor by the entire string band. The woodwind replies, in less solemn strains, which are imitated by the strings and lead into the portentous and tragic tones of the introduction. Then follows in 3-4 time less ominous sentiments, by the strings, followed by the entire orchestra with interesting dialogue between the string and woodwind choirs, with suggestions of questioning mystery.

In this overture Beethoven does not attempt to recount the events of the tragedy but follows his well known dictum of the creation of an atmosphere by suggestion rather than by the exposition of an actual picture. Quite the opposite of the intent of "program music" so much in vogue at the present time, and so much easier to create. It is easy to see that creative artistry such as this is of a far higher esthetic type and upon an entirely different plane from that of the obvious and the definite.

Debussy, although of a century later followed this high ideal of musical treatment and created ideals of musical impressionism which persisted throughout his life. Even with stage, scenery and operatic libretto, Debussy's genius of composition creates atmosphere and sentiment rather than definite portrayal, which is undoubtedly the secret of his high position among the great composers of all time. Even with a stated subject, his music is luminous and mystic rather than direct and definite. Those who would correlate visual color with musical timbre will find in this superb tone poem upon cloud effects remarkable material for such association. Yet beyond the domain of suggestiveness they cannot go. They cannot properly align tonal keys with colors or shades, nor may the voices of orchestral instruments be assigned to definite emotions or impressions. We should not attempt to unite the real and the actual too closely or turn all poetry into prose. But try as one will, Debussy's luminous dust can never be brought down to earth.

In "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" we have an entirely different kind of music, one in which the mood is not of tragic and dramatic prophecy or of fleecy clouds slowly and lazily rolling across the sky. Here is quick action, the rake's progress, cavortings and adventure, and all at top speed. Strauss himself refused to assign a program to the work. The story in the program book is highly suggestive and cannot fail to interest, and many of its surmises go very well indeed with the shrieking of the high D clarinet, the whirlwind chromatics of the flutes, onward rushing of rapid strings and the sinister bleatings of the French horns. It is a veritable study of virtuoso orchestra because of the technical difficulties of the parts.

None but orchestras of the highest technical and artistic attainments should attempt the performance of this work—nor do they. It is a marvellous orchestral fantasy: invested with the gruesome story, it is a phantasmagoria and it is one of the greatest works of that colossal genius of our own time Richard Strauss. The tired business man will not slumber nor sleep during this portrayal and should he read a few chapters of Francois Villon with this music still ringing in his ears after the concert its effect will not be lessened.

In the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowski we have a return to more serious and profound moods. One might read into this symphony an infinite variety of poetic thoughts. Its movements might have application to the great events in the lives of individuals or peoples, for into the work are poured thoughts of melody and harmony which may be construed in many ways. One hears with much interest the "borrowing" of many of the finest musical thoughts of Tschaikowski for the "talking" screen and often the music is far better than the picture. So far no name has been given to this symphony which is to many the finest of all of the Tschaikowski's works. From the first utterance of the low rich chalumeau of the clarinet to the final "allegro vivace" with its suggestion of clanging bells and the onward tramping of a peasant nation, it is absorbing and gripping, in its fierce intensities. Strongly rhythmic, persuasive in orchestral voices, grand and massively impressive in its use of the brass choir, and colossal in its tonal climaxes, its fascination is irresistible.

The second movement contains the famous horn solo which offers opportunity for familiarity with this potent orchestral voice with the exquisite musical material of the composer. At times horn sings alone, at others the clarinet enters with pleasing obligato. Again the 'cellos take up the same melody and with typical Tschaikowski idiom the solo oboe may in turn take it from the strings. The motive is graceful, stately and contemplative. The composer handles this theme with the greatest skill and esthetic artistry and leads it to a thunderous climax with the full orchestra only to part with it in the softest possible pianissimo. This movement is a veritable gem of graceful legato in which the solo instruments have many opportunities for their individual and characteristic speech. Attention must be called to the delicious waltz which is heard before the finale.

Tschaikowsky is not often thought of as a "Waltz King" yet this title is fully deserved when one considers the beautiful 3-4 movements in the piano trio, Opus. 50, that in the "Serenade for Strings," Opus 48, in the "Valse des Fleurs" of the Nutcracker Suite, and this movement of the symphony. The violins first announce a charming theme punctuated off beat by horns, bassoons and the other strings pizzicato. This is answered by bassoons and clarinets to which the oboe is soon added. The full woodwind chorus takes up the strain to a legato accompaniment of slowly moving scales by the 'cellos and first violins. The bassoon then plays a counter subject which is taken up by the woodwind choir in full voice only to give way to a pizzicato episode by the strings in entirely different mood and sentiment.

---

this particular one is, to your correspondent's way of thinking, the greatest fugue ever written.

But all that is beside the question. The Brahms-Haydn Variations were played (the three hundred and eighty millionth set of variations

---

ON

have vital ionic

going full tilt, a visit from the Boston Symphony and the weekly concert by the huge Musicians' Symphony.

Hearing Sir Thomas Beecham again, one comes to the conclusion that he is a less good conductor than we thought him on his previous visit here. The fact that he has one of the great orchestras of the world under his baton is much in his favor, but his programs have not been of startling interest and his conducting without a score, while it may impress the groundlings, nearly brought him to grief, once at least, in the Handel Concerto Grosso in E minor last week.

His playing of music by Bax, Delius and Elgar is good propaganda for contemporary British composers, but aside from that the music as a whole is not of thrilling interest.

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAMS

Mr. Koussevitzky outdid himself at his final two concerts of the season. At the first of these he gave a New York premiere of a Suite by Toch, the modernist composer who is in New York at the present time on a visit. The program also contained Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and the old chestnut Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky.

Mr. Toch's suite, which he calls a "bunte" suite; that is to say, "many colored," fulfills expectations. It is many-colored in more senses than one and while interesting and even of some beauty in spots, is not music which could be taken very near to one's heart.

NO LONGER RADICAL

The Strauss work, which even in our memories used to be thought so dissonant and radical, is conservative enough now and need startle no one. With the Tchaikowsky, Mr. Koussevitzky did wonderful things not only by his sharply pointed playing of it, but also by the careful shading which gave it a vigor it does not inherently possess, and robbed it of much of its sentimentality.

At the second concert he gave the Egmont Overture of Beethoven and Liszt's Faust Symphony with the Harvard Glee Club singing the choral part, and the tenor solo capably done by Rulon Y. Robison.

There would be no point in making a discussion of this work of Liszt which, too, in its day, was considered somewhat unorthodox. If we accept the hypothesis of Liszt as a composer at all, it has its place in the gallery of musical delineations of Goethe's legend, or rather the legend which Goethe made famous. The performance was excellent in every respect and so caught the fancy of the audience that it remained long after the end of the program to ap

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 13 1932

Boston Symphony's Final Program Proves Interesting

Capacity Audience Shows Appreciation of Artistry as Season Ends.—Varied Offerings Include Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave the last concert of its season last night in the Albee Theatre, presenting as varied and interesting a program as could be well imagined or designed. To remind of Goethe, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was played. For sterner fare, the brilliant and massively grand Symphony No. 5 of Tchaikovsky was offered and, lest we forget the tremendous inroads of modern musical speech, representative examples were very much in evidence in the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss and two "Nocturnes" by Debussy.

Neither director nor orchestra seemed jaded from the tremendous activities of the season just closing. Fit and in the prime of condition there were no evidences of technical uncertainty, weariness or lack of interest.

Conspicuous among the many superb tonal effects achieved were the exquisite nuances in the "Waltz" of the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the dramatic impressions of muted French horns and trumpets in "Till Eulenspiegel" and the atmospheric and visionary iridescence of the stately "Nuages" of Debussy. Nor should one forget the agility and tone colors of the woodwind, the unity of ensemble and the telling extremes of sforzando and pianissimo of the entire orchestra and the perfection of the string choir in its many episodes and configurations. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the "Andante Cantabile" will be long remembered for its rare sympathy and feeling, as will Mr. Boettcher's splendid tone study of the leading theme of this now famous movement.

The capacity audience was quick to appreciate the artistry of this concert and called both conductor and orchestra to their feet to acknowledge its applause. Ane one rejoices in the interest shown Debussy and Richard Strauss, composers, who have not always been so readily accepted or understood.

With the closing of this season's offerings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one notes with more than ordinary interest the musical and popular appeal of its well planned programs, the consistently perfect performances and the capacity attendance which has greeted each performance.

The program:

Beethoven ....
...Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
a. Nuages.
b. Fetes.
Strauss .. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner,"—in Rondo Form, Op. 28
Tchaikovsky ....
......Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op., 64
I. Andante: allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.

DR. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

New York series closed last week with a performance of the Liszt "Faust Symphony," hailed there as Manhattan's only musical celebration of the Goethe centenary. The orchestra was then abetted by the Harvard Glee Club.

* * *

"T

Tod

tell me that sistency is should like or disagree

The inconsiste

As a man Schoenberg is be one; the distinction is between nature of Schoenberg's experience, as conditioned by the former, and his ability to express it, as limited by the latter. What, essentially, he lacks is the gift of expression; it is this deficiency which accounts for the ineffectualness of both his early and his later works. In the former it was emphasized, homever, by his inability to personalize the romantic idiom which he borrowed from Wagner. Probably he realized this. With the completed score of the "Gurrelieder" before him, it may be that he recalled Spontini's words to Wagner on hearing a performance of "Rienzi": "Young man, you should stop composing; you have done better than you can." Schoenberg was not born to be a Wagner any more than Wagner was born to be a Meyerbeer, but, unlike Wagner, he was not, we think, born to be very much of anything else, for the gift of expression which Wagner possessed, and needed only to develop in another direction than that to which "Rienzi" pointed, was and remains lacking in Schoenberg's equipment.

For this reason his later works as well as his earlier ones are unrealized masterpieces. In them the idiom has become personalized to an amazing degree, but still the thought, the feeling which Schoenberg seeks to convey, remain unclear and unintelligible; still Schoenberg cannot say, so that the rest of us will understand, what is on his mind and in his heart, though to this end he has developed a technique of expression startling in its novelty, and rich in possibilities which other men than he—Alban Berg, conspicuously—have better realized.

* * *

Stokowski's Novelties

The publication in these columns of a complete list of novelties introduced in New York by Serge Koussewitsky during the past eight seasons (the full term, to date, of his connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra) has led to requests from readers for similar tables of new music brought to the attention of New York audiences by other conductors. Willing to oblige, the writer has compiled a list of works whose first performances here have been conducted by Mr. Stokowski at concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The list, which is printed below, does not include novelties introduced here by other conductors—Mr. Reiner, Mr. Gabrilowitsch, Mr. Molinari, Mr. Krauss—under whose leadership the Philadelphians have played in New York:

Albeniz-Stokowski: "Fete Dieu a Seville."
Bach-Stokowski: Chorale-preludes: "Wir Glauben All"; "Aus der Tiefe"; "Wachet Auf"; "Ich ruf' zu dir." Preludes in E-flat minor and B minor from Book 1 of the Well-Tempered Clavier. Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor. Toccata and Fugue in D minor. Fantasy and Fugue in G minor.
Balakirew-Caselle: "Islamey" fantasy.
Braunfels: Fantastic Variations, for orchestra.
Caplet: "Epiphanie," for 'cello and orchestra.
Carpenter: "A Pilgrim Vision."
Carrillo: Music for quarter- and eighth-tone instruments.
de la Casinier: "Hercule et les Centaures."
Casella: "Italia," rhapsody for orchestra. "A Notte Alta."
Caturla: Two Cuban Dances.
Debussy-Stokowski: "La Cathedral Engloutie."
Eichheim: Oriental Impressions, suite. Japanese Nocturne.
Elgar: Concerto for 'cello and orchestra.
Harmati: Prelude to a Drama.
Hindemith: "Nuschi Nuschi" dances.
Hofmann: "Chromaticon," for piano and orchestra (*). Tone poem, "The Haunted Castle." Concerto in A-flat for piano and orchestra.
Holst: Japa
Illiashenko: Dy
Jacobi: Indian Dance.
Joslyn: War Dance.
Kaminsky: Concerto Grosso.
Knipper: "Tale of a Plaster God."
Krein: Ode to the Memory of Lenin.
Levidis: Symphonic poem for electrical instruments and orchestra.
Loeffler: "Canticle to the Sun," for soprano and orchestra.
Mahler: Eighth Symphony (*).
Medtner: Concerto for piano and orchestra.
Miaskowsky: Fifth Symphony; Sixth Symphony; Tenth Symphony.
Milhaud: Concerto for percussion instruments and orchestra.
Moor: Concerto for string quartet and orchestra.
Moussorgsky: Entr'acte from "Khowantschina."
Ornstein: Concerto for piano and orchestra.
Pingoud: "Le Prophete," orchestral piece.
Prokofiew: Third Symphony. Ballet, "Pas d'Acier" (*). Overture in B-flat.
Rachmaninoff: Symphony, "The Bells." Fourth piano concerto. Three Russian songs, for orchestra.
Riegger: Study in Sonority for 40 violins.
Rimsky-Korsakow: Suite, "Tale of the Invisible City of Kitesch."
Scott: Piano Concerto. Two Passacaglias, for orchestra.
Schelling: "A Victory Ball."
Schoenberg: Five Orchestral Pieces. "Gurrelieder." Variations for orchestra. Opera, "Die Glueckliche Hand" (*).
Strawinsky: Symphonies a Instruments a Vent. "Renard." Volga Boatmen's Song. Violin Concerto. "Les Noces" (*).
Szostakowicz: Symphony in D.
Szymanowski: Violin Concerto.
Tailleferre: Piano Concerto.
Varese: "Hyperprism" (*). "Ameriques." "Arcanes."
Villa-Lobos: Dansas Caracteristicas de Indios Africanos.
Wassilenko: "Hyrcus Nocturnus," orchestral piece.
von Webern: Passacaglia, for orchestra.
Zimbalist: "Daphnis and Chloe," tone-poem.

* * *

This list covers in full a 16-year period, beginning with the first New York concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra (given under the auspices of the Society of the Friends of Music), at which Mahler's Eight Symphony was introduced here, and ending with the concert at which, last Tuesday evening, Mr. Stokowski conducted the first New York performance of Schoenberg's "Gurrelieder." A number of the works included on it were heard at concerts which Mr. Stokowski conducted for the Friends of Music, the International Composers' Guild and the League of Composers. These are starred on the list.

The most obvious difference between Mr. Koussewitsky's and Mr. Stokowski's novelties, as revealed by a comparison of the two lists (that published last Sunday and that above), is the frequently experimental character of the latter. The appearance among Mr. Stokowski's novelties of numerous works intended to demonstrate or employ new musical instruments (various types of theremins, of instruments for producing intervals of less than half-tone), of works illustrating the efforts of various modern composers to extend musical resources, may serve as an indication of the nature and direction of Mr. Stokowski's interest in new music. Few of the works that he has introduced here have found place in the standard symphonic repertory because few were chosen, to judge from this record, on a basis of intrinsic musical value. We are indebted to Mr. Stokowski principally, for his introduction here of various of Schoenberg's important works, of music by the contemporary Russian composers (despite the fact that nothing of value has been forthcoming from the latter quarter), and for what he has done to keep us informed on the latest developments, of an experimental and technical nature, in contemporary music.

Exhibitions Co
man Sculptur and Militar

DESPITE all the stori
the depression on one upon anothe breath-taking velocity for the term was de vain hope that me
bility of sales.
of six or seven depression y tion. And its shin

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 24 1932

SYMPHONY FUND CLIMBS TO $3293

More Than Two-Thirds of Sum Necessary Already Has Been Subscribed.

NEW SPONSORS NEEDE

Some Who Contributed Former Now Are Unable to Help Reach $4500 Mark

More than two-thirds of the amou necessary to finance the appearances the Boston Symphony in this city ne season has been raised in response a letter sent out last week by Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, President of the Music Association.

Subscriptions received to date from 71 persons, to whom Mrs. Sharpe appealed for the $4500 necessary, total $3293.

There are still a few regular sponsors of the Boston Symphony to be heard from, Mrs. Sharpe said last night, but it is doubtful whether their subscriptions will bring the total up to $4500.

"This means," Mrs. Sharpe pointed out, "that additional sponsors must be found. Several have decreased the amount of their former subscriptions and some who have given in former years are not able to give at all this year. It would be a pity if the Boston Symphony concerts had to be discontinued because of our failure to raise $4500 necessary to pay the expenses of the theatre on the four nights when it is leased. I am hopeful that during the next few days the total will be substantially increased either by replies from original sponsors or by the addition of new names to the list of guarantors."

Subscriptions should be sent to the office of the Music Association, 100 North Main street.

Those who have already sent in their subscriptions include:

$300—John Nicholas Brown, Mrs. Robert I. Gammell; $250—Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf; $150—Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Callender, Mrs. George Hail, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Samuel M. Nicholson; $100—Mrs. Peter G. Gerry, Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Herbert W. Rice, Mrs. Walter Callender, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe; $75—Mr. and Mrs. R. Clinton Fuller, $50—Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Chaminade Club of Providence, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mrs. Gammell Cross.

$30—Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh; $25—Helen C. Robertson, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson G. Wing, Edith Edwards, Irene B. Butler, Mrs. Harrison B. Huntoon, W. W. Dempster, William Ely, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin T. Peck, Mrs. Kenneth F. Wood, Stephen O. Metcalf, Eleanor B. Green, Helen G. Chase, Mr. and Mrs. William L. Sweet, Hugh F. MacColl, George Pierce Metcalf, Mary Helena Dey, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Anthony Cummings, Mrs. James B. Richardson, Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, Mrs. Henry S. Lanpher, Mrs. John S. Holbrook, Mrs. S. Foster Hunt.

$15—F. C. Freeman, William S. Innis, Mrs. Arthur W. Newell, Mrs. Albert A. Baker, Thomas Crosby, Jr.; $10—Mrs. Richard Rathborne Graham, Herbert F. Preston, The Henschel Club, Mrs. Austin T. Levy, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss Loraine Johnson, Prof. Lindsay T. Damon, Mrs. George B. Waterhouse, Mrs. Isabel Harris Metcalf; $5—Mrs. Hovey T. Freeman, Ellis L. Yatman, Carrie Schmitt, Anna L. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Edwards, Ada Blinkhorn, Janet Blinkhorn, Mrs. E. H. Howard, Louise C. Hoppin; John B. Archer, Edith W. Edwards, Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Emily Fairbanks, Charles S. Wood; $3—Evangeline Larry.

Hoover and Acting Secretary

score is dedicat Maria Sanroma, who played the solo part. Fundamentally in the concerto form, inasmuch as there are three distinct sections, the work nevertheless is constructed in one movement. The orchestration requires a small array of percussion instruments.

On the whole the piano part is more interesting than the orchestral portions. It has more variety, more vitality, more point. Although affording ample opportunity for technical display, this part is neither superficial nor lacking in musical feeling. In addition, there is a certain pithiness of ideas, a certain breezy vitality that makes it stand in memory.

Some of the harmony is mildly modern, and extensive use is made of jazz rhythms. In this last respect the concertino is to be counted among the more sincere and least self-conscious specimens of such symphonic writing.

Mr. Sanroma, who seems the ideal pianist for modern music, imparted his own brilliance of execution to an already brilliantly written part. There was most enthusiastic applause for all concerned; conductor, soloist, composer and orchestra.

FROM Traveler
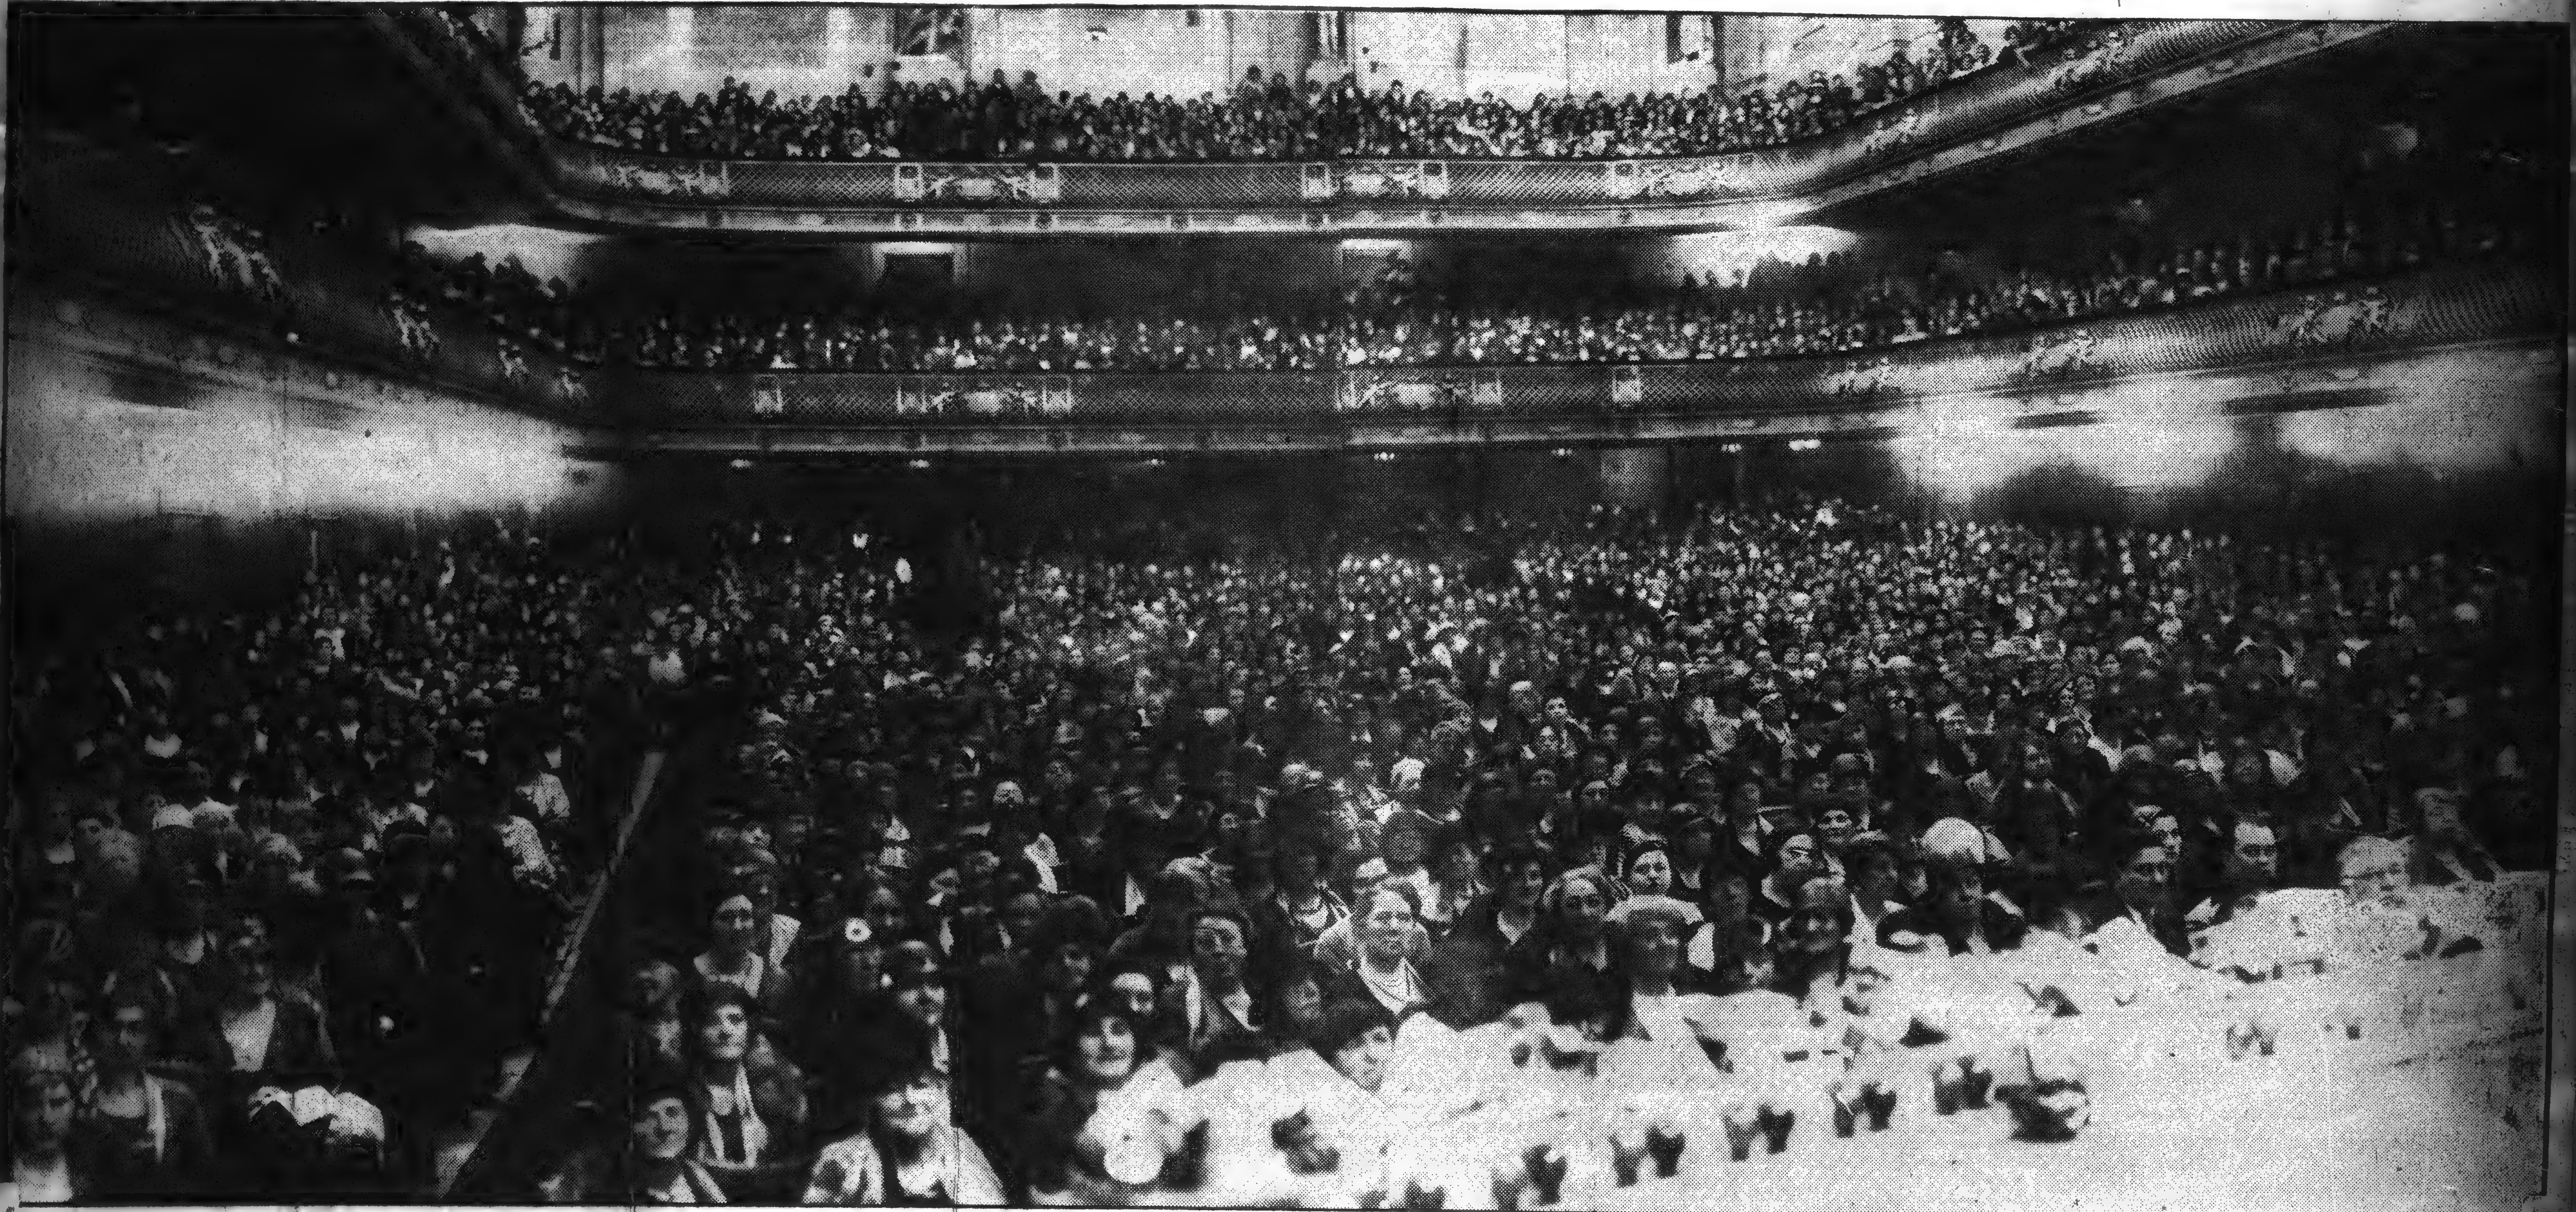
Boston, Mass.
4/27/32

WOMEN THRONG SYMPHONY HALL FOR COOKING SCHOOL



A glimpse of part of the 3000 women who thronged Symphony hall yesterday afternoon at the opening of The Herald-Traveler cooking school. Home-makers came from all over New England to attend this school, which has its second session today at 2 o'clock, with cooking lectures, music, entertainment and prizes as features of the occasion. All seats are free at this big school. Everyone is invited.

By AGNES CARR

With music to lend an air of festivity to the occasion, a warm welcome from Marjorie Mills, director of the better homes bureau of the Herald-Traveler, to make the guests feel at home, and cooking lectures by Mrs. Ida Chitwood and George Rector to provide both entertainment and instruction, the second session of the Herald-Traveler cooking school opened today at Symphony hall.

If the opening session were crowded, it seemed as if twice that number assembled today, eager to enjoy the varied program at the cooking school. The festivities opened with songs by Mimi Parks, contralto, and Aidan Redmond, baritone, both from WBZ. More than 3000 women jammed the great auditorium.

Hearty applause greeted the appearance of Mrs. Chitwood, lecturer who has already made a host of friends among Boston homemakers. Mrs. Chitwood has a charming stage presence, and presents her culinary information in entertaining fashion.

Her recipes today featured a honey all-bran pudding which scored a big hit with her audience and a banana macaroon mousse which was a triumph of perfection. Almond rings and a carrot pyramid salad were other special dishes which came in for applause. All these recipes are on the magazine page of today's Traveler.

Following Mrs. Chitwood, George Rector, who comes to the school through the courtesy of the A. & P. Stores, gave the second of his delightful food talks, which have been so much anticipated by New England women. Mr. Rector is famous as the proprietor of the well known Rector restaurants in New York and Chicago. His demonstration is unusual and carried through in snappy fashion, giving his audience many new seasoning and flavoring suggestions.

There was special interest in his French pancakes and in a delicious spaghetti milanaise. Every woman wanted these recipes. All the Rector recipes are to be found on the magazine page of today's Traveler.

WATER HEATER PRIZE

Judge Gordon, market expert for the A. & P. Stores, appeared with Mr. Rector and gave one of his entertaining five-minute talks, which everyone enjoyed. Twenty baskets of foodstuffs were given away today to holders of lucky numbers. A grand prize of a water heater was to be given away at the close of today's session.

Tomorrow Miss Helen O'Brien, well-known to Bostonians, will give one of her entertaining lectures on cakes and will make many varieties of cake for the enjoyment of the visitors. Miss O'Brien comes through the courtesy of the First National Stores. On Friday evening Dwight W. Hartzell of Chicago, meat-cutting expert for the First National Stores, will cut up a side of beef. There will be special gift boxes tomorrow afternoon and Friday evening, given by the First National Stores. In addition there will be gift baskets and grand prizes awarded.

Jack Beauvais, WEEI crooner, and a comedy team, Grin and Bearit, will come from WBZ for entertainment.

TREAT FRIDAY EVENING

An unusual treat in the entertainment line is in store for Friday evening at 8 o'clock when Sid Reinhert, "the man of 1000 tunes," whose piano performances have made him a big drawing card at the Metropolitan Theatre, will appear to entertain The Herald-Traveler guests.

This young man has a "way with a piano" that has not been equalled in this section of the country, according to critics. He composes and plays with equal facility. He comes to the school through the courtesy of the Metropolitan Theatre.

Sessions at the school are at 2 today and tomorrow and at 8 on Friday evening. All seats are free and everyone is welcome.

Pops Go Into 47th Consecutive Season Next Wednesday--Fiedler Plans Unusual Programs

Post May 1

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

On Wednesday evening of this week the Pops begin their 47th season, and with the admission charge reduced to 25 cents, the figure of the "good old days." The old days, by the way, are to be forcefully recalled at one of the first special nights of the season, "Gay Nineties Night," on Tuesday, May 10, when, so far as possible, the spirit of the Promenade Concerts in Music Hall will be revived. Among other features planned to make that evening an re-enactment of the past will be the conducting of several numbers by Timothee Adamowski, admired leader of the Pops in years gone by.

* * * *

But before that will come the opening night and several other nights with programmes devised by Mr. Fiedler very much in the spirit of the 1930s. In this, his third season as Pops conductor, Mr. Fiedler promises to continue his good work of presenting worthwhile music, both new and old, that has, in the better sense of that unfortunately overworked phrase, a popular appeal. In almost every one of his programmes thus far announced there is something to awaken the interest of the habitue of winter concerts, while in every one there is much that cannot fail to tickle the ear of even the untrained listener.

* * * *

Thus, upon the programme of the opening concert of Wednesday evening there is, among much more familiar matter, the brilliantly amusing "Facade" of William Walton, one of England's most promising young composers, introduced here by Mr. Feidler a year ago. There is also a selection from Schwartz's music to that most popular of reviews, "The Bandwagon," and such old favorites as Elgar's march, "Pomp and Circumstance"; Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture and Komzak's waltz, "Girls of Baden."

* * * *

On Thursday evening for special events there will be Mr. Sanroma's playing of the solo part in George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for piano and orchestra, first performed this season at the regular Symphony Concerts and later at a concert given by the orchestra in aid of the fund for the unemployed. At this same concert will be heard a Polka and Fugue from the folk opera "Schwanda," added this season to the repertory of the Metropolitan, which has made for its Czech composer, Jaromir Weinberger, a considerable fortune in royalties from its many performances in central Europe. Also upon this programme, for good measure, is the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart and that modern piece which audiences everywhere have taken to their hearts, Ravel's "Bolero."

* * * *

So it goes. Detailed comment cannot here be made upon each programme, but that of the first Sunday evening concert, a week from tonight, should be given in full. It begins with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, a piece for which Dr. Koussevitzky has shown a predilection at regular concerts of the Boston orchestra. It continues through the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" to the Finale from the Violin Concerto of Mendelssohn, in which the solo part is to be played by the 16 first violins of the Pops orchestra! Then will come "A Soviet Iron Foundry," by a composer of present day Russia, Mossolov by name, which not long ago had its first American performance in Philadelphia. The piece, a graphic depiction of its subject, is said to be more popular in other countries of Europe than in the land of its composition, where the workers, when they go to a concert, prefer to leave behind them the thought of their daily environment. Be that as it may, the first Boston performance of this work will be an occasion of interest. And the concert will conclude with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Mr. Sanroma as the pianist.

ARTHUR FIEDLER resumes his leadership of the Pops at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.

Adv May 1

SYMPHONY HALL

POPS

OPENING NIGHT
WED., MAY 4
at 8.30

85 Symphony
Players

ARTHUR
FIEDLER
Conductor

1ST SUNDAY PROGRAM
INCLUDES GERSHWIN'S
RHAPSODY
IN BLUE

J. M. Sanroma
Soloist

25c
ADMISSION

Refreshments
SMOKING

50c. 75c. $1.00

AGAIN THE POPS!

Camb Sentinel Apr 30

It is immaterial now whether the Symphony Pop Concerts are so named either because they are deservedly popular or from the report of the cork exploding from the bottle in the good old days before prohibition. It is more to the purpose to know that the equally popular before the war price of 25 cents admission has been revived, and for that little sum Cambridge music lovers will be enabled to hear 85 Symphony players offer lighter classical and kindred music nightly, under the baton of the able and personable Arthur Fiedler. Most versatile as well as selective are these annual Pops. If you prefer your music without disturbance, balcony seats will permit you to concentrate on the band; if your taste is more gregaricus, tables on the floor encourage a social glass of divers liquids, guaranteed to cheer while hopeless to inebriate, with the luncheonette and creams so favored by the gentler sex.

A series of Fiedler programs selected artfully to please every cultivated taste—except the fanatics on either end of the scale, i. e., jazz and highbrow—will be given nightly, starting May 4th.

The Pops are an exclusively Greater Boston institution and Cambridge has long enjoyed them, from the distant days when Music Hall was the scene, and the tragic figure of Beethoven a silent and significant auditor.

Concert-Crier

Trans Next Week Apr. 30

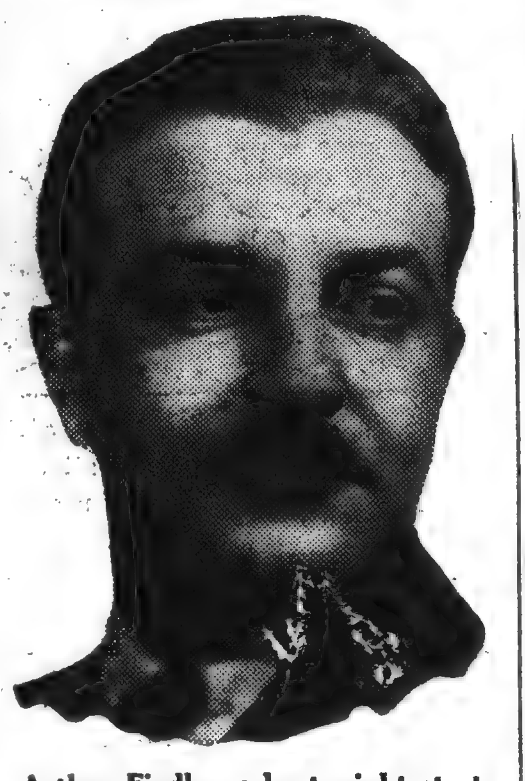
The Pops—Wednesday evening, in Symphony Hall, forty-seventh renewal of the annual series of Pop Concerts, continuing every evening (save occasional Sundays) through May and June. Arthur Fiedler, conductor; orchestra of eighty-five "Symphony men"; ingeniously assorted programs, light and modern; tables, smoking, refreshments. An annual institution in Boston. Notable numbers on the opening program are excerpts from "Die Meistersinger"; fragments from Walton's parody-music for Sitwell's "Facade"; and a selection from "The Band Wagon"; on the program for Thursday: Mr. Gershwin's newer Rhapsody for piano and orchestra with Mr. Sanromá to play solo-part; the celebrated Polka from the opera, "Schwanda"; a forgotten "Schatz" Waltz of Strauss; Ravel's "Bolero." On Friday and Sa day well tested and well liked num from previous springs fill both lists.

Y POST, MAY 1, 1932

Revival of trical Gossip

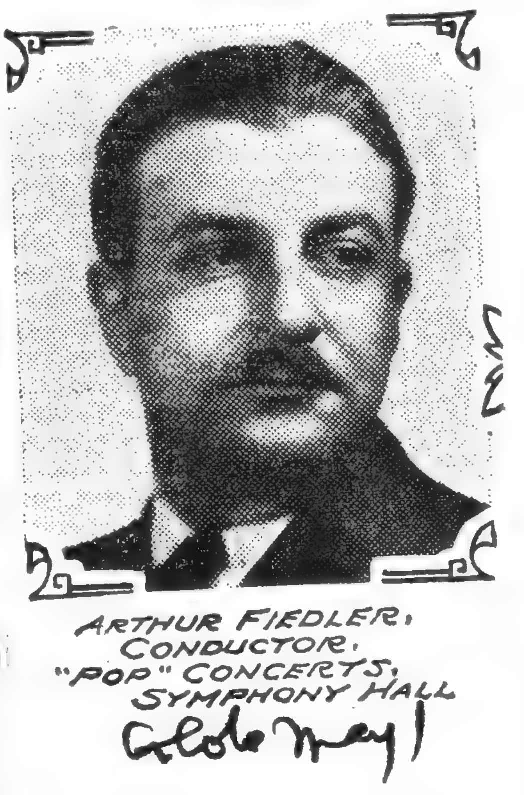
ARTHUR FIEDLER, POPS CONDUCTOR, STARTING NEW SEASON AT SYMPHONY HALL, MAY 4

Concert Favorite



Arthur Fiedler, who tonight starts his third season as conductor of the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall.

Record May 4



ARTHUR FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR, "POP" CONCERTS, SYMPHONY HALL

Globe May 1

---

in a scene in "The Good Fairy," at the Wi starting Wednesday evening.

Herald May

POPULAR PRICED "POPS"

Post April 23

The news from Symphony Hall that the admission price to the "Pops" this summer will be reduced to the old-time quarter of a dollar is in line with reductions in the tariffs of many other good things. For years and years, beginning in old Music Hall, it cost but 25 cents to get into the place of jollity, good cheer and appropriately gay and well-played music. Now there is to be a return to originals, in point of certain charges, at least, and we shall see how it works.

The "Pops"—always so-called, although formally christened "Promenade Concerts" at which there was never much promenading—have been a distinctively Boston institution for more than 45 years. Their musical quality was never so fine as now. The staunchness of their fibre is shown in the remarkable fact that even prohibition has not been able to kill them. A "Pop"-less summer would not be quite so worth living to the dyed-in-the-wool Bostonian.

Pop Concerts Start at Symphony Hall Tonight

Arthur Fiedler's program for the Pop concert opening in Symphony Hall tonight follows:

"Pomp and Circumstance" ....Elgar
Variations, Austrian National Hymn.... Haydn
Excerpts, "Die Meistersinger"....Wagner
Southern Rhapsody, "Virginia"....... Haydn Wood
Suite, "Facade" ....Walton
Overture, "1812" ....Tchaikovsky
Selections, "Band Wagon" ......Schwartz
"Perpetuum Mobile" ....Strauss
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ....Komzak

Herald May 4

PAGE TWENTY-TWO

POP CONCERTS OPEN TONIGHT FOR SEASON

Mr. Fiedler Will Combine Classics And Novelties in Program

Arthur Schwartz, composer of "Band Wagon," will be one of the guests of honor at the opening of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, when Arthur Fiedler will conduct a selection from the famous revue.

This will be the third season of Arthur Fiedler as conductor of the Pops.

The decorations by Robert Edmond Jones, and the possibilities for refreshments and smoking will transform Symphony hall into the atmosphere of the summer season.

Tonight's program, combining Pop classics and Pop novelties, follows:

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar

POP CONCERTS FOR 25 CENTS

Pre-War Price Restored —Season Opens May 4

Post Apr. 22

The early days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the "Promenade Concerts" are recalled by an announcement from Symphony Hall that the Pops this summer will return to the pre-war admission price of 25 cents. This was once the regular admission to the Pops and to the public rehearsals of the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoons.

The Pops are to open their 47th season on Wednesday, May 4.

POP CONCERTS BEGIN TONIGHT

Post May 4

Orchestra of 85 Men With Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

The Pop concerts, which have been a Boston institution for nearly half a century, will open the 1932 season tonight, at 8:30, at Symphony Hall.

Eighty-five musicians, most of them from the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, will comprise the orchestra, which will be directed by Arthur Fiedler for the third consecutive season.

The Pops are fashioned on European lines. On the floor of the hall the audience sit at tables and sip refreshments while they listen to the classic, semi-classic and popular melodies played by the orchestra.

This year the concerts will be the more notable due to the decorations which have been effected in the big hall by Robert Edmond Jones.

A feature of the opening night programme will be the presence of Arthur Schwartz, composer of the music of the musical comedy hit, "Band Wagon," and in honor of his presence the orchestra will play a series of selections from the score of that show.

POPS TO BEGIN WEDNESDAY

THE 47th season of the Pops will begin next Wednesday, May 4th, amid surroundings designed to please the ear, the eye and the palate.

Arthur Fiedler announces some notable novelties for the opening of his third season as the Pops conductor, together with Pops favorites of long standing. At the opening Sunday concert, a week from tonight, Jesus Maria Sanroma, playing Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" for the first time in its complete form, will not be the only soloist, for the 16 first violins of the orchestra are to test their prowess in the solo part of the finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto. "The Soviet Iron Foundry," by Mossolov, a composer of present-day Russia, recently had its first American performance in Philadelphia. New to the Pops will be Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony."

Adv. May 1

Apr 29 Trans

To the Polka from "Schwanda" Mr. Fiedler will add another piece that has lately gone the round of orchestras in America. In the first Sunday Pop, on May 8, he will include Mossolov's "Music of Machines or Soviet Iron Foundry." Add rhythm and it is all that the name implies. But, lest the timid be over-alarmed at this din from Bolshevy, be it said that it continues less than ten minutes.

Pops Go Into 47th Consecutive Season Next Wednesday--Fiedler Plans Unusual Programs

Post May 1

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

On Wednesday evening of this week the Pops begin their 47th season, and with the admission charge reduced to 25 cents, the figure of the "good old days." The old days, by the way, are to be forcefully recalled at one of the first special nights of the season, "Gay Nineties Night," on Tuesday, May 10, when, so far as possible, the spirit of the Promenade Concerts in Music Hall will be revived. Among other features planned to make that evening an re-enactment of the past will be the conducting of several numbers by Timothee Adamowski, admired leader of the Pops in years gone by.

* * * *

But before that will come the opening night and several other nights with programmes devised by Mr. Fiedler very much in the spirit of the 1930s. In this, his third season as Pops conductor, Mr. Fiedler promises to continue his good work of presenting worthwhile music, both new and old, that has, in the better sense of that unfortunately overworked phrase, a popular appeal. In almost every one of his programmes thus far announced there is something to awaken the interest of the habitue of winter concerts, while in every one there is much that cannot fail to tickle the ear of even the untrained listener.

* * * *

Thus, upon the programme of the opening concert of Wednesday evening there is, among much more familiar matter, the brilliantly amusing "Facade" of William Walton, one of England's most promising young composers, introduced here by Mr. Feidler a year ago. There is also a selection from Schwartz's music to that most popular of reviews, "The Bandwagon," and such old favorites as Elgar's march, "Pomp and Circumstance"; Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture and Komzak's waltz, "Girls of Baden."

* * * *

On Thursday evening for special events there will be Mr. Sanroma's playing of the solo part in George Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for piano and orchestra, first performed this season at the regular Symphony Concerts and later at a concert given by the orchestra in aid of the fund for the unemployed. At this same concert will be heard a Polka and Fugue from the folk opera "Schwanda," added this season to the repertory of the Metropolitan, which has made for its Czech composer, Jaromir Weinberger, a considerable fortune in royalties from its many performances in central Europe. Also upon this programme, for good measure, is the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart and that modern piece which audiences everywhere have taken to their hearts, Ravel's "Bolero."

* * * *

So it goes. Detailed comment cannot here be made upon each programme, but that of the first Sunday evening concert, a week from tonight, should be given in full. It begins with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, a piece for which Dr. Koussevitzky has shown a predilection at regular concerts of the Boston orchestra. It continues through the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser" to the Finale from the Violin Concerto of Mendelssohn, in which the solo part is to be played by the 16 first violins of the Pops orchestra! Then will come "A Soviet Iron Foundry," by a composer of present day Russia, Mossolov by name, which not long ago had its first American performance in Philadelphia. The piece, a graphic depiction of its subject, is said to be more popular in other countries of Europe than in the land of its composition, where the workers, when they go to a concert, prefer to leave behind them the thought of their daily environment. Be that as it may, the first Boston performance of this work will be an occasion of interest. And the concert will conclude with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Mr. Sanroma as the pianist.

ARTHUR FIEDLER resumes his leadership of the Pops at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.*

Adv May 1

SYMPHONY HALL

POPS

OPENING NIGHT,
WED., MAY 4
at 8.30

85 Symphony Players

ARTHUR FIEDLER
Conductor

1ST SUNDAY PROGRAM INCLUDES GERSHWIN'S RHAPSODY IN BLUE

J. M. Sanroma
Soloist

25c ADMISSION

Refreshments
SMOKING

50c. 75c. $1.00

AGAIN THE POPS!

Camb Sentinel Apr 30

It is immaterial now whether the Symphony Pop Concerts are so named either because they are deservedly popular or from the report of the cork exploding from the bottle in the good old days before prohibition. It is more to the purpose to know that the equally popular before the war price of 25 cents admission has been revived, and for that little sum Cambridge music lovers will be enabled to hear 85 Symphony players offer lighter classical and kindred music nightly, under the baton of the able and personable Arthur Fiedler. Most versatile as well as selective are these annual Pops. If you prefer your music without disturbance, balcony seats will permit you to concentrate on the band; if your taste is more gregaricus, tables on the floor encourage a social glass of divers liquids, guaranteed to cheer while hopeless to inebriate, with the luncheonette and creams so favored by the gentler sex.

A series of Fiedler programs selected artfully to please every cultivated taste—except the fanatics on either end of the scale, i. e., jazz and highbrow—will be given nightly, starting May 4th.

The Pops are an exclusively Greater Boston institution and Cambridge has long enjoyed them, from the distant days when Music Hall was the scene, and the tragic figure of Beethoven a silent and significant auditor.

Concert-Crier

Trans Next Week Apr. 30

The Pops—Wednesday evening, in Symphony Hall, forty-seventh renewal of the annual series of Pop Concerts, continuing every evening (save occasional Sundays) through May and June. Arthur Fiedler, conductor; orchestra of eighty-five "Symphony men"; ingeniously assorted programs, light and modern; tables, smoking, refreshments. An annual institution in Boston. Notable numbers on the opening program are excerpts from "Die Meistersinger"; fragments from Walton's parody-music for Sitwell's "Facade"; and a selection from "The Band Wagon"; on the program for Thursday: Mr. Gershwin's newer Rhapsody for piano and orchestra with Mr. Sanromá to play solo-part; the celebrated Polka from the opera, "Schwanda"; a forgotten "Schatz" Waltz of Strauss; Ravel's "Bolero." On Friday and Saturday well tested and well liked numbers from previous springs fill both lists.

POPULAR PRICED "POPS"

Post April 23

The news from Symphony Hall that the admission price to the "Pops" this summer will be reduced to the old-time quarter of a dollar is in line with reductions in the tariffs of many other good things. For years and years, beginning in old Music Hall, it cost but 25 cents to get into the place of jollity, good cheer and appropriately gay and well-played music. Now there is to be a return to originals, in point of certain charges, at least, and we shall see how it works.

The "Pops"—always so-called, although formally christened "Promenade Concerts" at which there was never much promenading—have been a distinctively Boston institution for more than 45 years. Their musical quality was never so fine as now. The staunchness of their fibre is shown in the remarkable fact that even prohibition has not been able to kill them. A "Pop"-less summer would not be quite so worth living to the dyed-in-the-wool Bostonian.

Concert Favorite

Arthur Fiedler, who tonight starts his third season as conductor of the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall.

Record May 4

Pop Concerts Start at Symphony Hall Tonight

Arthur Fiedler's program for the Pop concert opening in Symphony Hall tonight follows:

"Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
Variations, Austrian National Hymn	Haydn
Excerpts, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Southern Rhapsody, "Virginia"	Haydn Wood
Suite, "Facade"	Walton
Overture, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Selections, "Band Wagon"	Schwartz
"Perpetuum Mobile"	Strauss
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"	Komzak

ARTHUR FIEDLER,
CONDUCTOR,
"POP" CONCERTS,
SYMPHONY HALL

Globe May 1

POP CONCERTS BEGIN TONIGHT

Post May 4

Orchestra of 85 Men With Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

The Pop concerts, which have been a Boston institution for nearly half a century, will open the 1932 season tonight, at 8:30, at Symphony Hall.

Eighty-five musicians, most of them from the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, will comprise the orchestra, which will be directed by Arthur Fiedler for the third consecutive season.

The Pops are fashioned on European lines. On the floor of the hall the audience sit at tables and sip refreshments while they listen to the classic, semi-classic and popular melodies played by the orchestra.

This year the concerts will be the more notable due to the decorations which have been effected in the big hall by Robert Edmond Jones.

A feature of the opening night programme will be the presence of Arthur Schwartz, composer of the music of the musical comedy hit, "Band Wagon," and in honor of his presence the orchestra will play a series of selections from the score of that show.

---

in a scene in "The Good Fairy," at the Wilbur starting Wednesday evening.

Herald May

PAGE …AY 1, 1932

…val of Gossip

t she has a ances, and ves his e his will he girl, w not in a secure a rectory lover th hunts d tells t, and gus hu good t g per secur ins to y del the m hotel

I h w with nd t

ARTHUR FIEDLER,
POPS CONDUCTOR,
STARTING NEW SEASON AT SYMPHONY HALL, MAY 4

Herald May 4

PAGE TWENTY-TWO

POP CONCERTS OPEN TONIGHT FOR SEASON

Mr. Fiedler Will Combine Classics And Novelties in Program

Arthur Schwartz, composer of "Band Wagon," will be one of the guests of honor at the opening of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall tonight, when Arthur Fiedler will conduct a selection from the famous revue.

This will be the third season of Arthur Fiedler as conductor of the Pops.

The decorations by Robert Edmond Jones, and the possibilities for refreshments and smoking will transform Symphony hall into the atmosphere of the summer season.

Tonight's program, combining Pop classics and Pop novelties, follows:

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar

POP CONCERTS FOR 25 CENTS

Pre-War Price Restored —Season Opens May 4

Post Apr. 22

The early days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the "Promenade Concerts" are recalled by an announcement from Symphony Hall that the Pops this summer will return to the pre-war admission price of 25 cents. This was once the regular admission to the Pops and to the public rehearsals of the Symphony concerts on Friday afternoons.

The Pops are to open their 47th season on Wednesday, May 4.

POPS TO BEGIN WEDNESDAY

THE 47th season of the Pops will begin next Wednesday, May 4th, amid surroundings designed to please the ear, the eye and the palate.

Arthur Fiedler announces some notable novelties for the opening of his third season as the Pops conductor, together with Pops favorites of long standing. At the opening Sunday concert, a week from tonight, Jesus Maria Sanroma, playing Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" for the first time in its complete form, will not be the only soloist, for the 16 first violins of the orchestra are to test their prowess in the solo part of the finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto. "The Soviet Iron Foundry," by Mossolov, a composer of present-day Russia, recently had its first American performance in Philadelphia. New to the Pops will be Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony."

Adv. May 1

Apr 29 Trans

To the Polka from "Schwanda" Mr. Fiedler will add another piece that has lately gone the round of orchestras in America. In the first Sunday Pop, on May 8, he will include Mossolov's "Music of Machines or Soviet Iron Foundry." Add rhythm and it is all that the name implies. But, lest the timid be over-alarmed at this din from Bolshevy, be it said that it continues less than ten minutes.

MISSING
PAGE(S)

199

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe May 8

Boston Symphony Season

The 51st season of Boston Symphony concerts, which ended April 30, was artistically one of the most successful in the orchestra's history. Only under Dr Muck has a higher standard of performance consistently been maintained. Never has the enthusiasm of the audiences been greater. Never have the programs ranged more widely through music old and new.

The only really serious difficulty is the size of the deficit, estimated at $100,000; of which $37,000 had not been subscribed at the close of the season. No doubt the trustees will make a determined effort to reduce expenses next year. It is encouraging to all concerned that the 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays were sold out for the season just ended, and the two short series on Mondays and Tuesdays were very well attended. Symphony concerts, if a luxury, are evidently not one with which their frequenters willingly dispense.

Dr Koussevitzky this year offered his audience notably less ultra-modern music than heretofore, yet included on the programs some important novelties. From Stravinsky, the chief of living composers, we heard a new concerto for violin, and the "Symphonie de Psaumes," first performed in the preceding season. Ravel's new concerto for piano, George Gershwin's new Rhapsody, and Copland's Symphonic Ode were the other outstanding pieces by living writers.

To these should be added the first performance in the United States of the late Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony, a masterpiece long strangely neglected. None of the other new pieces from lesser writers seemed significant except the "Two Etudes" of Vogel, the work of a great if ill-regulated talent.

It must be added that Stravinsky and Gershwin have each written music more significant than their latest works proved to be.

Mr Copland's ode was admired by some well qualified judges, but like most reviewers, the writer for the Globe could find little imaginative stimulus or solace in it at a first hearing. That Copland is in many ways the most promising of our younger composers remains, however, indisputable.

The list of soloists includes first appearances at these concerts of two exceptionally fine violinists, Adolf Busch and Jelly d'Aranyi, and a reappearance of Myra Hess, who deserved the almost unprecedented applause given her. Messrs Gershwin, Morris and Toch played piano parts in their own compositions.

Gustav Holst, the distinguished English composer, conducted a program of his own music on which the chief item was his admirable suite, "The Planets," first heard here from Mr Monteux.

In the Monday series the noted pianist, Robert Goldsand, won applause and high praise for his playing in Beethoven's C major concerto. Jesus Maria Sanroma, who excels in the music of contemporary composers, played admirably in Ravel's new concerto, and also in E. B. Hill's new concertino in the Monday series.

Commemorative programs, either in the regular series or at extra concerts, were far more numerous than ever before. Those whose memory was thus honored were Edison, d'Indy, Judge Cabot, Lewis Carroll Goethe and Haydn, a curiously varied list.

Bach's B minor mass was repeated at a pension fund concert, with the performers who gave it at last year's Bach festival.

The excellence of the performances throughout the season was largely due to the unaltered membership of the orchestra, which Dr Koussevitzky has now remodeled into an instrument responsive to his will. His return for the 52d season, which is announced to begin Oct 7 and 8, insures us another year of brilliantly eloquent and highly individual interpretations of music old and new, certain to stir audiences as those this year have been stirred to heartfelt admiration.

Persons who wish to hear next season's concerts should subscribe at once, as it is unlikely that many places will remain untaken when October comes.

Second Week of "Pops"

The second week of the current season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will begin this evening with the first Sunday evening concert. Features of this program will be the first Boston performance of "Soviet Iron Foundry," by Alexander Mossolov. This musical product of Soviet Russia, otherwise entitled "Music for Machines," has been performed in Philadelphia and Cleveland, as well as in various European cities. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, will be performed for the first time at the Pops in its complete form. There will be 16 soloists in the Finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto, the solo part to be played by the first violin section.

Tuesday will be "Gay Nineties Night," a valiant attempt to revive the atmosphere of the old-time Promenade Concerts of Music Hall on Hamilton pl. Timothee Adamowski, who conducted the Pops in the seasons 1891-1894, will be the guest conductor of the evening, presenting such music as Handel's "Largo" in the old-time manner. Mr Adamowski was brought from Europe to join the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1884, by Wilhelm Gericke. He left the orchestra in 1887 to concentrate his efforts upon chamber music. At the Promenade Concerts he was immensely popular for many seasons.

The program for "Gay Nineties Night" is constructed entirely from favorites noted in the old program files. Patrons of the old Pops are urged to wear on this evening such appropriate clothing as their attics may bring forth. For old-times sake, near-beer will be served on draft in the original glasses which diligent search has uncovered in a remote storeroom in Symphony Hall.

The music of Wagner will be featured tomorrow night. The programs of the week follow:

Sunday, May 8. "Classical Symphony," Prokofieff; "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor, Schubert; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; finale from the violin concerto (the solo part to be played by 16 first violins), Mendelssohn; "Soviet Iron Foundry" (first performance in Boston), Mossolov; "Rhapsody in Blue," soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin.

Monday, May 9. "Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, Wagner; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Minuet, Bolzoni; "Natchez on the Hill," Virginia Country Dance, Powell; excerpts from "Siegfried (act 3, scene 2); "A Siegfried Idyll," overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Faust," ballet music, Gounod; "Danube Waves," waltz, Ivanovici; Fifth Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

Tuesday, May 10. March, "Wien Bleibt Wien," Schrammel; overture, "Poet and Peasant" (solo 'cello, Mr J. Langendoen), von Suppe; intermezzo, "Loin du Bal," Gillet; popular college songs. This group will be conducted by Timothee Adamowski, leader of the Promenade Concerts in the seasons 1891-1894 and 1903-1907. Overture, "Orpheus in the Underworld," Offenbach; Largo from "Xerxes" (for solo violin, harp and organ), Handel; waltz, "An der Schonen Blauen Donau," Strauss; overture, "The Pirates of Penzance," Sir Arthur Sullivan; cakewalk, "At a Georgia Campmeeting," Kerry Mills; grand selection of song favorites.

Wednesday, May 11. Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; "Carmen," Fantasia, Bizet; "Tales from Johann Strauss," Korngold; "A Londonderry Air," arr for string orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin," Drigo; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Thursday May 12. "Procession of Bacchus," from "Sylvia," Delibes; Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; "March of the Little Lead Soldiers," Pierne; Suite from "Nell Gywnn," German; "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Scherzo, Dukas; Ave Maira, Schubert-Wilhelmj; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; "Country Gardens," Grainger; Czardas from "The Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman.

Friday, May 13. "Marche Militaire," Schubert; "Roman Carnival," overture, Berlioz; "To a Water Lily," Macdowell; "Prince Igor," Polovetzkian dances, Borodin; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Andante Cantabile, for strings, Tchaikovsky; Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Girl Crazy," selection, Gershwin; "Jealousy," tango, Gade; Indian War Dance, Skilton.

Saturday, May 14. Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; "Aragon," Albeniz; "Heire Kati," Scene de la Czardas, Hubay; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; Meditation from "Thais," violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz, Massenet; Finale, Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; "New Moon," selection, Kern; "Estudiantina," waltz, Waldteufel; "Strike up the Band," Gershwin.

"Gay Nineties" at "Pops"

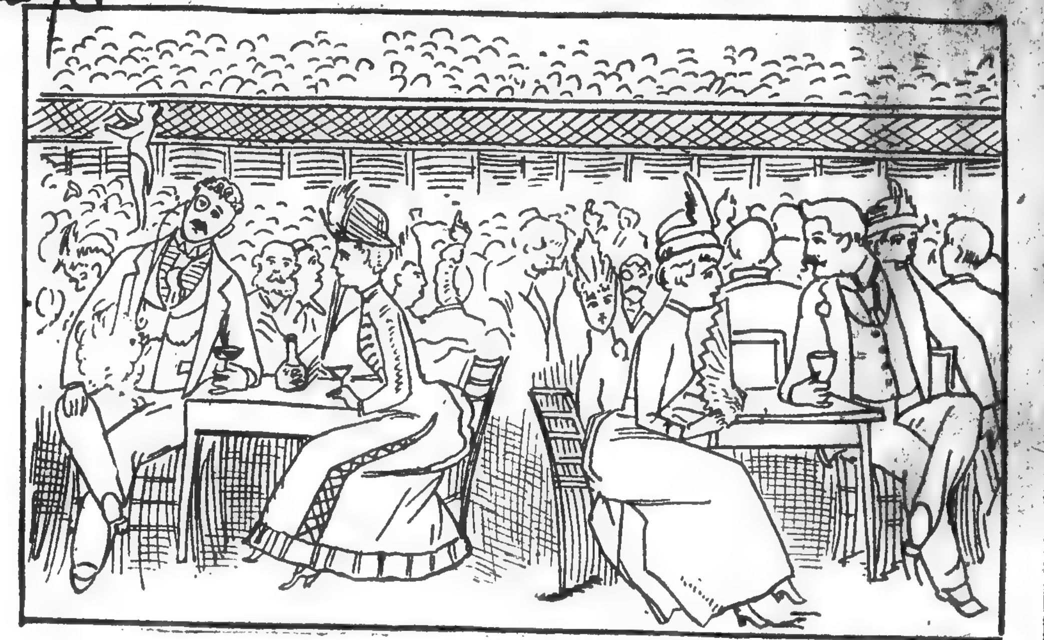
The music and the atmosphere of the "Gay Nineties" will be revived at the Pop concert tonight. Old-timers are requested to wear their apparel of the '90s, and a prize will be given to the most impressive outfit. There will be "beer" on draught and the steins of those so dressed will be kept filled. "Gay Nineties" night would not be complete without the presence of Timothee Adamowski, beloved Pops conductor of the early '90s in the old Music Hall in Hamilton pl. He will conduct several of the numbers.

Globe May 10

Sunday Pops Programme to Introduce New Composition, "Soviet Iron Foundry"—Plan Gay 90's Night for Tuesday—Music Notes of Week

Post May 8

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH



As the Pops' public looked back in the gay 90's. From an old programme of the Pops.

The first Sunday Night Pop Concert takes place tonight with two notable items on the programme, the first Boston performance of "Soviet Iron Foundry," otherwise entitled "Music for Machines," by the young Russian composer Alexander Mossolov, and the first performance at the Pops in complete and unabridged form of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." In the latter piece, which concludes the programme, Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the pianist. Before these two features of special interest will come another novelty, the playing by 16 of the orchestra's first violins of the solo part in the Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. And for the first half of the programme Mr. Fiedler has set the "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff, the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

* * * *

Monday evening will be, at least in part, a Wagner night, since the middle section of the programme will be devoted to the music of that composer: excerpts from "Siegfried," "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Overture to "Rienzi." For beginning of the programme, too, will come the "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from "Tannhauser." For the rest there will be music of the dance: the Minuet of Bolzoni, a Virginia Country Dance of Powell, the ballet music from "Faust," a Waltz of Ivanovici and the Fifth Hungarian Dance of Brahms.

* * * *

Then Tuesday night will be Gay Nineties Night, with bicycles checked free of charge, members of the audience invited to resurrect from their attics the raiment of that era, and beer to be served on draft (alcoholic content unspecified) in the original glasses used in Music Hall days. As for the programme, that is to be made up of music popular at the end of the century before our own, with college songs and other popular songs of that day having a place thereon. And the middle group of the evening's programme will be conducted by Timothee Adamowski, who led the Promenade Concerts in Music Hall in the seasons from 1891 through 1894, as indeed he led them again from 1903 through 1907.

* * * *

Wednesday evening will bring the Pops back to the nineteen-thirties, with selections from two of the season's current "hits" upon the programme, one from Kern's music for "The Cat and the Fiddle," and Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President" from "Of Thee I Sing." There will, of course, be other music of an older vintage, too: Berlioz's "Rakoczy" March, Rossini's Overture to "Wilhelm Tell," Sibelius' Valse Triste, a "Carmen" Fantasia and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite," among other things.

Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Schubert's "Ave Maria" in the arrangement of Wilhelmj, Tchaikovsky's Slavic March, and Percy Grainger's "Country Gardens," will be among the ever-popular pieces arrayed on the list for Thursday evening's concert. Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz is there, too, and so is Pierne's March of the Little Lead Soldiers.

* * * *

Friday evening will bring still other favorites: Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, the Polovtzkian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries, and the Ballet of the Hours from "La Gioconda," to mention but a few.

* * * *

Saturday evening, Mr. Theodorowicz, concert master of the Pops orchestra, will be the soloist in the Meditation from Massenet's "Thais." The Finale from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the Irish Rhapsody of Victor Herbert, a selection from Kern's "New Moon," and Gershwin's "Strike Up the Band," will be among the other numbers in this concluding Pop Concert of the week.

* * * *

MUSIC

Globe May 9

SYMPHONY HALL

First Sunday "Pop" Concert

Euterpe has kept strange company and has received all sorts of musical treatment in her countless Summers, but the first Sunday Pops concert of the season last evening must have been one of her most varied and enjoyable experiences. She was wooed passionately—and with extraordinary unanimity—by 16 first violinists, who played the solo part in the finale of Mendelssohn's violin concerto; she toured an iron works in Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry," and wound up hilariously in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," during which—had she been visible—one probably could have seen her perched atop the grand piano joyously singing the "blues" tunes.

Mossolov's piece—first played in this country by the Cleveland Orchestra two years ago—received, last night, its first Boston performance. The composer—Alexander Wassiliewitsch Mossolov, to give his full name—is a Russian, 32 years old, who is said to have composed in many forms, including the cantata and the opera. The avowed purpose of his present piece is to describe the "sounds and dynamic impressions of a steel mill."

He has succeeded notably; the work is an orchestral tour de force, in which are reproduced, by screaming woodwinds, groaning brasses, shivering strings, reverberating cymbals and pounding drums, all the noises one can conceive an iron works of producing. The work is an extremely clever bit of tone painting; it has no abstract musical value and its point lies in its programmatic endeavor. Mossolov has attained phenomenal semblance of reality in his reproduction of extremely discordant sounds, and the final chord is the most metallic sound given out by musical instruments which has ever fallen upon these ears.

The audience liked it; there were cheers as well as handclapping; and the piece probably has a future at these concerts, similar to that which lay ahead of Ravel's "Bolero" a couple of seasons ago.

Mr Fiedler did his best conducting in this piece and in Gershwin's Rhapsody; this type of music, with its verve and emphatic rhythms, its witticisms and its brilliant, unsentimental melodies reveals him at his best. He is, apparently, the only conductor who can obtain from the Symphony players, a good jazz rhythm. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," which began the concert, lacked clarity and lightness of touch; Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture did not have the desirable cumulative dramatic force, but his reading of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony was adequate.

Jesus Maria Sanroma was soloist in the Gershwin piece, and, as invariably, played with his inimitable brilliancy. He is the ideal pianist for this score, which is fast becoming a modern "classic." For originality of ideas, for clarity and resource in instrumentation, this "Rhapsody" is a masterpiece of modern American music. It may prove to be—who can say?—the best musical expression of our day. Whether or no, it is now probably the greatest piece of "symphonic" jazz yet written. It is still a mark for other composers desirous of writing the American "jazz classic" to aim at.

MUSIC

Herald May 9

SUNDAY NIGHT "POP"

The first Sunday concert of the newly-opened season of "Pops" filled Symphony Hall to overflowing last night. According to Sunday custom, it had a program interesting enough to merit undivided attention, since the dangerous distractions of food, drink, and smoke are on that evening eliminated by decree of the department of public safety.

Here it is: Prokofieff, "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25; Schubert, "Unfinished Symphony in B minor; Wagner, Overture to "Tannhaeuser"; Mendelssohn, Finale from the Violin Concerto, Op. 64 (solo part played by 16 first violins); Mossolov, Soviet Iron Foundry (first performance in Boston); Gershwin, Rhapsody in Blue, for piano and orchestra (soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma). Something for every taste.

The vast audience applauded neatly made, whimsical, sparkling music of a Prokofieff, aiming to show them how a resuscitated Mozart might have written today. Schubert's "Unfinished," with its rich and limpid beauty, (and worthily performed) gave still greater pleasure. Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture did not fail of its customary effect.

The virtuosity of the orchestra's first violins was pleasantly proved anew by 16 of them who joined forces in the solo part of the lively last movement of Mendelssohn's concerto. They achieved reasonably complete unanimity and were forced to rise repeatedly to acknowledge applause.

But the sensation of the evening was the first Boston performance of a work by the young Soviet composer Mossolov, entitled "Soviet Iron Foundry." Lacking technical advice as to the accuracy with which the composer has represented the sounds of an iron foundry, the listener may none the less admit that the imitation is a plausible one.

The discordant sounds and nerve-wracking uproar of machinery and tortured metal—stylized and reduced to rythmic order rose to a climax surpassing for sheer din anything within memory. Every sort of percussive insrument contributed its share, while at the height of the uproar a large flexible sheet of iron suspended from the ceiling was agitated by an unseen hand and seemed to perform a grotesque, rythmic dance. Over all a battery of horns sang a paean of praise (recalling Honegger's Pacific 231) to the Machine deified saviour of modernized Russia. The work has shape; best of all, it is brief. Although some members of the audience showed signs of distress during its performance, it was applauded with overwhelming enthusiasm and there were no sound of disapproval. Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra deserve high praise for their courage and skill.

Mr. Sanroma's brilliant performance of Gershwin's most popular and perhaps most successful non-theatrical work—his Rhapsody in Blue—earned him an ovation. The orchestra grows in its power to adopt the manner and technique of jazz. S. S.

Post May 10

BUSTLES AND BEER AT POPS

Guests in Costumes of the 90s to Arrive on Bicycles

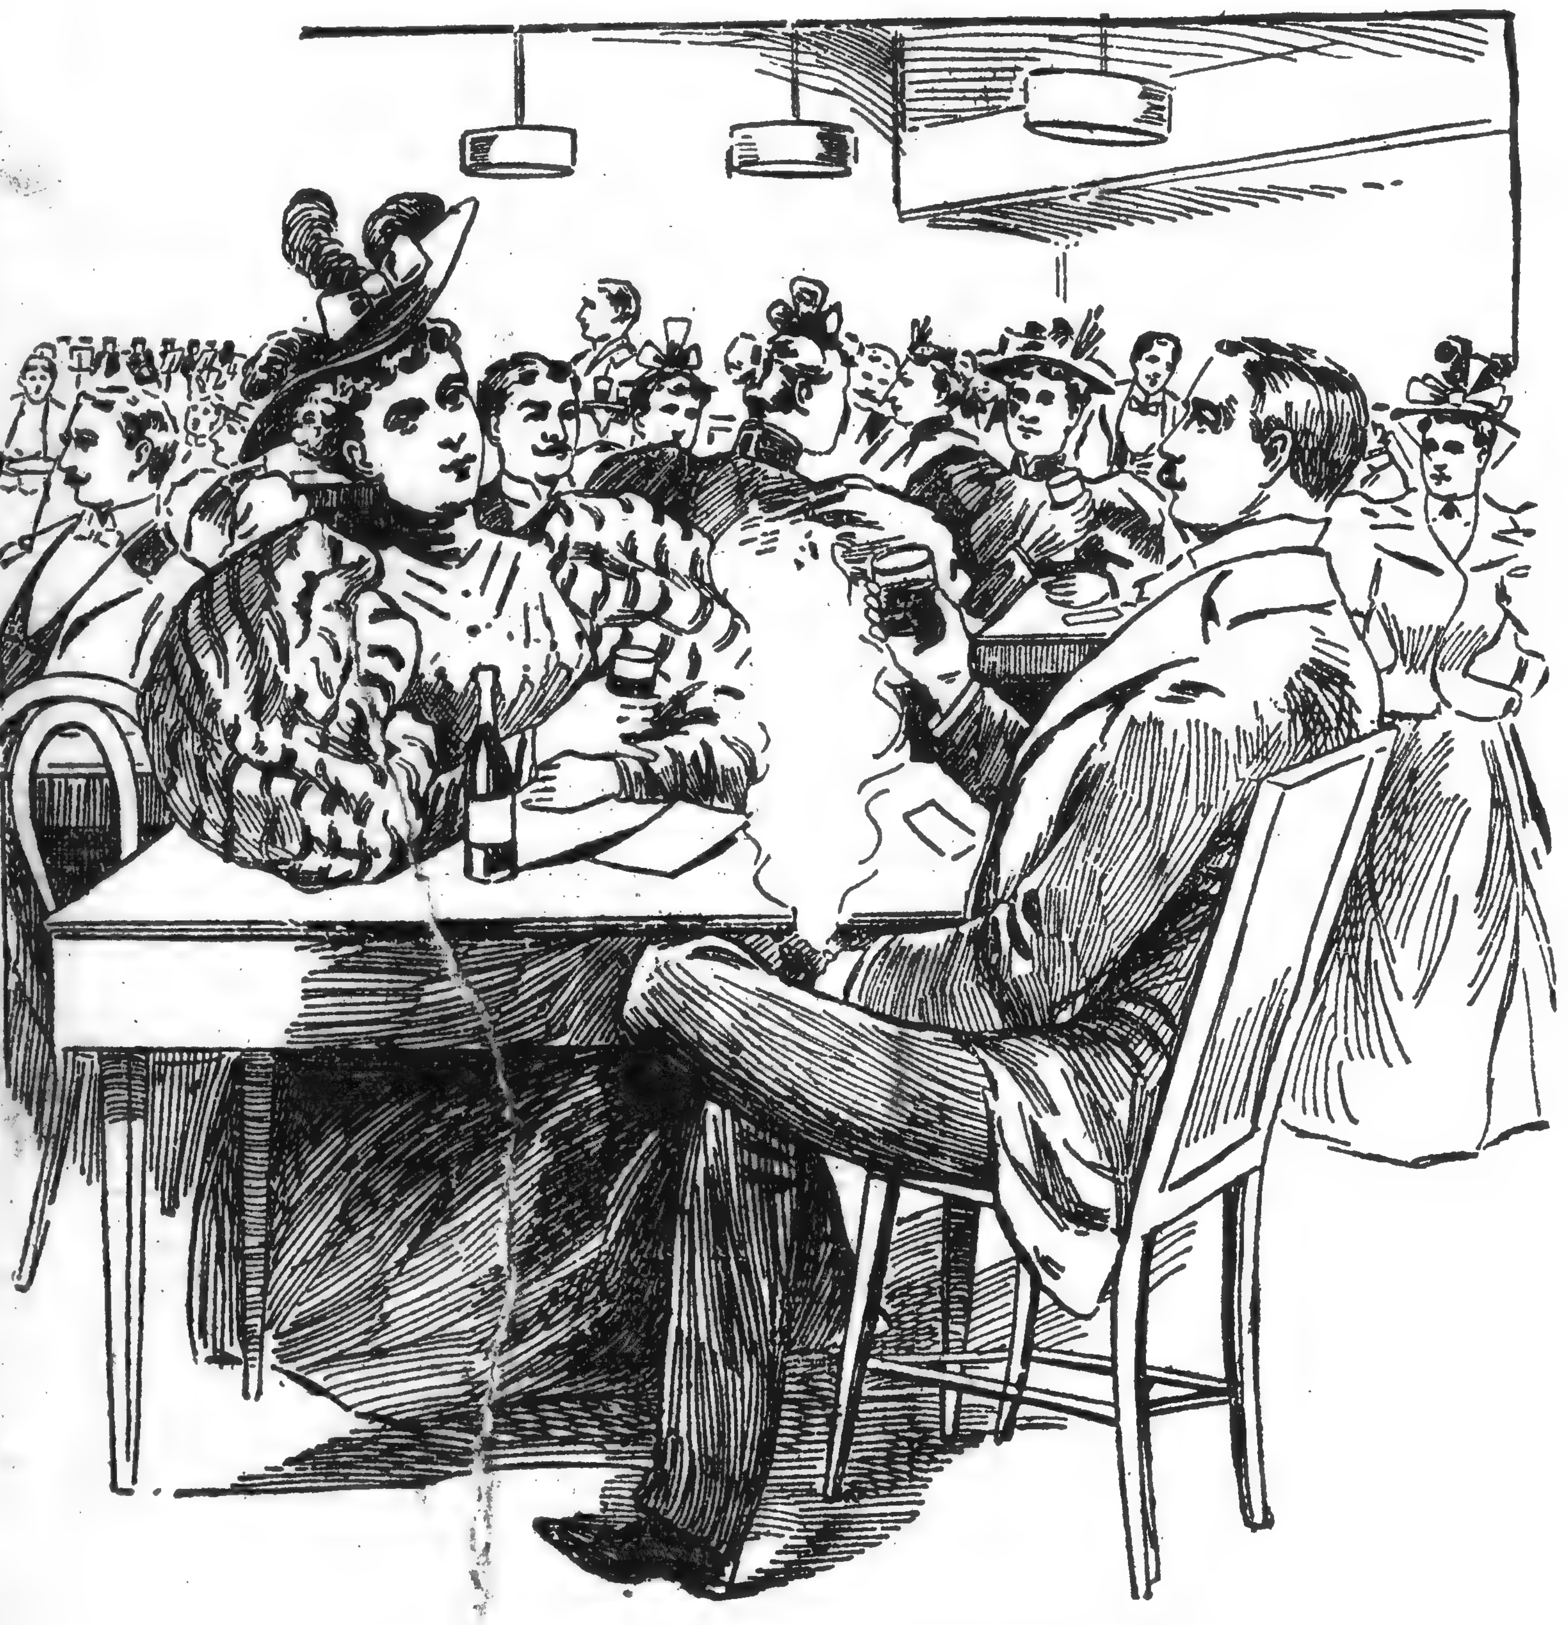
Guests at Pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight will be dressed in costumes of the "Gay Nineties," and many are expected to arrive on bicycles. The announcement of the party says that there will be beer on draught and that the steins of those in costume will be kept full. Timothee Adamowski, Pops conductor in the old Mucic Hall on Hamilton place, will be the guest of honor.

200

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MAY 9, 1932

ayers --- Music and Musicians

The Apparel Oft Proclaims the Time



As They Sat at The Pops Forty Years Ago

Costume-Hint, Extracted from A Newspaper of the Day, for The "Gay-Nineties" Evening at Symphony Hall Tomorrow

Concert-Chronicle

Symphonic Sabbath

UNLESS they are movie-addicts, seekers for public entertainment in Boston on Sunday evenings find it hard to come by. By statute it is not the first day of the week, but the Lord's Day, to the ancient sanctity of which only movies, vaudeville entertainments and concerts may, modernly, contribute. Yet not without restriction. Thus at Symphony Hall last evening, it was lawful to smoke in the corridors on one's feet; but unlawful "to burn tobacco" in a sitting posture within the auditorium. Across the way, at three or four soft-drink counters, whoever would might take his fill. But within the hall, such mortal sin was forbidden. No, dear friends, logic did not make our Sunday laws or the regulations enforcing them. Nor again are they "symblems" (as the word sometimes goes among our rulers) of that liberty, which—see the Congressional Record passim—we are told that we enjoy.

Rather they are "symblems" of our docilities and submissions. Does anyone see anything comic in four or five close-packed around a table on which nothing to eat or drink or smoke is ever spread? Seemingly not. Does any one complain of these statutory prohibitions? By word of the management, certainly not. To the contrary, we fill Symphony Hall to the last gilded chair against the walls, crowd around tables and into balconies. Either we passion ourselves for such music as The Pops afford on alternate Sundays or we ache for something to do in a public place on these Lord's Day evenings. And there you are, as the cat said sotto voce, when it first looked upon a king.

Variously to Gershwin

Dr. Koussevitzky has released Prokofiev's Classical Symphony to The Pops. Yesterday it was Mr. Fiedler's first piece to an audience that liked its light flow and neat bite, but hardly recognized it as the jeu d'esprit in invention and craft that more symphonically sophisticated companies know. It was, perhaps, a little off the expected track. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was more familiar; but Sabbath beatitude hardly began until the first measures of the advancing pilgrims sounded out of the Overture to "Tannhäuser." At the close satisfaction mounted high, to be topped only by elation at the end of Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," played at last—as it has long deserved—with only one minute and sanctioned cut. (If anyone doubts the deep-dyed American quality of such music, he has only to heed the direct, intensive response to it from an American audience.)

And all this with reason. Throughout Mr. Gershwin writes freshly, eagerly, inventively, taking every formal quirk in an easy, happy stride. Throughout Mr. Grofé, who did most of the scoring, adapts a jazz idiom to symphonic usage more skilfully than in the Second Rhapsody did the composer himself Throughout, moreover, Mr. Sanromá now matches Mr. Gershwin in the bravura with which he flings off the piano-part. In imagination, the hearer sees the composer listening endlessly to those ill-omened records of the second Rhapsody of Rivets, revising and re-revising; whereas by every aural evidence the Rhapsody in Blue was flung off in a flood of spontaneous creation. Mr. Gershwin may pride himself on the superior scholarship of the Second Rhapsody; but by the same token it is far less self-expression.

"Maschinen-Musik"

So via the Finale to Mendelssohn's Concerto played by the united and unanimous first violins against an orchestral background from which they were little distinguished, to the novel number of the evening, Mossolov's "Music of Machines" or, more explicitly, "Soviet Iron Foundry." The long steel plate, say twenty inches wide, which is his additional instrument, was loosed from the wall; while the member of the orchestra charged to shake it made ready to deploy a new virtuosity. Six horns were equally prepared to rise in their places and turn the bells of their instruments outward—as Mr. Mengelberg used to turn them in Liszt's "Preludes." Now we go, in a well-marked rhythm of otherwise jangled sounds—the sounds of the machine-shop. And on we go until through them winds an audible thread of instrumental song. Call it, as do some, the song of machines or, as others prefer, the song of man, their master. (Ah! if he only were!) The model is not far to seek—Honegger's so-called locomotive-piece, "Pacific 2-3-1"; but Mossolov's execution is blunt-fingered and unimaginative in comparison. Yet better such crudity in expression of one's own life and one's own time than the mere repetition, on uncounted sheets of music-paper, of an academic model and an orthodox tradition.

Items of the Day

Dr. Koussevitzky will be guest-conductor at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna on Thursday, June 9, during the first of the festival weeks. His program will assemble an eighteenth-century Concerto of Emanuel Bach; Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony"; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; a number from Ravel; Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony."

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,

Giving 'Thrifty Thirties' a Thrill

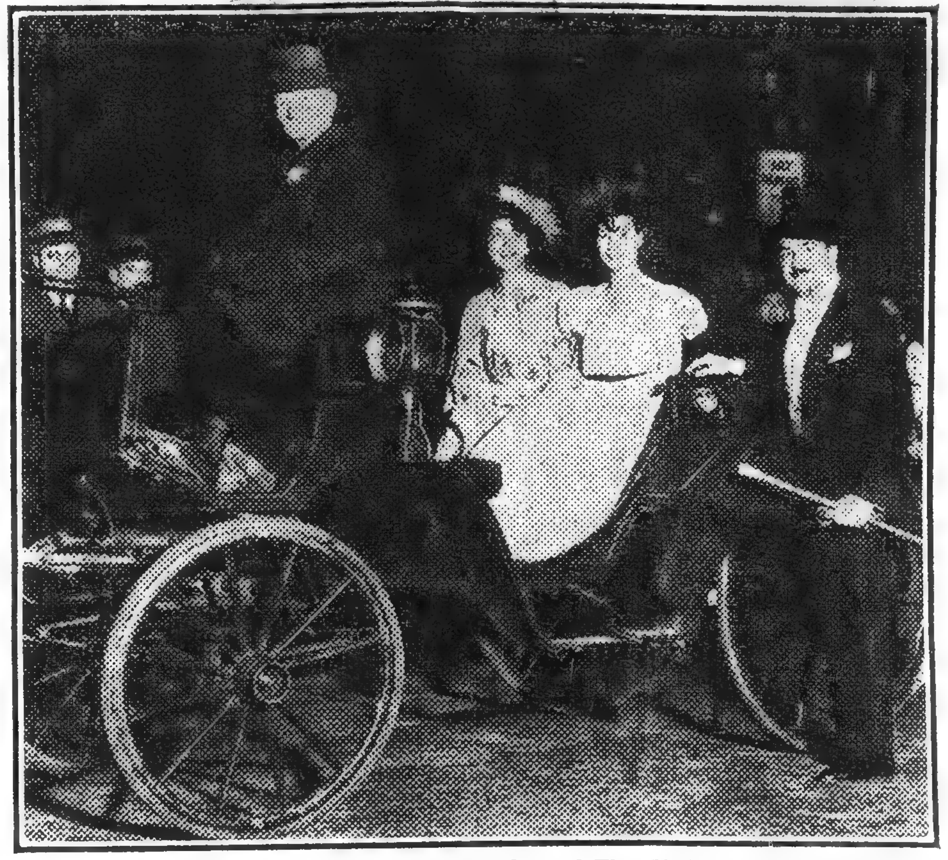


Photo by a Staff Photographer of The Christian Science Monitor

AN ARRIVAL AT THE POPS CONCERT

Mrs. Victor H. Barwood and Miss Pearl DeLebecque With Mr. Arthur Fiedler in a Conveyance of the Nineteenth Century.

'Bikes,' Bustles and Bowlers Of the 'Gay Nineties' Reappear

Popping Pop Concert Pops With Popular Airs of Three Decades Ago in Setting of Soft Drinks and Costumes of Last Century

High-wheeled bicycles, "tandems" and just plain "bikes" decorated the sedate corridors of Symphony Hall last night—checked free. Photographers' flashlights spurted on the steps and in the lobby. Crowds of the curious stood about the doors. Applause within and without greeted the arrival of groups of people resplendent in leg-o'-mutton sleeves, bustles, and picture hats, or in peg-top trousers, stocks, bowler hats and ferocious mustaches.

The strains of "Sweet Rosie O'Grady," "After the Ball" and "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay" were heard within the classic walls, and a couple cake-walked up and down the central aisle to the tune of "At a Georgia Camp Meeting." It was the first "Gay Nineties Night" at the Pops.

A gay night it was, and all achieved on nothing stronger than soft drinks. The entrances to Symphony Hall took on the aspect of a Hollywood movie "opening," for those who were unable to get in—the hall was sold out at noon—stood about the steps to admire the entering belles and beaux. Nobody could mistake it—this was an Event.

The program, of course, was made up of favorites of 40 years ago. Mr. Arthur Fiedler opened with a Schrammel March, Suppé's "Poet and Peasant" Overture, the Intermezzo from Gillet's "Loin du Bal" and a selection of college songs. Then he yielded the stick to Mr. Timothée Adamowski, leader of the Promenade concerts at the old Music Hall in 1891-94 and of the Symphony Hall Pops in 1903-07. This distinguished veteran, who used to sit beside Franz Kneisel at the first desk of the Symphony violins, received an ovation from a standing orchestra and audience. He quickly proved to the youngsters in the audience that things were not so slow in the old days. Directing the Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus in the Underworld," Handel's Largo and the Strauss "Blue Danube" Waltz, he displayed not only musical authority but a sensitive feeling for style. A long-skirted young woman passed up her bouquet to him in tribute.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 1932

Mr. Fiedler resumed the baton for the final section, which included the Overture to "The Pirates," the cakewalk aforesaid and a Grand Selection of Song Favorites. When the audience joined in the old ballads, it was interesting to note that the young people knew the words and the tunes better than their seniors—check up one to the radio.

Altogether the most exciting night experienced at the Pops in these dul' modern times, and so successful that a repetition was announced, before the evening was over, for next Wednesday. The applause that greeted the announcement made it clear that in the opinion of the 'thirties, the 'nineties weren't so bad.

L. A. S.

Tonight at the Pops

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
"Valse Triste"	Sibelius
"Carmen," Fantasia	Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss	Korngold
"A Londonderry Air" Arranged for String Orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty
"Nutcracker," Ballet Suite	Tchaikovsky
"The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection	Kern
Serenade, "The Millions of Harlequin"	Drigo
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing"	Gershwin

201

Age depends entirely on how a woman ac

he Bost

d Class Matter at Boston P. O.
t. 1932, by Post Pub. Co.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11

POP CONCERT OF '93 AGAIN

Record Audience Arrives on Bicycles and Carryalls in Prince Alberts—Beer on Tables in Steins

REVIVING THE MAUVE DECADE
The scene at Pops in Symphony Hall last night as the Gay Nineties, were revived, with beer (near) and a leg 'o mutton sleeves, bustles and those so chic sombreros. The Misses Katherine Embree, left, and Miriam Jasspon of Radcliffe College, are shown with their fin de siecle finery.

BY GRACE DAVIDSON

The gay nineties of "wein, weiber, und gesang"—modern translation: ice cream soda, the girl friend, and boop-a-doop—of the good old wine-gardens of the Chicago World's Fair midway paid a phantom visit last night to Symphony Hall. In a generation that remembers, a feeling of nostalgia was revived and in those born too late, a synthetic taste was created of what it was in an age when beer was beer.

Continued on Page 9—Fourth Col.

Bostonians of Other Days Return to Symphony Hall to Mix Their Tunes With a Little Beer at Pops

ARTHUR N. WIGGIN MRS. CARL HODGKINSON
ARRIVING IN HEIGHT OF STYLE
Arthur N. Wiggin of Brookline and Mrs. Carl Hodgkinson of Wellesley helped to restore the old-time glory of the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall when they drew up to the building last night, garbed in raiment long stored in attic trunks, on a bicycle "built for two."

MRS. MARY MELVIN MRS. ELEANOR JORDAN
MUSIC-LOVERS OF "BLUE DANUBE" DAYS
Mrs. Mary Melvin and Mrs. Eleanor Jordan, both of Boston, did their bit to make last night's Pops concert as much like an affair of the 90's as possible. Bustles and hats that revealed the back of the neck were in vogue again and the only flaw in the revival was the alcoholic percentage of the beer that was served. Near beer had to do, of course, but that looked good.

MRS. BAIRNWOOD MISS DELABREQUE ARTHUR FIEDLER
DIRECTOR FIEDLER ARRIVES IN CARRIAGE
Not only did Arthur Fiedler, director of the Pops, feature Strauss and other composers popular with music-lovers of a generation or more ago, but he completed the portrayal by arriving at Symphony Hall in a horse-drawn carriage with Mrs. Victor Bairnwood and Miss Pearl Delabreque. A number of horse-drawn vehicles were parked in front of the hall.

KATHERINE EMBREE MARIAN JASSPON
COLLEGE GIRLS LIVE IN MOTHERS' DAY
Miss Katherine Embree and Miss Marian Jasspon represented the younger set at the concert. They are Radcliffe students and attired themselves in the fashions of mother's girlhood to mingle with the throng. Despite the unique nature of the affair, many were turned away.

S NEEDED TO PASS PROSPERITY BOND PLAN

☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆ ☆

Beards and Bustles Flourish Again at 'Pops' Beer Party

POPS CONDUCTOR ARRIVES IN MAUVE DECADE MANNER

The photo shows Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Pops, arriving at Symphony Hall last night in an open barouche driven by the renowned "Freddy," coachman to rollicking Harvard students of the last half century, show on the box. Seated in the barouche are, left to right: Mrs. Victor H. Barwood and Miss Pearl Delebrecque

Continued From First Page

For more than 3000 Bostonians, young and old, responded to the Pops invitation to come to celebrate a gay Nineties night. It was a huge surprise, a really big success all around. Perhaps, for the first time in the history of Pops concerts, more than 500 people were turned away, but they lingered outside, tied up traffic to watch the gay procession of bicycles, a carry-all, gentlemen with beards and sideburns in grandfather's Prince Albert, slightly motheaten from years of attic rest, ladies in bustles, leg-of-mutton sleeves and Gainsborough hats with plumes perched high on pompadours.

The atmosphere was very Deutsch or German, as you will, music, near beer, and waiters made up to look like the good German waiters of less sophisticated days, when the family gathered around a table, drank a stein of beer and listened to Strauss' "An Der Schonen Blauen Donau" or Schrammel's "Wien Bleibt Wien," which were played last night in an attempt to recapture the old spirit.

As of the Midway

There was a feeling of doubt a couple of hours before the show got going that perhaps the Bostonians would not respond in the costume of the gay 90's or even the spirit. But the tip-off came when Arthur Fielder, the Pops maestro, blocked traffic when he drove up in a dilapidated carry-all of an earlier vintage with two young women out of a picture of the Chicago mid-way. They were Miss Pearl Delabreque and Mrs. Victor H. Barwood. Miss Delabreque wore a muslin dress of white with large polka dots, full skirt, and huge puff sleeves. Her hat was plumed and large. Mrs. Barwood's costume boasted the hour-glass waist and her hat, too, was of the picture variety. Both costumes were reminiscent of the famous scene of the Chicago Midway which was revived in Ziegfeld's memorable "Show Boat."

In fact, the whole party last night at Symphony Hall carried a pleasant note of authenticity. The spirit of the crowd proved there was a desire to revive an old-fashioned evening when a pretty girl was content to be taken out by a young man for a quiet evening of good music, a glass of beer, a compliment or two in a beer garden. The radio, jazz, crooning, movies, tooting horns of the automobile were forgotten once inside Symphony Hall.

One Modern Note

The only modern note lacking on such a May night in 1892-3, the year of the World's Fair, which summarized that epic, was the presence of the electric bulb flashlights of the photographers. Photographers invaded Symphony Hall for local color and the crowd were eager, so it appeared, to record their night in newspaper history.

Here and there, caricatures in costume appeared. A group of some 50 Harvard students from the Business and Medical schools appeared with amateur constructed beards, high collars at least two sizes too big, red bow ties. Their fair escort, too, for the most part burlesqued their costume, but their conduct measured up to the good taste of the conservative gay '90s.

200 in Dress of Nineties

At least 200 Bostonians came in authentic costumes of the gay '90s. Arthur M. Wiggam entertained a party of eight, and they were all in costume. Mrs. Wiggam wore a costume of her aunt's. Many of those present brought old German steins, which were filled with the near beer, light or dark, which gave the effect, but not the taste, alas. A bar was set up in the foyer, where the beer was served, and in the intermission crowds surged around to recapture the old thrill of drinking at the bar.

Charles McCarthy of the box office staff was made up in exact costume of the box office man of the Pops of the '90s. Somewhere he found a faded photograph and copied the costume in detail. When people came up to get their tickets, the did not recognize the familiar faces of Mr. McCarthy and his staff in the old-fashioned makeup.

One woman said, "What happened to the regular men, and who are you?"

McCarthy replied, "I am a ticket seller from old Music Hall. You know it's 1893 tonight, Madame."

Even the telephone operator, Mrs. Catherine O'Connor took the time to get out her grandmother's black mantilla and a stiff taffeta gown of black with leg of mutton sleeves. But the best surprise of the night was the waiters with the sideburns and long white beer aprons.

There was not time to get them the short jackets of the waiters that are still worn in Germany and France, but the aprons were tied over the coats and the effect was quite the same.

Adamowski Conducts

Maestro Fiedler, it seems, was anxious to provide precisely the same programmes that were given in the old beer garden days, but there was some difficulty in obtaining a complete programme of that melodious but less highbrow music. However, there was a grand selection of old song favorites from the 90's: Strauss' "Blue Danube" and Von Suppe's "Poet and Peasant."

And Timothee Adamowski, leader of the Promenade concerts in the seasons of 1891-1894, was given the honor of conducting the second part of the concert. There was the cake-walk number, "At a Georgia Camp Meeting"; Sir Arthur Sullivan's "The Pirates of Penzance," and the crowd forgot any trace of Boston offishness, frigidity, applauded, laughed, and had a jolly good time.

FIEDLER PUTS ON PROGRAM OF OLD FAVORITES

Bicycles and Barouches Rear Odd Throng to Concert at Symphony Hall

Leg o' mutton sleeves, bustles, perched bonnets, beards and side-beards, two-seated bicycles and horse-drawn barouches.

These intermingled as approximately 3000 up-to-date Bostonians last night tried to recapture the atmosphere of the "Gay Nineties" at the Pops concert in Symphony Hall.

500 TURNED AWAY

Bostonians ransacked attic trunks to find the relics of a bygone age.

Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, started the proceedings when he drove up in a dilapidated carryall in the company of Miss Pearl Delabreque and Mrs. Victor H. Bairnwood, both attired a la the days when beer was beer.

Patrons arrived fast after that and soon the hall was crowded and more than 500 people who had been turned away were lingering outside.

NEAR BEER SERVED

Fiedler rendered selections popular in the 90's, such as Strauss' "Blue Danube," and Von Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" to reproduce as near as possible the program given in the old beer garden days.

Although in these days of prohibition the real beer familiar to our fathers was lacking, near beer and side-burned waiters furnished the necessary atmosphere

Here and there, caricatures in costume appeared in the audience. A group of some 50 Harvard students from the Business and Medical schools appeared with amateur constructed beards, high collars at least two sizes too big, red bow ties. Their fair escort, too, for the most part burlesqued their costume, but their conduct measured up to the good taste of the conservative gay '90s.

GAY NINETIES NIGHT AT POPS

Arthus Fiedler Revives Old Memories with Novel Program

TRAV. —— MAY 11

By KATHARINE LYONS

A bicycle built for two might have attracted a crowd on Massachusetts or Huntington avenues last evening but it fitted perfectly into the picture inside of Symphony hall.

It was "Gay Nineties" night and a gay throng was there. Some came in victorias, with their paisley shawls, feather boas, leg-of-mutton sleeves, high-back combs, fans, old-fashioned bouquets, fur jackets, bonnets with velvet strings and what not.

BARTENDERS ACTIVE

Bartenders in big white aprons and "sideboards" trayed around [illegible], and beer in steins and some of the guests were privileged to have a drink on the house.

One of the exits was transformed into a bar and beer signs adorned the walls for decorations. And the staid old rafters and beams of Boston's famous sanctorum for music and the other arts shook with laughter and applause because the dignified Pops of 1932 was taking a night off to show us what they were like in the 90's, when beer without the "near" was served and the cakewalk was coming into its own.

Every one was thrilled. There were reasons why. There was the perfect program which Conductor Arthur Fiedler selected and there was that famous Boston conductor Timothee Adamowski on hand to conduct his portion of the program. And what a reception was accorded this conductor who held the baton for the Promenade concerts back in the early '90's and again from 1902 to 1907! The audience rose to his musicianship to pay its deepest respect to him, and it added cheers and bravos. When he borrowed Theodorowicz's violin to play a few measures of the "Blue Danube" waltz, emotions were unrestrained. For encores he added to his allotted group "Pizzicato" from [illegible] and Gounod's "Hymn to Saint Cecilia."

In the latter he gave a [illegible] demonstration of what beautiful [illegible] tones he could draw from [illegible] and displayed the supreme [illegible] he had in the men who held the instruments.

PRAISE FOR FIEDLER

With the Pops but one week old for the 1932 season, Arthur Fiedler has played his trump card early. The [illegible] of such a program, the making [illegible] and the tremendous success [illegible] adds some tall plumage to his [illegible]

In his first group there was the familiar overture to "Poet and Peasant" which brought such terrific applause he answered with "Oh Promise Me" and "Hiawatha." These familiar old tunes put the audience into a high [illegible] of enthusiasm and Mr. Fiedler, [illegible] the joy and excitement of the [illegible] turned to the far-famed "Florodora" and brought forth the famous "Tell Me Pretty Maiden" number. The spirit of the occasion had a high effect when the orchestra played "At a Georgia Campmeeting" and two of the patrons costumed for the event left their seats to cakewalk up and down the aisle to the conductor's platform.

OLD SONGS HEARD

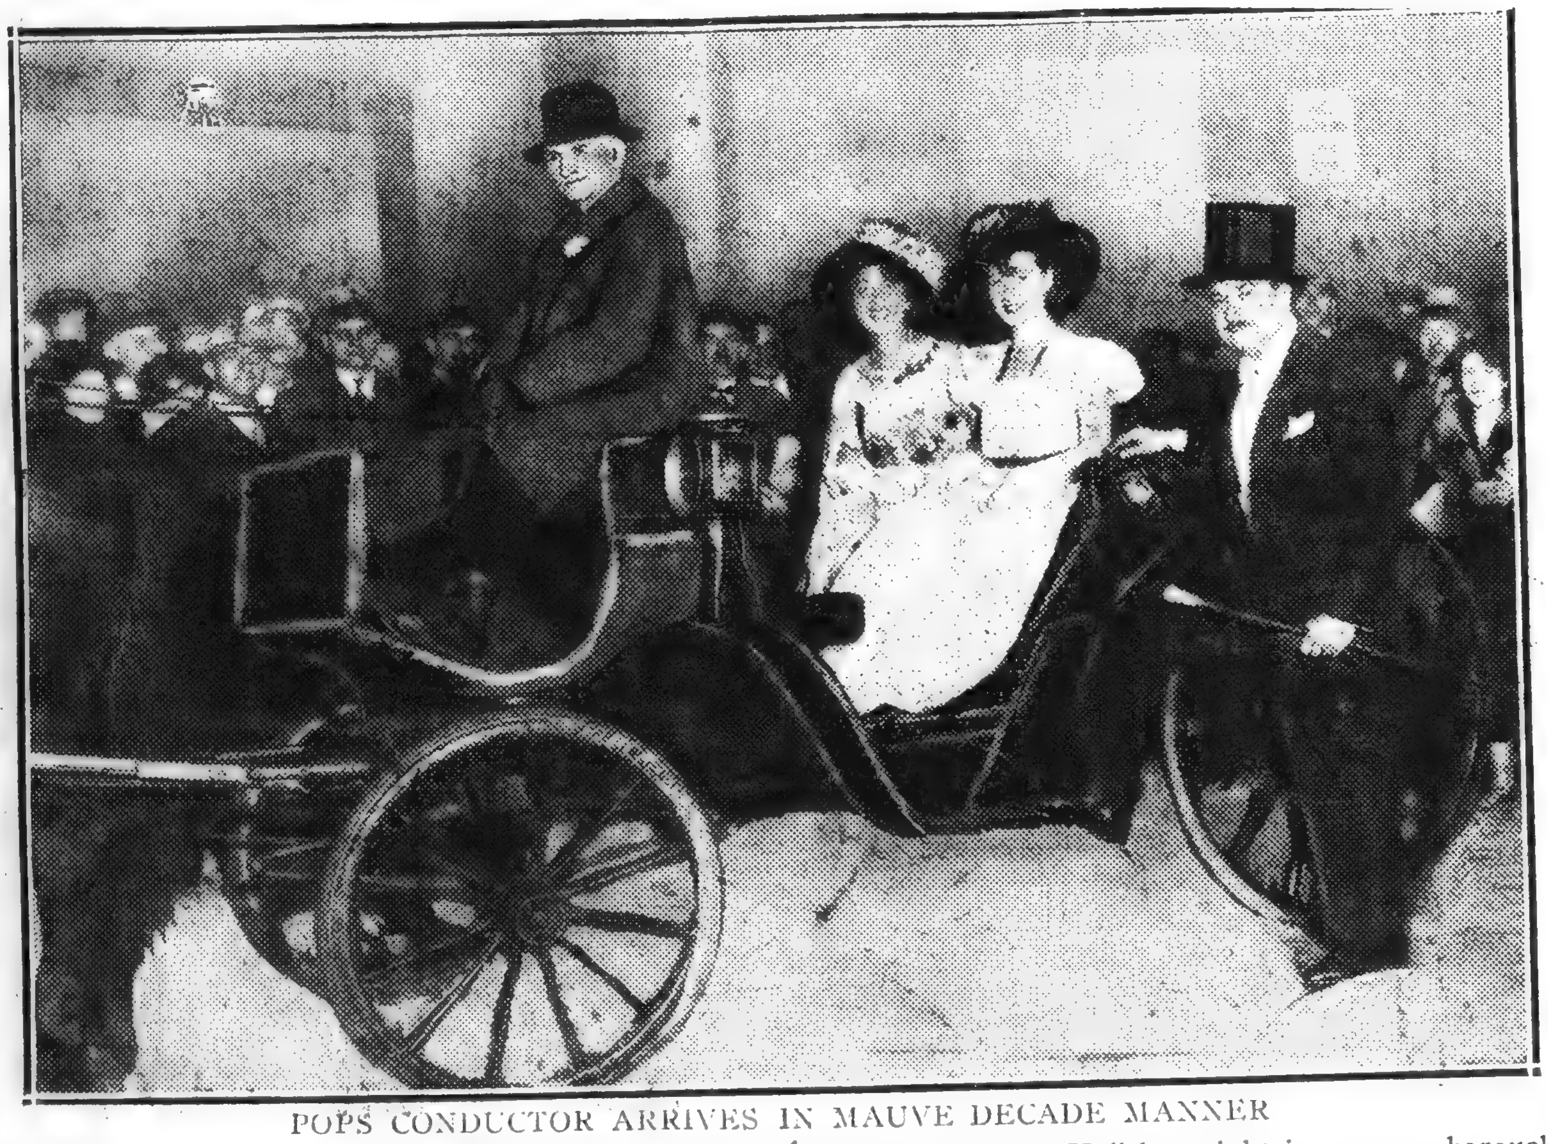
A few minutes intermission gave opportunity for a few "slides" to announce the prize-winners of the evening. Then came the grand selection of song favorites with the audience joining in singing such popular old hits as "Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom-De-Ay," "Rosie O'Grady," "East Side West Side," "Daisy Daisy," "After the Ball" and others.

Not only the older generation but the younger one caught the spirit of the affair and joined in to make merry, lending a more sentimental and serious moment with "Auld Lang Syne," which closed the program.

The immediate success of the evening prompted the management to make a ready announcement that this "Gay Nineties" program will be repeated next Wednesday evening, May 18th, with the request to "please come in costume and we'll park your bicycles free."

202

Pops of 1893 Relived in Costume, Music and Steins on the Tables



POPS CONDUCTOR ARRIVES IN MAUVE DECADE MANNER

The photo shows Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Pops, arriving at Symphony Hall last night in an open barouche driven by the renowned "Freddy," coachman to rollicking Harvard students of the last half century, show on the box. Seated in the barouche are, left to right: Mrs. Victor H. Barwood and Miss Pearl Delebrecque

Continued From First Page

For more than 3000 Bostonians, young and old, responded to the Pops invitation to come to celebrate a gay Nineties night. It was a huge surprise, a really big success all around. Perhaps, for the first time in the history of Pops concerts, more than 500 people were turned away, but they lingered outside, tied up traffic to watch the gay procession of bicycles, a carry-all, gentlemen with beards and sideburns in grandfather's Prince Albert, slightly motheaten from years of attic rest, ladies in bustles, leg-of-mutton sleeves and Gainsborough hats with plumes perched high on pompadours.

The atmosphere was very Deutsch or German, as you will, music, near beer, and waiters made up to look like the good German waiters of less sophisticated days, when the family gathered around a table, drank a stein of beer and listened to Strauss' "An Der Schonen Blauen Donau" or Schrammel's "Wien Bleibt Wien," which were played last night in an attempt to recapture the old spirit.

As of the Midway

There was a feeling of doubt a couple of hours before the show got going that perhaps the Bostonians would not respond in the costume of the gay 90's or even the spirit. But the tip-off came when Arthur Fielder, the Pops maestro, blocked traffic when he drove up in a dilapidated carry-all of an earlier vintage with two young women out of a picture of the Chicago mid-way. They were Miss Pearl Delabreque and Mrs. Victor H. Barwood. Miss Delabreque wore a muslin dress of white with large polka dots, full skirt, and huge puff sleeves. Her hat was plumed and large. Mrs. Barwood's costume boasted the hour-glass waist and her hat, too, was of the picture variety. Both costumes were reminiscent of the famous scene of the Chicago Midway which was revived in Ziegfeld's memorable "Show Boat."

In fact, the whole party last night at Symphony Hall carried a pleasant note of authenticity. The spirit of the crowd proved there was a desire to revive an old-fashioned evening when a pretty girl was content to be taken out by a young man for a quiet evening of good music, a glass of beer, a compliment or two in a beer garden. The radio, jazz, crooning, movies, tooting horns of the automobile were forgotten once inside Symphony Hall.

One Modern Note

The only modern note lacking on such a May night in 1892-3, the year of the World's Fair, which summarized that epic, was the presence of the electric bulb flashlights of the photographers. Photographers invaded Symphony Hall for local color and the crowd were eager, so it appeared, to record their night in newspaper history.

Here and there, caricatures in costume appeared. A group of some 50 Harvard students from the Business and Medical schools appeared with amateur constructed beards, high collars at least two sizes too big, red bow ties. Their fair escort, too, for the most part burlesqued their costume, but their conduct measured up to the good taste of the conservative gay '90s.

200 in Dress of Nineties

At least 200 Bostonians came in authentic costumes of the gay '90s. Arthur M. Wiggam entertained a party of eight, and they were all in costume. Mrs. Wiggam wore a costume of her aunt's. Many of those present brought old German steins, which were filled with the near beer, light or dark, which gave the effect, but not the taste, alas. A bar was set up in the foyer, where the beer was served, and in the intermission crowds surged around to recapture the old thrill of drinking at the bar.

Charles McCarthy of the box office staff was made up in exact costume of the box office man of the Pops of the '90s. Somewhere he found a faded photograph and copied the costume in detail. When people came up to get their tickets, the did not recognize the familiar faces of Mr. McCarthy and his staff in the old-fashioned makeup.

One woman said, "What happened to the regular men, and who are you?"

McCarthy replied, "I am a ticket seller from old Music Hall. You know it's 1893 tonight, Madame."

Even the telephone operator, Mrs. Catherine O'Connor took the time to get out her grandmother's black mantilla and a stiff taffeta gown of black with leg of mutton sleeves. But the best surprise of the night was the waiters with the sideburns and long white beer aprons.

There was not time to get them the short jackets of the waiters that are still worn in Germany and France, but the aprons were tied over the coats and the effect was quite the same.

Adamowski Conducts

Maestro Fiedler, it seems, was anxious to provide precisely the same programmes that were given in the old beer garden days, but there was some difficulty in obtaining a complete programme of that melodious but less highbrow music. However, there was a grand selection of old song favorites from the 90's: Strauss' "Blue Danube" and Von Suppe's "Poet and Peasant."

And Timothee Adamowski, leader of the Promenade concerts in the seasons of 1891-1894, was given the honor of conducting the second part of the concert. There was the cake-walk number, "At a Georgia Camp Meeting"; Sir Arthur Sullivan's "The Pirates of Penzance," and the crowd forgot any trace of Boston offishness, frigidity, applauded, laughed, and had a jolly good time.

JO

HOW does a boy find his as a man?

FIEDLER PUTS ON PROGRAM OF OLD FAVORITES

Bicycles and Barouches Rear Odd Throng to Concert at Symphony Hall

Leg o' mutton sleeves, bustles, perched bonnets, beards and side-beards, two-seated bicycles and horse-drawn barouches.

These intermingled as approximately 3000 up-to-date Bostonians last night tried to recapture the atmosphere of the "Gay Nineties" at the Pops concert in Symphony Hall.

500 TURNED AWAY

Bostonians ransacked attic trunks to find the relics of a bygone age.

Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, started the proceedings when he drove up in a dilapidated carryall in the company of Miss Pearl Delabreque and Mrs. Victor H. Bairnwood, both attired a la the days when beer was beer.

Patrons arrived fast after that and soon the hall was crowded and more than 500 people who had been turned away were lingering outside.

NEAR BEER SERVED

Fiedler rendered selections popular in the 90's, such as Strauss' "Blue Danube," and Von Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" to reproduce as near as possible the program given in the old beer garden days.

Although in these days of prohibition the real beer familiar to our fathers was lacking, near beer and side-burned waiters furnished the necessary atmosphere

Here and there, caricatures in costume appeared in the audience. A group of some 50 Harvard students from the Business and Medical schools appeared with amateur constructed beards, high collars at least two sizes too big, red bow ties. Their fair escort, too, for the most part burlesqued their costume, but their conduct measured up to the good taste of the conservative gay '90s.

Largest Evening Circulation in New England

TO PASS

☆ ☆

Bustles Flou

but hung on.

It was "Gay Nineties" [illegible] the plunging, [illegible] gay throng was there. Some came in victorias, with their paisley shawls, feather boas, leg-of-mutton sleeves, high-back combs, fans, old-fashioned bouquets, fur jackets, bonnets with velvet strings and what not.

BARTENDERS ACTIVE

Bartenders in big white aprons and "sideboards" trayed around pretzels, and beer in steins and some of the guests were privileged to have a drink on the house.

One of the exits was transformed into a bar and beer signs adorned the walls for decorations. And the staid old rafters and beams of Boston's famous sanctorum for music and the other arts shook with laughter and applause because the dignified Pops of 1932 was taking a night off to show us what they were like in the 90's, when beer without the "near" was served and the cakewalk was coming into its own.

Every one was thrilled. There were reasons why. There was the perfect program which Conductor Arthur Fiedler selected and there was that famous Boston conductor Timothee Adamowski on hand to conduct his portion of the program. And what a reception was accorded this conductor who held the baton for the Promenade concerts back in the early '90's and again from [illegible] to 1907! The audience rose to his musicianship to pay its deepest [illegible] to him, and it added cheers and bravos. When he borrowed Theodorowicz's violin to play a few measures of the "Blue Danube" waltz, emotions were unrestrained. For encores he added to his allotted group "Pizzicato" from [illegible] and Gounod's "Hymn to Saint C[illegible]

In the latter he gave a striking demonstration of what beautiful [illegible] tones he could draw from the [illegible] and displayed the supreme [illegible] he had in the men who held the instruments.

PRAISE FOR FIEDLER

With the Pops but one week old for the 1932 season, Arthur Fiedler has played his trump card early. [illegible] of such a program, the making [illegible] and the tremendous success [illegible] adds some tall plumage to [illegible]

In his first group there was the familiar overture to "Poet and Peasant" which brought such terrific [illegible] he answered with "Oh Promise Me" and "Hiawatha." These familiar old tunes put the audience into a high [illegible] of enthusiasm and Mr. Fiedler, [illegible] the joy and excitement of the [illegible] turned to the far-famed "Florodora" and brought forth the famous "Tell Me Pretty Maiden" number. The spirit of the occasion had a high effect when the orchestra played "At a Georgia Campmeeting" and two of the patrons costumed for the event left their seats to cakewalk up and down the aisle to the conductor's platform.

OLD SONGS HEARD

A few minutes intermission gave opportunity for a few "slides" to announce the prize-winners of the evening. Then came the grand selection of song favorites with the audience joining in to sing such popular old hits as "Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom-De-Ay," "Rosie O'Grady," "East Side West Side," "Daisy [illegible]," "After the Ball" and others.

Not only the older generation but the younger one caught the spirit of the affair and joined in to make merry, lending a more sentimental and serious moment with "Auld Lang Syne," which closed the program.

The immediate success of the evening prompted the management to make a ready announcement that this "Gay Nineties" program will be repeated next Wednesday evening, May 18th, with the request to "please come in costume and we'll park your bicycles free."

GAY NINETIES RULE AT POPS

Costumed Groups Cheered —Familiar Airs of Period Played

BEER AND BUSTLES HAVE THEIR HOUR

By FRANCES BLANCHARD

Spurred on by the familiar, rollicking tunes of the Gay Nineties, and enthused to hearty cheers by the appearance of Flora-dora girls, bicycle girls, leg-o'-mutton sleeved girls and Gainsborough hatted girls, the 2000 persons filling the floor and balcony seats at the Pop concert last evening unloosed their vocal cords and lustily carolled "Sweet Rosy O'Grady," "Daisy, Daisy Give Me Your Hand So True," "After the Ball Is Over," and others of the jolly favorites of four decades ago.

Young men suddenly blossoming out over night in generous beards rivalling those of the famous Smith Brothers, accompanied young ladies with silken gowns that their grandmothers had worn to coming-out parties. Other young men adopted the distinguished sideburns and genteel moustaches, while their companions chose tight little jackets and sweeping circular skirts, with coquettish chapeaux saucily tilted over one ear.

Whatever the attire or whoever the wearer, the advent of each costumed party in the great hall was the signal for rousing applause, laughter and cheers. Not nearly all of the audience arrived in costume, but those who wore conventional clothes were ready with

(Continued on Page Two)

THE BOSTON HERALD, WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 1932

Gay Nineties Rule at Pops; Costumed Groups Win Applause

(Continued from Page One)

their noisy greeting for those who dressed up.

FIRST PRIZE

First prize went to a group comprising Miss Katharine Hughes and her sister, Miss Elinor Hughes of Cambridge, Miss Ethel Machanic, Miss Margery Lang, Alfred Spittall, Abbott Cheever, Herbert Barnett, Jacob Rosenberg, Henry Fuller and Elmer Greene. Miss Katharine Hughes wore a tight-waisted pale blue silk gown with puffed sleeves trimmed with wide ruffles of lace and bands of black velvet. Miss Elinor Hughes was crowned with the gem hat of the entire evening, a huge Paris creation of tan straw faced with taffeta and with enoromus butterfly taffeta bows on top. Miss Lang's historic pink silk was topped with a black velvet Gainsborough hat and Miss Machanic wore an enormous black velvet hat and black gown.

Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, gowned in black with pearls as her jewels, looked proudly on while her distinguished husband conducted the second group of selections. In her party were Mrs. De Forest Danielson, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Dexter, Charles Ellis, former manager of Symphony, and LeBaron Russell. At a table nearby were Mr. and Mrs. Horace Binney. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hill Thorndike, Miss Elizabeth W. Colwell and Herbert Brown. Mrs. Richard D. Sears, Jr., occupied another table with a group of friends. Another large party came with Mr. and Mrs. Roger Wolcott. Miss Mildred Hastings was another noted in the audience.

Mr. and Mrs. Woodford L. Wilcox had with them Miss Helen Stinson and her fiance, Edward Center. They brought along their steins. Mrs. Wilcox wore an oyster gray brocade satin with long, tight sleeves that had tiny puffs at the top, and a pearl dog-collar. The gown had been worn by her grandmother at her mother's coming-out party. Miss Stinson was in a black gown, beaded in jet, with high neck and long sleeves, over which she wore an ivory brocade circular evening cape bordered with white fur.

YOUNGER SET

Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson was present, wearing a black gown. Mr. and Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr. (Anstiss Boyden) were among the younger set attending. Miss Frances Gardiner was at a table with a group of escorts. The Misses Helen and Elizabeth Jackson, wearing present-day attire, came with John and William Manuel and John Musser, who were beautifully decked out in long whiskers and wore gay carnations in their buttonholes and carried canes.

A very distinguished party occupying a large table included Arthur M. Wiggin, treasurer of the Symphony, and Mrs. Wiggin, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Hodgkinson, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Robinson, Dr. and Mrs. Delos J. Bristol, Mrs. Joseph A. Hall and Capt. Clarence A. Abele, United States navy. All members of this group were in costume. The ladies wore old time silks made with basques, some of them of soft gray striped silk, some having little beaded capes, and all wore flowered hats of the period of 40 years ago.

Miss Sally Fitzpatrick, one of the post-debutantes, wore her mother's handsome wedding gown of white lace and an old-fashioned flowered velvet cape. Miss Elizabeth Schulten of New York, who was with her, wore her grandmother's stiff brown silk with a very long skirt, and a brown velvet dolman evening wrap. Accompanying them were David Stone and Pryor Percival, both with the proper facial ornaments of the 90's.

Mrs. P. J. Kelliher wore an old white muslin and lace gown and an ermine collar. Two Radcliffe students, Miss Katherine Embree, in her great-aunt's plaid silk gown, and Miss Miriam Jasspon in another of her grandmother's day, both with appropriate hats, added to the picture. At another table were Miss Margery Hart in bicycle attire of sailor hat and plaid jacket with short skirt; Miss Nathalie Bartlett in historic silks with feathered hat; Miss Lillie Saxman in walking costume and pancake black hat; Thomas Shipman and George Wilkins.

The second of these Gay Nineties events will take place on May 18, and every one is requested to appear in costume.

A GALA NIGHT

Gay Nineties Program Proves Tremendously Popular

Bustles and beer, cake walks and bravas. Never was such a night since the "Pops" went conservative. It started when Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived early last night at the stage door in a horse-drawn barouche of the vintage of 1890, perhaps several years before that.

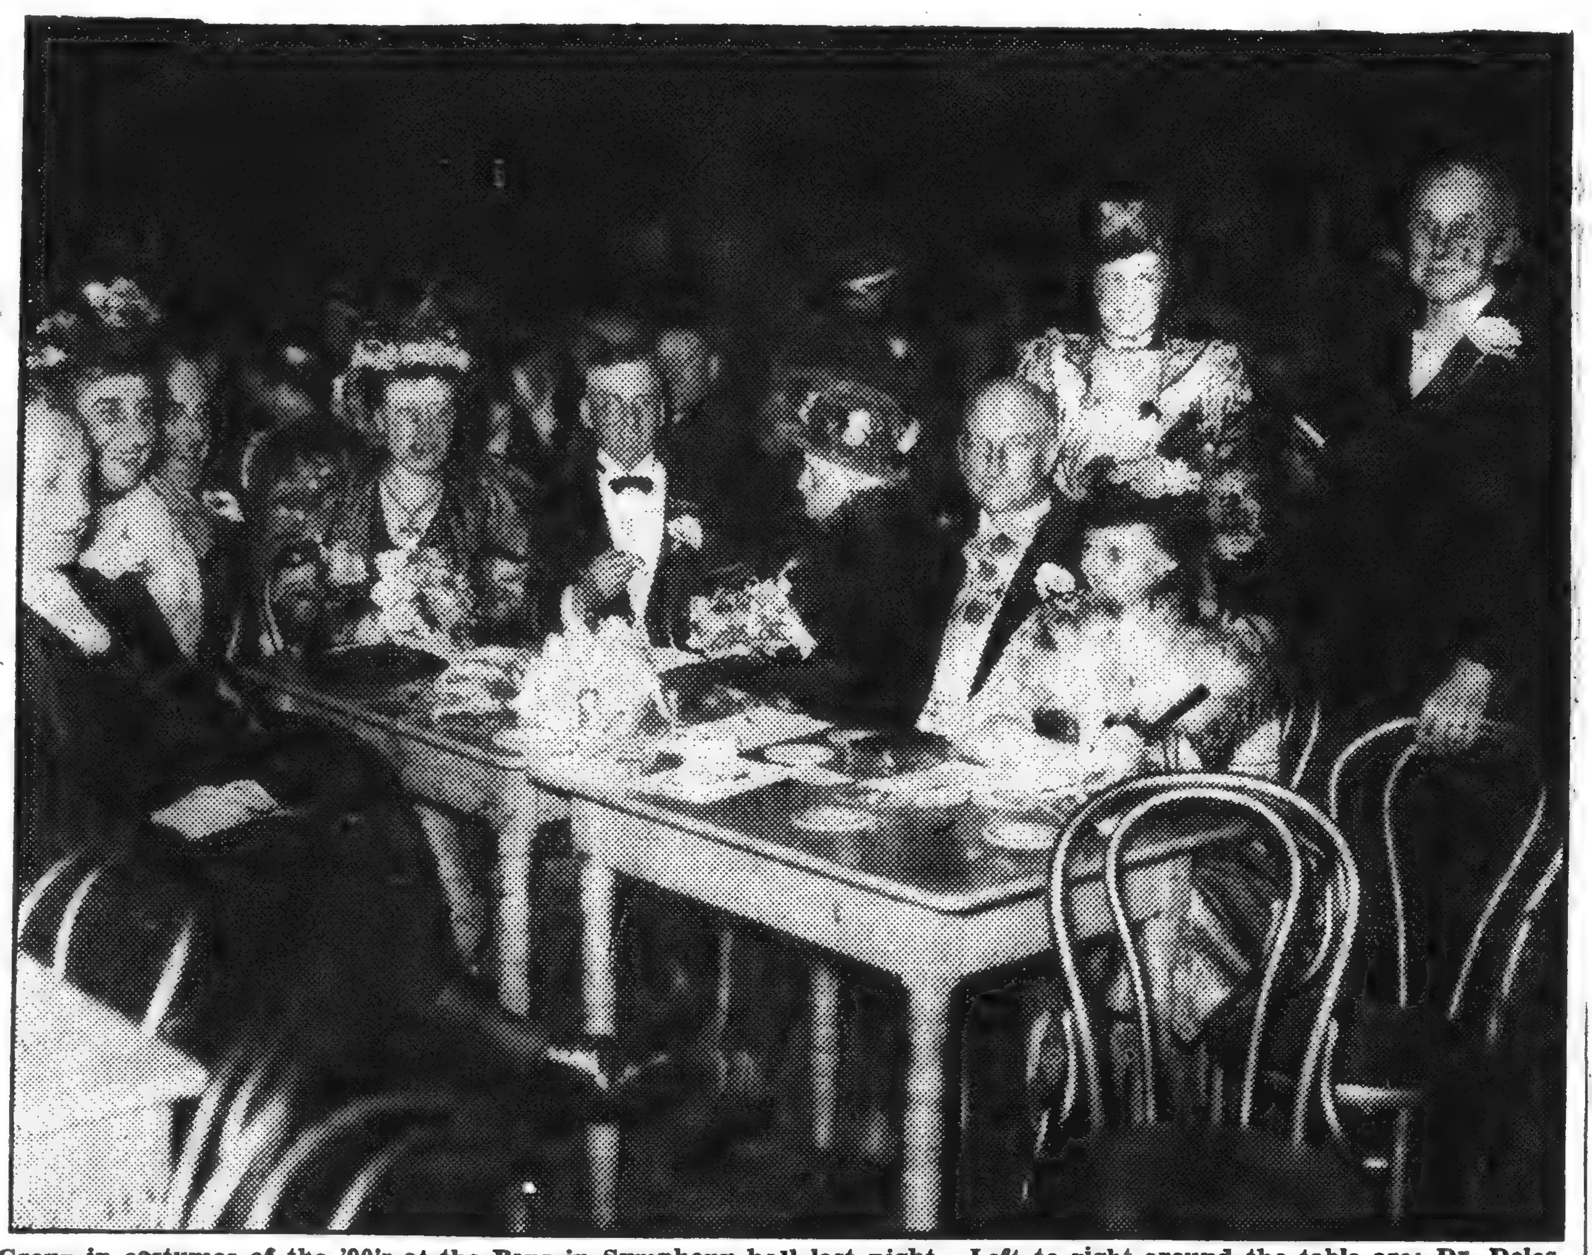
It gave a hint of what was to come as those within Symphony hall rose and cheered each group of quaintly if not always authentically costumed groups marching proudly to their table seats. It swelled in volume as Mr. Fiedler led his band into the martial strains of the first number, Schrammel's "Wien Bleibt Wien," and it reached a glorious crescendo when Timothee Adamowski, who led the "Promenade Concerts" in the seasons of 1891-94 mounted the podium and with that same magnetic, impressive and altogether graceful presence of years long gone, conducted a group of favorite selections of four decades ago.

Naturally, while it was a gala night for Mr. Fiedler, who, we suspect, inspired this novel and tremendously popular program, the spotlight belonged to Mr. Adamowski. Tall, dignified, wholly at ease, he conducted four numbers—Handel's immortal Largo from "Xerxes," for solo violin, harp and organ, with Messrs. J. Theodorowicz, E. Caughey and A. Snow; Offenbach's "Orpheus in the Underworld," Strauss's "An der Schonen Blauen Donau" and Gounod's Hymn to St. Cecilia. In the Largo the string sections stood as they played.

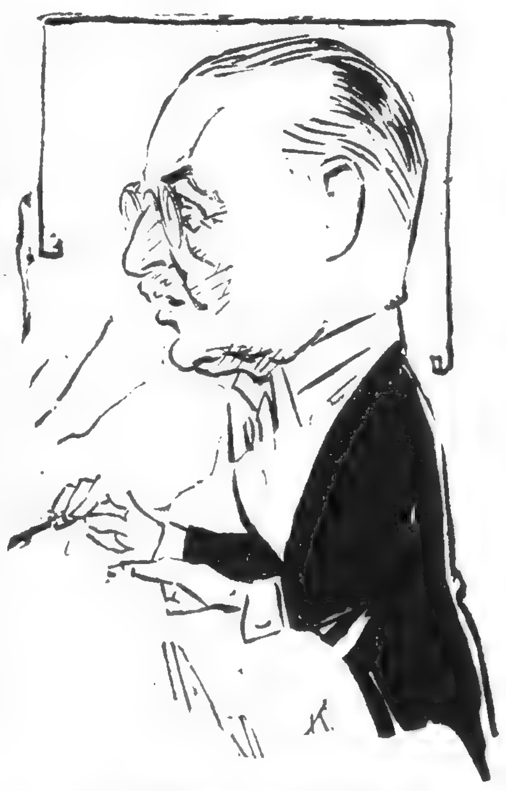
During all solo passages Mr. Adamowski was passive. And when "The Blue Danube" arrived he played the first measures on the violin, as Eduard Strauss, son of the great Johann, did many years ago, when his orchestra appeared in New York's Madison Square Garden.

Then Mr. Fiedler resumed command, with "The Pirates of Penzance," Kerry Mills's "At a Georgia Campmeeting," during which a couple in costume pranced up and down the centre aisle to that ingratiating tune; the sextet from "Florodora," a medley of popular songs of the '90s, and a "grand selection of song favorites," concluding with "Auld Lang Syne." It was positively amazing and enlightening to note how [illegible] of those present, including the [illegible] not only the airs but [illegible] these, from "After

SOME OF COSTUMES WORN AT "GAY '90's" AT THE POPS



Group in costumes of the '90's at the Pops in Symphony hall last night. Left to right around the table are: Dr. Delos J. Bristol, Mrs. Charles E. Robinson, Carl Hodkinson, Mrs. Arthur M. Wigging, Capt. C. A. Abele, Mrs. Joseph A. Hall, Charles E. Robinson, Mrs. Delos J. Bristol. Standing: Mrs. Carl Hodkinson and Arthur M. Wiggin.



TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI
Who conducted part of Pops concert last night.

Mary Melvins (left) and Eleanor Jordan, Radcliffe College girls in the style of the late Nineteenth century at the Pops concert in Symphony hall last night.

HOUSE ENACTS TUNNEL BILL; VETO IS ASKED

(Continued from Page One)

enactment, while Representatives Archibald M. Estabrook of Haverhill and George P. Anderson and Higgins of Boston warmly defended it.

Reardon branded it as a "$3,000,000

Filene's

EGGSHELL

GREY

SUNTAN

BEIGE

204

The Boston Dai

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 11, 1932

"POPS" REVERTS TO GAY NINETIES

Music, Manners, Even Costumes Of Last Century Paraded To Depict Decade

Mrs Victor H. Barwood and Miss Pearl Delebecque arriving at "Pops" with Arthur Fiedler, conductor, in old-time barouche.

"But you'll look sweet
"Upon the seat
"Of a bicycle built for two."

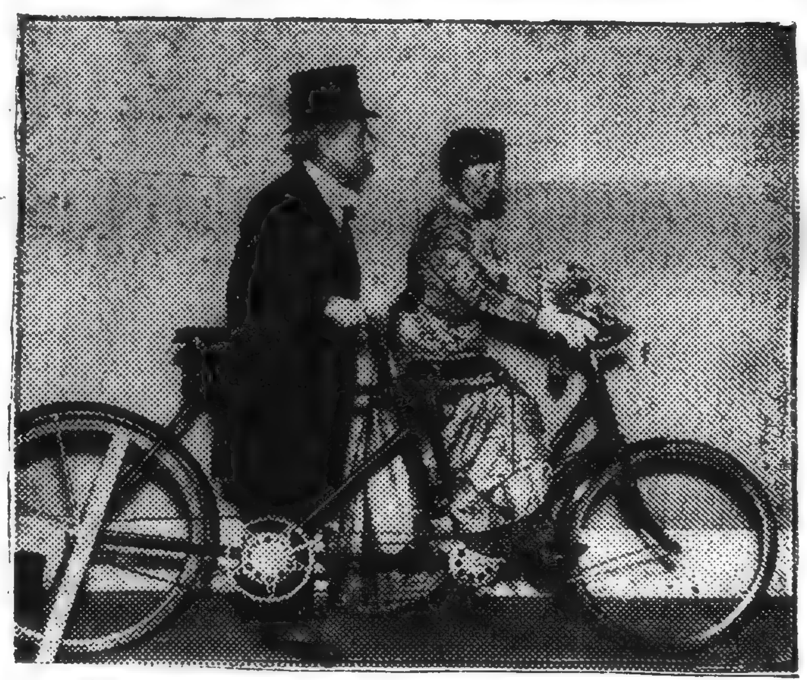
With the rollicking bicycle song "Daisy Bell" mixed with other glittering, sugary, frothy musical oddities and mediocrities of the "Gay Nineties," that strange decade went on musical parade at the "Pops" last night before the batons of Arthur Fiedler and Timothee Adamowski, conductors, with the result that the old generation became frankly sentimental, the middle-aged generation a little self-consciously amused, and the younger generation both amused and aghast.

The parade had costume, bicycle, carryall, dancing, and beverage effects, and was vastly enjoyed by an audience of all ages and in all manner of dress which packed Symphony Hall. Hundreds were turned away.

The Nineties was primarily the day of the bicycle, and the Boston Bicycle Club, headed by Dr Walter G. Kendall, attended 15 strong. Not to be outmatched, Conductor Arthur Fiedler posed with a silk topper and opera cane beside an old-fashioned carryall drawn by an aged sorrel

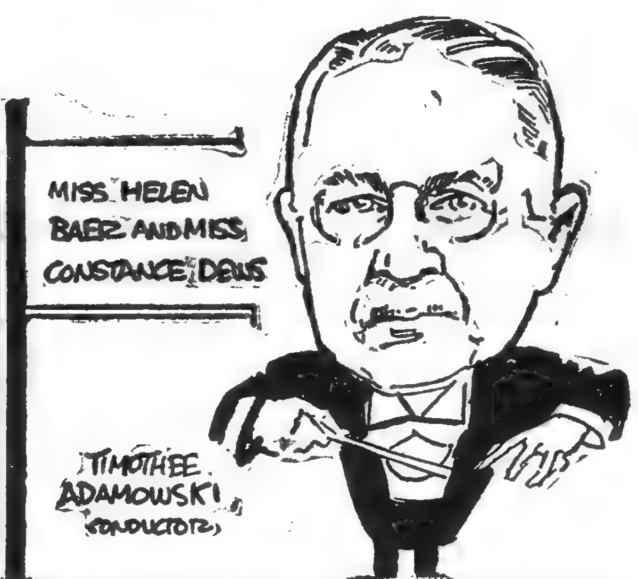
Continued on the Fourteenth Page

PERSONS, SCENES AND SIGHTS AT "GAY NINETIES POPS"

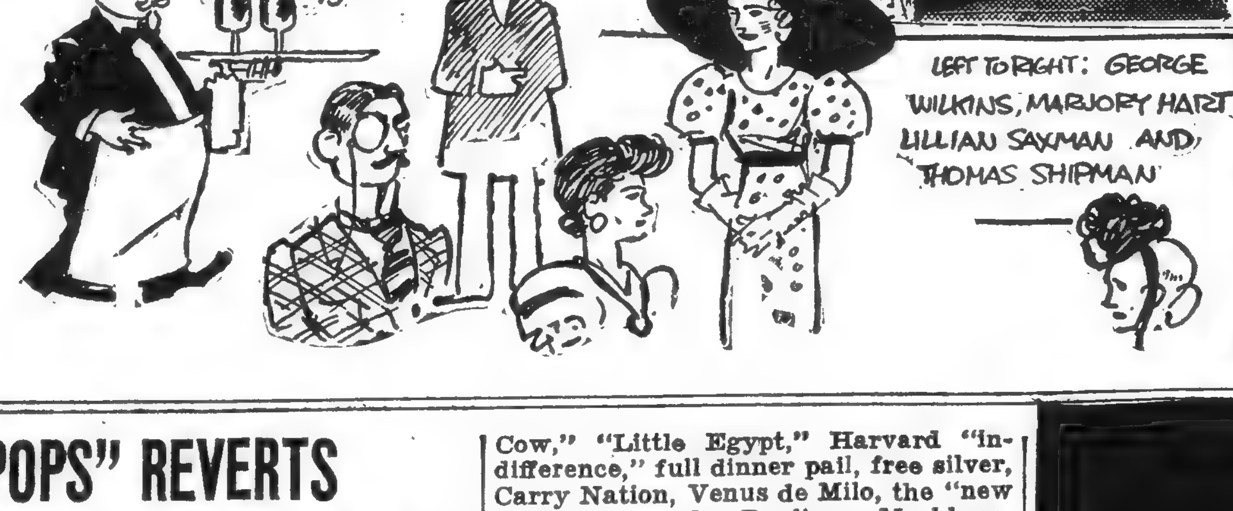


ARTHUR M. WIGGIN AND MRS CARL HODGKINSON

MISS HELEN BAER AND MISS CONSTANCE DEWS



TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI (CONDUCTOR)



LEFT TO RIGHT: GEORGE WILKINS, MARJORY HART LILLIAN SAXMAN AND THOMAS SHIPMAN

"POPS" REVERTS TO GAY NINETIES

Continued From the First Page

mare in which two "Gibson girls" were "ensconced," nosegay and all. Even the coach lamps flickered feebly!

Bikes "Checked Free"

In the entry one tandem bike and one high-wheeler were "checked free' in a bike stand. Throughout the hall were scattered groups in costume, which ranged from the drab era of mutton-leg sleeves, velvet and ribbons and Prince Alberts, mustaches, and Ascot ties to the full-bosomed, padded-shoulder era of "straight front" corsets, lace stocks, American roses, picture hats, feathers and frills and high collars, bow ties and dusters.

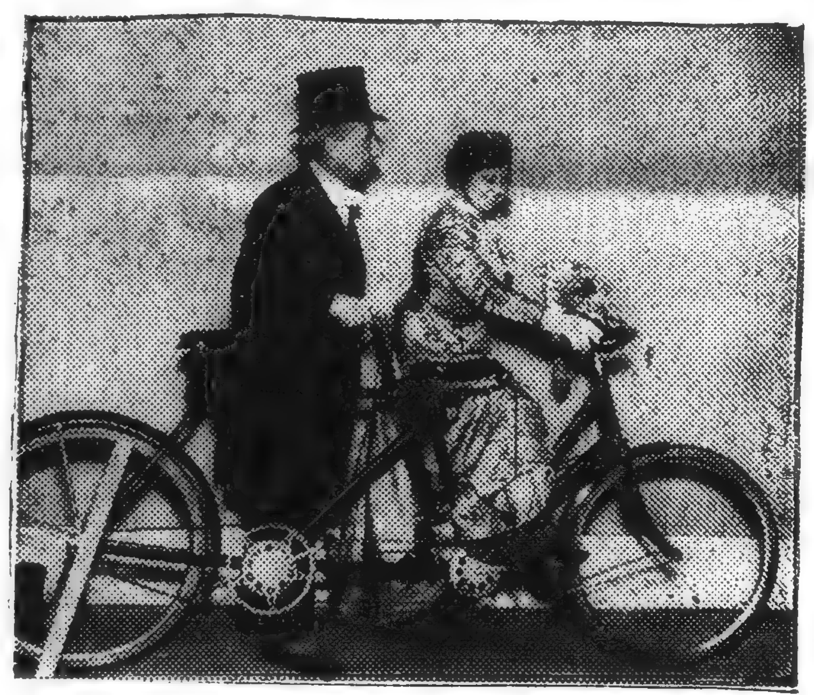
Waiters with white aprons and sideburns trod the hall with three seidels to a hand. Sitting in the midst of a hall, packed with gaffawing, cheering, stamping and humming crowd, one

Cow," "Little Egypt," Harvard "indifference," full dinner pail, free silver, Carry Nation, Venus de Milo, the "new woman," and Pauline Markham, "Venus" in Lydia Thompson's British Blondes troupe and in 1896 an unhappy old woman relegated to "bits" in the "Night Owls" burlesque, saying "They used to meet me at the stage door, too —I had plenty of admirers."

The Nineties was primarily the day of the bicycle, and the Boston Bicycle Club, headed by Dr Walter G. Kendall, attended 15 strong. Not to be outmatched, Conductor Arthur Fiedler posed with a silk topper and opera cane beside an old-fashioned carryall drawn by an aged sorrel

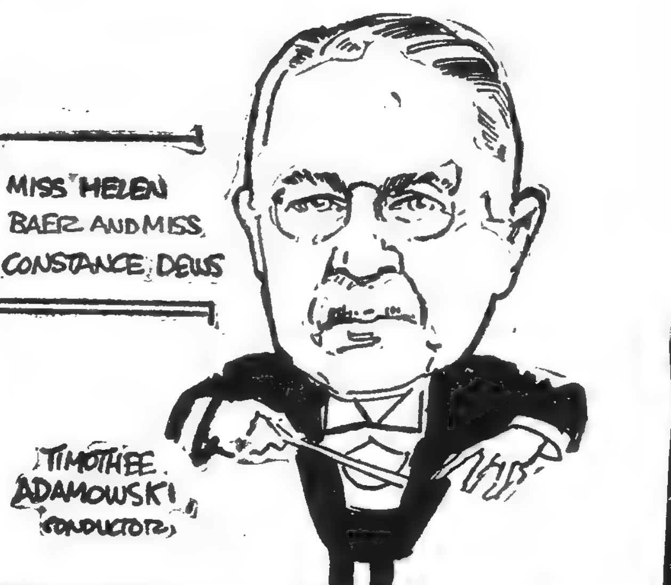
Continued on the Fourteenth Page

PERSONS, SCENES AND SIGHTS AT "GAY NINETIES POPS"



ARTHUR M. WIGGIN AND MRS CARL HODGKINSON

MISS HELEN BAER AND MISS CONSTANCE DEWS



TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI (CONDUCTOR)

LEFT TO RIGHT: GEORGE WILKINS, MARJORY HART, LILLIAN SAXMAN AND THOMAS SHIPMAN

"POPS" REVERTS TO GAY NINETIES

Continued From the First Page

mare in which two "Gibson girls" were "ensconced," nosegay and all. Even the coach lamps flickered feebly!

Bikes "Checked Free"

In the entry one tandem bike and one high-wheeler were "checked free' in a bike stand. Throughout the hall were scattered groups in costume, which ranged from the drab era of mutton-leg sleeves, velvet and ribbons and Prince Alberts, mustaches, and Ascot ties to the full-bosomed, padded-shoulder era of "straight front" corsets, lace stocks, American roses, picture hats, feathers and frills and high collars, bow ties and dusters.

Waiters with white aprons and sideburns trod the hall with three seidels to a hand. Sitting in the midst of a hall, packed with gaffawing, cheering, stamping and humming crowd, one had the entire decade laid out before him—he could hear it, see it and almost drink it.

It seemed truly an age of mediocrity, not as futile as the "eighties," not as grandiose as the "naughties." What little there was that was distinguished stood out in stark contrast like the morning star. "After the Ball" brought memories of the White City, for one, for that song was the hit of the truly great World's Fair. Handel's "Largo" brought Mr Adamowski in person to the podium for another.

Guest Conductor Digresses

Mr Adamowski, leader of the Promenade Concerts in the seasons 1891-1894 and 1903-1907, was allowed, as guest conductor, to digress into Handel and Gounod, bringing some measure of musical relief from von Suppe and Offenbach, the "white hopes" of opera bouffe in the '90s who seem in this age to be headed toward oblivion.

After conducting the orchestra in "Largo," he gave an encore of Pizzicato from "Sylvia." Then came Offenbach's overture from "Orpheus in the Underworld," which survives, with "Tales of Hoffman," from more than 100 complete stage-works. This was followed by Gounod's "Hymn to St Cecilia" as an encore. The next was Strauss's "Blue Danube Waltz." Mr Adamowski played a few snatches of the waltz on a violin, and the audience shouted its praise at the conclusion of the group. Twice Mr Adamowski was called back for bows and bouquets.

The remainder of the program was conducted by Mr Fiedler. It began with a march, "Wien Bleibt Wien," which had a drinking song flavor. Next was von Suppe's overture from "Poet and Peasant," with Mr J. Langendoen as 'cello soloist, and following, an intermezzo, "Loin du Bal" by Gillet, said to be a relative or forbear of the first oboe in the orchestra. The group was concluded with popular college songs.

Even a Cakewalk

Mr Fiedler's second group was comprised of the Sir Arthur Sullivan's overture from "The Pirates of Penzance"; the Florodora Sextet Song, a cakewalk, "At a Georgia Campmeeting," and a selection of song favorites, including "Daisy Bell." During the cakewalk a couple in costume danced up and down the main aisle.

The table of Elinor Hughes of the Boston Herald staff won first prize for herself and her guests. Miss Hughes was dressed in a beige silk dress with a lace collar, mutton chop sleeves, and hat weighed down with a gargantuan ribbon bow. One of the costumed gentlemen impersonated George Henschell, first director of the Symphony Orchestra. Also in costume but impersonating himself in a younger day was Arthur M. Wiggin, treasurer of the Symphony Orchestra, and a party of eight friends.

Mr Wiggin, who wore a Prince Albert, a cream-colored Ascot tie, a silk topper, and a white carnation in his lapel, with one of his guests, Mrs Carl Hodgkinson of Wellesley, whose skirts literally swept the floor, showed how the tandem bicycle was ridden for the edification of news photographers.

O the bowings and the scrapings from Mr Wiggin as Mrs Hodgkinson mounted the front seat!

Some Serious Moments

There was a good lot of nonsense at last night's concert, what between a festive audience, a conductor with his ear on the public's heartbeat, and managers and press agents. There also were serious moments.

There was Mr Adamowski's courtly bearing, and a baton that was graceful and measured. When he took a violin from one of the gentlemen of the strings to play once more the air of the "Blue Danube," there was a flash-back to the days of the old Music Hall on Hamilton pl.

There were moments to ponder over Strauss with his 500 waltzes and other dances, to consider von Suppe with his 210 stage-works, including 31 operettas, and to wonder if posterity that is so pitiless is also just.

But most of all, it was a night to view the 1890's, famous as they were for—

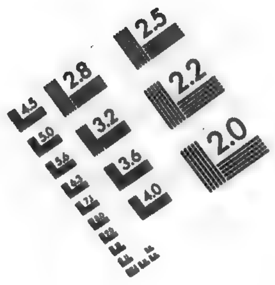
"O Promise Me," stationary rockers, cosy corners, souvenir spoons, the Midway, cracker-box parliaments, lodges, Navajo blankets, tandem bicycles, The Four Hundred, Sandow, Niagara Falls honeymoons, cat-tails, "Trilby," "the splendid little war," "The Rosary," better-road agitation, Laura Jean Libbey, "Don't cheer, boys, the poor fellows are dying," peacock feathers, celluloid collars, mission furniture, horse cars, the A. P. A., Mr Dooley, Sousa, Ella Wheeler Wilcox (Laugh and the world laughs with you), the Durrant murders, McDowell's Indian suite, Gelett Burgess and his "Purple Cow," "Little Egypt," Harvard "indifference," full dinner pail, free silver, Carry Nation, Venus de Milo, the "new woman," and Pauline Markham, "Venus" in Lydia Thompson's British Blondes troupe and in 1896 an unhappy old woman relegated to "bits" in the "Night Owls" burlesque, saying "They used to meet me at the stage door, too —I had plenty of admirers."

REDUCTION
RATIO
17x

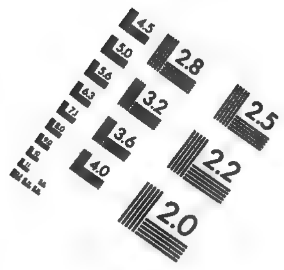
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

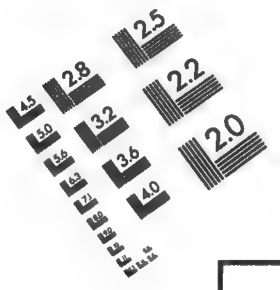


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
3.6
2.0
4.0
4.5



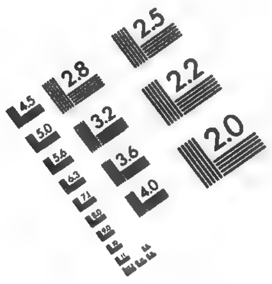
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

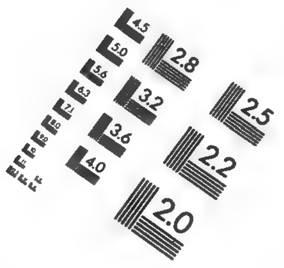


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
3.6
2.0
4.0

2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
3.6
2.0
4.0

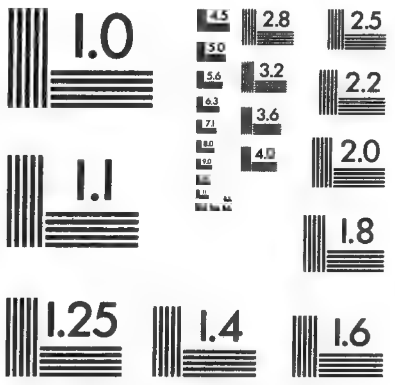


2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
2.8
2.5
3.2
2.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

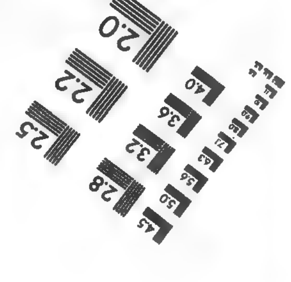
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

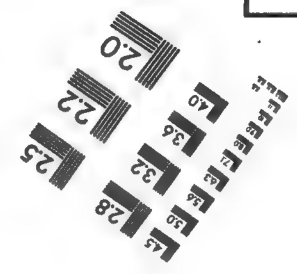


2.0
2.2
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.0

2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8

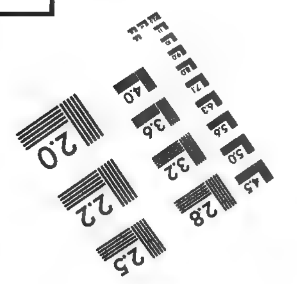
A4

A3



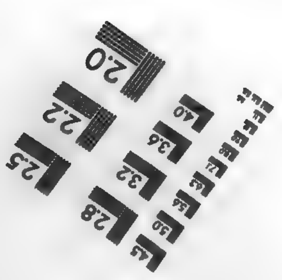
2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
2.2
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.0

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

POPS WILL GO BACK TO "GAY NINETIES" NEXT TUESDAY NIGHT

Popular Melodies of That Raffish Period to Be Heard Again, Old Steins Will Be Filled Once More (but with Near-Beer Instead of Guinness' Stout), and the Conductor Will Be Mr. Adamowsky, Who Recalls with Amusement His Historic Walk-Out at the Big Tech Blow-off When Roisterers Drowned Out His Orchestra—French Sleeves May Reappear

By CARL WARTON

A "Gay Nineties Night" will be staged at the Pops Tuesday night in an effort to bring back for the moment what everybody but the musicians themselves refer to as the "good old days." They were a trifle too raffish at times for the artists, what with beer drinking and all. Popular songs of the period, such as the "Georgia Camp Meeting," will be sprinkled liberally among the classics. The old steins which passed into obscurity with so-called prohibition will be dusted off and pressed into near-beer service. Ladies who used to frequent the Pops in the nineties and the early nineteen hundreds are requested to wear picture hats, French sleeves, basques and whatever of period finery they may have preserved.

What lends particular appropriateness to it all is the announcement that Mr. Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons of 1891-1894 and 1903-1907, will conduct one of the musical groups. That fairly completes the picture.

SOCIETY AGAIN TO RALLY AROUND OLD FAVORITE

Just how much gaiety (whoopee, we call it now) this crowd is going to manufacture out of near-beer and ginger ale remains to be seen. That will depend a great deal on individual ingenuity, we should say. But the very fact that Mr. Adamowski, one of the most popular of all the Symphony social lions, will conduct at the Pops for the first time in 25 years is significant. It means that the socially prominent who made him their rallying point in those days when Boston was trying to be fast, will be back at their tables on this occasion.

The years, especially those following the adoption of the 18th amendment have wrought a considerable change in this institution, now opening its 47th season. When these concerts started in the spring of 1885 in old Music Hall in Hamilton place they were modelled after the famous "Bilse" concerts in Berlin. Thus the German propensity for simultaneous beer and music was imported to America. For some years they were gay affairs, too gay, at times, for such artists as Adamowski.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra moved to Symphony Hall, in 1900, that auditorium also became the home of the Pops. It marked an epoch in the history of the concerts. The very atmosphere of Symphony Hall exerted a restraining influence on the beer garden idea to which Music Hall, in the heart of the city, so naturally lent itself. While the music was just as popular, more so, perhaps, and while beer and wines and light refreshments continued to be served as before, a little higher tone seemed to attach itself to the concerts.

HARD ON MUSICIANS

The musicians had a rather terrible time of it in the Music Hall days, despite the fact that the concerts were sponsored, in a manner of speaking, by the society leaders of the time. The audiences had boasted a considerable nucleus of genuine music-lovers who extended their support of the Symphony season into that of the Pops, or Promenade Concerts, as they were then called. But on the whole the patrons were beer-garden conscious. People in all walks of life, with an hour or two to kill, dropped in off the street to indulge in dignified bibbing and, whether by design or by chance, to receive those beneficences which is the lot of good music to endow.

With Guiness's Stout, Muir's Scotch ale, Culmbacher, Dog's Head, Foster's Bot and White Label at 25 cents a pint, Rhine wines at $1 a quart, and Haut Sauterne at $1.50, not to mention lobster salad at 25 cents, it is not hard to understand why gayety should have been the prevailing note. But where there is gayety there is noise, and at times the orchestra, accustomed during the Symphony season to rapt attention on the part of audiences, had to play lustily to overwhelm the cacaphony of chatter and laughter which filled the hall. It is said that Adamowski, on a morning after one of these concerts, picked up a paper to read the report of the performance. The headline was "Art Receives Its Tribute." The conductor frowned slightly and started to read the heading aloud: "Art receives" —he paused—" a kick in the pants!"

A STRICT CONDUCTOR

Adamowski has always had the reputation of being a strict conductor, a veritable czar in many ways. Inattention or any manifestation of bad manners on the part of the audience quickly aroused his displeasure. He was the epitome of dignity—a man of great personal charm and commanding presence. When he sharply rapped his baton and fixed his audience with an icy look there usually ensued an instant and appalling silence. Nevertheless he was a man with a rare sense of humor. His pique was only temporary and he frequently laughed over these ludicrous situations afterward. Of course, at the Pops, he tried, as do other conductors, to be more liberal and less exacting toward the audience.

The orchestra had its greatest difficulties on so-called college nights. Tech and Harvard used to take over the hall at least once every season and what with college and class yells the place was a bedlam. For the most part the musicians entered into the spirit of the occasion and managed to go through with their programs.

These affairs took place periodically throughout the nineties and all were the scenes of great gayety and high jinks. But the climax was not reached until the early nineteen-hundreds. The wildest night of all it appears took place in 1903, at Symphony hall.

Harvard started it with their "Graduates Night." The floor was entirely reserved for the various classes, the women looking on from the balcony. The classes vied with one another in setting table upon table thus erecting towering monuments to the quivering peak of which some grad made his precarious way, there to flaunt in triumph the class banner.

THE BIG BLOW-OFF

Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra peered out upon these spectacles with misgivings, but grimly stuck to the task in hand, doing the best they could by those immortals whose revered compositions they were there to interpret. Such classics as "Whistling Rufus, the One Man Band," and "The Good Old Summer Time," however, were received with fitting, even hilarious attention.

Shortly afterward came the big blow-off—Tech Night. Stirred to greater deeds by the example thus set them, the engineers came to Symphony Hall determined to dwarf the showmanship of their brethren from Harvard square.

Mr. Adamowski was prepared to compromise to some extent with his ideas about strict decorum while the orchestra was playing, but there was a point beyond which his liberality would not stretch.

The class of '03 led the yelling and the hall rocked with whoopee even before the concert started. The crowd subsided temporarily and there was comparative quiet during the first number. It was on the second, "Faust," that the lid was torn off. A dozen bars had not been played before every Tech man in the house spread wide his bazoo and completely engulfed the orchestra in a deafening chorus.

This was a little too much for Mr. Adamowski. He smote mightily with his baton. It was like popping corn at the battle of Verdun. At length the orchestra stopped playing and gradually the howling ceased.

There was a dignified pause during which the conductor calmly if reproachfully regarded the mob before him, then ordered his musicians to recommence. If he thought his audience had been rendered repentant by this gesture, he entirely missed the temper of the occasion. They were with him again, this time with whistling. Singing was bad enough as an accompaniment, but whistling was an unforgivable indignity.

Mr. Adamowski stopped his orchestra instantly and retired amidst a wild demonstration of "We are happy, Tech is hell, T-E-C-H-N-O-L," and so on.

Out in the corridor the conductor paced up and down struggling with his emotions. The manager of the concert and several spokesmen for the Tech group sought to persuade him to return. Meanwhile, all was hallaballoo within the hall.

Manager Comee addressed the multitude and finally succeeded in getting attention. He was tactful about it and, since he was dealing with a good-natured college crowd simply out for a good time, seemed in a fair way of getting better co-operation for the remainder of the concert, should it be resumed.

Despite everything, however, Mr. Adamowski was unmoved, and had it not been for a slightly unsteady grad who had been making terrific inroads in the world's beer supply, the concert might have stayed ended.

Nearly three-quarters of an hour had elapsed before it dawned on this particular celebrant that possibly his good offices might not be amiss. Perhaps he could straighten the thing out, whatever it was. Fired with this noble purpose, he rose from his table and with exaggerated dignity set out in search of the conductor. He found him eventually.

A NEW ARGUMENT

"May I ash, sir," he began politely as he rocked back on his heels, "why you do not continue-sh concert?"

The conductor was by now quite calm. His interrogator obviously was a gentleman, if tight. He replied:

"Because, sir, I cannot play with you men making all this noise."

"Yesh, I know sir," was the respectful rejoinder, "but don't you shee—we can't make all this noish with you playing!"

As we have said Mr. Adamowski possessed a sense of humor. At this unique representation a smile crept over his face.

"Well, well," said he, "that is a point of view I had not considered." Still smiling he announced that he was prepared to continue. The concert went on and while the hilarity of the occasion remained undiminished all went reasonably well to the end.

Today, however, Mr. Adamowski has only the pleasantest recollections of his conducting days in the Gay Nineties and the Naughty Nineteen Hundreds. He looks back with great amusement on those wild college nights when there was more Tech than Faust and more Harvard than Wagner. He has only praise for the present Pops and for Arthur Fiedler, the conductor who, he says, combines serious and light music admirably. He looks forward with pleasure to his reappearance at Symphony hall after a lapse of 25 years. So do his many admirers and friends.

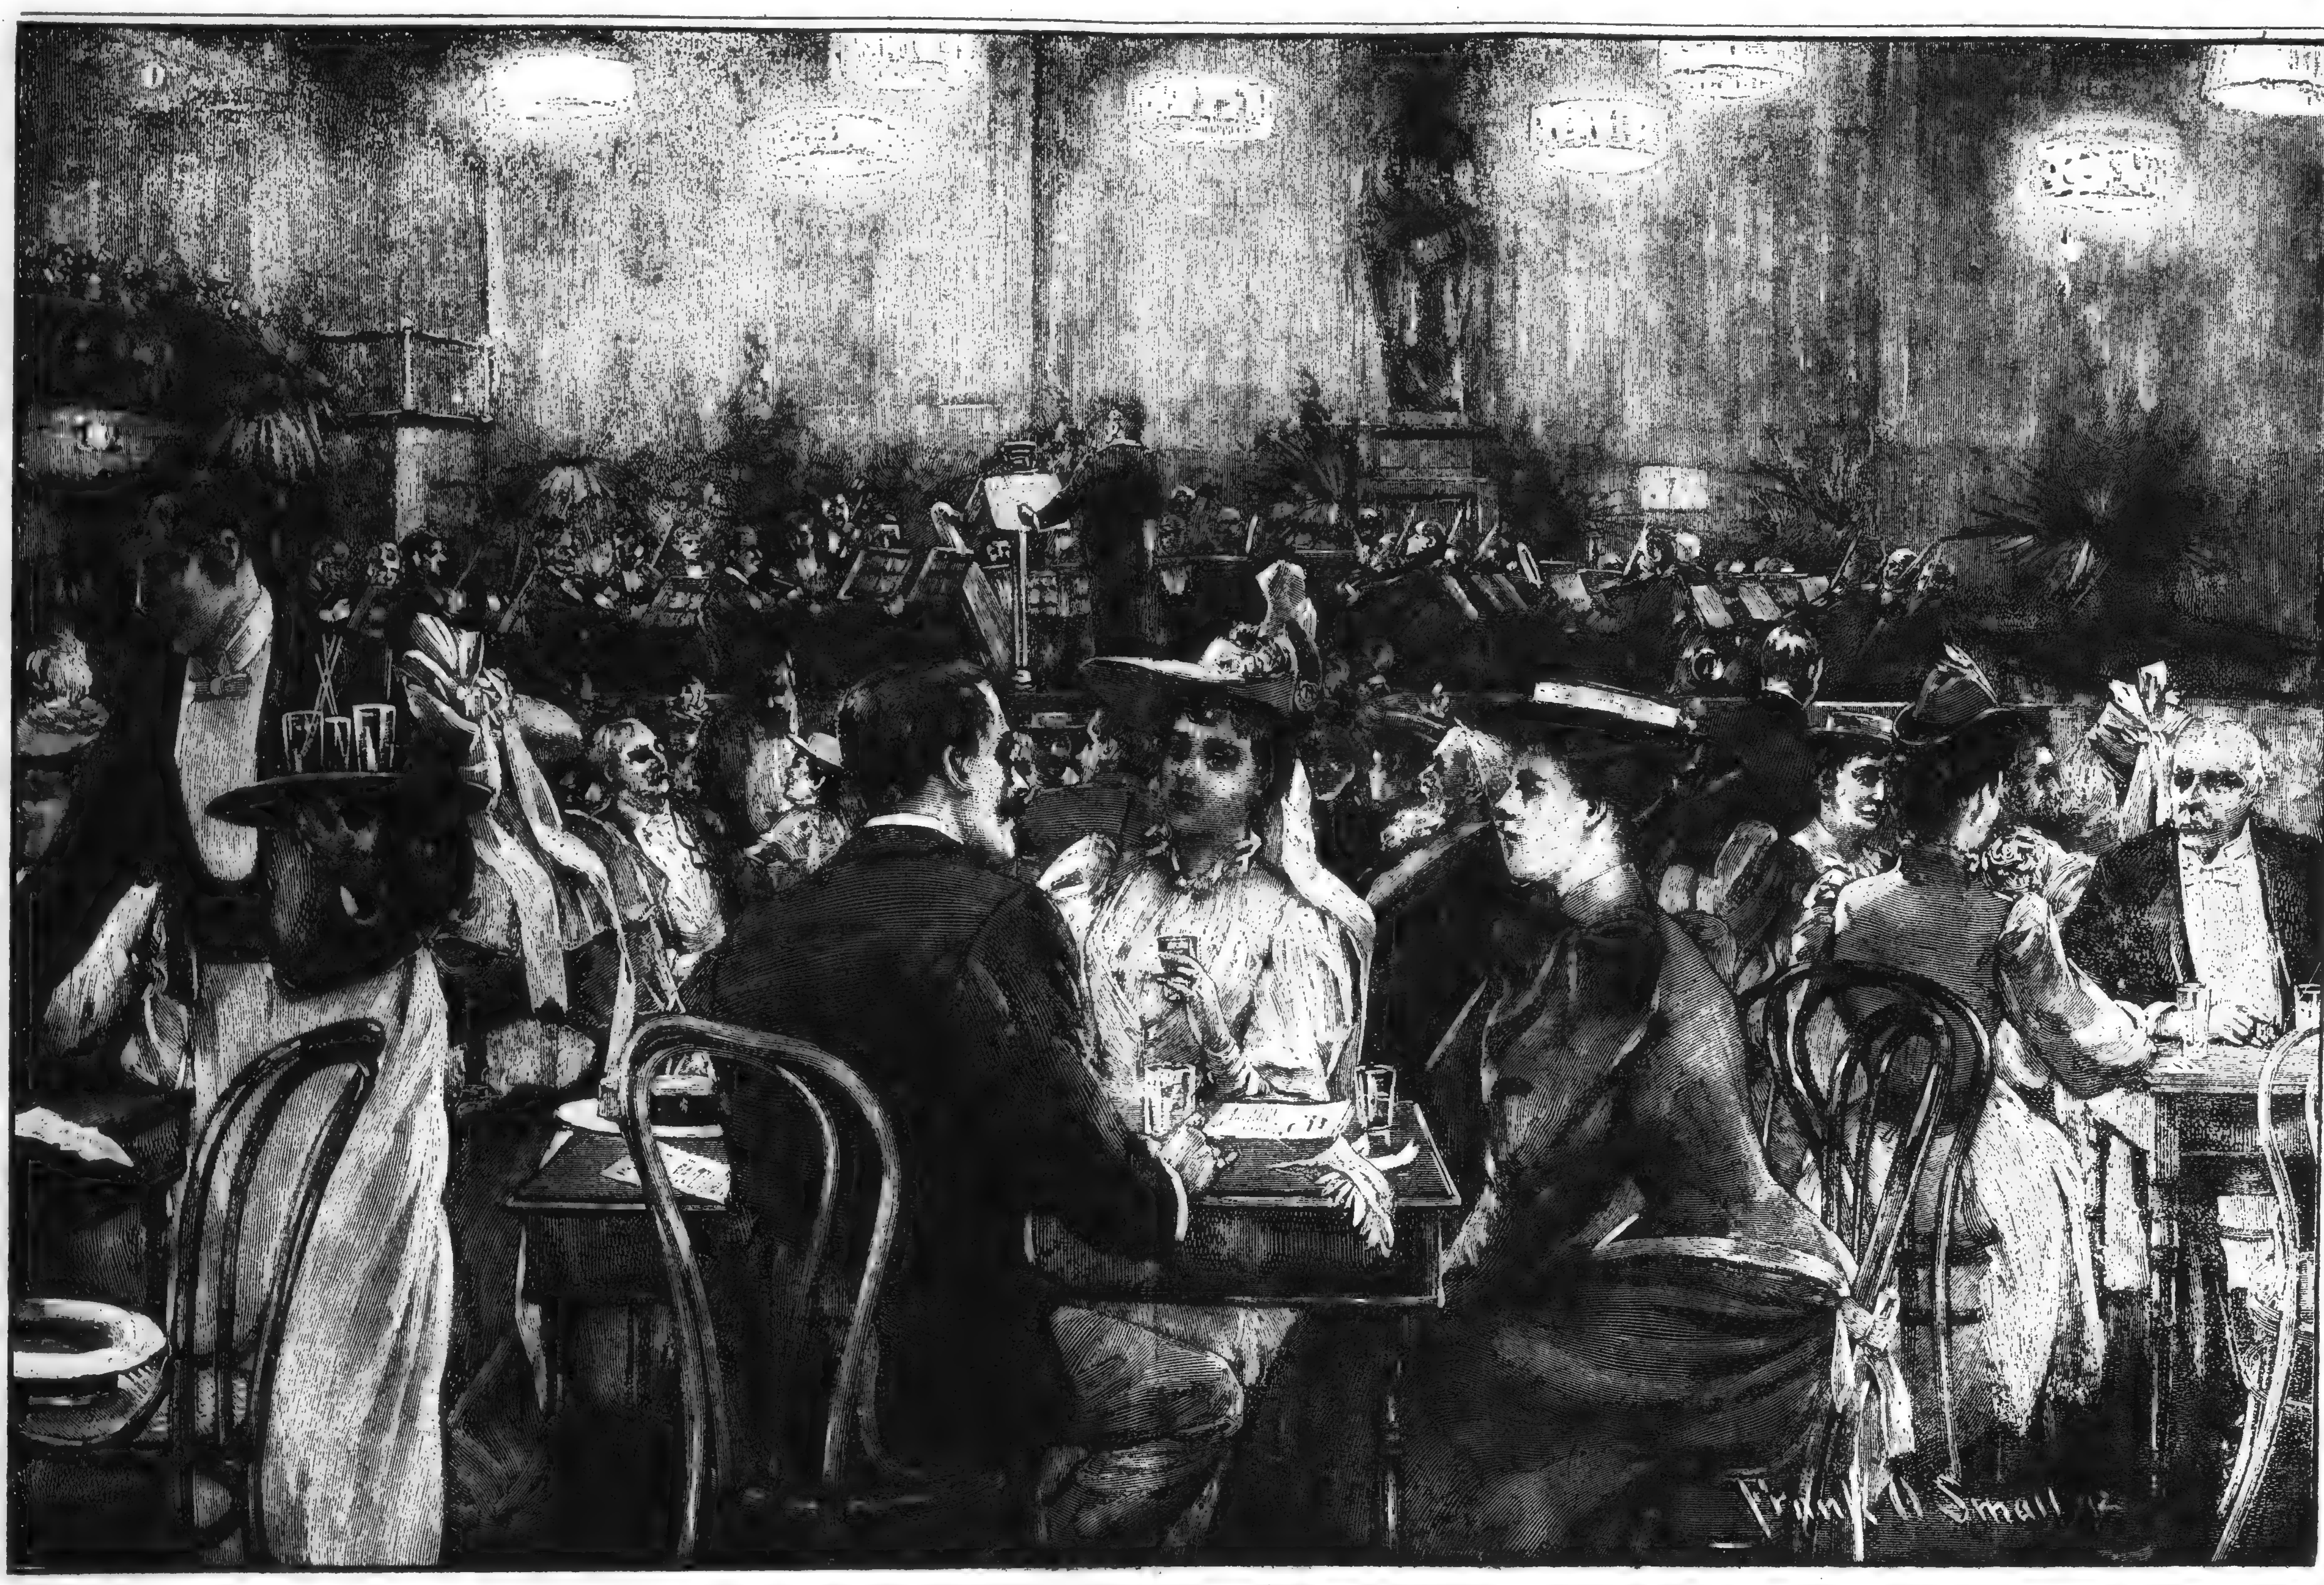
SPEAKING OF GOWNS

There is one other interesting phase of the Gay Nineties at the Pops which Tuesday night's affair may or may not revive. It has to do with the ladies and we quote from an old scrapbook containing accounts of concerts of that period. This one was in 1894.

"There were two very attractive costumes. One was very stunning because of the wide shoulder effect. It was gamed through double bretelle ruffles flaring out over well stiffened sleeve pouffs. The gown was of that most fashionable of all summer materials, checked taffeta, in lavender and white. It was trimmed very daintily with lace insertion in a deep ecru. The skirt had three flounces about the bottom and flared gracefully. The bodice was simply perfect. It had a finishing circular basque of the silk setting out over the hips. Three graduated pieces of insertion trimmed the space between the bretelles, back and front alike, and the bretteles were formed by bias ruffles setting up smartly over sleeve tops, the sleeves themselves being in the French fashion.

"The hat was a wide brimmed affair of soft straw in buttercup yellow, trimmed with bunches of black violets with green stems. There were two mercury wings in burnished green and lavender and blue set up gracefully on each side of the crown."

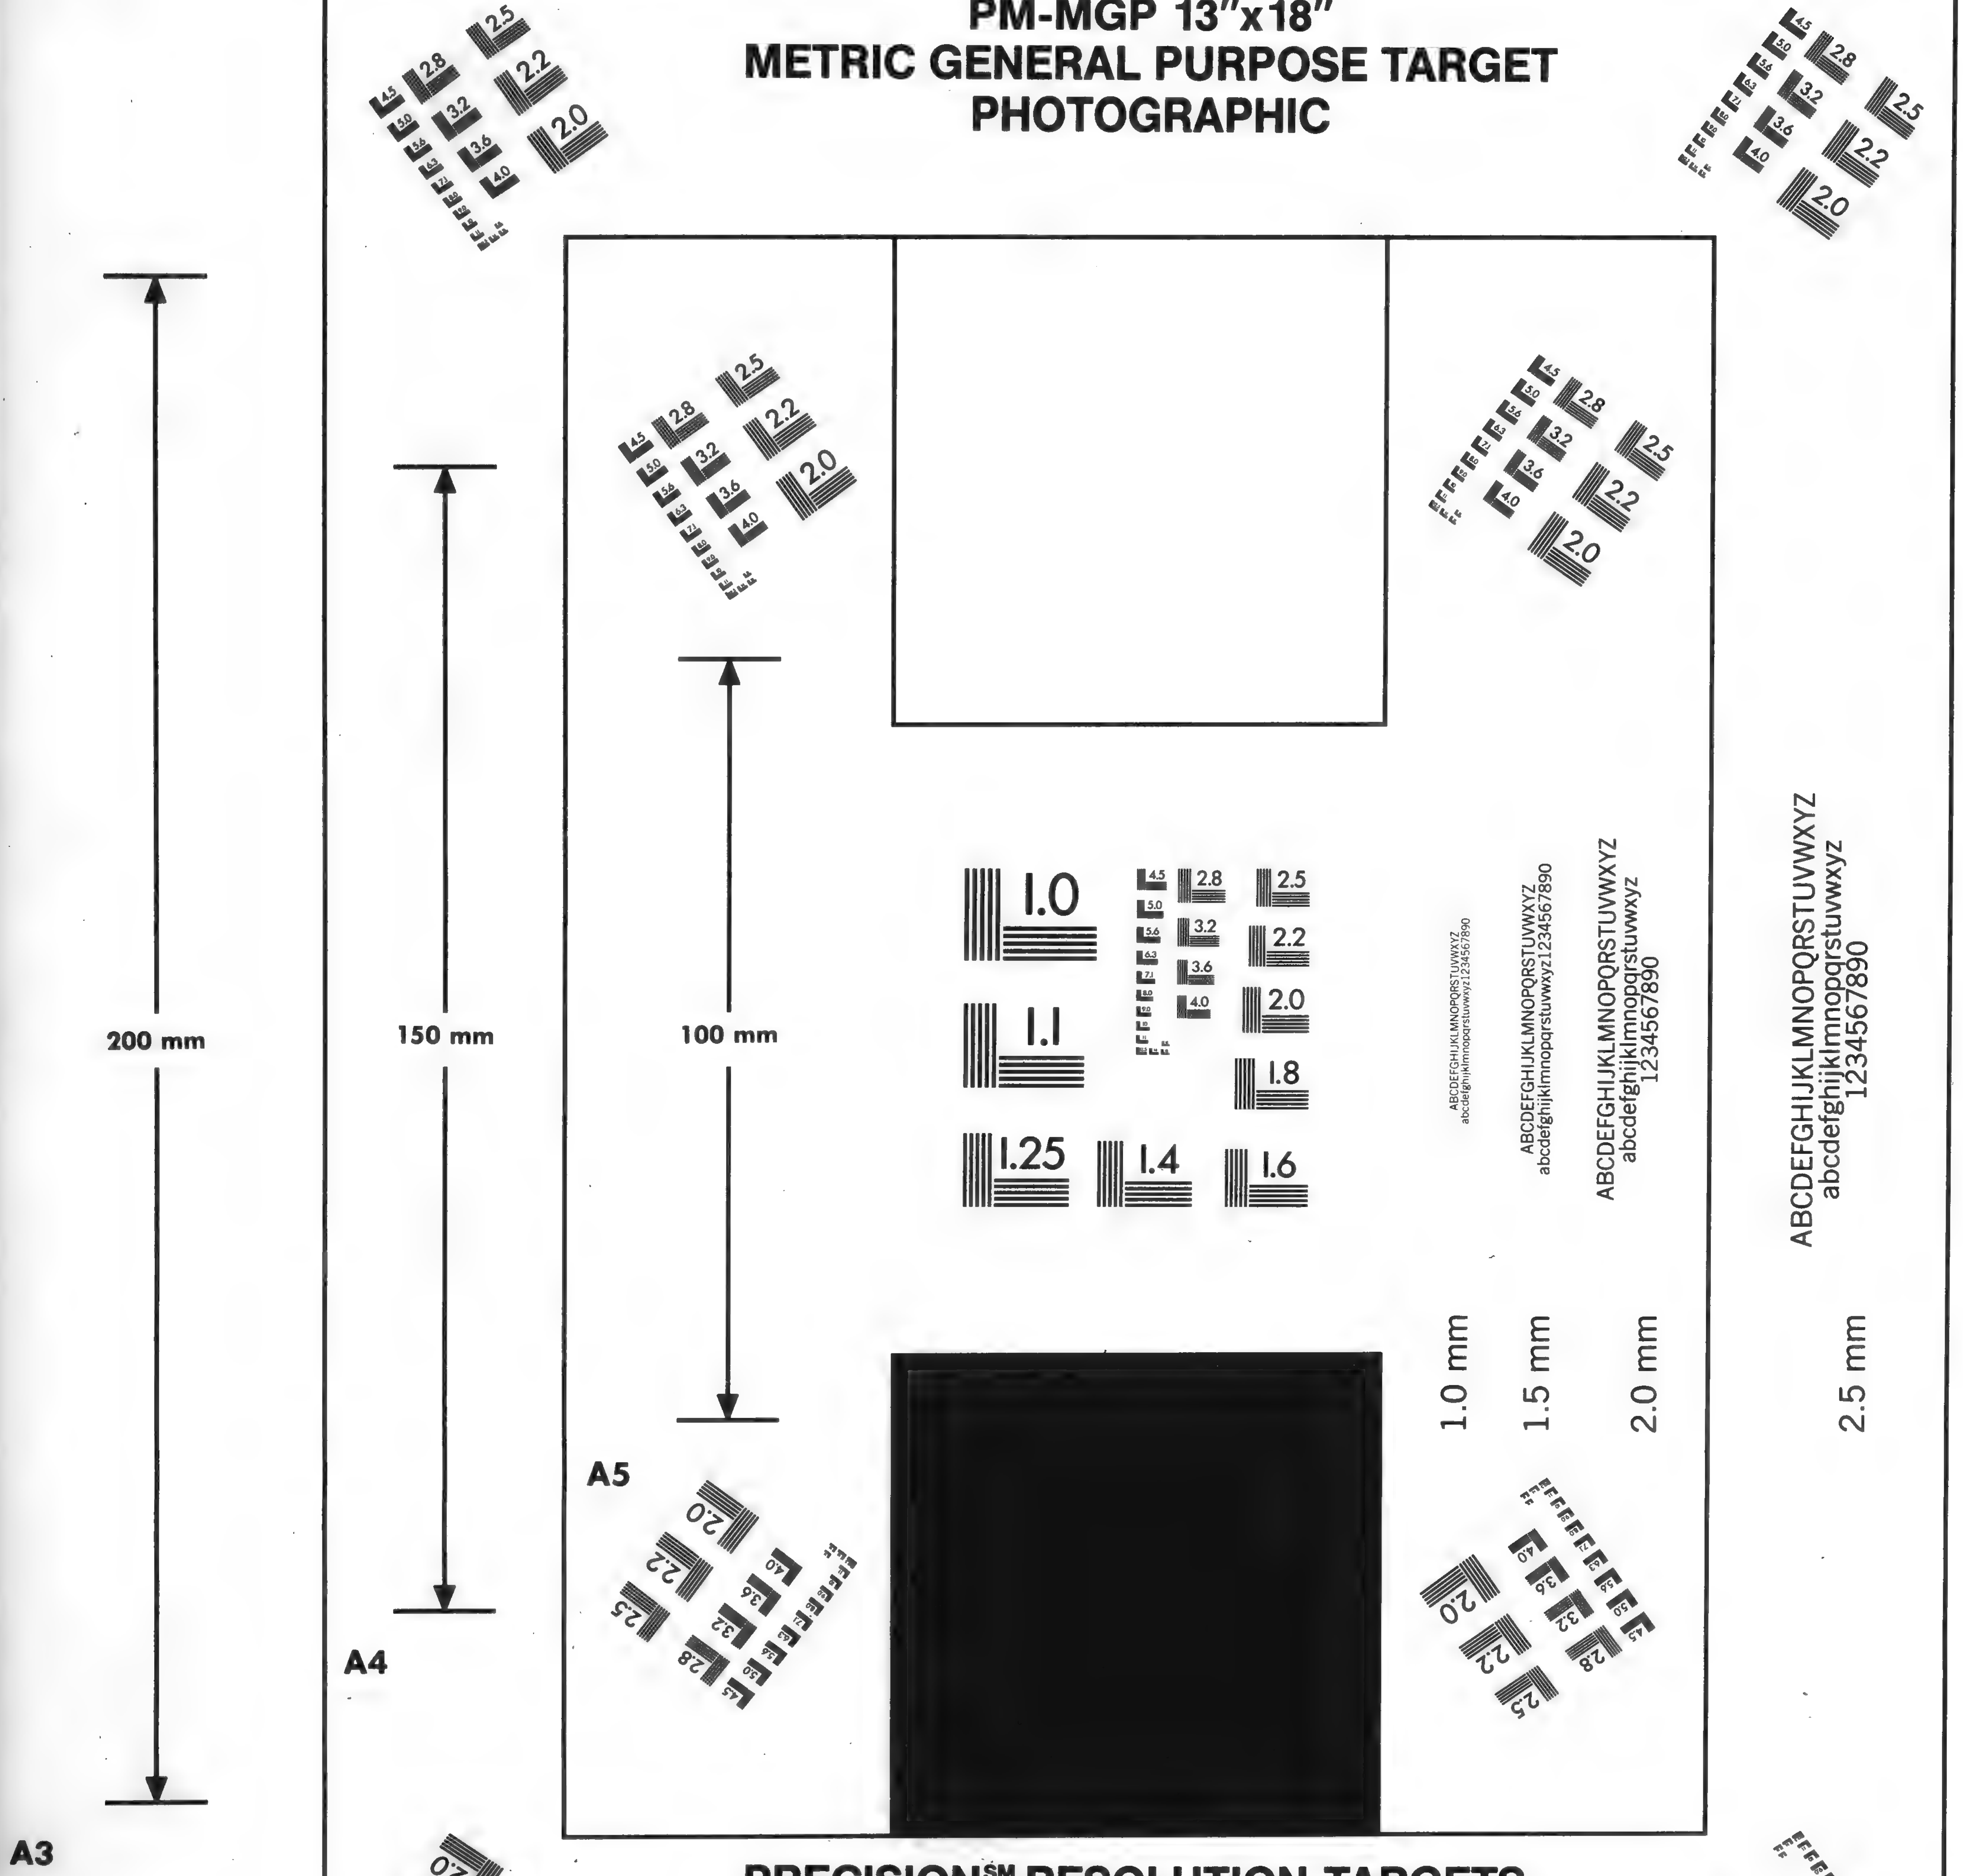
If milady is in doubt as to what to wear to this Gay Nineties Night, let this be a lesson to her. And—oh yes—the program says bicycles will be checked free! Nothing is said about roller skates. Perhaps they were not the vogue in those days. Or were they?



Boston Symphony "Pop" concert at the old Boston Music Hall in the gay nineties, as drawn by the staff artist of Harper's Bazar.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

POPS WILL GO BACK TO "GAY NINETIES" NEXT TUESDAY N

Popular Melodies of That Raffish Period to Be Heard Again, Old Steins Will Be Filled Once More (but with Ne Instead of Guinness' Stout), and the Conductor Will Be Mr. Adamowsky, Who Recalls with Amusement His Hi Walk-Out at the Big Tech Blow-off When Roisterers Drowned Out His Orchestra—French Sleeves May Reappe

By CARL WARTON

A "Gay Nineties Night" will be staged at the Pops Tuesday night in an effort to bring back for the moment what everybody but the musicians themselves refer to as the "good old days." They were a trifle too raffish at times for the artists, what with beer drinking and all. Popular songs of the period, such as the "Georgia Camp Meeting," will be sprinkled liberally among the classics. The old steins which passed into obscurity with so-called prohibition will be dusted off and pressed into near-beer service. Ladies who used to frequent the Pops in the nineties and the early nineteen hundreds are requested to wear picture hats, French sleeves, basques and whatever of period finery they may have preserved.

What lends particular appropriateness to it all is the announcement that Mr. Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons of 1891-1894 and 1903-1907, will conduct one of the musical groups. That fairly completes the picture.

SOCIETY AGAIN TO RALLY AROUND OLD FAVORITE

Just how much gaiety (whoopee, we call it now) this crowd is going to manufacture out of near-beer and ginger ale remains to be seen. That will depend a great deal on individual ingenuity, we should say. But the very fact that Mr. Adamowski, one of the most popular of all the Symphony social lions, will conduct at the Pops for the first time in 25 years is significant. It means that the socially prominent who made him their rallying point in those days when Boston was trying to be fast, will be back at their tables on this occasion.

The years, especially those following the adoption of the 18th amendment have wrought a considerable change in this institution, now opening its 47th season. When these concerts started in the spring of 1885 in old Music Hall in Hamilton place they were modelled after the famous "Bilse" concerts in Berlin. Thus the German propensity for simultaneous beer and music was imported to America. For some years they were gay affairs, too gay, at times, for such artists as Adamowski.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra moved to Symphony Hall, in 1900, that auditorium also became the home of the Pops. It marked an epoch in the history of the concerts. The very atmosphere of Symphony Hall exerted a restraining influence on the beer garden idea to which Music Hall, in the heart of the city, so naturally lent itself. While the music was just as popular, more so, perhaps, and while beer and wines and light refreshments continued to be served as before, a little higher tone seemed to attach itself to the concerts.

HARD ON MUSICIANS

The musicians had a rather terrible time of it in the Music Hall days, despite the fact that the concerts were sponsored, in a manner of speaking, by the society leaders of the time. The audiences had boasted a considerable nucleus of genuine music-lovers who extended their support of the Symphony season into that of the Pops, or Promenade Concerts, as they were then called. But on the whole the patrons were beer-garden conscious. People in all walks of life, with an hour or two to kill, dropped in off the street to indulge in dignified bibbing and, whether by design or by chance, to receive those beneficences which is the lot of good music to endow.

With Guiness's Stout, Muir's Scotch ale, Culmbacher, Dog's Head, Foster's Bot and White Label at 25 cents a pint, Rhine wines at $1 a quart, and Haut Sauterne at $1.50, not to mention lobster salad at 25 cents, it is not hard to understand why gayety should have been the prevailing note. But where there is gayety there is noise, and at times the orchestra, accustomed during the Symphony season to rapt attention on the part of audiences, had to play lustily to overwhelm the cacaphony of chatter and laughter which filled the hall. It is said that Adamowski, on a morning after one of these concerts, picked up a paper to read the report of the performance. The headline was "Art Receives Its Tribute." The conductor frowned slightly and started to read the heading aloud: "Art receives" —he paused—" a kick in the pants!"

A STRICT CONDUCTOR

Adamowski has always had the reputation of being a strict conductor, a veritable czar in many ways. Inattention or any manifestation of bad manners on the part of the audience quickly aroused his displeasure. He was the epitome of dignity—a man of great personal charm and commanding presence. When he sharply rapped his baton and fixed his audience with an icy look there usually ensued an instant and appalling silence. Nevertheless he was a man with a rare sense of humor. His pique was only temporary and he frequently laughed over these ludicrous situations afterward. Of course, at the Pops, he tried, as do other conductors, to be more liberal and less exacting toward the audience.

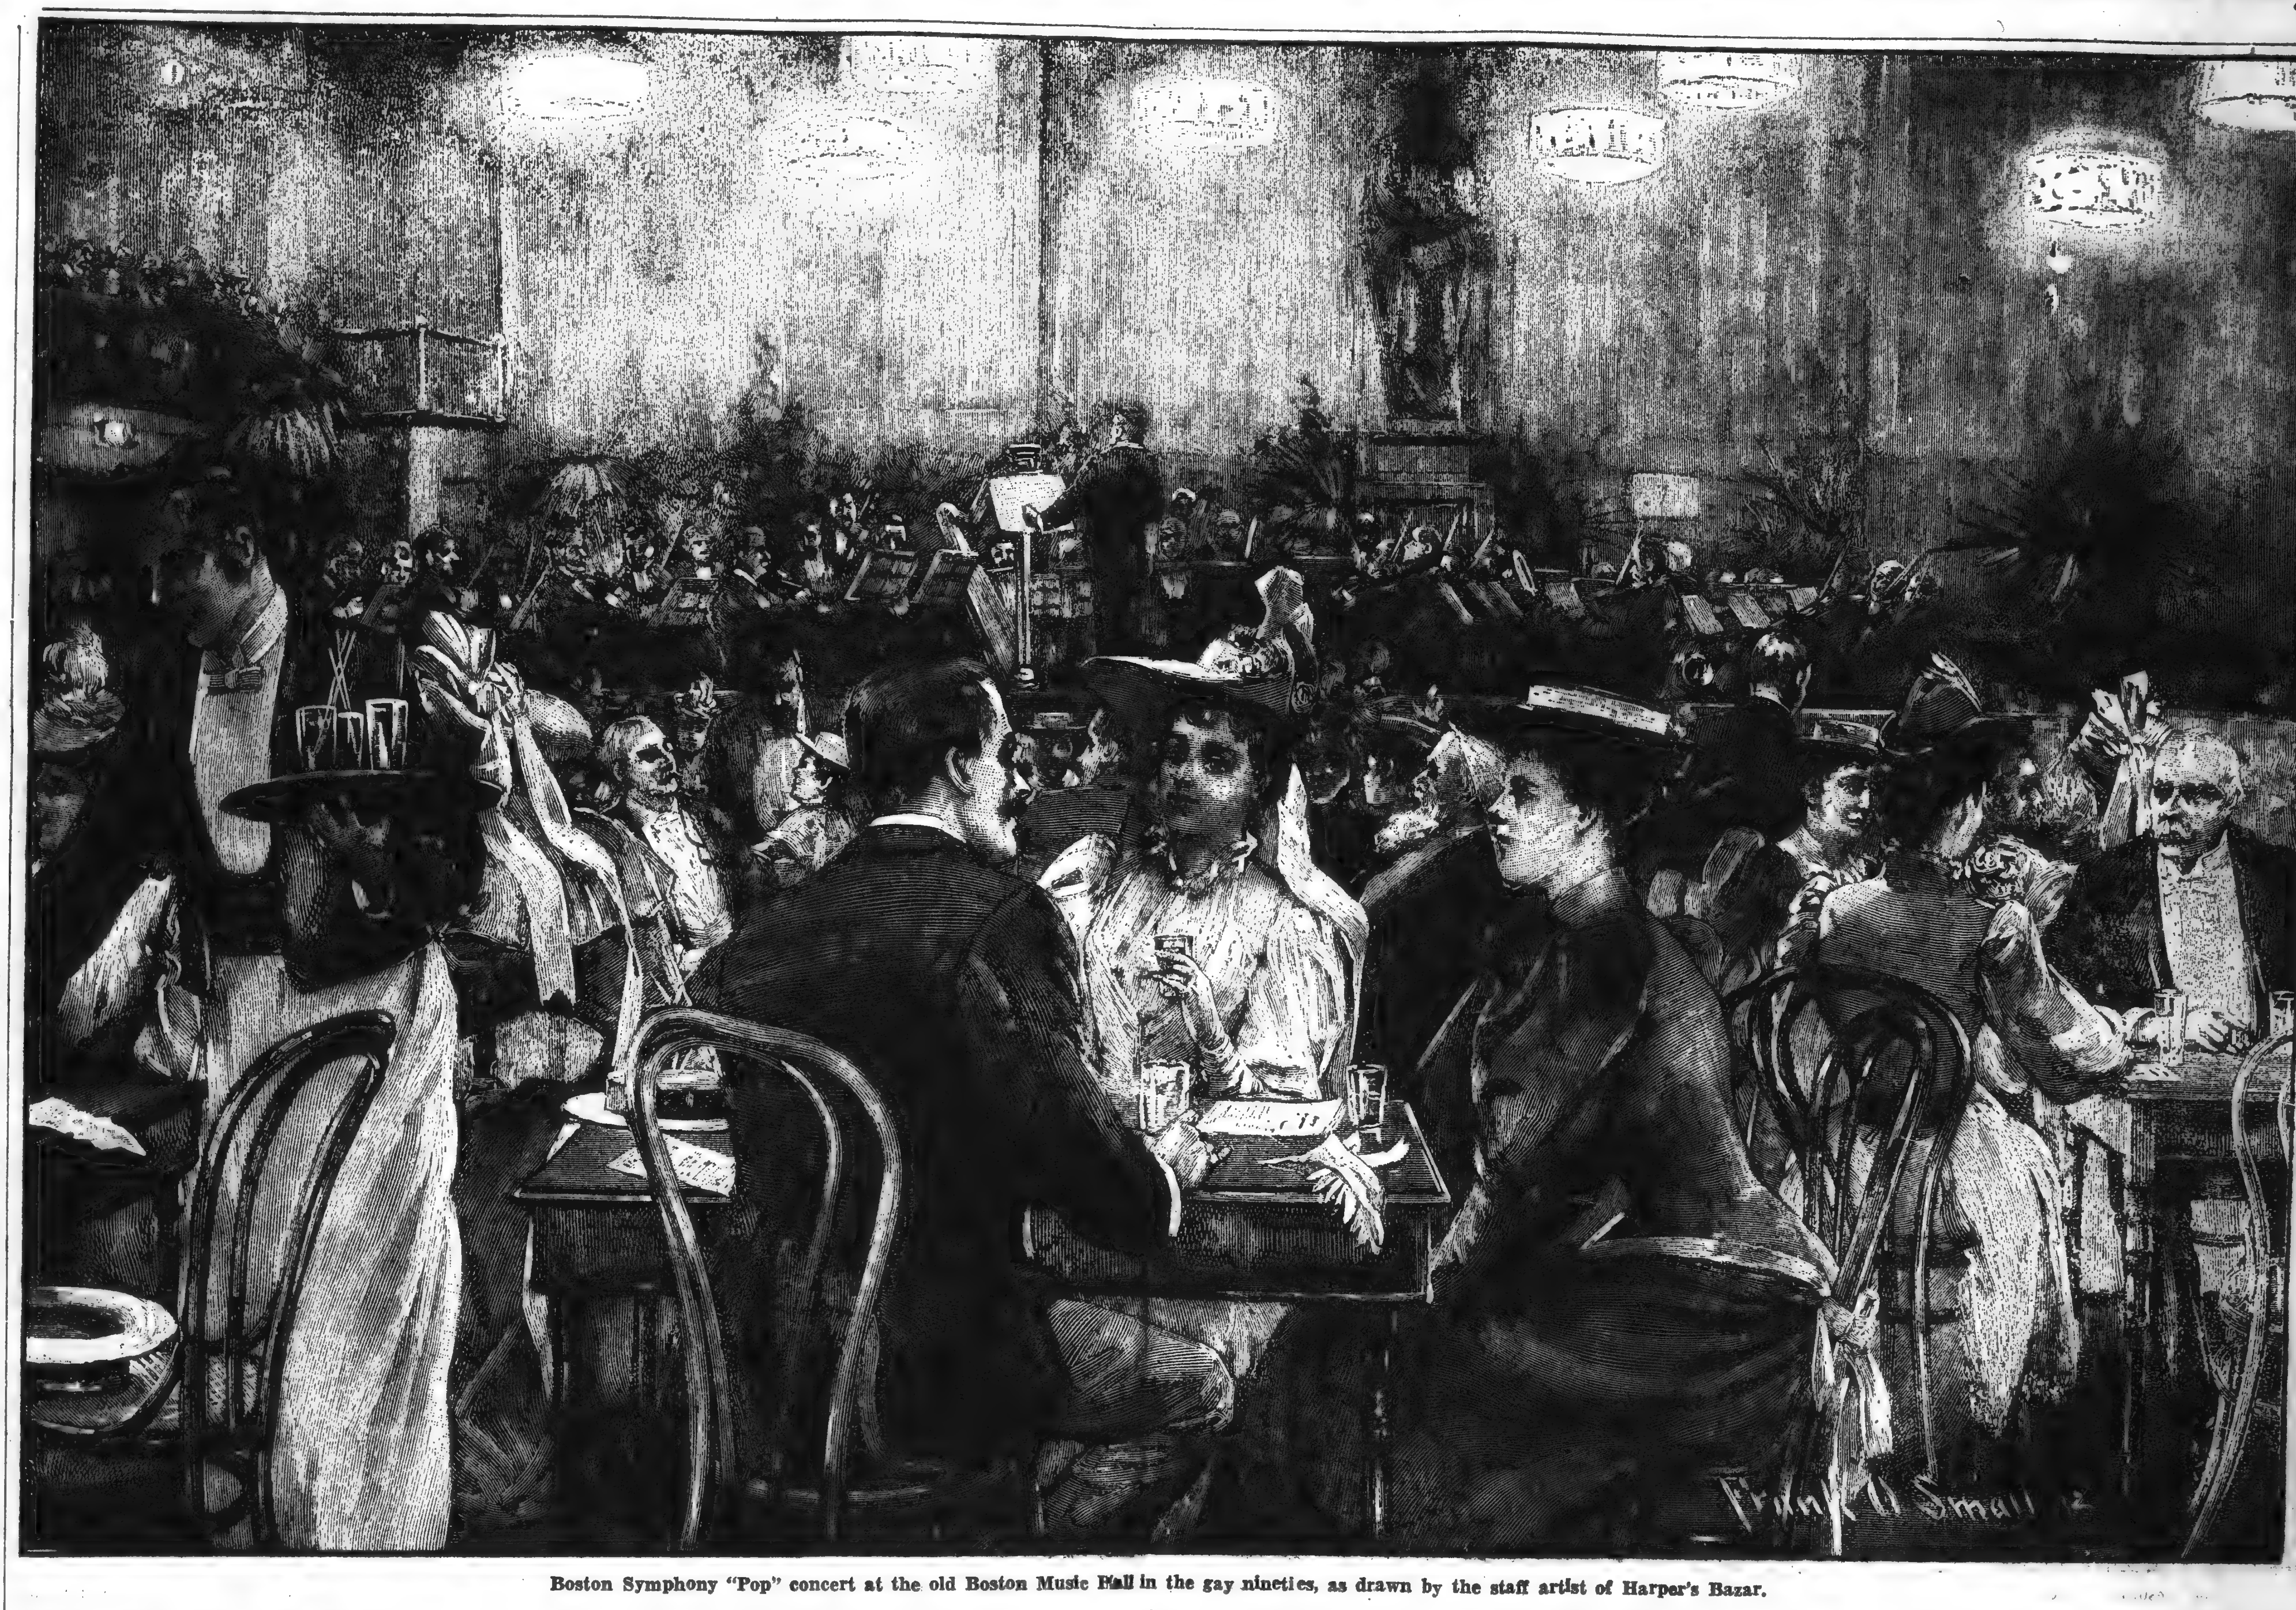
The orchestra had its greatest difficulties on so-called college nights. Tech and Harvard used to take over the hall at least once every season and what with college and class yells the place was a bedlam. For the most part the musicians entered into the spirit of the occasion and managed to go through with their programs.

These affairs took place periodically throughout the nineties and all were the scenes of great gayety and high jinks. But the climax was not reached until the early nineteen-hundreds. The wildest night of all it appears took place in 1903, at Symphony hall.

Harvard started it with their "Graduates Night." The floor was entirely reserved for the various classes, the women looking on from the balcony. The classes vied with one another in setting table upon table thus erecting towering monuments to the quivering peak of which some grad made his precarious way, there to flaunt in triumph the class banner.

THE BIG BLOW-OFF

Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra peered out upon these spectacles with misgivings, but grimly stuck to the task in hand, doing the best they could by those immortals whose revered compositions they were there to interpret. Such classics as "Whistling Rufus, the One Man Band," and "The Good Old Summer Time," however, were received with fitting, even hilarious attention.



Boston Symphony "Pop" concert at the old Boston Music Hall in the gay nineties, as drawn by the staff artist of Harper's Bazar.

Shortly afterward came the big blow-off—Tech Night. Stirred to greater deeds by the example thus set them, the engineers came to Symphony Hall determined to dwarf the showmanship of their brethren from Harvard square.

Mr. Adamowski was prepared to compromise to some extent with his ideas about strict decorum while the orchestra was playing, but there was a point beyond which his liberality would not stretch.

The class of '03 led the yelling and the hall rocked with whoopee even before the concert started. The crowd subsided temporarily and there was comparative quiet during the first number. It was on the second, "Faust," that the lid was torn off. A dozen bars had not been played before every Tech man in the house spread wide his bazoo and completely engulfed the orchestra in a deafening chorus.

This was a little too much for Mr. Adamowski. He smote mightily with his baton. It was like popping corn at the battle of Verdun. At length the orchestra stopped playing and gradually the howling ceased.

There was a dignified pause during which the conductor calmly if reproachfully regarded the mob before him, then ordered his musicians to recommence. If he thought his audience had been rendered repentant by this gesture, he entirely missed the temper of the occasion. They were with him again, this time with whistling. Singing was bad enough as an accompaniment, but whistling was an unforgivable indignity.

Mr. Adamowski stopped his orchestra instantly and retired amidst a wild demonstration of "We are happy, Tech is hell, T-E-C-H-N-O-L," and so on.

Out in the corridor the conductor paced up and down struggling with his emotions. The manager of the concert and several spokesmen for the Tech group sought to persuade him to return. Meanwhile, all was hallaballoo within the hall.

Manager Comee addressed the multitude and finally succeeded in getting attention. He was tactful about it and, since he was dealing with a good-natured college crowd simply out for a good time, seemed in a fair way of getting better co-operation for the remainder of the concert, should it be resumed.

Despite everything, however, Mr. Adamowski was unmoved, and had it not been for a slightly unsteady grad who had been making te world's beer supply
have stayed ended.

Nearly three-quar
elapsed before it d ticular celebrant th offices might not be could straighten the it was. Fired with he rose from his ta gerated dignity set c conductor. He foun

A NEW AR

"May I ash, sir," h
he rocked back on h
do not continue-sh c

The conductor was His interrogator obvi man, if tight. He re

"Because, sir, I ca men making all this

"Yesh, I know sir,
ful rejoinder, "but can't make all this n ing!"

As we have said M
sessed a sense of hum representation a sm face.

"Well, well," said h of view I had not smiling he announced
pared to continue.
on and while the hi
sion remained undi
reasonably well to th

Today, however, M
only the pleasantest conducting days in and the Naughty N
He looks back with g
those wild college n was more Tech than Harvard than Wagne
praise for the presen
Arthur Fiedler, the c says, combines seriou admirably. He looks f ure to his reappeara hall after a lapse of his many admirers an

SPEAKING O

There is one other of the Gay Nineties a Tuesday night's affair revive. It has to do w we quote from an ol taining accounts of period. This one was

"There were two ve
tumes. One was very
of the wide shoulder
gamed through doubl flaring out over well pouffs. The gown w fashionable of all su checked taffeta, in lav
It was trimmed very d insertion in a deep ecr three flounces about flared gracefully. The ply perfect. It had a basque of the silk sett hips. Three graduated tion trimmed the spa bretelles, back and fro bretteles were formed setting up smartly over sleeves themselves bein fashion.

"The hat was a wide of soft straw in b trimmed with bunches with green stems. Ther cury wings in burnished ender and blue set u
each side of the crown.

If milady is in doubt wear to this Gay Nin
this be a lesson to her.
the program says b checked free! Nothing roller skates. Perhaps the vogue in those days.

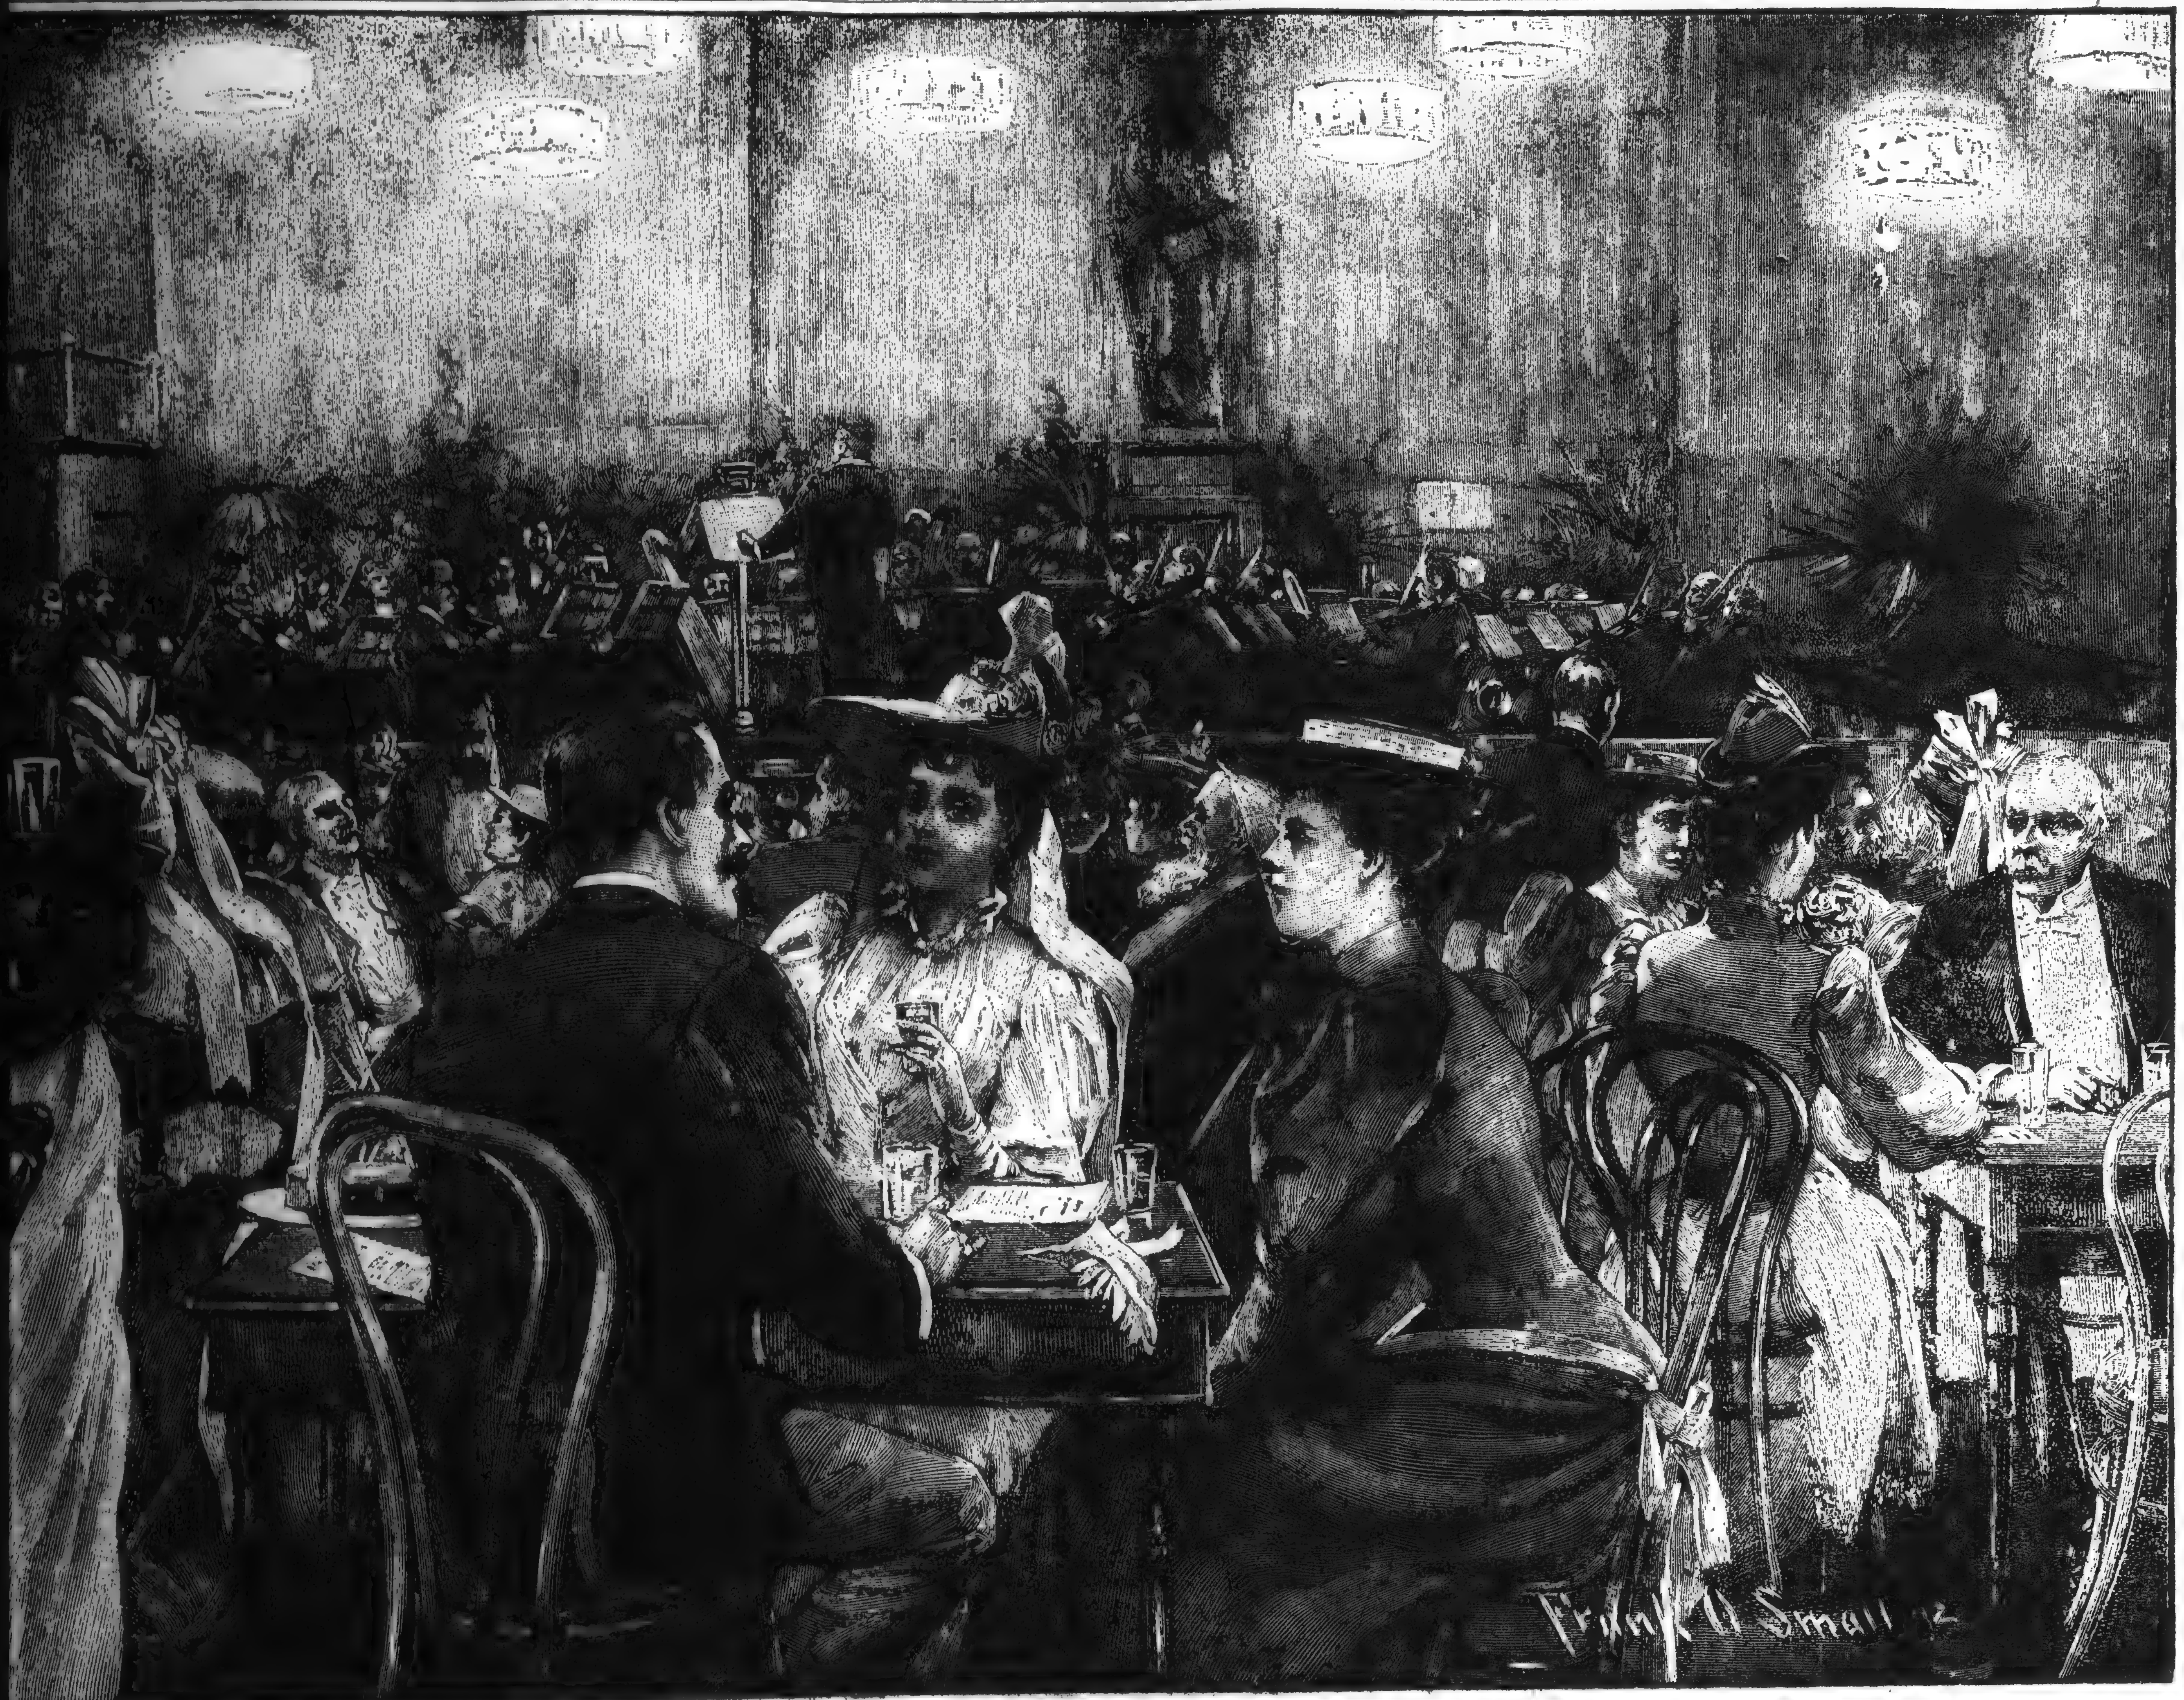
BACK TO "GAY NINETIES" NEXT TUESDAY NIGHT

affish Period to Be Heard Again, Old Steins Will Be Filled Once More (but with Near-Beer , and the Conductor Will Be Mr. Adamowsky, Who Recalls with Amusement His Historic h Blow-off When Roisterers Drowned Out His Orchestra—French Sleeves May Reappear



Boston Symphony "Pop" concert at the old Boston Music Hall in the gay nineties, as drawn by the staff artist of Harper's Bazar.

ived
n.
low-eater hem,
Hall
ship are.
com-ideas
hes-

tra was playing, but there was a point beyond which his liberality would not stretch.

The class of '03 led the yelling and the hall rocked with whoopee even before the concert started. The crowd subsided temporarily and there was comparative quiet during the first number. It was on the second, "Faust," that the lid was torn off. A dozen bars had not been played before every Tech man in the house spread wide his bazoo and completely engulfed the orchestra in a deafening chorus.

This was a little too much for Mr. Adamowski. He smote mightily with his baton. It was like popping corn at the battle of Verdun. At length the orchestra stopped playing and gradually the howling ceased.

There was a dignified pause during which the conductor calmly if reproachfully regarded the mob before him, then ordered his musicians to recommence. If he thought his audience had been rendered repentant by this gesture, he entirely missed the temper of the occasion. They were with him again, this time with whistling. Singing was bad enough as an accompaniment, but whistling was an unforgivable indignity.

Mr. Adamowski stopped his orchestra instantly and retired amidst a wild demonstration of "We are happy, Tech is hell, T-E-C-H-N-O-L," and so on.

Out in the corridor the conductor paced up and down struggling with his emotions. The manager of the concert and several spokesmen for the Tech group sought to persuade him to return. Meanwhile, all was hallaballoo within the hall.

Manager Comee addressed the multitude and finally succeeded in getting attention. He was tactful about it and, since he was dealing with a good-natured college crowd simply out for a good time, seemed in a fair way of getting better co-operation for the remainder of the concert, should it be resumed.

Despite everything, however, Mr. Adamowski was unmoved, and had it not been for a slightly unsteady grad who had been making terrific inroads in the world's beer supply, the concert might have stayed ended.

Nearly three-quarters of an hour had elapsed before it dawned on this particular celebrant that possibly his good offices might not be amiss. Perhaps he could straighten the thing out, whatever it was. Fired with this noble purpose, he rose from his table and with exaggerated dignity set out in search of the conductor. He found him eventually.

A NEW ARGUMENT

"May I ash, sir," he began politely as he rocked back on his heels, "why you do not continue-sh concert?"

The conductor was by now quite calm. His interrogator obviously was a gentleman, if tight. He replied:

"Because, sir, I cannot play with you men making all this noise."

"Yesh, I know sir," was the respectful rejoinder, "but don't you shee—we can't make all this noish with you playing!"

As we have said Mr. Adamowski possessed a sense of humor. At this unique representation a smile crept over his face.

"Well, well," said he, "that is a point of view I had not considered." Still smiling he announced that he was prepared to continue. The concert went on and while the hilarity of the occasion remained undiminished all went reasonably well to the end.

Today, however, Mr. Adamowski has only the pleasantest recollections of his conducting days in the Gay Nineties and the Naughty Nineteen Hundreds. He looks back with great amusement on those wild college nights when there was more Tech than Faust and more Harvard than Wagner. He has only praise for the present Pops and for Arthur Fiedler, the conductor who, he says, combines serious and light music admirably. He looks forward with pleasure to his reappearance at Symphony hall after a lapse of 25 years. So do his many admirers and friends.

SPEAKING OF GOWNS

There is one other interesting phase of the Gay Nineties at the Pops which Tuesday night's affair may or may not revive. It has to do with the ladies and we quote from an old scrapbook containing accounts of concerts of that period. This one was in 1894.

"There were two very attractive costumes. One was very stunning because of the wide shoulder effect. It was gamed through double bretelle ruffles flaring out over well stiffened sleeve pouffs. The gown was of that most fashionable of all summer materials, checked taffeta, in lavender and white. It was trimmed very daintily with lace insertion in a deep ecru. The skirt had three flounces about the bottom and flared gracefully. The bodice was simply perfect. It had a finishing circular basque of the silk setting out over the hips. Three graduated pieces of insertion trimmed the space between the bretelles, back and front alike, and the bretteles were formed by bias ruffles setting up smartly over sleeve tops, the sleeves themselves being in the French fashion.

"The hat was a wide brimmed affair of soft straw in buttercup yellow, trimmed with bunches of black violets with green stems. There were two mercury wings in burnished green and lavender and blue set up gracefully on each side of the crown."

If milady is in doubt as to what to wear to this Gay Nineties Night, let this be a lesson to her. And—oh yes—the program says bicycles will be checked free! Nothing is said about roller skates. Perhaps they were not the vogue in those days. Or were they?

Plays and Players ---

The Clothes, The Manners, The Numbers

To the Nineties Go The Pops, Mr. Adamowski Returns, Spirited Evening

NEVER before was there such a Pop Concert. Nor will there be another save only on the second "Gay Nineties Night," now set for Wednesday of next week. . . . At the entrance to Symphony Hall, if one chanced in from Huntington Avenue, signs and wonders began. Across the lobby against the back wall stood a bicycle rack. Out of recollection as well as wood, the carpenter had made it. It was very like the real thing. In it, moreover, bicycles were stabled—one a tandem, with Radcliffe College believably reported as country of origin. An upstanding specimen of the old high "wheel" companioned these "safeties." There was only to tilt it against the nearest radiator. But to the letter the management kept its word. "Bicycles checked free." And they were.

Next, at the box-office—if one was calling for reserved tickets—there was full regalia. A frock coat, discovered for the first time in many a young life, was the dress of authority. Between the lapels shone that marvel of tie-craft as the Nineties knew it—the Ascot, incomplete, and also undependable, until the wearer had thrust in the securing stick-pin. There is to report, however, a grave sartorial delinquency. Without a top-hat no frock-coat of the Nineties was complete. Even the ticket-seller at the circus wore it. cyed he tl black lines Hall, of the frock- crowned, Had it be Emanuel ton, migh out of his of New Y and pass

Passing since gen eras wer subjects, journalist by scores no ninet place at t servation advance. give reas . . . With Portly ma nowhere; cheeks wa of the rec how genui was also b for waitin glass—hap hibitionist Congress had brew afternoon it had been fetched in old-time kegs from Roxbury. Some said, behind their hands, that there was a faint "kick" in it. Possibly they were sharpening the tipple with nervous exhilaration.

Dress, however, before drink—dresses and millinery that were rare to see. Vast-brimmed "sailor-hats" held under the chin, little-girl fashion, by black elastic; less expansive "straws" from the back of which dangled sashlike ribbons; hillocks of bows; tilted saucers for small heads: at the other extreme befeathered "Gainsboroughs." (There was more than one way with this "Nineties" millinery.) And dresses with sleeves puffed above and tight below; with splotches of pink; with the austere lines proper to Gibson's man-like maidens; with short-waisted and gimp-trimmed bodices; even mauve-hued costumes. For if the Nineties were "gay," they were also the "mauve decade."

What a ransacking of trunk-rooms and store-closets had preceded the concert, with maybe an order or two for the costumer. Cousin Ellen had lent that—and remembered. Aunt Irene had proffered this— and looked away as she passed it from her youth to another's. The inclination to "dress up" is in us all. For these renewed Nineties, men caught the contagion. There were other Ascots beside that of the box-office; other tuftage than the waiters'; high and flaring collars very statesmanlike. Even retreats into earlier times when trousers ran tight down the legs and waistcoats were waistcoats, matching nothing but themselves.

From old programs at the old Music Hall Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Adamowski assembled the music that was occasion for this masquerade. In verbiage they kept to the ancient style—German titles for German pieces; courteous mention of "The Gentlemen of the Strings"; respectful request to the audience "to preserve silence during the performance of this number." Out came "Loin du Bal" in which we drive homeward sentimentally with the dance still echoing in our ears; the Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" then almost as new as our selection, the other evening, from "The Band Wagon"; a cakewalk from Georgia, illustrated a bit too politely by a pair in the middle aisle; priceless above the rest and as "extra" the Sextet from "Florodora," "Tell me, pretty maiden, are there any more at home like you." With a grain of imagination every listener—of the proper years—could see the swishing skirts, the black-buttoned boot-tops; could hear the tinkling voices. Nowadays we have only "selections"; but in the orotund nineties they were "grand selection." In this particular assemblage the bass tuba did prodigies of hoarse descent.

Mr. Adamowski's share was the middle division. Clapping and standing, audience and orchestra welcomed him to the conductor's stand and farewelled him from it. His long baton suggested a personal peculiarity. His slower tempi belonged to another day. Conductorial authority rather than the present good-fellowship looked out of his sidelong glance to assure a stilled audience. Handel's "Largo"; the Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus"; the "Blue Danube" waltz were his numbers. In the Largo, the violins played standing. In the waltz, the conductor borrowed the concert-master's violin and sounded a few measures after the manner of the Strausses themselves. There were "extras" as well; among them Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia." What syrup dripped softly into the ears of a desentimentalized generation!

It was Mr. Fiedler who brought the evening to climax. As "extra," he whipped out an assortment of songs from the nineties — "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," "The Bowery," "Oh Promise Me!" and many another. The audience took him at his word, carried the tune, if it did not always remember the words; at last found free outlet for the high spirits these two hours in bubble. You never can tell what an audience will do until you try it —especially a Boston audience. Next Wednesday comes the second test.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
MAY 11 1932

Bostonians Revive 'Gay Nineties'; Bikes and Bustles at Pops Concert

Boston, May 11 (UP)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near), last night, to relive a few hours of the Gay Nineties.

They crowded musically-historical Symphony Hall to be present at the Gay Nineties' night of the pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "the promenade concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived for the evening. So too were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Old Leader Returns

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra through some of the popular pieces of the decade. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube Waltzes."

But for sheer dramatic suspense the final notes of "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" as played by Paul Fido on his bass tuba exceeded anything offered by Fiedler or Adamowski. The audience, accustomed to hear the bass tuba as only a subdued "oompa-oompa" accompanying a melody, held its breath as lower and still lower notes, none the less pleasing because they were unusual, emerged from the gigantic horn's mouth. It seemed impossible that Fido could strike the final note, lower than all the rest. He paused for the effort and the great hall was still. Fido compressed his lips and blew. The note rumbled out, gloriously true. The audience sighed its r

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEARFIELD, PA.
PROGRESS
MAY 11 1932

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SHARON, PA.
NEWS-TELEGRAPH
MAY 11 1932

Boston Returns to Days of Beer, Bustles and Bikes

BOSTON, May 11.—(U.P.)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near) last night, to re-live a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded Symphony hall at the gay nineties night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "The Promenade Concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived. So were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube waltzes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 11 1932

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAY 12 1932

The Gay Nineties They had a "gay nineties" pop concert in Boston Symphony hall the other night, and it must have been a lot of fun. Many of those who came arrived in the costumes that were popular in the days of Cleveland and McKinley. The orchestra, composed mostly of the expert musicians of the famous Boston Symphony, played tunes that were familiar before and during the Spanish War—"Sweet Rosy O'Grady," "After the Ball Is Over" and things like that. Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, arrived at the hall in a horse-drawn barouche, and if there be any survival of antiquity that stirs the risibilities, it is a horse-drawn barouche with an orchestra-conductor sitting in back.

Altogether, it was an occasion for laughter. People laughed at the costumes, and laughed at the music. And both are rather funny, come to think of it. The costumes were cumbersome, uncomfortable, unbecoming, by modern standards. The music was too sweetly sentimental for modern standards—not that our own 1932 composers are guiltless of sweet sentiment, however.

For that matter, this generation is not guiltless of sartorial error. If anything, the women of today have a better right to laugh at the costumes of the late 19th century than the men. Women have reformed largely by eliminating the superfluous. They have thrown out yards and yards of needless material. They dress more simply, and with infinitely more comfort—so they tell us. But men wear pretty much the same gewgaws they wore 40 years ago. They stick to collars and neckties, which are tolerably useless, and may even aggravate colds. They wear waistcoats when waistcoats are uncomfortable. Some of their trousers are as loose and baggy as the trousers of their parents were tight and skimpy. And it may be that the sophisticated audiences of 1972, going to pop concerts commemorating and illustrating the more or less gay thirties, will be highly amused.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DU BOIS, PA.
EXPRESS
MAY 12 1932

Hub Tries to Revive Gay 90's with Near Beer

Boston, May 11.—(UP)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles and beer (near), last night, to relive a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded musically-historical Symphony Hall to be present at the Gay Nineties Night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "the promenade concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar moustaches and long hair were revived for the evening. So too were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fielder, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra through some of the popular pieces of the decade. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube Waltzes."

But for sheer dramatic suspense the final notes of "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," as played by Paul Fido on his bass tuba, exceeded anything offered by Fiedler or Adamowski. The audience, accustomed to hear the bass tuba as only a subdued "oompa-oompa" accompanying a melody, held its breath as lower and still lower notes, none the less pleasing because they were unusual, emerged from the gigantic horn's mouth. It seemed impossible that Fido could strike the final note, lower than all the rest. He paused for the effort and the great hall was still. Fido compressed his lips and blew. The note rumbled out, gloriously true. The audience sighed its relief.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ORANGE, N. J.
COURIER
MAY 11 1932

ETIES VIVED BOSTON

—(UP)—Boston- bustles, bicycles, t night, to re- the gay ninephony Hall at it of the pops, known in those ade Concerts." they quaffed usic of the pes, handle-bar hair were re- sleeves, bustles hats women of the cen-uctor of the ancient Vic- icycles, avail- privilege of in the lobby.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
1932

Bostonians Go Back to Ways of The "Gay Nineties" for Just a Night; Have Novel, Gay Frolic

BOSTON, May 11.—(U.P.)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near) last night, to re-live a few hours of the "gay nineties."

They crowded Symphony Hall at the Gay Nineties Night of the pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "the promenade concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair revived. So were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fielder, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston symphony orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned last at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube waltzes."

'Gay Nineties' r; It Was Near

chestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came in bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra through some of the popular pieces of the decade. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube Waltz."

LIVED C-LOVERS

—Bostonians icycles and to re-live a eties. ly-historical sent at the e Pops, a in those concerts." ey quaffed of the pe-handle-bar ere revived ere puffed describable he turn of or of the cient vic- les, avail- ivilege of he lobby. us Maria the Boston Symphony orchestra, who pedaled the five his home

Plays and Players ---

The Clothes, The Manners, The Numbers

To the Nineties Go The Pops, Mr. Adamowski Returns, Spirited Evening

NEVER before was there such a Pop Concert. Nor will there be another save only on the second "Gay Nineties Night," now set for Wednesday of next week. . . . At the entrance to Symphony Hall, if one chanced in from Huntington Avenue, signs and wonders began. Across the lobby against the back wall stood a bicycle rack. Out of recollection as well as wood, the carpenter had made it. It was very like the real thing. In it, moreover, bicycles were stabled—one a tandem, with Radcliffe College believably reported as country of origin. An upstanding specimen of the old high "wheel" companioned these "safeties." There was only to tilt it against the nearest radiator. But to the letter the management kept its word. "Bicycles checked free." And they were.

Next, at the box-office—if one was calling for reserved tickets—there was full regalia. A frock coat, discovered for the first time in many a young life, was the dress of authority. Between the lapels shone that marvel of tie-craft as the Nineties knew it—the Ascot, incomplete, and also undependable, until the wearer had thrust in the securing stick-pin. There is to report, however, a grave sartorial delinquency. Without a top-hat no frock-coat of the Nineties was complete. Even the ticket-seller at the circus wore it. Open mouthed and wide-eyed he that puts to yellow paper these black lines has seen him. But Symphony Hall, of all places, forgot itself; above the frock-coat of its box-office set a low-crowned, curly-brimmed black Derby. Had it been brown, the Honorable Alfred Emanuel Smith, always kindly to Boston, might have lent it for the occasion out of his youthful days on the sidewalks of New York. As it was, forget, forgive and pass in.

Passing in, however, was not so easy, since gentlemen of the press with cameras were doing their duty on willing subjects, which operation of benignant journalistic surgery was watched intently by scores who had no attics and therefore no ninetified apparel. Besides, every place at tables, or in the balconies as observation posts, had been taken long in advance. Many were turned away—to give reason for a second "Ninety-night." . . . Within, there were sights again. Portly masculine waiters appeared from nowhere; while on their chins or their cheeks was the imperial or the sideburns of the recalled epoch. No need to inquire how genuine this amusing tuftage. There was also beer—light beer, dark beer, beer for waiting steins, beer at ten cents the glass—happy omen of the time when Prohibitionists shall cease from troubling and Congress be at rest. Messrs. Burkhardt had brewed it for the occasion. That afternoon it had been fetched in old-time kegs from Roxbury. Some said, behind their hands, that there was a faint "kick" in it. Possibly they were sharpening the tipple with nervous exhilaration.

Dress, however, before drink—dresses and millinery that were rare to see. Vast-brimmed "sailor-hats" held under the chin, little-girl fashion, by black elastic; less expansive "straws" from the back of which dangled sashlike ribbons; hillocks of bows; tilted saucers for small heads: at the other extreme befeathered "Gainsboroughs." (There was more than one way with this "Nineties" millinery.) And dresses with sleeves puffed above and tight below; with splotches of pink; with the austere lines proper to Gibson's man-like maidens; with short-waisted and gimp-trimmed bodices; even mauve-hued costumes. For if the Nineties were "gay," they were also the "mauve decade."

What a ransacking of trunk-rooms and store-closets had preceded the concert, with maybe an order or two for the costumer. Cousin Ellen had lent that—and remembered. Aunt Irene had proffered this— and looked away as she passed it from her youth to another's. The inclination to "dress up" is in us all. For these renewed Nineties, men caught the contagion. There were other Ascots beside that of the box-office; other tuftage than the waiters'; high and flaring collars very statesmanlike. Even retreats into earlier times when trousers ran tight down the legs and waistcoats were waistcoats, matching nothing but themselves.

From old programs at the old Music Hall Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Adamowski assembled the music that was occasion for this masquerade. In verbiage they kept to the ancient style—German titles for German pieces; courteous mention of "The Gentlemen of the Strings"; respectful request to the audience "to preserve silence during the performance of this number." Out came "Loin du Bal" in which we drive homeward sentimentally with the dance still echoing in our ears; the Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" then almost as new as our selection, the other evening, from "The Band Wagon"; a cakewalk from Georgia, illustrated a bit too politely by a pair in the middle aisle; priceless above the rest and as "extra" the Sextet from "Florodora," "Tell me, pretty maiden, are there any more at home like you." With a grain of imagination every listener—of the proper years—could see the swishing skirts, the black-buttoned boot-tops; could hear the tinkling voices. Nowadays we have only "selections"; but in the orotund nineties they were "grand selection." In this particular assemblage the bass tuba did prodigies of hoarse descent.

Mr. Adamowski's share was the middle division. Clapping and standing, audience and orchestra welcomed him to the conductor's stand and farewelled him from it. His long baton suggested a personal peculiarity. His slower tempi belonged to another day. Conductorial authority rather than the present good-fellowship looked out of his sidelong glance to assure a stilled audience. Handel's "Largo"; the Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus"; the "Blue Danube" waltz were his numbers. In the Largo, the violins played standing. In the waltz, the conductor borrowed the concert-master's violin and sounded a few measures after the manner of the Strausses themselves. There were "extras" as well; among them Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia." What syrup dripped softly into the ears of a desentimentalized generation!

It was Mr. Fiedler who brought the evening to climax. As "extra," he whipped out an assortment of songs from the nineties — "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," "The Bowery," "Oh Promise Me!" and many another. The audience took him at his word, carried the tune, if it did not always remember the words; at last found free outlet for the high spirits these two hours in bubble. You never can tell what an audience will do until you try it —especially a Boston audience. Next Wednesday comes the second test.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

MAY 11 1932

---

and, by a 3 to 1 vote ratio.
of the democratic delegates
ng White were plainly defeat-
cept one in the Akron district,
favored Newton D. Baker,
r secretary of war, although
was not a candidate. The race s district was close and the re-
as uncertain.

Smith Delegates Beaten

delegates in the Cleveland dis-pledged to Peter Witt, but
ed for former Gov. Al Smith
w York, were defeated by the slate by a ratio estimated at 1.

addition to the races for dele-
there was a sprinkling of
in the entirely separate presi-
l preferential contests the re-
of which will not be binding
e delegates.

sident Hoover and Gov. White
ot enter the preferential lists,
here were three republicans
ne democrat who did. The lican contestants were Senator
e, Mayor Coxey, and Olin J.
Columbus lecturer. The dem-

---

ncert ivilege of

he lobby.
us Maria
e Boston
pedaled
me and returned way.

leader of ns 1891-d the or-he popu-
ffenbach, heard un-audience
lue Dan-suspense

ed in the played by

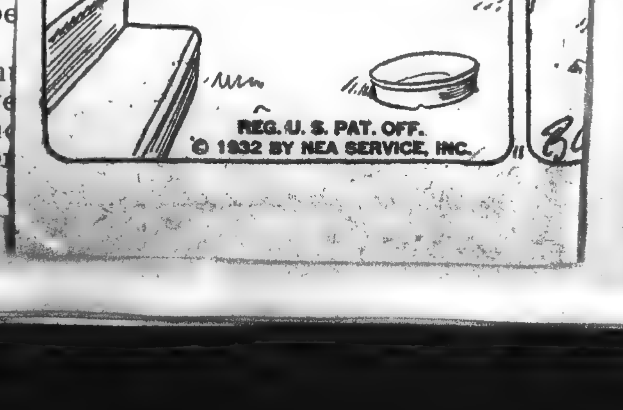
Paul Fido on his bass tuba exceeded anything offered by Fiedler or Adamowski. The audience, accustomed to hear the bass tuba as only a subdued "oompa-oompa" accompanying a melody, held its breath as lower and still lower notes, none the less pleasing because they were unusual, emerged from the gigantic horn's mouth. It seemed impossible that Fido could strike the final note, lower than all the rest. He paused for the effort and the great hall was still. Fido compressed his lips and blew. The note rumbled out, gloriously true. The audience sighed its r

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEARFIELD, PA.
PROGRESS

MAY 11 1932



WHOOPEE !! POODLE'S BACK!! HER PAN'S EMPTY!!
ARE YOU SURE ?
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
© 1932 BY NEA SERVICE, INC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SHARON, PA.
NEWS-TELEGRAPH

MAY 11 1932

Boston Returns to Days of Beer, Bustles and Bikes

BOSTON, May 11.—(U.P.)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near) last night, to re-live a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded Symphony hall at the gay nineties night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "The Promenade Concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived. So were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube waltzes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 11 1932

Hub Tries to Revive Gay 90's with Near Beer

Boston, May 11.—(UP)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles and beer (near), last night, to relive a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded musically-historical Symphony Hall to be present at the Gay Nineties Night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "the promenade concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar moustaches and long hair were revived for the evening. So too were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fielder, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra through some of the popular pieces of the decade. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube Waltzes."

But for sheer dramatic suspense the final notes of "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," as played by Paul Fido on his bass tuba, exceeded anything offered by Fiedler or Adamowski. The audience, accustomed to hear the bass tuba as only a subdued "oompa-oompa" accompanying a melody, held its breath as lower and still lower notes, none the less pleasing because they were unusual, emerged from the gigantic horn's mouth. It seemed impossible that Fido could strike the final note, lower than all the rest. He paused for the effort and the great hall was still. Fido compressed his lips and blew. The note rumbled out, gloriously true. The audience sighed its relief.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 12 1932

The Gay Nineties

They had a "gay nineties" pop concert in Boston Symphony hall the other night, and it must have been a lot of fun. Many of those who came arrived in the costumes that were popular in the days of Cleveland and McKinley. The orchestra, composed mostly of the expert musicians of the famous Boston Symphony, played tunes that were familiar before and during the Spanish War—"Sweet Rosy O'Grady," "After the Ball Is Over" and things like that. Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, arrived at the hall in a horse-drawn barouche, and if there be any survival of antiquity that stirs the risibilities, it is a horse-drawn barouche with an orchestra-conductor sitting in back.

Altogether, it was an occasion for laughter. People laughed at the costumes, and laughed at the music. And both are rather funny, come to think of it. The costumes were cumbersome, uncomfortable, unbecoming, by modern standards. The music was too sweetly sentimental for modern standards—not that our own 1932 composers are guiltless of sweet sentiment, however.

For that matter, this generation is not guiltless of sartorial error. If anything, the women of today have a better right to laugh at the costumes of the late 19th century than the men. Women have reformed largely by eliminating the superfluous. They have thrown out yards and yards of needless material. They dress more simply, and with infinitely more comfort—so they tell us. But men wear pretty much the same gewgaws they wore 40 years ago. They stick to collars and neckties, which are tolerably useless, and may even aggravate colds. They wear waistcoats when waistcoats are uncomfortable. Some of their trousers are as loose and baggy as the trousers of their parents were tight and skimpy. And it may be that the sophisticated audiences of 1972, going to pop concerts commemorating and illustrating the more or less gay thirties, will be highly amused.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DU BOIS, PA.
EXPRESS

MAY 12 1932

ETIES
VIVED
BOSTON

—(UP)—Boston-
bustles, bicycles,
t night, to re-
the gay ninephony Hall at t of the pops, known in those de Concerts."

they quaffed
usic of the pe-

s, handle-bar hair were re-sleeves, bustles hats women of the cen-uctor of the ancient Vicicycles, avail-privilege of in the lobby.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAY 11 1932

Bostonians Go 'Gay Nineties' Except for Beer; It Was Near

Boston, May 11—(UP)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near), last night, to relive a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded Symphony Hall at the Gay Nineties Night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "The Promenade Concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived for the evening. So too, were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fielder, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came in bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra through some of the popular pieces of the decade. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube Waltz."

LIVED
C-LOVERS

—Bostonians
icycles and to re-live a eties.
ly-historical sent at the e Pops, a in those concerts."
ey quaffed of the pe-handle-bar ere revived ere puffed describable

e turn of r of the cient vic-les, availivilege of

he lobby.
us Maria
e Boston
Symphony orchestra, who pe[illegible] the five [illegible] his home

Page Four

Plays and Players ===

The Clothes, The Manners, The Numbers

To the Nineties Go The Pops, Mr. Adamowski Returns, Spirited Evening

NEVER before was there such a Pop Concert. Nor will there be another save only on the second "Gay Nineties Night," now set for Wednesday of next week. . . . At the entrance to Symphony Hall, if one chanced in from Huntington Avenue, signs and wonders began. Across the lobby against the back wall stood a bicycle rack. Out of recollection as well as wood, the carpenter had made it. It was very like the real thing. In it, moreover, bicycles were stabled—one a tandem, with Radcliffe College believably reported as country of origin. An upstanding specimen of the old high "wheel" companioned these "safeties." There was only to tilt it against the nearest radiator. But to the letter the management kept its word. "Bicycles checked free." And they were.

Next, at the box-office—if one was calling for reserved tickets—there was full regalia. A frock coat, discovered for the first time in many a young life, was the dress of authority. Between the lapels shone that marvel of tie-craft as the Nineties knew it—the Ascot, incomplete, and also undependable, until the wearer had thrust in the securing stick-pin. There is to report, however, a grave sartorial delinquency. Without a top-hat no frock-coat of the Nineties was complete. Even the ticket-seller at the circus wore it. Open mouthed and wide-eyed he that puts to yellow paper these black lines has seen him. But Symphony Hall, of all places, forgot itself; above the frock-coat of its box-office set a low-crowned, curly-brimmed black Derby. Had it been brown, the Honorable Alfred Emanuel Smith, always kindly to Boston, might have lent it for the occasion out of his youthful days on the sidewalks of New York. As it was, forget, forgive and pass in.

Passing in, however, was not so easy, since gentlemen of the press with cameras were doing their duty on willing subjects, which operation of benignant journalistic surgery was watched intently by scores who had no attics and therefore no ninetified apparel. Besides, every place at tables, or in the balconies as observation posts, had been taken long in advance. Many were turned away—to give reason for a second "Ninety-night." . . . Within, there were sights again. Portly masculine waiters appeared from nowhere; while on their chins or their cheeks was the imperial or the sideburns of the recalled epoch. No need to inquire how genuine this amusing tuftage. There was also beer—light beer, dark beer, beer for waiting steins, beer at ten cents the glass—happy omen of the time when Prohibitionists shall cease from troubling and Congress be at rest. Messrs. Burkhardt had brewed it for the occasion. That afternoon it had been fetched in old-time kegs from Roxbury. Some said, behind their hands, that there was a faint "kick" in it. Possibly they were sharpening the tipple with nervous exhilaration.

Dress, however, before drink—dresses and millinery that were rare to see. Vast-brimmed "sailor-hats" held under the chin, little-girl fashion, by black elastic; less expansive "straws" from the back of which dangled sashlike ribbons; hillocks of bows; tilted saucers for small heads: at the other extreme befeathered "Gainsboroughs." (There was more than one way with this "Nineties" millinery.) And dresses with sleeves puffed above and tight below; with splotches of pink; with the austere lines proper to Gibson's man-like maidens; with short-waisted and gimp-trimmed bodices; even mauve-hued costumes. For if the Nineties were "gay," they were also the "mauve decade."

What a ransacking of trunk-rooms and store-closets had preceded the concert, with maybe an order or two for the costumer. Cousin Ellen had lent that—and remembered. Aunt Irene had proffered this— and looked away as she passed it from her youth to another's. The inclination to "dress up" is in us all. For these renewed Nineties, men caught the contagion. There were other Ascots beside that of the box-office; other tuftage than the waiters'; high and flaring collars very statesmanlike. Even retreats into earlier times when trousers ran tight down the legs and waistcoats were waistcoats, matching nothing but themselves.

From old programs at the old Music Hall Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Adamowski assembled the music that was occasion for this masquerade. In verbiage they kept to the ancient style—German titles for German pieces; courteous mention of "The Gentlemen of the Strings"; respectful request to the audience "to preserve silence during the performance of this number." Out came "Loin du Bal" in which we drive homeward sentimentally with the dance still echoing in our ears; the Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" then almost as new as our selection, the other evening, from "The Band Wagon"; a cakewalk from Georgia, illustrated a bit too politely by a pair in the middle aisle; priceless above the rest and as "extra" the Sextet from "Florodora," "Tell me, pretty maiden, are there any more at home like you." With a grain of imagination every listener—of the proper years—could see the swishing skirts, the black-buttoned boot-tops; could hear the tinkling voices. Nowadays we have only "selections"; but in the orotund nineties they were "grand selection." In this particular assemblage the bass tuba did prodigies of hoarse descent.

Mr. Adamowski's share was the middle division. Clapping and standing, audience and orchestra welcomed him to the conductor's stand and farewelled him from it. His long baton suggested a personal peculiarity. His slower tempi belonged to another day. Conductorial authority rather than the present good-fellowship looked out of his sidelong glance to assure a stilled audience. Handel's "Largo"; the Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus"; the "Blue Danube" waltz were his numbers. In the Largo, the violins played standing. In the waltz, the conductor borrowed the concert-master's violin and sounded a few measures after the manner of the Strausses themselves. There were "extras" as well; among them Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia." What syrup dripped softly into the ears of a desentimentalized generation!

It was Mr. Fiedler who brought the evening to climax. As "extra," he whipped out an assortment of songs from the nineties — "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," "The Bowery," "Oh Promise Me!" and many another. The audience took him at his word, carried the tune, if it did not always remember the words; at last found free outlet for the high spirits these two hours in bubble. You never can tell what an audience will do until you try it —especially a Boston audience. Next Wednesday comes the second test.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

MAY 11 1932

and, by a 3 to 1 vote ratio.
of the democratic delegates
ng White were plainly defeat-
cept one in the Akron district,
favored Newton D. Baker,
r secretary of war, although
was not a candidate. The race
s district was close and the re-vas uncertain.

Smith Delegates Beaten

delegates in the Cleveland dis-
pledged to Peter Witt, but ned for former Gov. Al Smith
w York, were defeated by the slate by a ratio estimated at 1.

addition to the races for dele-
there was a sprinkling of
in the entirely separate presi-
l preferential contests the re-
of which will not be binding
e delegates.
sident Hoover and Gov. White
ot enter the preferential lists,
here were three republicans
one democrat who did. The lican contestants were Senator
e, Mayor Coxey, and Olin J.
Columbus lecturer. The dem-

Paul Fido on his bass tuba exceeded anything offered by Fiedler or Adamowski. The audience, accustomed to hear the bass tuba as only a subdued "oompa-oompa" accompanying a melody, held its breath as lower and still lower notes, none the less pleasing because they were unusual, emerged from the gigantic horn's mouth. It seemed impossible that Fido could strike the final note, lower than all the rest. He paused for the effort and the great hall was still. Fido compressed his lips and blew. The note rumbled out, gloriously true. The audience sighed its

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEARFIELD, PA.
PROGRESS

MAY 11 1932

WHOOPEE!! POODLE'S BACK!! HER PAN'S EMPTY!!
ARE YOU SURE ?
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
© 1932 BY NEA SERVICE, INC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SHARON, PA.
NEWS-TELEGRAPH

MAY 11 1932

Boston Returns to Days of Beer, Bustles and Bikes

BOSTON, May 11.—(U.P.)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near) last night, to re-live a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded Symphony hall at the gay nineties night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "The Promenade Concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived. So were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube waltzes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 11 1932

Sun Sets Tonight .... 7:54 p. m
Sun Rises Tomorrow .... 5:29 a.
Moon Sets Tomorrow .... 1:27 a.

RECORD OF FIRES

YESTERDAY

8:05 p. m.—Fire in third floor apartment at 100 Waterman street, occupied by Mrs. Margaret McKenzie and family, caused by overheated electric stove. Damage slight.

9:37 p. m.—Fire in ash bin rear of 482 Atwells avenue, owned by Antonio Gasbarro, 41 Maplehurst avenue. Damage slight, and cause unknown.

10:27 p. m.—Supposed fire in apartment building at 20 Atlantic avenue. Florence Leibo smelled smoke and pulled alarm. Firemen found no fire.

10:46 p. m.—Fire in rear room of the Transit Market, 144 Brook street, owned by Louis Berman, 15 Morrison avenue. Considerable damage, cause undetermined.

TODAY

2:00 a. m., Alarm for broken sprinkler head, Champlin building, 116 Chestnut street. No fire.

MAY 11 1932

M. C. A., Main st., Orange, hea sons advanced why they should cipate in an aggressive newspa vertising campaign, to acquai public with the values to be for Orange Day, May 20, by re
tatives of the advertising depa
of the newspapers serving th
munity.

Plans for the observation of were also discussed by heads o mittees and reports of progre
sented. Allyn L. Wright,
chairman of the committee, p

The committee plans to car celebration into the night, a ments being made for participa
restaurant and motion pictur ters in the event. The plans a clude the stationing of a f
representative of the Red Cross
ter of the Oranges, at or n
Orange Day headquarters, a
and North Day sts., Orange.

The Chamber of Commerc
Civics of the Oranges and Ma

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 12 1932

The Gay Nineties They had a "gay nineties" pop concert in Boston Symphony hall the other night, and it must have been a lot of fun. Many of those who came arrived in the costumes that were popular in the days of Cleveland and McKinley. The orchestra, composed mostly of the expert musicians of the famous Boston Symphony, played tunes that were familiar before and during the Spanish War—"Sweet Rosy O'Grady," "After the Ball Is Over" and things like that. Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, arrived at the hall in a horse-drawn barouche, and if there be any survival of antiquity that stirs the risibilities, it is a horse-drawn barouche with an orchestra-conductor sitting in back.

Altogether, it was an occasion for laughter. People laughed at the costumes, and laughed at the music. And both are rather funny, come to think of it. The costumes were cumbersome, uncomfortable, unbecoming, by modern standards. The music was too sweetly sentimental for modern standards—not that our own 1932 composers are guiltless of sweet sentiment, however.

For that matter, this generation is not guiltless of sartorial error. If anything, the women of today have a better right to laugh at the costumes of the late 19th century than the men. Women have reformed largely by eliminating the superfluous. They have thrown out yards and yards of needless material. They dress more simply, and with infinitely more comfort—so they tell us. But men wear pretty much the same gewgaws they wore 40 years ago. They stick to collars and neckties, which are tolerably useless, and may even aggravate colds. They wear waistcoats when waistcoats are uncomfortable. Some of their trousers are as loose and baggy as the trousers of their parents were tight and skimpy. And it may be that the sophisticated audiences of 1972, going to pop concerts commemorating and illustrating the more or less gay thirties, will be highly amused.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DU BOIS, PA.
EXPRESS

MAY 12 1932

GAY NINETIES ARE REVIVED IN BOSTON

Boston, Ma. 12.—(UP)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near) last night, to relive a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded Symphony Hall at the gay nineties night of the pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "the Promeade Concerts." Seated aroud tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived. So were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

1932

GAY NINETIES RE-LIVED BY HUB MUSIC-LOVERS

Boston, May 11—(UP)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles and beer (near), last night, to re-live a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded musically-historical Symphony hall to be present at the gay nineties night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "the promenade concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived for the evening. So too were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fielder, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony orchestra, who pedaled the five [illegible] his home.

Page Four

Plays and Players ---

The Clothes, The Manners, The Numbers

To the Nineties Go The Pops, Mr. Adamowski Returns, Spirited Evening

NEVER before was there such a Pop Concert. Nor will there be another save only on the second "Gay Nineties Night," now set for Wednesday of next week. . . . At the entrance to Symphony Hall, if one chanced in from Huntington Avenue, signs and wonders began. Across the lobby against the back wall stood a bicycle rack. Out of recollection as well as wood, the carpenter had made it. It was very like the real thing. In it, moreover, bicycles were stabled—one a tandem, with Radcliffe College believably reported as country of origin. An upstanding specimen of the old high "wheel" companioned these "safeties." There was only to tilt it against the nearest radiator. But to the letter the management kept its word. "Bicycles checked free." And they were.

Next, at the box-office—if one was calling for reserved tickets—there was full regalia. A frock coat, discovered for the first time in many a young life, was the dress of authority. Between the lapels shone that marvel of tie-craft as the Nineties knew it—the Ascot, incomplete, and also undependable, until the wearer had thrust in the securing stick-pin. There is to report, however, a grave sartorial delinquency. Without a top-hat no frock-coat of the Nineties was complete. Even the ticket-seller at the circus wore it. Open mouthed and wide eyed he that puts to yellow paper these black lines has seen him. But Symphony Hall, of all places, forgot itself; above the frock-coat of its box-office set a low-crowned, curly-brimmed black Derby. Had it been brown, the Honorable Alfred Emanuel Smith, always kindly to Boston, might have lent it for the occasion out of his youthful days on the sidewalks of New York. As it was, forget, forgive and pass in.

Passing in, however, was not so easy, since gentlemen of the press with cameras were doing their duty on willing subjects, which operation of benignant journalistic surgery was watched intently by scores who had no attics and therefore no ninetified apparel. Besides, every place at tables, or in the balconies as observation posts, had been taken long in advance. Many were turned away—to give reason for a second "Ninety-night." . . . Within, there were sights again. Portly masculine waiters appeared from nowhere; while on their chins or their cheeks was the imperial or the sideburns of the recalled epoch. No need to inquire how genuine this amusing tuftage. There was also beer—light beer, dark beer, beer for waiting steins, beer at ten cents the glass—happy omen of the time when Prohibitionists shall cease from troubling and Congress be at rest. Messrs. Burkhardt had brewed it for the occasion. That afternoon it had been fetched in old-time kegs from Roxbury. Some said, behind their hands, that there was a faint "kick" in it. Possibly they were sharpening the tipple with nervous exhilaration.

Dress, however, before drink—dresses and millinery that were rare to see. Vast-brimmed "sailor-hats" held under the chin, little-girl fashion, by black elastic; less expansive "straws" from the back of which dangled sashlike ribbons; hillocks of bows; tilted saucers for small heads: at the other extreme befeathered "Gainsboroughs." (There was more than one way with this "Nineties" millinery.) And dresses with sleeves puffed above and tight below; with splotches of pink; with the austere lines proper to Gibson's man-like maidens; with short-waisted and gimp-trimmed bodices; even mauve-hued costumes. For if the Nineties were "gay," they were also the "mauve decade."

What a ransacking of trunk-rooms and store-closets had preceded the concert, with maybe an order or two for the costumer. Cousin Ellen had lent that—and remembered. Aunt Irene had proffered this— and looked away as she passed it from her youth to another's. The inclination to "dress up" is in us all. For these renewed Nineties, men caught the contagion. There were other Ascots beside that of the box-office; other tuftage than the waiters'; high and flaring collars very statesmanlike. Even retreats into earlier times when trousers ran tight down the legs and waistcoats were waistcoats, matching nothing but themselves.

From old programs at the old Music Hall Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Adamowski assembled the music that was occasion for this masquerade. In verbiage they kept to the ancient style—German titles for German pieces; courteous mention of "The Gentlemen of the Strings"; respectful request to the audience "to preserve silence during the performance of this number." Out came "Loin du Bal" in which we drive homeward sentimentally with the dance still echoing in our ears; the Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" then almost as new as our selection, the other evening, from "The Band Wagon"; a cakewalk from Georgia, illustrated a bit too politely by a pair in the middle aisle; priceless above the rest and as "extra" the Sextet from "Florodora," "Tell me, pretty maiden, are there any more at home like you." With a grain of imagination every listener—of the proper years—could see the swishing skirts, the black-buttoned boot-tops; could hear the tinkling voices. Nowadays we have only "selections"; but in the orotund nineties they were "grand selection." In this particular assemblage the bass tuba did prodigies of hoarse descent.

Mr. Adamowski's share was the middle division. Clapping and standing, audience and orchestra welcomed him to the conductor's stand and farewelled him from it. His long baton suggested a personal peculiarity. His slower tempi belonged to another day. Conductorial authority rather than the present good-fellowship looked out of his sidelong glance to assure a stilled audience. Handel's "Largo"; the Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus"; the "Blue Danube" waltz were his numbers. In the Largo, the violins played standing. In the waltz, the conductor borrowed the concert-master's violin and sounded a few measures after the manner of the Strausses themselves. There were "extras" as well; among them Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia." What syrup dripped softly into the ears of a desentimentalized generation!

It was Mr. Fiedler who brought the evening to climax. As "extra," he whipped out an assortment of songs from the nineties — "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," "The Bowery," "Oh Promise Me!" and many another. The audience took him at his word, carried the tune, if it did not always remember the words; at last found free outlet for the high spirits these two hours in bubble. You never can tell what an audience will do until you try it —especially a Boston audience. Next Wednesday comes the second test.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

MAY 11 1932

and, by a 3 to 1 vote ratio.
of the democratic delegates
ng White were plainly defeat-
cept one in the Akron district,
favored Newton D. Baker,
r secretary of war, although
was not a candidate. The race
s district was close and the re-
as uncertain.

Smith Delegates Beaten

delegates in the Cleveland dis-
pledged to Peter Witt, but
ed for former Gov. Al Smith
w York, were defeated by the slate by a ratio estimated at 1.

addition to the races for dele-
there was a sprinkling of
in the entirely separate presi-
l preferential contests the re-
of which will not be binding
e delegates.

sident Hoover and Gov. White
ot enter the preferential lists,
here were three republicans
one democrat who did. The lican contestants were Senator
e, Mayor Coxey, and Olin J.
Columbus lecturer. The dem-

ncert

ivilege of
he lobby.
us Maria
he Boston
pedaled
me and returned way.

leader of ns 1891-
d the or-he popu-
Offenbach. heard un-audience
Blue Dan-

suspense
ed in the
played by

Paul Fido on his bass tuba exceeded anything offered by Fiedler or Adamowski. The audience, accustomed to hear the bass tuba as only a subdued "oompa-oompa" accompanying a melody, held its breath as lower and still lower notes, none the less pleasing because they were unusual, emerged from the gigantic horn's mouth. It seemed impossible that Fido could strike the final note, lower than all the rest. He paused for the effort and the great hall was still. Fido compressed his lips and blew. The note rumbled out, gloriously true. The audience sighed its

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEARFIELD, PA.
PROGRESS

MAY 11 1932

WHOOPEE!! POODLE'S BACK!! HER PAN'S EMPTY!!
ARE YOU SURE ?
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
© 1932 BY NEA SERVICE, INC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SHARON, PA.
NEWS-TELEGRAPH

MAY 11 1932

Boston Returns to Days of Beer, Bustles and Bikes

BOSTON, May 11.—(U.P.)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near) last night, to re-live a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded Symphony hall at the gay nineties night of the Pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "The Promenade Concerts." Seated around tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived. So were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube waltzes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 11 1932

Sun Sets Tonight .... 7:34 p.
Sun Rises Tomorrow .... 5:20 a.
Moon Sets Tomorrow .... 1:27 a.

RECORD OF FIRES

YESTERDAY

8:05 p. m.—Fire in third floor apartment at 100 Waterman street, occupied by Mrs. Margaret McKenzie and family, caused by overheated electric stove. Damage slight.

9:37 p. m.—Fire in ash bin rear of 482 Atwells avenue, owned by Antonio Gasbarro, 41 Maplehurst avenue. Damage slight, and cause unknown.

10:27 p. m.—Supposed fire in apartment building at 20 Atlantic avenue. Florence Leibo smelled smoke and pulled alarm. Firemen found no fire.

10:46 p. m.—Fire in rear room of the Transit Market, 144 Brook street, owned by Louis Berman, 15 Morrison avenue. Considerable damage, cause undetermined.

TODAY

2:00 a. m., Alarm for broken sprinkler head, Champlin building, 116 Chestnut street. No fire.

MAY 11 1932

M. C. A., Main st., Orange, hea sons advanced why they shoul
cipate in an aggressive newspa vertising campaign, to acqua public with the values to be
for Orange Day, May 20, by re
tatives of the advertising depa
of the newspapers serving th
munity.

Plans for the observation of were also discussed by heads mittees and reports of progre
sented. Allyn L. Wright,
chairman of the committee, p

The committee plans to car
celebration into the night, a ments being made for participa
restaurant and motion pictur ters in the event. The plans
clude the stationing of a f
representative of the Red Cross
ter of the Oranges, at or n
Orange Day headquarters,
and North Day sts., Orange.

The Chamber of Commer
Civics of the Oranges and Ma

Bos
E

Boston
went ba beer (n few hou
They
the Gay
a Bosto days as Seated beer an period.
Flat-t mustach vived fo puffed s cribable turn of Arthu

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 12 1932

The Gay Nineties They had a "gay nineties" pop concert in Boston Symphony hall the other night, and it must have been a lot of fun. Many of those who came arrived in the costumes that were popular in the days of Cleveland and McKinley. The orchestra, composed mostly of the expert musicians of the famous Boston Symphony, played tunes that were familiar before and during the Spanish War—"Sweet Rosy O'Grady," "After the Ball Is Over" and things like that. Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, arrived at the hall in a horse-drawn barouche, and if there be any survival of antiquity that stirs the risibilities, it is a horse-drawn barouche with an orchestra-conductor sitting in back.

Altogether, it was an occasion for laughter. People laughed at the costumes, and laughed at the music. And both are rather funny, come to think of it. The costumes were cumbersome, uncomfortable, unbecoming, by modern standards. The music was too sweetly sentimental for modern standards—not that our own 1932 composers are guiltless of sweet sentiment, however.

For that matter, this generation is not guiltless of sartorial error. If anything, the women of today have a better right to laugh at the costumes of the late 19th century than the men. Women have reformed largely by eliminating the superfluous. They have thrown out yards and yards of needless material. They dress more simply, and with infinitely more comfort—so they tell us. But men wear pretty much the same gewgaws they wore 40 years ago. They stick to collars and neckties, which are tolerably useless, and may even aggravate colds. They wear waistcoats when waistcoats are uncomfortable. Some of their trousers are as loose and baggy as the trousers of their parents were tight and skimpy. And it may be that the sophisticated audiences of 1972, going to pop concerts commemorating and illustrating the more or less gay thirties, will be highly amused.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DU BOIS, PA.
EXPRESS

MAY 12 1932

GAY NINETIES ARE REVIVED IN BOSTON

Boston, Ma. 12.—(UP)—Bostonians went back to bustles, bicycles, and beer (near) last night, to relive a few hours of the gay nineties.

They crowded Symphony Hall at the gay nineties night of the pops, a Boston institution known in those days as "the Promeade Concerts." Seated aroud tables, they quaffed beer and listened to music of the period.

Flat-topped derbies, handle-bar mustaches and long hair were revived. So were puffed sleeves, bustles and the indescribable hats women wore before the turn of the century.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, arrived in an ancient Victoria. Many came on bicycles, availing themselves of the privilege of free bicycle parking in the lobby. Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home and found it such fun that he returned late at night in the same way.

Timothee Adamowski, leader of the concerts in the seasons 1891-1894, once again conducted the orchestra. Offenbach, Handel and Strauss were heard under his guidance. The audience seemed to like best "The Blue Danube Waltzes."

Among the latter was Jesus Maria Sanroma, solo pianist to the Boston Symphony orchestra, who pedaled the five miles from his home

In Records Of Old Days At The Pops

The Gay Nineties ad Libitum, Riotous "Harvard Night," Notes by a Butterfly

FOR the time being the Gay Nineties are in high favor at the Pops. On Tuesday evening, in the music, costumes, refreshments and equipages there was a suggestion of the concerts of forty years ago. On Wednesday of next week the occasion will be repeated. In the meantime it may be amusing to gather from accounts printed in the newspapers of the period something of the flavor of the time. First from the Globe of June 16, 1896:

"Everything last night was crimson in Music Hall, for it was Harvard Night at the 'Pops.' Crimson bunting and flags, crimson colored programs, girls in crimson waists and boys with crimson scarfs drinking crimson wine.

"Over the platform hung a list of the glorious victories won this season by the Harvard baseball team—fifteen in all—and the audience was largely made up of Harvard students and their friends.

"The house was packed, and strange to say it was an extremely quiet crowd for about two hours, or until No. 11 on the program was reached. This was 'Fair Harvard,' and the students in the audience decided that they wanted to give that part of the concert themselves. So about 700 of them made a rush for the platform.

"The musicians were panic stricken—fiddles, 'cellos, horns, drums, and piccolos fled in consternation. The industrious little artist who works the snare and kettle drums and several other implements had all he could do to save his chattels, and the three big double basses sought refuge in flight. Nothing could stay the progress of the athletic young students.

"They mounted the platform from all directions, and then one of them attempted to give 'Fair Harvard' as a solo. If he had had a voice like a steam calliope he might have been heard, but his notes were drowned in the pandemonium that reigned. So the whole crowd took up the strain and fairly lifted the roof with their ear-splitting endeavors to sing.

"It was a great success, as far as noise was concerned. Then they sang one or two other songs, which seemed to offer a safety valve for their enthusiasm.

"Quiet was soon restored, and the banished musicians were allowed to return to their places and give the final number on the program, which contained many selections from Hasty Pudding and Pi Eta operettas."

◆

There were details of setting that should not be forgotten. The Journal of May 12, 1895, calls attention to some of them, along with wise admonitions to its readers:

"There is an inclosure, not a pen, as certain disagreeable persons have insisted, for the purpose of preserving class distinctions, but for exhibiting, as in a microcosm, the true democratic feeling that exists in Boston; it exists quietly; it is just a little shy; but it exists. In this pen—if you will have it so, oh Thersites—Columbus Avenue and Marlborough Street are in elbow-jostling proximity. Entrance to it is obtained by purchase, not by an affidavit concerning the validity of a grandfather. Mr. Newbury, in his choicest Bostonese, asks Mr. Cove if he will be good enough to let him look at a program a minute, and Mr. Cove replies, 'Why, cert' '; and the feet of them tap time to the strains of the waltz.

"Is it possible that some, stern-faced, may object to synchronous deglutition of food and music? Perish the thought! There should be food served at Symphony concerts. The system fortified by a boiled New England dinner would withstand the colossal works of Brahms. Nourished judiciously, a Saturday evening audience would no longer seem at departure an anaemic, etiolated race. So with light music, there are very properly 'light refreshments,' and let them be light, without ironic twist or turn. 'Truly, now,' said Michael Mail, 'there's a friendly tie of some sort between music and eating.'

Listen to the music and delight in rhythm and melody; learn that such pleasure is to be shared in common with citizens and citizenesses; you may never have been introduced, oh Mr. Cabotsworth, and yet they are happy without an intimate knowledge of your mental accomplishments and private views; but, for once, smile pleasantly on the crowd and without thought of incredible social complications. Eat and drink together decently and in moderation. That girl with fish-pool eyes is pretty, even if she is not a patroness of art. That old gentleman has an honest, kindly face, even if he is not a member of your club. One word of caution. When you eat, choose the occasion of a slow movement. If you devour an ice during a waltz or a galop, sympathy will lead to haste and indigestion. Above all, dismiss thought of business. There is but one golden thought at a 'Popular concert: 'I loafe and invite my soul.' "

◆

Sartorial information is to be obtained from an item in the Daily Advertiser of May 16, 1896. It begins with the simple statement that some of the costumes worn at the 'pop' concert were beautiful" —not all of them, but some of them. It continues:

"A very striking one was of black and white figured silk, with straps of white chiffon forming a great Maltese cross on each sleeve, and the chiffon insertion relieving also the yoke. Stock and girdle and cuffs were of hunter's green velvet. The hat was a Manila sailor, with a big oriflamme of black and white striped ribbon, and purple white violets and green leaves.

"Not far from the stage was a woman who wore one of those startling 'bandana' waists with black crepon sleeves, the waist itself being one of those which were made up during the winter by the dry goods houses of from four to six 'bandana' handkerchiefs, which retail at from $1 to $1.50—the finished waist being sold at something like $25.

"One woman in a party of three ladies with one man (and that man had left his wife at home, for I know him, horrid thing) wore a costume of green cloth with melon sleeves and trimmed with mink, with sleeves having straps of the mink, and a boa of mink encircling the neck.

"One striking costume showed sleeves of dotted yellow silk, the jacket front of Persian silk, the bodice of pale blue and two mink tails pendant; and the hat of black straw with two big black plumes rising from the center of the crown and the brim bordered with a white lace frill the hat set at a zipping angle! At the same table with this young lady sat another, who was gowned soberly in black but whose hat was a marvel—of black straw, with a wreath of pink roses full blown and buds, green leaves, and a big white satin bow set just between two gigantic Mercury wings.

"The men who sat within the sacred precincts of the rail were many of them in full dress, but only one white waistcoat was noticed. Outside the rail just one solitary man in evening clothes was observed.

"A young man in company with a pretty girl fell asleep during the playing of the "Ride of the Valkyries,' Wagner's most tempestuous passages.

"The Harvard boys too seem latterly to be restraining their natural desire to run things, and their natural propensity to make a noise. Of course, it may be because they do not nowadays have anything to make a noise over. But that is a rather cruel suggestion."

To a writer in the Post, whose identity is concealed beneath the modest nom de plume of "The Society Girl," may be left the task of painting a picture of the audience. She writes:

I am only a moth, a miller, a night butterfly, anything you like, but oh, what a lot I know, what a very great deal I have seen, and I have only been out one season.

All winter long I fluttered everywhere, from the theater to the ballroom, from the banquet hall to the private supper room, and now every night those who know where to look for me will find me here at the "Pop" concerts.

Few notice me, and so unobserved I see everything and everybody. All the people with whom I have become acquainted during the winter drift in one by one, and I think of the times and the places where I have seen them and I take a keen pleasure in recalling it all and watching them in these new surroundings. Someone has said: "Life is a comedy to him who thinks, a tragedy to him who feels." I am only a moth, so I have no soul. I never feel. I only laugh, and oh, so heartily, at the unconscious comedians who compose the human race.

Novelists sit in their studies and rack their brains for types and plots with unwritten romance happening underneath their very windows.

Through the smoke which curls up from the cigars in the Music Hall below, I see five hundred men and women, any one of whom has a life story, which faithfully painted would make one writer famous.

Each man is a hero or a villain in his own little world, usually a mixture of both.

Eash woman is a saint or a sinner oftener something of each.

I look at first one and then the other and amuse myself.

I watch the girl who sits at the fifth table back in the center to right and admire her.

Is she not beautiful, with her dainty Dresden china face?

Her lips are as red as the leaves of a Jacqueminot rose; nobody but myself notices how thin and selfish they will be when the color fades. Her features are as clear-cut as an exquisite cameo; nobody but myself knows that it is wine which has put the delecate coloring in her checks and the sparkle in her eyes.

Ah! What a pace she goes! She lives more in two weeks than many women do in all their lives.

The unmistakable stamp of dissipation has not yet appeared upon her face, and shall be gone before it comes, so I shall be spared that annoyance, and I see her now as one of the most beautiful girls in Boston—the girl with the Dresden china face.

◆

With his back to the orchestra and staring insolently into the faces of those in front of him, I see a man whose heart has never known a throb of tenderness, of kindness or of sympathy for years. The blood in his veins is ice. His heart is a machine. He is an officer in the United States Navy and is invited everywhere. He pays his poker debts and is called a man of honor, but I saw him blast a young girl's reputation by a shrug of his shoulders and an insinuating sneer. Still he makes the most perfect smoke rings I ever saw and is an excellent pistol shot, both of which, of course, are very much to his credit

There, close to the railing, on the left, is a man who looks like an undertaker, but he is a politician.

He smiles and bows and sees everybody. He will always see everybody until after election, for he is a candidate for an office. He is a lean and hungry Cassius, with an ambition which knows no check.

I have seen him in his quiet moments throw his head back upon his office chair and dream of dignities and honors so high that I dare not even whisper them.

His wife is always at home now, but then she is a dowdy little thing, and loves him a great deal, which of course is a nuisance.

Next to the politician's table is a famous society beauty She does not say much, because she does not know what to say. Her father is very rich and the society reporters say she is beautiful, and she trustingly believes them.

If she sold hooks and eyes in a shop, the same reporters might think she had a very long nose, and they possibly might notice that her ears stuck out from her head in a conspicuous manner; but a girl with a million never has a long nose.

Sitting at one of the inexpensive outside tables I see a man in a shabby coat, who scarcely seems to breathe when the orchestra is playing.

He is a music teacher, very ambitious and very poor; so poor is he that I have seen him lay his head upon his arms and let the tears trickle down upon the ivory keys of the piano because he was hungry and because his shabby shoes and hat so hurt his pride.

Nobody but he and I know how much he has endured and suffered, and nobody but ourselves know the exquisite pleasure he has derived from feeling that he was sacrificing for his art's sake.

Music is his life. It is food and drink and happiness—it is everything to him. If the world could only see and hear him sing as I have, in his bare little Tremont-street studio, they would crown his unruly red, gold hair with laurel.

When he is wretched and discouraged and miserable, ah! how he sings. I can hear his voice vibrating through the empty hallways now, singing "He Cometh to Bring Us Salvation." It is very sad. I almost forget to laugh at him, even when I stop to think that by simply saying "Yes" the poor musician could become a rich tradesman.

He has an uncle who refuses to recognize him and his art, but is willing should he give it up, to take him into his own household, treat him as a son, and make him a member of an old-established business firm.

This young fellow almost makes me think there are some things and people money cannot buy.

On the other side of the same inexpensive table a railroad magnate sits. His face is shrewd and sharp and keen. He sips his wine indifferently, and a cynical smile often plays about the corner of his mouth at some quiet thought which comes to him. Yet during certain numbers on the program something of the poor music teacher's soul shines in the railroad magnate's eyes. There is a bond of sympathy between this stern, unyielding man of business and the sensitive, unworldly musician who often blushes like a girl.

A little later in the evening I shall see them nodding and smiling approval at each other as they keep time to the music with their fingers.

There is so much to amuse me here that I come night after night.

I laugh so merrily at the people with the blank, uncomprehending expression in their eyes, who applaud so vigorously.

The people who only come to stare and be stared at interest me as do the people who hunger and thirst after Bohemia in a timid, respectable way.

The music, the light and the gayety fascinate me, for after all I am only a moth miller, a night butterfly.

From the Herald of May 13, 1896, may be gleaned a bit of background from the earliest days.

The eleventh season of Promenade concerts, more familiarly called the "Pops" [this writer records] opened with all the proper ceremonies, and proved, as in the past, how magnetic is the lighter music. It is pleasant to compare these full fledged, easy-going functions with the first "Pop" concert of a decade ago, and to remember how shyly Boston behaved when it was first bidden to smoke and drink to the cheerful strains of a good orchestra. In those days the band was not the ne plus ultra aggregate of musicians that it is now. Music Hall was somewhat fresher, too, and great Symphony concerts had not mellowed Apollo, or set Beethoven on a back seat as it were; there was no sounding board to lend an air of a country meetinghouse shed to the dear old auditorium, but in the center of the hall fluttered and frisked a fountain, and pots of tall shrubbery dotted the stage and floor, interspersed with tables and chairs. These latter were few and far between, and it must be confessed that the occupants thereof looked somewhat lonesome while trying to adapt themselves to a beer garden style of enjoyment, then so foreign to conservative Boston ideas.

It took more than one season to accustom the town to this delightful innovation: the knowing and experienced patrons accepted it at once, but the majority was won by degeres, yet so completely in the end that the fountain

Continued on Following Page

[Reprinted from the London Times]

At the Pops

Continued from Preceding Page

and potted shrubbery disappeared to make room for the more decorative and numerous summer girl and her smoky escort. Season after season this patronage increased. Harvard recuperated under the balcony, and all the "floating seaside population" found out what a fascinating thing it is to mix waltzes with smoke and beer. As soon as society took a hand in the game, the "Pops" won their fashionable spurs, and rode to success and glory. Then, too, the choice of conductors has had great weight in keeping interest in these concerts at fever heat. The summer was a reflection of the winter, so that everybody felt the classical, serious music of Mr. Paur's orchestra was, for the nonce, turned to the sparkling and blossomy tunes, to be listened to without effort, but with the comfort of knowing that all is good.

A chapter might be written on this evolution of the "Pop" concerts, but the attainment of their eleventh season is an eloquent argument for lighter music, and a proof positive that Boston is a city second to none in its love of the divine art. Had the orchestra been of an indifferent caliber, or had less care been taken in making the programs, it is a question if even the attraction of drink and cigars could have sustained the giddy series through so many years. There has always been dash and go to the performances, and, consequently, their novelty has remained unchallenged. But not to go to the "Pops" is to deprive music lovers of a phase of time-killing that cannot be too highly commended.

The spectacle of Music Hall, the opening night, bore testimony to the truth that nothing succeeds like success, for the floor was packed with tables and their social groups of representative Bostonians. It was a gay scene viewed through a cloud of smoke. Talk and snappy matches, with the swish of the omnipresent waiters, and the clink of glasses punctured the quieter passages of the playing; but, as this is the principal charm of a promenade concert people shouldn't be offended by such interruptions. It has been proved again and again that these gatherings would lose all their magnetism for the public if the habitué was obliged to be mute. M. Zach makes the request on his program for silence during performances of certain numbers, but tactfully refrains from rapping on the conductor's desk, the pedagogic fashion of some of his predecessors. Beyond this, however anxious enthusiasts may be to hear every note of a favorite piece, it is not wise to go. On

---

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March from the Opera, "The Prophet" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to Shakespeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
"Aragon" from the "Spanish Suite" Albeniz
Czardas, "Hejre Kati" ...... Hubay
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
Meditation from the Opera, "Thais" Massenet
(Violinist: Mr. Theodorowicz)
Finale from the Symphony in F minor .... Chaikovsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" ... . Romberg
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Fox Trot, "Strike Up the Band" Gershwin

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—Outside a Russian program on Monday and a renewal of the "Gay Nineties Night" on Wednesday, The Pops next week will run familiar course. . . . The Russian program includes a repetition of Mossolov's "Music of Machines," more particularly in a Soviet Iron Foundry, with the shaken steel sheet and the out-turned horns that amused a week ago. Out of these horns, however, song rises, as some say the song of man the master of machines. Otherwise, Chaikovsky thrice over, Rimsky-Korsakov, Musorgsky, Glazunov and Rakhmaninov fill the list.

There will be no other conductor than Mr. Fiedler at the second "Gay Nineties Night." From the programs of those days he has unearthed such favorite pieces as Keler-Bela's Overture, "Ungarische Lustspiel" and Ochs's " 'S Kommit ein Vogel Geflogen," which is a set of variations on a folk-tune in the manner of easily recognizable composers. . . . Mr. Sidow will repeat this celebrated "rendition" (as the Nineties might have called it) of "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" as solo for bass-tuba. . . . Mr. Sanromá is searching the "literature" of the time for an appropriate piano-piece. . . . An advance-copy of the program also contains this mysterious item: "News-Flashes of the Nineties—by Magic Lantern." Possibly Symphony Hall is taking a hint

---

At the Pops Trans May 13

There will be no other conductor than Mr. Fiedler at the second "Gay Nineties Night," next Wednesday. From the programs of those days he has unearthed such favorite pieces as Keler-Bela's Overture, "Ungarische Lustspiel" and Ochs's " 'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen," which is a set of variations on a folk-tune in the manner of easily recognizable composers. . . . Mr. Sidow will repeat his celebrated "rendition" (as the Nineties might have called it) of "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" as solo for bass-tuba. . . . Mr. Sanromá is searching the "literature" of the time for an appropriate piano-piece. . . . An advance-copy of the program also contains this mysterious item: "News-Flashes of the Nineties—by Magic Lantern." Possibly, Symphony Hall is taking a hint from "The Camera Eye" of Mr. Dos Passos's novels.

The promised "Selection" from Mr. Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing" is announced for first performance on Saturday week, May 21. . . . At the "Sunday Pop" on May 22, Mr. Fiedler will again exhibit his relic from Beethoven, "Wellington's Victory or the Battle at Vittoria." For the first time also Mr. Sanromá will play the piano-part in Weber's "Concert Piece."

The Listener

THE "GAY NINETIES," popularly and pop-concertedly commemorated at Symphony Hall, were indeed always fairly gay, for Boston, at the hall, but in the country at large they were not so gay. On the whole, the phrase is a misnomer. It was the decade of Mr. Bryan's disturbances, with a period of depression in it, of the blowing up of the Maine and of all the hunger and sickness of the Spanish-American war, and of all the languid, decadent sentiment of the "fin de siècle" period. Feminine costumes were preposterous, and most of the literature was tiresome. It was as if people wanted to be gay, but were too tired out with Victorianism to be able to manage it. It was the decade, too, when Thomas Hardy gave up writing novels, under the shock of the unintelligent reception of his greatest work of fiction, "Jude the Obscure." The period should be called decadent, not gay. The eighties were more vital, and so were the first ten years of the present century. If the nineties had been omitted from the calendar altogether the world would not have missed them greatly, though we should not then have had the Philippines—which we are now trying to get rid of.

---

also turn the pages.

Incident and Prospect Trans May 16

The return to the Nineties at the Pops has caught the fancy of the town. Every table at Symphony Hall is already taken for the second "Gay Nineties" evening next Wednesday. . . . Mr. Fiedler, looking up dates, has discovered that "The Prince of Pilsen" followed the turn into the twentieth century. Hence a "grand selection," not from it, but from Herbert's "Fortune-Teller," A. D. 1898.

H. T. P.

In Records Of Old Days At The Pops

The Gay Nineties ad Libitum, Riotous "Harvard Night," Notes by a Butterfly

FOR the time being the Gay Nineties are in high favor at the Pops. On Tuesday evening, in the music, costumes, refreshments and equipages there was a suggestion of the concerts of forty years ago. On Wednesday of next week the occasion will be repeated. In the meantime it may be amusing to gather from accounts printed in the newspapers of the period something of the flavor of the time. First from the Globe of June 16, 1896:

"Everything last night was crimson in Music Hall, for it was Harvard Night at the 'Pops.' Crimson bunting and flags, crimson colored programs, girls in crimson waists and boys with crimson scarfs drinking crimson wine.

"Over the platform hung a list of the glorious victories won this season by the Harvard baseball team—fifteen in all—and the audience was largely made up of Harvard students and their friends.

"The house was packed, and strange to say it was an extremely quiet crowd for about two hours, or until No. 11 on the program was reached. This was 'Fair Harvard,' and the students in the audience decided that they wanted to give that part of the concert themselves. So about 700 of them made a rush for the platform.

"The musicians were panic stricken—fiddles, 'cellos, horns, drums, and piccolos fled in consternation. The industrious little artist who works the snare and kettle drums and several other implements had all he could do to save his chattels, and the three big double basses sought refuge in flight. Nothing could stay the progress of the athletic young students.

"They mounted the platform from all directions, and then one of them attempted to give 'Fair Harvard' as a solo. If he had had a voice like a steam calliope he might have been heard, but his notes were drowned in the pandemonium that reigned. So the whole crowd took up the strain and fairly lifted the roof with their ear-splitting endeavors to sing.

"It was a great success, as far as noise was concerned. Then they sang one or two other songs, which seemed to offer a safety valve for their enthusiasm.

"Quiet was soon restored, and the banished musicians were allowed to return to their places and give the final number on the program, which contained many selections from Hasty Pudding and Pi Eta operettas."

* * *

There were details of setting that should not be forgotten. The Journal of May 12, 1895, calls attention to some of them, along with wise admonitions to its readers:

"There is an inclosure, not a pen, as certain disagreeable persons have insisted, for the purpose of preserving class distinctions, but for exhibiting, as in a microcosm, the true democratic feeling that exists in Boston; it exists quietly; it is just a little shy; but it exists. In this pen—if you will have it so, oh Thersites—Columbus Avenue and Marlborough Street are in elbow-jostling proximity. Entrance to it is obtained by purchase, not by an affidavit concerning the validity of a grandfather. Mr. Newbury, in his choicest Bostonese, asks Mr. Cove if he will be good enough to let him look at a program a minute, and Mr. Cove replies, 'Why, cert' '; and the feet of them tap time to the strains of the waltz.

"Is it possible that some, stern-faced, may object to synchronous deglutition of food and music? Perish the thought! There should be food served at Symphony concerts. The system fortified by a boiled New England dinner would withstand the colossal works of Brahms. Nourished judiciously, a Saturday evening audience would no longer seem at departure an anaemic, etiolated race. So with light music, there are very properly 'light refreshments,' and let them be light, without ironic twist or turn. 'Truly, now,' said Michael Mail, 'there's a friendly tie of some sort between music and eating.'

"Listen to the music and delight in rhythm and melody; learn that such pleasure is to be shared in common with citizens and citizenesses; you may never have been introduced, oh Mr. Cabotsworth, and yet they are happy without an intimate knowledge of your mental accomplishments and private views; but, for once, smile pleasantly on the crowd and without thought of incredible social complications. Eat and drink together decently and in moderation. That girl with fish-pool eyes is pretty, even if she is not a patroness of art. That old gentleman has an honest, kindly face, even if he is not a member of your club. One word of caution. When you eat, choose the occasion of a slow movement. If you devour an ice during a waltz or a galop, sympathy will lead to haste and indigestion. Above all, dismiss thought of business. There is but one golden thought at a 'Popular concert: 'I loafe and invite my soul.' "

* * *

Sartorial information is to be obtained from an item in the Daily Advertiser of May 16, 1896. It begins with the simple statement that some of the costumes worn at the 'pop' concert were beautiful"—not all of them, but some of them. It continues:

"A very striking one was of black and white figured silk, with straps of white chiffon forming a great Maltese cross on each sleeve, and the chiffon insertion relieving also the yoke. Stock and girdle and cuffs were of hunter's green velvet. The hat was a Manila sailor, with a big oriflamme of black and white striped ribbon, and purple white violets and green leaves.

"Not far from the stage was a woman who wore one of those startling 'bandana' waists with black crepon sleeves, the waist itself being one of those which were made up during the winter by the dry goods houses of from four to six 'bandana' handkerchiefs, which retail at from $1 to $1.50—the finished waist being sold at something like $25.

"One woman in a party of three ladies with one man (and that man had left his wife at home, for I know him, horrid thing) wore a costume of green cloth with melon sleeves and trimmed with mink, with sleeves having straps of the mink, and a boa of mink encircling the neck.

"One striking costume showed sleeves of dotted yellow silk, the jacket front of Persian silk, the bodice of pale blue and two mink tails pendant; and the hat of black straw with two big black plumes rising from the center of the crown and the brim bordered with a white lace frill the hat set at a zipping angle! At the same table with this young lady sat another, who was gowned soberly in black but whose hat was a marvel—of black straw, with a wreath of pink roses full blown and buds, green leaves, and a big white satin bow set just between two gigantic Mercury wings.

"The men who sat within the sacred precincts of the rail were many of them in full dress, but only one white waistcoat was noticed. Outside the rail just one solitary man in evening clothes was observed.

"A young man in company with a pretty girl fell asleep during the playing of the "Ride of the Valkyries,' Wagner's most tempestuous passages.

"The Harvard boys too seem latterly to be restraining their natural desire to run things, and their natural propensity to make a noise. Of course, it may be because they do not nowadays have anything to make a noise over. But that is a rather cruel suggestion."

To a writer in the Post, whose identity is concealed beneath the modest nom de plume of "The Society Girl." may be left the task of painting a picture of the audience. She writes:

I am only a moth, a miller, a night butterfly, anything you like, but oh, what a lot I know, what a very great deal I have seen, and I have only been out one season.

All winter long I fluttered everywhere, from the theater to the ballroom, from the banquet hall to the private supper room, and now every night those who know where to look for me will find me here at the "Pop" concerts.

Few notice me, and so unobserved I see everything and everybody. All the people with whom I have become acquainted during the winter drift in one by one, and I think of the times and the places where I have seen them and I take a keen pleasure in recalling it all and watching them in these new surroundings. Someone has said: "Life is a comedy to him who thinks, a tragedy to him who feels." I am only a moth, so I have no soul. I never feel. I only laugh, and oh, so heartily, at the unconscious comedians who compose the human race.

Novelists sit in their studies and rack their brains for types and plots with unwritten romance happening underneath their very windows.

Through the smoke which curls up from the cigars in the Music Hall below, I see five hundred men and women, any one of whom has a life story, which faithfully painted would make one writer famous.

Each man is a hero or a villain in his own little world, usually a mixture of both.

Eash woman is a saint or a sinner oftener something of each.

I look at first one and then the other and amuse myself.

I watch the girl who sits at the fifth table back in the center to right and admire her.

Is she not beautiful, with her dainty Dresden china face?

Her lips are as red as the leaves of a Jacqueminot rose; nobody but myself notices how thin and selfish they will be when the color fades. Her features are as clear-cut as an exquisite cameo; nobody but myself knows that it is wine which has put the delecate coloring in her cheeks and the sparkle in her eyes.

Ah! What a pace she goes! She lives more in two weeks than many women do in all their lives.

The unmistakable stamp of dissipation has not yet appeared upon her face, and shall be gone before it comes, so I shall be spared that annoyance, and I see her now as one of the most beautiful girls in Boston—the girl with the Dresden china face.

* * *

With his back to the orchestra and staring insolently into the faces of those in front of him, I see a man whose heart has never known a throb of tenderness, of kindness or of sympathy for years. The blood in his veins is ice. His heart is a machine. He is an officer in the United States Navy and is invited everywhere. He pays his poker debts and is called a man of honor, but I saw him blast a young girl's reputation by a shrug of his shoulders and an insinuating sneer. Still he makes the most perfect smoke rings I ever saw and is an excellent pistol shot, both of which, of course, are very much to his credit

There, close to the railing, on the left, is a man who looks like an undertaker, but he is a politician.

He smiles and bows and sees everybody. He will always see everybody until after election, for he is a candidate for an office. He is a lean and hungry Cassius, with an ambition which knows no check.

I have seen him in his quiet moments throw his head back upon his office chair and dream of dignities and honors so high that I dare not even whisper them.

His wife is always at home now, bet then she is a dowdy little thing, and loves him a great deal, which of course is a nuisance.

Next to the politician's table is a famous society beauty She does not say much, because she does not know what to say. Her father is very rich and the society reporters say she is beautiful, and she trustingly believes them.

If she sold hooks and eyes in a shop, the same reporters might think she had a very long nose, and they possibly might notice that her ears stuck out from her head in a conspicuous manner; but a girl with a million never has a long nose.

Sitting at one of the inexpensive outside tables I see a man in a shabby coat, who scarcely seems to breathe when the orchestra is playing.

He is a music teacher, very ambitious and very poor; so poor is he that I have seen him lay his head upon his arms and let the tears trickle down upon the ivory keys of the piano because he was hungry and because his shabby shoes and hat so hurt his pride.

Nobody but he and I know how much he has endured and suffered, and nobody but ourselves know the exquisite pleasure he has derived from feeling that he was sacrificing for his art's sake.

Music is his life. It is food and drink and happiness—it is everything to him. If the world could only see and hear him sing as I have, in his bare little Tremont-street studio, they would crown his unruly red, gold hair with laurel.

When he is wretched and discouraged and miserable, ah! how he sings. I can hear his voice vibrating through the empty hallways now, singing "He Cometh to Bring Us Salvation." It is very sad. I almost forget to laugh at him, even when I stop to think that by simply saying "Yes" the poor musician could become a rich tradesman.

He has an uncle who refuses to recognize him and his art, but is willing should he give it up, to take him into his own household, treat him as a son, and make him a member of an old-established business firm.

This young fellow almost makes me think there are some things and people money cannot buy.

On the other side of the same inexpensive table a railroad magnate sits. His face is shrewd and sharp and keen. He sips his wine indifferently, and a cynical smile often plays about the corner of his mouth at some quiet thought which comes to him. Yet during certain numbers on the program something of the poor music teacher's soul shines in the railroad magnate's eyes. There is a bond of sympathy between this stern, unyielding man of business and the sensitive, unworldly musician who often blushes like a girl.

A little later in the evening I shall see them nodding and smiling approval at each other as they keep time to the music with their fingers.

There is so much to amuse me here that I come night after night.

I laugh so merrily at the people with the blank, uncomprehending expression in their eyes, who applaud so vigorously.

The people who only come to stare and be stared at interest me as do the people who hunger and thirst after Bohemia in a timid, respectable way.

The music, the light and the gayety fascinate me, for after all I am only a moth miller, a night butterfly.

From the Herald of May 13, 1896, may be gleaned a bit of background from the earliest days.

The eleventh season of Promenade concerts, more familiarly called the "Pops" [this writer records] opened with all the proper ceremonies, and proved, as in the past, how magnetic is the lighter music. It is pleasant to compare these full fledged, easy-going functions with the first "Pop" concert of a decade ago, and to remember how shyly Boston behaved when it was first bidden to smoke and drink to the cheerful strains of a good orchestra. In those days the band was not the ne plus ultra aggregate of musicians that it is now. Music Hall was somewhat fresher, too, and great Symphony concerts had not mellowed Apollo, or set Beethoven on a back seat as it were; there was no sounding board to lend an air of a country meetinghouse shed to the dear old auditorium, but in the center of the hall fluttered and frisked a fountain, and pots of tall shrubbery dotted the stage and floor, interspersed with tables and chairs. These latter were few and far between, and it must be confessed that the occupants thereof looked somewhat lonesome while trying to adapt themselves to a beer garden style of enjoyment, then so foreign to conservative Boston ideas.

It took more than one season to accustom the town to this delightful innovation: the knowing and experienced patrons accepted it at once, but the majority was won by degeres, yet so completely in the end that the fountain

Continued on Following Page

[Reprinted from the London Times]

At the Pops

Continued from Preceding Page

and potted shrubbery disappeared to make room for the more decorative and numerous summer girl and her smoky escort. Season after season this patronage increased. Harvard recuperated under the balcony, and all the "floating seaside population" found out what a fascinating thing it is to mix waltzes with smoke and beer. As soon as society took a hand in the game, the "Pops" won their fashionable spurs, and rode to success and glory. Then, too, the choice of conductors has had great weight in keeping interest in these concerts at fever heat. The summer was a reflection of the winter, so that everybody felt the classical, serious music of Mr. Paur's orchestra was, for the nonce, turned to the sparkling and blossomy tunes, to be listened to without effort, but with the comfort of knowing that all is good.

A chapter might be written on this evolution of the "Pop" concerts, but the attainment of their eleventh season is an eloquent argument for lighter music, and a proof positive that Boston is a city second to none in its love of the divine art. Had the orchestra been of an indifferent caliber, or had less care been taken in making the programs, it is a question if even the attraction of drink and cigars could have sustained the giddy series through so many years. There has always been dash and go to the performances, and, consequently, their novelty has remained unchallenged. But not to go to the "Pops" is to deprive music lovers of a phase of time-killing that cannot be too highly commended.

The spectacle of Music Hall, the opening night, bore testimony to the truth that nothing succeeds like success, for the floor was packed with tables and their social groups of representative Bostonians. It was a gay scene viewed through a cloud of smoke. Talk and snappy matches, with the swish of the omnipresent waiters, and the clink of glasses punctured the quieter passages of the playing; but, as this is the principal charm of a promenade concert, people shouldn't be offended by such interruptions. It has been proved again and again that these gatherings would lose all their magnetism for the public if the habitué was obliged to be mute. M. Zach makes the request on his program for silence during performances of certain numbers, but tactfully refrains from rapping on the conductor's desk, in the pedagogic fashion of some of his predecessors. Beyond this, however anxious enthusiasts may be to hear every note of a favorite piece, it is not wise to go. One listens, or one speaks, and the freedom of a partie carree, in that respect, has given the "Pops" long life and favor among some of the most musical people in the city.

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March from the Opera, "The Prophet" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to Shakespeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
"Aragon" from the "Spanish Suite" Albeniz
Czardas, "Hejre Kati" ...... Hubay
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Meditation from the Opera, "Thais" Massenet
(Violinist: Mr. Theodorowicz)
Finale from the Symphony in F minor ....Chaikovsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" ....Romberg
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .....Waldteufel
Fox Trot, "Strike Up the Band" Gershwin

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—Outside a Russian program on Monday and a renewal of the "Gay Nineties Night" on Wednesday, The Pops next week will run familiar course. . . . The Russian program includes a repetition of Mossolov's "Music of Machines," more particularly in a Soviet Iron Foundry, with the shaken steel sheet and the out-turned horns that amused a week ago. Out of these horns, however, song rises, as some say the song of man the master of machines. Otherwise, Chaikovsky thrice over, Rimsky-Korsakov, Musorgsky, Glazunov and Rakhmaninov fill the list.

There will be no other conductor than Mr. Fiedler at the second "Gay Nineties Night." From the programs of those days he has unearthed such favorite pieces as Keler-Bela's Overture, "Ungarische Lustspiel" and Ochs's " 'S Kommit ein Vogel Geflogen," which is a set of variations on a folk-tune in the manner of easily recognizable composers. . . . Mr. Sidow will repeat this celebrated "rendition" (as the Nineties might have called it) of "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" as solo for bass-tuba. . . . Mr. Sanromá is searching the "literature" of the time for an appropriate piano-piece. . . . An advance-copy of the program also contains this mysterious item: "News-Flashes of the Nineties—by Magic Lantern." Possibly, Symphony Hall is taking a hint from "The Camera Eye" of Mr. Dos Passos's novels. . . . A special brew of beer will flow as on last Tuesday; the bicycle-rack will be in waiting in the corridor; the more who dress in the fashion of those nineties the better. As last week, a prize goes to the most characteristic table.

Otherwise there is little to note: the reappearance on Tuesday of "Sally in Our Alley" as arranged for orchestra by Bridge; the re-entry on Thursday of numbers from "The Mikado"; a dip on Friday into the eighteenth century with dances of Gluck; on Saturday, at last, the promised "selection" from "Of Thee I Sing," hitherto represented only by Mr. Wintergreen's' torchlight procession.

---

also turn the pages.

Incident and Prospect Trans May 16

The return to the Nineties at the Pops has caught the fancy of the town. Every table at Symphony Hall is already taken for the second "Gay Nineties" evening next Wednesday. . . . Mr. Fiedler, looking up dates, has discovered that "The Prince of Pilsen" followed the turn into the twentieth century. Hence a "grand selection," not from it, but from Herbert's "Fortune-Teller," A. D. 1898. H. T. P.

INTERESTING POPS LIST FOR THE CURRENT WEEK

May 15

The hundreds who missed the merry doings of last Tuesday's Gay Nineties Night at the Pops may, if they bestir themselves, attend its sequel this Wednesday evening. The management hopes that all will this time come in the costumes of that vanished epoch, and the best table will receive a prize. The beer and the bicycle-racks of the earlier evening will again be in evidence, and an additional attraction will be newsflashes of the nineties by "magic-lantern."

* * * *

Old favorites will make the programme of this Nineties Night: Spindler's "Charge of the Hussars," the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance," Keler-Bela's "Ungarische Lustspiel" Overture, Ochs' "Variations on a German Folk-Song" after the manner of various composers, Vollstedt's waltz, "Jolly Fellows"; a selection from Luders' "The Prince of Pilsen," and "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," played as a tuba solo by Mr. Sidow. Besides this, there will be a pianoforte solo, as yet unspecified, from Mr. Sanroma, and the programme will close with a medley of popular songs of the nineties, most of them those that the audience of last Tuesday evening heard and sang with such relish.

* * * *

Other special nights in the immediate future are a Russian programme announced for tomorrow evening that ranges chronologically from Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmillah" through Mossolov's sensational "Soviet Iron Foundry," first heard in Boston at the Pop Concert of last Sunday evening. A week from tonight brings the second Sunday concert, and on this programme Mr. Fiedler has placed that curious composition, Beethoven's "Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria," which had gone unheard in this city for 85 years until Mr. Fiedler revived it last winter at a concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra. The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky begins this programme, and the remaining numbers are Ravel's "Bolero" and Weber's Concert-Piece for piano and orchestra, descriptive of the absent and returning Crusader, in which Mr. Sanroma will bear the solo part.

* * * *

The other programmes of the week adhere to what is now the convention of the Pops, a judicious blend of music, old and new, light and semi-serious. Thus Tuesday's programme lists both Cadman's "At Dawning" and the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," finds room for the "Light Cavalry" overture of Suppe and for selections from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

* * * *

The extremes of Thursday's programme may be set down as the March "Wintergreen for President," from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," and Siegfried's "Rhine-Journey," from Wagner's "The Dusk of the Gods," with operatic numbers from Rossini, Verdi, Offenbach, Korngold and Sullivan in between.

* * * *

Two members of the orchestra will be heard as soloists on Friday evening: Mr. Theodorowicz, concertmaster of the Pops orchestra, will play Wilhelmj's transcription of Schubert's "Ave Maria," accompanied by harp, organ and strings, and Mr. Langendoen will play as 'cello solo the "Song to the Evening Star," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

* * * *

Mr. Theodorowicz will be heard as soloist again on Saturday evening, when he plays the Largo of Handel. Mendelssohn's Overture, "Fingal's Cave," unjustly neglected at the Symphony Concerts of late years, will have place on this final programme of the week, which also offers pieces by Deslibes, Debussy, Grieg and Gillet, the last-named represented by his "Loin du bal," successfully revived at the recent Gay Nineties Night. And there will also be a selection from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NILES, MICH.
DAILY STAR
MAY 14 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop" concerts, when Boston symphony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretensions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practice. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program. On Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be at hand. The second Sunday program a week from tonight will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard for 85 years in Boston when Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season past.

May 15

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 16

Hopak, from The Fair of Sorotchinsk ... Moussorgsky
Overture to Russian and Ludmilla...Glinka
Hymn to the Sun from Le Coq d'Or ... Rimsky-Korsakov
Soviet Iron Foundry..............Mossolov
Eugen Onegin, Fantasia
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings
Marche Slave ... Tchaikovsky
Prelude in G minor..........Rachmaninoff
Volga Bargemen's Song ... Arranged by Jacchia
Panaderos, Spanish Dance........Glazounov

TUESDAY EVENING

First Slavonic Dance..............Dvorak
Overture to Light Cavalry...........Suppe
The Firebird, Berceuse........ Stravinsky
Bacchanale from Samson and Delilah ... Saint-Saens
Spanish Dance from La Vida Breve ... de Falla
Sally in Our Alley, Old English Song ... Arranged by Frank Bridge
Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg, Excerpts ... Wagner
Artist's Life, Waltz...............Strauss
At Dawning...............Cadman-Herbert
Aragonaise, from The Cid..........Massenet

WEDNESDAY EVENING
("Gay Nineties" Night)

Charge of the Hussars..........Spindler
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte Solo (selected) ... Jesus Maria Sanroma
Ungarische Lustspiel.......... Keler-Bela
'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen; variations on a German Folksong, in the styles of different masters ... Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties (By Magic Lantern)
Waltz, Jolly Fellows.............Vollstedt
Selection, The Prince of Pilsen..... Luders
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep....Knight
Tuba solo, Mr. Paul Sidow
Popular Song Hits

THURSDAY EVENING

Military Polonaise...... Chopin-Glazounov
Overture to The Barber of Seville ..Rossini
Perpetuum Mobile..................Strauss
Aida, Fantasia......................Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from Gotterdammerung ... Wagner
Dance Song of Pierrot, from Die Tote Stadt ... Korngold
The Mikado, selection...........Sullivan
Estudiantina, waltz.......... Waldteufel
Barcarolle from The Tales of Hoffman ... Offenbach
March, Wintergreen for President, from Of Thee I Sing ... Gershwin

FRIDAY EVENING

March from Der Obersteiger..........Zeller
Overture to The Merry Wives of W

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WILLIMANTIC, CONN
CHRONICLE
MAY 16 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop" concerts, when Boston symphony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretensions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the
ey pretended a virtue and did not practise. Our ge is considered to be d from these restraints, ncerity as the highest

n of our present frankberalism is only another ynicism and skepticism.
d to enjoy our coarsest
nd consider them noble.
never made progress by e beasts of the field.
of the "gay nineties"
ularly barren to us now.
biles, no movies, no ratoilsomely they jogged ind lazy old Dobbin, see-little fragment of the they found their gaiety
ays. Instead of burning pots in swift motor par-had evenings of happi-
g college songs on the
and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

---

ngland—MAY 15, 1932—Telephone Liberty 4000

E DRAMA'S LA

'Gay Nineties' Night Will Be Repeated at Pops Wednesday

AN all-Russian program tomorrow and another "Gay Nineties Night" on Wednesday are some of the delights that Conductor Arthur Fiedler has arranged for Pops audiences this week at Symphony Hall.

The Russian concert opens with Moussorgsky's rousing Hopak from his opera "The Fair at Sorotchinsk" and includes such truly popular numbers as the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky - Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," Chaikovsky's "Marche Slave," and Rachmaninoff's Prelude in G-Minor.

Another feature of this concert is the repetition of Mossolov's ingenious tone-poem "Soviet Iron Foundry" in which it becomes necessary, at one point, for all the members of the orchestra to make as much noise as they possibly can.

The success of the "Gay Nineties Night" last Tuesday was so great that a repetition was deemed necessary. All those who have period costumes are urged by the management to get them out and wear them to the concert. Prizes will be given to the most picturesque table.

The Wednesday night program includes pieces by Spindler, Weber and Vollstedt. Sanroma will play some piano solos; and Paul Sidow will render, most appropriately, "Rocked In the Cradle of the Deep" on his tuba.

Tuesday night's program is made up of music by Bohemian, German, Russian and French composers, with the American Cadman thrown in for good measure. It includes a Slavonic dance by Dvorak, the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, and Cadman's "At Dawning."

The Thursday concert is devoted largely to selections from operas and operettas such as "The Barber of Seville," "Aida," "The Mikado," "The Tales of Hoffman," "Twilight of the Gods" and "Of Thee I Sing."

On Friday, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite and Chaikovsky's "1812" Overture will be features of the concert. Among other numbers scheduled to be played are the Shubert "Ave Maria," Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods," and selections from Tannhauser" with violincello solo by J. Langendoen.

The Saturday evening program includes a Dance by Debussy, orchestrated by Ravel; Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, selections from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," Handel's "Largo," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circum-

---

Third Week of the "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program.

Next Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" Night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer, bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be in evidence.

The second Sunday program, a week from tonight, will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard in Boston for 85 years until Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season just past.

The program of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 16—Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky; overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; hymn to the sun from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; "Eugen Onegin," fantasia, waltz from the serenade for strings, "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; prelude in G minor, Rachmaninoff; Volga Bargemen's song, arranged by Jacchia; "Panaderos," Spanish dance, Glazounov.

TUESDAY, MAY 17—First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; overture to "Light Cavalry," Suppe; the Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Spanish dance from "La Vida Breve," de Falla; "Sally in Our Alley," old England song, arranged by Frank Bridge; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," excerpts, Wagner; "Artist's Life," waltz, Strauss; "At Dawning," Cadman-Herbert; argonaise, from "The Cid," Massenet.

Wednesday, May 18, "Gay Nineties" Night. "Charge of the Hussars," Spindler; Invitation to the Dance, Weber-Berlioz; pianoforte solo (Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist); "Ungarische Lustspiel," Keler-Bela; "'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen"; variations on a German folk song, in the styles of different masters, Ochs; news flashes of the '90s, by magic lantern; waltz, "Jolly Fellows," Vollstedt; selection, "The Prince of Pilsen," Luders; "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" (tuba solo, Mr Paul Sidow), Knight; popular song hits.

Thursday, May 19, Military Polonaise, Chopin-Glazounov; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Perpetuum Mobile, Strauss; "Aida," Fantasia, Verdi; "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," from "Gotterdammerung," Wagner; "Dance Song of Pierrot," from "Die Tote Stadt," Korngold; "The Mikado," selection, Sullivan; "Estudiantina," waltz, Waldteufel; Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach; march, "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I sing," Gershwin.

Friday May 20, March from "Der Obersteiger," Zeller; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; "Peer Gynt," Suite, Grieg; Ballet Suite, Gluck-Mottl; Ave Maria (solo violin: J. Theodorowicz), Schubert-Wilhelmi; "Overture Solennelle, 1812," Tchaikovsky; "Tales from the Vienna Woods," waltz, Strauss; "Tannhauser," Introduction and song of the Evening Star (Violoncello solo: J. Langendoen), Wagner; "Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, Wagner.

Saturday May 21, "Norwegian Bridal Procession," Grieg; Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Waltz No. 15, Brahms-Gericke; "La Source," Ballet Suite, Delibes; "Scheherazade," Finale, Rimsky-Korsakov; Largo, Handel; Dance, (arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel), Debussy; "Of Thee I Sing," Selection, Gershwin; "Loin du Bal," Gillet; "Pomp and Circumstance" Elgar.

Sunday May 22, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36, Tchaikovsky; "Wellington's Victory," or "The Battle of Vittoria," Op. 91, Beethoven; Concert Piece in F minor for Pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 79 (soloist; Jesus Maria Sanroma), Weber; "Bolero," Ravel.

GLOBE MAY 15

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONESSEN, PA.
INDEPENDENT
MAY 16 1932

THE G

A reminiscence of t decade of the 19th century concerts, when Boston sym music of 40 years ago, he whom wore 19th century c now to the period referred back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretentions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practise. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked in wonder.

It was an age that startled innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

Record May 16

The WISDOM BOX

By George C. MacKinnon

Typewriter Quickie: Arthur Fiedler.
1—Early Uncertainties.

In Old German, "Fiedler" means "fiddler." Arthur Fiedler bears his last name for more than sufficient reasons. Look! His father, Emmanuel Fiedler, was first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—& is now, by the way, pensioned & living in Berlin.

Arthur Fiedler

His grandsire & great grandsire were, during their adult lives, in charge of all musical events in the little Austrian town where they lived. His uncle, Bernard Fiedler, is a Boston Symphony violinist. Another uncle, Gustav Fiedler, is a former Boston Symphony member . . . His sister, Elsa, is a professional pianist oft heard over the air from N. Y. . . . & as far back as can be traced, the Fiedlers have been musicians.

Well & truly do the Fiedlers rate their family name.

When people first gaze upon Arthur Fiedler, they usually think him French. When they hear his name, they think him German. As a matter of fact, the Fiedlers all come from Austria.

He has no middle name—for no particular reason that he knows of.

★

Approximate Birthplace . . .

He was born in Boston in 1894—"somewhere near West Cottage st."—he doesn't recall just where. He's "almost sure" he received his first name in honor of Arthur Nikish, the conductor.

He kindergartened at the Perkins School on Cumberland st., grammar-schooled at the Prince school, then entered Boston Latin.

He loathed the paste-&-colored paper delights of kindergarten. On many occasions his mother had to drag him to its imaginative games, its community-songful joys. His dislike for organized improvement of the child-mind (at least, insofar as it pertained to HIS child-mind), continued when he entered grammar school, nor did his hatred of being Improved dwindle, peak & pine when he reached high.

He hated mathematics the most, geography & languages the least.

Many times he buckled down & studied just in time to save himself from being ousted from high school.

An episode which occurred during one of the high school's monthly assemblies annoyed him more than anything else that ever happened to him in school. As he'd started early studying violin under his father's tutelage, he was often asked to play during these assemblies. At one assembly, rising to perform, he espied his parents in the audience. He decided he'd show them a thing or two anent violining. But he had evoked only a few notes when his father mounted the platform, took the violin from him, tuned it, handed it back to him. That made Arthur very angry indeed.

★

Outre Mer . . .

When 15 he checked out of Boston Latin & went with his family to live in Europe. Arrived there, Fiedler, Sr., inquired of Fiedler, Jr., whether he was desirous of continuing his book-learning. "That," replied Fiedler, Jr., "is the last thing I should like to do." So his father didn't make him go to school, though he made him study with a tutor for a while.

Finally it became clear he'd have to decide on a career. He wasn't sure he wanted to be a musician—thought he'd prefer being a business man. So he got a job in a Berlin publishing house. There he tried being a business man, which, in his case, consisted in running errands, wrapping bundles, & licking postage stamps. After a few days he began to think he wasn't going to like being a business man. After a couple of months he was sure he wouldn't like it. One of his crotchets has ever been to escape from doing things he doesn't like, whenever at all feasible. So he tendered his resignation to the publishing firm, causing no extensive agitation among its executives.

★

Next Monday: Enterprises, Ideas & Ideals of Boston's Most Successful Pops Conductor . . .

268

INTERESTING POPS LIST FOR THE CURRENT WEEK

MAY 15

The hundreds who missed the merry doings of last Tuesday's Gay Nineties Night at the Pops may, if they bestir themselves, attend its sequel this Wednesday evening. The management hopes that all will this time come in the costumes of that vanished epoch, and the best table will receive a prize. The beer and the bicycle-racks of the earlier evening will again be in evidence, and an additional attraction will be news-flashes of the nineties by "magic-lantern."

* * * *

Old favorites will make the programme of this Nineties Night: Spindler's "Charge of the Hussars," the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance," Keler-Bela's "Ungarische Lustspiel" Overture, Ochs' "Variations on a German Folk-Song" after the manner of various composers, Vollstedt's waltz, "Jolly Fellows"; a selection from Luders' "The Prince of Pilsen," and "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," played as a tuba solo by Mr. Sidow. Besides this, there will be a pianoforte solo, as yet unspecified, from Mr. Sanroma, and the programme will close with a medley of popular songs of the nineties, most of them those that the audience of last Tuesday evening heard and sang with such relish.

* * * *

Other special nights in the immediate future are a Russian programme announced for tomorrow evening that ranges chronologically from Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmillah" through Mossolov's sensational "Soviet Iron Foundry," first heard in Boston at the Pop Concert of last Sunday evening. A week from tonight brings the second Sunday concert, and on this programme Mr. Fiedler has placed that curious composition, Beethoven's "Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria," which had gone unheard in this city for 85 years until Mr. Fiedler revived it last winter at a concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra. The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky begins this programme, and the remaining numbers are Ravel's "Bolero" and Weber's Concert-Piece for piano and orchestra, descriptive of the absent and returning Crusader, in which Mr. Sanroma will bear the solo part.

* * * *

The other programmes of the week adhere to what is now the convention of the Pops, a judicious blend of music, old and new, light and semi-serious. Thus Tuesday's programme lists both Cadman's "At Dawning" and the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," finds room for the "Light Cavalry" overture of Suppe and for selections from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

* * * *

The extremes of Thursday's programme may be set down as the March "Wintergreen for President," from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," and Siegfried's "Rhine-Journey," from Wagner's "The Dusk of the Gods," with operatic numbers from Rossini, Verdi, Offenbach, Korngold and Sullivan in between.

* * * *

Two members of the orchestra will be heard as soloists on Friday evening: Mr. Theodorowicz, concertmaster of the Pops orchestra, will play Wilhelmj's transcription of Schubert's "Ave Maria," accompanied by harp, organ and strings, and Mr. Langendoen will play as 'cello solo the "Song to the Evening Star," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

* * * *

Mr. Theodorowicz will be heard as soloist again on Saturday evening, when he plays the Largo of Handel. Mendelssohn's Overture, "Fingal's Cave," unjustly neglected at the Symphony Concerts of late years, will have place on this final programme of the week, which also offers pieces by Deslibes, Debussy, Grieg and Gillet, the last-named represented by his "Loin du bal," successfully revived at the recent Gay Nineties Night. And there will also be a selection from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing."

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program. On Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer, bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be at hand. The second Sunday program a week from tonight will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard for 85 years in Boston when Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season past.

May 15

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 16

Hopak, from The Fair of Sorotchinsk ... Moussorgsky
Overture to Russian and Ludmilla ... Glinka
Hymn to the Sun from Le Coq d'Or ... Rimsky-Korsakov
Soviet Iron Foundry ... Mossolov
Eugen Onegin, Fantasia
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings
Marche Slave ... Tchaikovsky
Prelude in G minor ... Rachmaninoff
Volga Bargemen's Song ... Arranged by Jacchia
Panaderos, Spanish Dance ... Glazounov

TUESDAY EVENING

First Slavonic Dance ... Dvorak
Overture to Light Cavalry ... Suppe
The Firebird, Berceuse ... Stravinsky
Bacchanale from Samson and Delilah ... Saint-Saens
Spanish Dance from La Vida Breve ... de Falla
Sally in Our Alley, Old English Song ... Arranged by Frank Bridge
Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg, Excerpts ... Wagner
Artist's Life, Waltz ... Strauss
At Dawning ... Cadman-Herbert
Aragonaise, from The Cid ... Massenet

WEDNESDAY EVENING
("Gay Nineties" Night)

Charge of the Hussars ... Spindler
Invitation to the Dance ... Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte Solo (selected) ... Jesus Maria Sanroma
Ungarische Lustspiel ... Keler-Bela
'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen; variations on a German Folksong, in the styles of different masters ... Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties (By Magic Lantern)
Waltz, Jolly Fellows ... Vollstedt
Selection, The Prince of Pilsen ... Luders
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep ... Knight
Tuba solo, Mr. Paul Sidow
Popular Song Hits

THURSDAY EVENING

Military Polonaise ... Chopin-Glazounov
Overture to The Barber of Seville ... Rossini
Perpetuum Mobile ... Strauss
Aida, Fantasia ... Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from Gotterdammerung ... Wagner
Dance Song of Pierrot, from Die Tote Stadt ... Korngold
The Mikado, selection ... Sullivan
Estudiantina, waltz ... Waldteufel
Barcarolle from The Tales of Hoffman ... Offenbach
March, Wintergreen for President, from Of Thee I Sing ... Gershwin

FRIDAY EVENING

March from Der Obersteiger ... Zeller
Overture to The Merry Wives of Wi

---

ngland—MAY 15, 1932—Telephone Liberty 4000

E DRAMA'S LA

'Gay Nineties' Night Will Be Repeated at Pops Wednesday

AN all-Russian program tomorrow and another "Gay Nineties Night" on Wednesday are some of the delights that Conductor Arthur Fiedler has arranged for Pops audiences this week at Symphony Hall.

The Russian concert opens with Moussorgsky's rousing Hopak from his opera "The Fair at Sorotchinsk" and includes such truly popular numbers as the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," Chaikovsky's "Marche Slave," and Rachmaninoff's Prelude in G-Minor.

Another feature of this concert is the repetition of Mossolov's ingenious tone-poem "Soviet Iron Foundry" in which it becomes necessary, at one point, for all the members of the orchestra to make as much noise as they possibly can.

The success of the "Gay Nineties Night" last Tuesday was so great that a repetition was deemed necessary. All those who have period costumes are urged by the management to get them out and wear them to the concert. Prizes will be given to the most picturesque table.

The Wednesday night program includes pieces by Spindler, Weber and Vollstedt. Sanroma will play some piano solos; and Paul Sidow will render, most appropriately, "Rocked In the Cradle of the Deep" on his tuba.

Tuesday night's program is made up of music by Bohemian, German, Russian and French composers, with the American Cadman thrown in for good measure. It includes a Slavonic dance by Dvorak, the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, and Cadman's "At Dawning."

The Thursday concert is devoted largely to selections from operas and operettas such as "The Barber of Seville," "Aida," "The Mikado," "The Tales of Hoffman," "Twilight of the Gods" and "Of Thee I Sing."

On Friday, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite and Chaikovsky's "1812" Overture will be features of the concert. Among other numbers scheduled to be played are the Shubert "Ave Maria," Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods," and selections from "Tannhauser" with violincello solo by J. Langendoen.

The Saturday evening program includes a Dance by Debussy, orchestrated by Ravel; Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, selections from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," Handel's "Largo," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circum-

---

Third Week of the "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program.

Next Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" Night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer, bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be in evidence.

The second Sunday program, a week from tonight, will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard in Boston for 85 years until Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season just past.

The program of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 16—Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky; overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; hymn to the sun from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; "Eugen Onegin," fantasia, waltz from the serenade for strings, "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; prelude in G minor, Rachmaninoff; Volga Bargemen's song, arranged by Jacchia; "Panaderos," Spanish dance, Glazounov.

TUESDAY, MAY 17—First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; overture to "Light Cavalry," Suppe; the Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Spanish dance from "La Vida

---

Record May 16

The WISDOM BOX

By George C. MacKinnon

Typewriter Quickie: Arthur Fiedler.

1—Early Uncertainties.

In Old German, "Fiedler" means "fiddler." Arthur Fiedler bears his last name for more than sufficient reasons. Look! His father, Emmanuel Fiedler, was first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—& is now, by the way, pensioned & living in Berlin.

His grandsire & great grandsire were, during their adult lives, in charge of all musical events in the little Austrian town where they lived. His uncle, Bernard Fiedler, is a Boston Symphony violinist. Another uncle, Gustav Fiedler, is a former Boston Symphony member . . . His sister, Elsa, is a professional pianist oft heard over the air from N. Y. . . . & as far back as can be traced, the Fiedlers have been musicians.

Arthur Fiedler

Well & truly do the Fiedlers rate their family name.

When people first gaze upon Arthur Fiedler, they usually think him French. When they hear his name, they think him German. As a matter of fact, the Fiedlers all come from Austria.

He has no middle name—for no particular reason that he knows of.

★

Approximate Birthplace . . .

He was born in Boston in 1894—"somewhere near West Cottage st."—he doesn't recall just where. He's "almost sure" he received his first name in honor of Arthur Nikish, the conductor.

He kindergartened at the Perkins School on Cumberland st., grammar-schooled at the Prince school, then entered Boston Latin.

He loathed the paste-&-colored paper delights of kindergarten. On many occasions his mother had to drag him to its imaginative games, community-songful joys. His dislike for organized improvement of the child-mind (at least, insofar as it pertained to HIS child-mind), continued when he entered grammar school, nor did his hatred of being Improved dwindle, peak & decline when he reached high.

He hated mathematics the most, geography & languages the least. Many times he buckled down & studied just in time to save himself from being ousted from high school.

An episode which occurred during one of the high school's monthly assemblies annoyed him more than anything else that ever happened to him in school. As he'd started early studying violin under his father's tutelage, he was often asked to play during these assemblies. At one assembly, rising to perform, he espied his parents in the audience. He decided he'd show them a thing or two anent violining. But he had evoked only a few notes when his father mounted the platform, took the violin from him, tuned it, handed it back to him. That made Arthur very angry indeed.

★

Outre Mer . . .

When 15 he checked out of Boston Latin & went with his family to live in Europe. Arrived there, Fiedler, Sr., inquired of Fiedler, Jr., whether he was desirous of continuing his book-learning. "That," replied Fiedler, Jr., "is the last thing I should like to do." So his father didn't make him go to school, though he made him study with a tutor for a while.

Finally it became clear he'd have to decide on a career. He wasn't sure he wanted to be a musician—thought he'd prefer being a business man. So he got a job in a Berlin publishing house. There he tried being a business man, which, in his case, consisted in running errands, wrapping bundles, & licking postage stamps. After a few days he began to think he wasn't going to like being a business man. After a couple of months he was sure he wouldn't like it. One of his crotchets has ever been to escape from doing things he doesn't like, whenever at all feasible. So he tendered his resignation to the publishing firm, causing no extensive agitation among its executives.

★

Next Monday: Enterprises, Ideas & Ideals of Boston's Most Successful Pops Conductor . . .

THIS CLIPPING FROM NILES, MICH.
DAILY STAR

MAY 14 1932

THE GAY

A reminiscence c nineties," the last dec was given at the Bost Boston symphony orc music of 40 years ago ence many of whom tumes. One sees ma period referred to, an were back there.

The years 1890 to the "Victorian age," reigned in England, a now view with conte of insincere pretensio "limbs," they wore b the ground, they pret they did not practice. sidered to be eman straints, exalting si good.

scount fac
nd the co

the bene
heet the r

S AS

nent

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WILLIMANTIC, CONN
CHRONICLE

MAY 16 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop" concerts, when Boston symphony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretensions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suoits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practise. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONESSEN, PA.
INDEPENDENT

MAY 16 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the las decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop concerts, when Boston sympthony orchestra players presente music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience many o whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many reference now to the period referred to, and some people wish they wer back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows view with contempt. It is called a tim of insincere pretentions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended virtue and piety they did not practise. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism i only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. Th world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barre to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked in wonder.

It was an age that startled innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

208

INTERESTING POPS LIST FOR THE CURRENT WEEK

MAY 15

The hundreds who missed the merry doings of last Tuesday's Gay Nineties Night at the Pops may, if they bestir themselves, attend its sequel this Wednesday evening. The management hopes that all will this time come in the costumes of that vanished epoch, and the best table will receive a prize. The beer and the bicycle-racks of the earlier evening will again be in evidence, and an additional attraction will be news-flashes of the nineties by "magic-lantern."

* * * *

Old favorites will make the programme of this Nineties Night: Spindler's "Charge of the Hussars," the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance," Keler-Bela's "Ungarische Lustspiel" Overture, Ochs' "Variations on a German Folk-Song" after the manner of various composers, Vollstedt's waltz, "Jolly Fellows"; a selection from Luders' "The Prince of Pilsen," and "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," played as a tuba solo by Mr. Sidow. Besides this, there will be a pianoforte solo, as yet unspecified, from Mr. Sanroma, and the programme will close with a medley of popular songs of the nineties, most of them those that the audience of last Tuesday evening heard and sang with such relish.

* * * *

Other special nights in the immediate future are a Russian programme announced for tomorrow evening that ranges chronologically from Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmillah" through Mossolov's sensational "Soviet Iron Foundry," first heard in Boston at the Pop Concert of last Sunday evening. A week from tonight brings the second Sunday concert, and on this programme Mr. Fiedler has placed that curious composition, Beethoven's "Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria," which had gone unheard in this city for 85 years until Mr. Fiedler revived it last winter at a concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra. The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky begins this programme, and the remaining numbers are Ravel's "Bolero" and Weber's Concert-Piece for piano and orchestra, descriptive of the absent and returning Crusader, in which Mr. Sanroma will bear the solo part.

* * * *

The other programmes of the week adhere to what is now the convention of the Pops, a judicious blend of music, old and new, light and semi-serious. Thus Tuesday's programme lists both Cadman's "At Dawning" and the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," finds room for the "Light Cavalry" overture of Suppe and for selections from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

* * * *

The extremes of Thursday's programme may be set down as the March "Wintergreen for President," from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," and Siegfried's "Rhine-Journey," from Wagner's "The Dusk of the Gods," with operatic numbers from Rossini, Verdi, Offenbach, Korngold and Sullivan in between.

* * * *

Two members of the orchestra will be heard as soloists on Friday evening: Mr. Theodorowicz, concertmaster of the Pops orchestra, will play Wilhelmj's transcription of Schubert's "Ave Maria," accompanied by harp, organ and strings, and Mr. Langendoen will play as 'cello solo the "Song to the Evening Star," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

* * * *

Mr. Theodorowicz will be heard as soloist again on Saturday evening, when he plays the Largo of Handel. Mendelssohn's Overture, "Fingal's Cave," unjustly neglected at the Symphony Concerts of late years, will have place on this final programme of the week, which also offers pieces by Deslibes, Debussy, Grieg and Gillet, the last-named represented by his "Loin du bal," successfully revived at the recent Gay Nineties Night. And there will also be a selection from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing."

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program. On Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer, bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be at hand. The second Sunday program a week from tonight will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard for 85 years in Boston when Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season past.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 16

Hopak, from The Fair of Sorotchinsk	Moussorgsky
Overture to Russian and Ludmilla	Glinka
Hymn to the Sun from Le Coq d'Or	Rimsky-Korsakov
Soviet Iron Foundry	Mossolov
Eugen Onegin, Fantasia Waltz from the Serenade for Strings Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
Prelude in G minor	Rachmaninoff
Volga Bargemen's Song	Arranged by Jacchia
Panaderos, Spanish Dance	Glazounov

TUESDAY EVENING

First Slavonic Dance	Dvorak
Overture to Light Cavalry	Suppe
The Firebird, Berceuse	Stravinsky
Bacchanale from Samson and Delilah	Saint-Saens
Spanish Dance from La Vida Breve	de Falla
Sally in Our Alley, Old English Song	Arranged by Frank Bridge
Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg, Excerpts	Wagner
Artist's Life, Waltz	Strauss
At Dawning	Cadman-Herbert
Aragonaise, from The Cid	Massenet

WEDNESDAY EVENING

("Gay Nineties" Night)

Charge of the Hussars	Spindler
Invitation to the Dance	Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte Solo (selected) Jesus Maria Sanroma
Ungarische Lustspiel	Keler-Bela
'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen; variations on a German Folksong, in the styles of different masters	Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties (By Magic Lantern)
Waltz, Jolly Fellows	Vollstedt
Selection, The Prince of Pilsen	Luders
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep Tuba solo, Mr. Paul Sidow	Knight
Popular Song Hits

THURSDAY EVENING

Military Polonaise	Chopin-Glazounov
Overture to The Barber of Seville	Rossini
Perpetuum Mobile	Strauss
Aida, Fantasia	Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from Gotterdammerung	Wagner
Dance Song of Pierrot, from Die Tote Stadt	Korngold
The Mikado, selection	Sullivan
Estudiantina, waltz	Waldteufel
Barcarolle from The Tales of Hoffman	Offenbach
March, Wintergreen for President, from Of Thee I Sing	Gershwin

FRIDAY EVENING

March from Der Obersteiger	Zeller
Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor	Nicolai
Valse Triste	Sibelius
Peere Gynt, Suite	Grieg
Ballet Suite	Gluck-Mottl
Ave Maria Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; harp, organ and strings	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ouverture Solennelle, 1812	Tchaikovsky
Tales from the Vienna Woods, waltz	Strauss
Tannhauser, Introduction and Song of the Evening Star Violoncello solo, J. Langendoen	Wagner
Tannhauser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg	Wagner

SATURDAY EVENING

Norwegian Bridal Procession	Grieg
Overture, Fingal's Cave	Mendelssohn
Waltz No. 15	Brahms-Gericke
La Source, Ballet Suite	Delibes
Scheherazade, Finale	Rimsky-Korsakov
Largo	Handel
Dance (Arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel)	Debussy
Of Thee I Sing (selection)	Gershwin
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar

SUNDAY EVENING

Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36	Tchaikovsky
Wellington's Victory, or The Battle of Vittoria, Op. 91	Beethoven
Concert Piece in F minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79 Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma	Weber
Bolero

E DRAMA'S LA

'Gay Nineties' Night Will Be Repeated at Pops Wednesday

AN all-Russian program tomorrow and another "Gay Nineties Night" on Wednesday are some of the delights that Conductor Arthur Fiedler has arranged for Pops audiences this week at Symphony Hall.

The Russian concert opens with Moussorgsky's rousing Hopak from his opera "The Fair at Sorotchinsk" and includes such truly popular numbers as the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," Chaikovsky's "Marche Slave," and Rachmaninoff's Prelude in G-Minor.

Another feature of this concert is the repetition of Mossolov's ingenious tone-poem "Soviet Iron Foundry" in which it becomes necessary, at one point, for all the members of the orchestra to make as much noise as they possibly can.

The success of the "Gay Nineties Night" last Tuesday was so great that a repetition was deemed necessary. All those who have period costumes are urged by the management to get them out and wear them to the concert. Prizes will be given to the most picturesque table.

The Wednesday night program includes pieces by Spindler, Weber and Vollstedt. Sanroma will play some piano solos; and Paul Sidow will render, most appropriately, "Rocked In the Cradle of the Deep" on his tuba.

Tuesday night's program is made up of music by Bohemian, German, Russian and French composers, with the American Cadman thrown in for good measure. It includes a Slavonic dance by Dvorak, the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, and Cadman's "At Dawning."

The Thursday concert is devoted largely to selections from operas and operettas such as "The Barber of Seville," "Aida," "The Mikado," "The Tales of Hoffman," "Twilight of the Gods" and "Of Thee I Sing."

On Friday, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite and Chaikovsky's "1812" Overture will be features of the concert. Among other numbers scheduled to be played are the Shubert "Ave Maria," Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods," and selections from Tannhauser" with violincello solo by J. Langendoen.

The Saturday evening program includes a Dance by Debussy, orchestrated by Ravel; Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, selections from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," Handel's "Largo," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance."

Third Week of the "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program.

Next Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" Night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer, bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be in evidence.

The second Sunday program, a week from tonight, will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard in Boston for 85 years until Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season just past.

The program of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 16—Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky; overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; hymn to the sun from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; "Eugen Onegin," fantasia, waltz from the serenade for strings, "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; prelude in G minor, Rachmaninoff; Volga Bargemen's song, arranged by Jacchia; "Panaderos," Spanish dance, Glazounov.

TUESDAY, MAY 17—First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; overture to "Light Cavalry," Suppe; the Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint Saens; Spanish dance from "La Vida

---

Record May 16

The WISDOM BOX

By George C. MacKinnon

Typewriter Quickie: Arthur Fiedler.

1—Early Uncertainties.

In Old German, "Fiedler" means "fiddler." Arthur Fiedler bears his last name for more than sufficient reasons. Look! His father, Emmanuel Fiedler, was first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—& is now, by the way, pensioned & living in Berlin.

Arthur Fiedler

His grandsire & great grandsire were, during their adult lives, in charge of all musical events in the little Austrian town where they lived. His uncle, Bernard Fiedler, is a Boston Symphony violinist. Another uncle, Gustav Fiedler, is a former Boston Symphony member . . . His sister, Elsa, is a professional pianist oft heard over the air from N. Y. . . . & as far back as can be traced, the Fiedlers have been musicians.

Well & truly do the Fiedlers rate their family name.

When people first gaze upon Arthur Fiedler, they usually think him French. When they hear his name, they think him German. As a matter of fact, the Fiedlers all come from Austria.

He has no middle name—for no particular reason that he knows of.

★

Approximate Birthplace . . .

He was born in Boston in 1894—"somewhere near West Cottage st."—he doesn't recall just where. He's "almost sure" he received his first name in honor of Arthur Nikish, the conductor.

He kindergartened at the Perkins School on Cumberland st., grammar-schooled at the Prince school, then entered Boston Latin.

He loathed the paste-&-colored paper delights of kindergarten. On many occasions his mother had to g him to its imaginative games, community-songful joys. His like for organized improvement the child-mind (at least, insofar it pertained to HIS child-mind), ntinued when he entered grammar school, nor did his hatred of eing Improved dwindle, peak & ine when he reached high.

He hated mathematics the most, geography & languages the least. Many times he buckled down & studied just in time to save himself from being ousted from high school.

An episode which occurred during one of the high school's monthly assemblies annoyed him more than anything else that ever happened to him in school. As he'd started early studying violin under his father's tutelage, he was often asked to play during these assemblies. At one assembly, rising to perform, he espied his parents in the audience. He decided he'd show them a thing or two anent violining. But he had evoked only a few notes when his father mounted the platform, took the violin from him, tuned it, handed it back to him. That made Arthur very angry indeed.

★

Outre Mer . . .

When 15 he checked out of Boston Latin & went with his family to live in Europe. Arrived there, Fiedler, Sr., inquired of Fiedler, Jr., whether he was desirous of continuing his book-learning. "That," replied Fiedler, Jr., "is the last thing I should like to do." So his father didn't make him go to school, though he made him study with a tutor for a while.

Finally it became clear he'd have to decide on a career. He wasn't sure he wanted to be a musician—thought he'd prefer being a business man. So he got a job in a Berlin publishing house. There he tried being a business man, which, in his case, consisted in running errands, wrapping bundles, & licking postage stamps. After a few days he began to think he wasn't going to like being a business man. After a couple of months he was sure he wouldn't like it. One of his crotchets has ever been to escape from doing things he doesn't like, whenever at all feasible. So he tendered his resignation to the publishing firm, causing no extensive agitation among its executives.

★

Next Monday: Enterprises, Ideas & Ideals of Boston's Most Successful Pops Conductor . . .

Mussolini has his own special corps secret police who hunt down plotrs. It is known as the Ovra and, ile small, is reputed to be as efient as the more widely known pu of Soviet Russia.

The Duce himself is minister of the terior and therefore, in addition to e Ovra, has direct control of the gular police, numbering 11,000 for e whole country.

This does not include plain-clothes en, but does not take in the carabineers or military police, who are ntrolled by the War Department.

The Ovra costs the Government aproximately $1,000,000 a year, and the olice $20,000,000.

Something Wrong, Somehow

Young Clerk (to his employer) — Sir, there's a lady wishes to speak to you.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NILES, MICH.
DAILY STAR
MAY 14 1932

THE GAY

A reminiscence o nineties," the last dec was given at the Bost Boston symphony orc music of 40 years ago ence many of whom tumes. One sees ma period referred to, an were back there.

The years 1890 to the "Victorian age," reigned in England, a now view with conter of insincere pretensio "limbs," they wore b the ground, they prete they did not practice. sidered to be eman straints, exalting si good.

scount fac
nd the co
the bene
heet the r
S AS
nent

economy.

Representatives from this district include Joseph N. Weymouth, Ambrose L. Osborn, Richard W. Holden, Miss Florence E. Newbury and Miss Anna M. Robinson of New London; John B. Walsh of Norwich; Miss Ruth A. Weather-

[redacted]

ness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONESSEN, PA.
INDEPENDENT
MAY 16 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop" concerts, when Boston sympthony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretentions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practise. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked in wonder.

It was an age that startled innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

INTERESTING POPS LIST FOR THE CURRENT WEEK

May 15

The hundreds who missed the merry doings of last Tuesday's Gay Nineties Night at the Pops may, if they bestir themselves, attend its sequel this Wednesday evening. The management hopes that all will this time come in the costumes of that vanished epoch, and the best table will receive a prize. The beer and the bicycle-racks of the earlier evening will again be in evidence, and an additional attraction will be news-flashes of the nineties by "magic-lantern."

* * * *

Old favorites will make the programme of this Nineties Night: Spindler's "Charge of the Hussars," the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance," Keler-Bela's "Ungarische Lustspiel" Overture, Ochs' "Variations on a German Folk-Song" after the manner of various composers, Vollstedt's waltz, "Jolly Fellows"; a selection from Luders' "The Prince of Pilsen," and "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," played as a tuba solo by Mr. Sidow. Besides this, there will be a pianoforte solo, as yet unspecified, from Mr. Sanroma, and the programme will close with a medley of popular songs of the nineties, most of them those that the audience of last Tuesday evening heard and sang with such relish.

* * * *

Other special nights in the immediate future are a Russian programme announced for tomorrow evening that ranges chronologically from Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmillah" through Mossolov's sensational "Soviet Iron Foundry," first heard in Boston at the Pop Concert of last Sunday evening. A week from tonight brings the second Sunday concert, and on this programme Mr. Fiedler has placed that curious composition, Beethoven's "Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria," which had gone unheard in this city for 85 years until Mr. Fiedler revived it last winter at a concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra. The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky begins this programme, and the remaining numbers are Ravel's "Bolero" and Weber's Concert-Piece for piano and orchestra, descriptive of the absent and returning Crusader, in which Mr. Sanroma will bear the solo part.

* * * *

The other programmes of the week adhere to what is now the convention of the Pops, a judicious blend of music, old and new, light and semi-serious. Thus Tuesday's programme lists both Cadman's "At Dawning" and the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," finds room for the "Light Cavalry" overture of Suppe and for selections from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

* * * *

The extremes of Thursday's programme may be set down as the March "Wintergreen for President," from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," and Siegfried's "Rhine-Journey," from Wagner's "The Dusk of the Gods," with operatic numbers from Rossini, Verdi, Offenbach, Korngold and Sullivan in between.

* * * *

Two members of the orchestra will be heard as soloists on Friday evening: Mr. Theodorowicz, concertmaster of the Pops orchestra, will play Wilhelmj's transcription of Schubert's "Ave Maria," accompanied by harp, organ and strings, and Mr. Langendoen will play as 'cello solo the "Song to the Evening Star," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

* * * *

Mr. Theodorowicz will be heard as soloist again on Saturday evening, when he plays the Largo of Handel. Mendelssohn's Overture, "Fingal's Cave," unjustly neglected at the Symphony Concerts of late years, will have place on this final programme of the week, which also offers pieces by Deslibes, Debussy, Grieg and Gillet, the last-named represented by his "Loin du bal," successfully revived at the recent Gay Nineties Night. And there will also be a selection from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing."

THIRD WEEK OF POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program. On Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer, bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be at hand. The second Sunday program a week from tonight will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard for 85 years in Boston when Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season past.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 16

Hopak, from The Fair of Sorotchinsk ..... Moussorgsky
Overture to Russian and Ludmilla ... Glinka
Hymn to the Sun from Le Coq d'Or ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Soviet Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
Eugen Onegin, Fantasia
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky
Prelude in G minor .... Rachmaninoff
Volga Bargemen's Song ..... Arranged by Jacchia
Panaderos, Spanish Dance .... Glazounov

TUESDAY EVENING

First Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
Overture to Light Cavalry .... Suppe
The Firebird, Berceuse .... Stravinsky
Bacchanale from Samson and Delilah ..... Saint-Saens
Spanish Dance from La Vida Breve ..... de Falla
Sally in Our Alley, Old English Song ..... Arranged by Frank Bridge
Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg, Excerpts ..... Wagner
Artist's Life, Waltz .... Strauss
At Dawning .... Cadman-Herbert
Aragonaise, from The Cid .... Massenet

WEDNESDAY EVENING
("Gay Nineties" Night)

Charge of the Hussars .... Spindler
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte Solo (selected)
Jesus Maria Sanroma
Ungarische Lustspiel .... Keler-Bela
'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen; variations on a German Folksong, in the styles of different masters ..... Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties
(By Magic Lantern)
Waltz, Jolly Fellows .... Vollstedt
Selection, The Prince of Pilsen ...... Luders
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep .... Knight
Tuba solo, Mr. Paul Sidow
Popular Song Hits

THURSDAY EVENING

Military Polonaise .... Chopin-Glazounov
Overture to The Barber of Seville ... Rossini
Perpetuum Mobile .... Strauss
Aida, Fantasia .... Verdi
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from Gotterdammerung ..... Wagner
Dance Song of Pierrot, from Die Tote Stadt ..... Korngold
The Mikado, selection .... Sullivan
Estudiantina waltz .... Waldteufel
Barcarolle from The Tales of Hoffman ..... Offenbach
March, Wintergreen for President, from Of Thee I Sing ..... Gershwin

FRIDAY EVENING

March from Der Obersteiger .... Zeller
Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor ..... Nicolai
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Peere Gynt, Suite .... Grieg
Ballet Suite .... Gluck-Mottl
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; harp, organ and strings
Ouverture Solennelle, 1812 ..... Tchaikovsky
Tales from the Vienna Woods, waltz .. Strauss
Tannhauser, Introduction and Song of the Evening Star ..... Wagner
Violoncello solo, J. Langendoen
Tannhauser, Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg ..... Wagner

SATURDAY EVENING

Norwegian Bridal Procession .... Grieg
Overture, Fingal's Cave ...... Mendelssohn
Waltz No. 15 .... Brahms-Gericke
La Source, Ballet Suite .... Delibes
Scheherazade, Finale ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Largo .... Handel
Dance .... Debussy
(Arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel)
Of Thee I Sing (selection) .... Gershwin
Loin du Bal .... Gillet
Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar

SUNDAY EVENING

Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 ..... Tchaikovsky
Wellington's Victory, or The Battle of Vittoria, Op. 91 ..... Beethoven
Concert Piece in F minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79 ..... Weber
Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma
Bolero ....

---

ngland—MAY 15, 1932—Telephone Liberty 4000

E DRAMA'S LA

'Gay Nineties' Night Will Be Repeated at Pops Wednesday

AN all-Russian program tomorrow and another "Gay Nineties Night" on Wednesday are some of the delights that Conductor Arthur Fiedler has arranged for Pops audiences this week at Symphony Hall.

The Russian concert opens with Moussorgsky's rousing Hopak from his opera "The Fair at Sorotchinsk" and includes such truly popular numbers as the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky - Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," Chaikovsky's "Marche Slave," and Rachmaninoff's Prelude in G-Minor.

Another feature of this concert is the repetition of Mossolov's ingenious tone-poem "Soviet Iron Foundry" in which it becomes necessary, at one point, for all the members of the orchestra to make as much noise as they possibly can.

The success of the "Gay Nineties Night" last Tuesday was so great that a repetition was deemed necessary. All those who have period costumes are urged by the management to get them out and wear them to the concert. Prizes will be given to the most picturesque table.

The Wednesday night program includes pieces by Spindler, Weber and Vollstedt. Sanroma will play some piano solos; and Paul Sidow will render, most appropriately, "Rocked In the Cradle of the Deep" on his tuba.

Tuesday night's program is made up of music by Bohemian, German, Russian and French composers, with the American Cadman thrown in for good measure. It includes a Slavonic dance by Dvorak, the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, and Cadman's "At Dawning."

The Thursday concert is devoted largely to selections from operas and operettas such as "The Barber of Seville," "Aida," "The Mikado," "The Tales of Hoffman," "Twilight of the Gods" and "Of Thee I Sing."

On Friday, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite and Chaikovsky's "1812" Overture will be features of the concert. Among other numbers scheduled to be played are the Shubert "Ave Maria," Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods," and selections from "Tannhauser" with violincello solo by J. Langendoen.

The Saturday evening program includes a Dance by Debussy, orchestrated by Ravel; Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, selections from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," Handel's "Largo," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance."

Third Week of the "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall enter upon their third week tomorrow night with an all-Russian program.

Next Wednesday, "Gay Nineties" Night, to which hundreds were unable to obtain admission last Tuesday, will be repeated with more famous airs of the 90's and other new features. All are urged to come in their period costumes, and the best table will be awarded a prize. The beer, bicycle racks, and other appendages of the 90's will be in evidence.

The second Sunday program, a week from tonight, will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," a score which had not been heard in Boston for 85 years until Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season just past.

The program of the week follow:

MONDAY, MAY 16—Hopak from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky; overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka; hymn to the sun from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; "Eugen Onegin," fantasia, waltz from the serenade for strings, "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; prelude in G minor, Rachmaninoff; Volga Bargemen's song, arranged by Jacchia; "Panaderos," Spanish dance, Glazounov.

TUESDAY, MAY 17—First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; overture to "Light Cavalry," Suppe; the Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint Saens; Spanish dance from "La Vida

---

Record May 16

The WISDOM BOX

By George C. MacKinnon

Typewriter Quickie: Arthur Fiedler.
1—Early Uncertainties.

In Old German, "Fiedler" means "fiddler." Arthur Fiedler bears his last name for more than sufficient reasons. Look! His father, Emmanuel Fiedler, was first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—& is now, by the way, pensioned & living in Berlin.

His grandsire & great grandsire were, during their adult lives, in charge of all musical events in the little Austrian town where they lived. His uncle, Bernard Fiedler, is a Boston Symphony violinist. Another uncle, Gustav Fiedler, is a former Boston Symphony member . . . His sister, Elsa, is a professional pianist oft heard over the air from N. Y. . . . & as far back as can be traced, the Fiedlers have been musicians.

Arthur Fiedler

Well & truly do the Fiedlers rate their family name.

When people first gaze upon Arthur Fiedler, they usually think him French. When they hear his name, they think him German. As a matter of fact, the Fiedlers all come from Austria.

He has no middle name—for no particular reason that he knows of.

★

Approximate Birthplace . . .

He was born in Boston in 1894—"somewhere near West Cottage st."—he doesn't recall just where. He's "almost sure" he received his first name in honor of Arthur Nikish, the conductor.

He kindergartened at the Perkins School on Cumberland st., grammar-schooled at the Prince school, then entered Boston Latin.

He loathed the paste-&-colored paper delights of kindergarten. On many occasions his mother had to [illegible] him to its imaginative games, community-songful joys. His like for organized improvement of the child-mind (at least, insofar as it pertained to HIS child-mind), continued when he entered grammar school, nor did his hatred of being Improved dwindle, peak & [illegible]une when he reached high.

He hated mathematics the most, geography & languages the least. Many times he buckled down & studied just in time to save himself from being ousted from high school.

An episode which occurred during one of the high school's monthly assemblies annoyed him more than anything else that ever happened to him in school. As he'd started early studying violin under his father's tutelage, he was often asked to play during these assemblies. At one assembly, rising to perform, he espied his parents in the audience. He decided he'd show them a thing or two anent violining. But he had evoked only a few notes when his father mounted the platform, took the violin from him, tuned it, [illegible]d it back to him. That made [illegible] very angry indeed.

★

Mer . . .

[illegible]15 he checked out of Boston & went with his family [illegible] Europe. Arrived there, [illegible], inquired of Fiedler, Jr., [illegible]e was desirous of con[illegible] book-learning. "That," [illegible]dler, Jr., "is the last [illegible]ld like to do." So his [illegible]t make him go to [illegible]h he made him study for a while.

[illegible] came clear he'd have [illegible] career. He wasn't [illegible] to be a musician—[illegible]efer being a business [illegible] he got a job in a [illegible] house. There he [illegible]iness man, which, [illegible]isted in running [illegible] bundles, & lick[illegible]s. After a few [illegible]hink he wasn't [illegible] business man. [illegible]onths he was [illegible]it. One of his [illegible]en to escape [illegible] doesn't like, [illegible]ible. So he [illegible]signation to the publishing firm, causing no extensive agitation among its executives.

★

Next Monday: Enterprises, Ideas & Ideals of Boston's Most Successful Pops Conductor . . .

ric sier thai Colo colon otio
r cui
UP—dyes a trimme remai moves ol terial so color.
ring whit e materiali
g and 15s unters ex
DYES

THIS CLIPPING FROM NILES, MICH.
DAILY STAR
MAY 14 1932

THE GA

A reminiscence o[illegible] nineties," the last dec[illegible] was given at the Bost[illegible]
Boston symphony orc[illegible] music of 40 years ag[illegible] ence many of whom [illegible] tumes. One sees ma[illegible] period referred to, an[illegible] were back there.

The years 1890 to [illegible]
the "Victorian age,"[illegible] reigned in England, a[illegible] now view with conte[illegible] of insincere pretensio[illegible]
"limbs," they wore [illegible]
the ground, they pret[illegible] they did not practice. [illegible] sidered to be eman[illegible] straints, exalting si[illegible] good.

scount fa
nd the co
the bene
neet the r
S A
nent

[redacted]

ness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONESSEN, PA.
INDEPENDENT
MAY 16 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop" concerts, when Boston sympthony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretentions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practise. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked in wonder.

It was an age that startled innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

Arguments, Preferences And Figures

TRANS. MAY 18

Dr. Koussevitzky's Programs, Fact-Finding Defenders Enter the Debate

THERE IS opportunity today for return to the debate over Dr. Koussevitzky's programs. Two letters at hand press for printing. The first, written by Mr. James B. Hobbs of Newton Center, replies in general and in particular to objections raised against them by the conservative—or more truly anti-modernist—wing. It follows hereunder:

"Two letters recently appeared in The Transcript criticizing what the writers consider the excessive emphasis on modern music in the programs of the Symphony Orchestra. It seems only reasonable that a few words be presented for the other side of the case. Not that I do not recognize that any words of mine (or of anyone else, for that matter) will probably have no effect on those who periodically protest at the Koussevitzky type of program, since these different points of view—these different musical tastes—are

tant of his musical abilities. . . . He must in choosing his programs please all types in his audience as far as possible. These include elderly ladies who adore Schubert but for the most part sleep through Sibelius (the Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony) and talk through Toch. Since such persons have an indisputable right to their own predilections (though courtesy to neighbors who also pay admission might suggest quiet during even pieces by Toch), they must be catered to. Even without them the programs would certainly contain the same great proportion of works by the great masters. These after all are the meat and drink of the symphonic repertory. At the other extreme is the almost "lunatic fringe," in Boston very negligible, which regards everything written before 1910 as impossible twaddle. It doubtless deserves scant consideration.

There remains a large body of concertgoers, including musicians, music-students, and merely music lovers like myself, who care not only for the great works of the past but who are interested also in hearing the works of the present. Some of us honestly believe that Honegger's Symphony and Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" are great, and this while still realizing that Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms also left some worth-while things behind. I confess to tremendous admiration for Bruckner's Eighth Symphony which Koussevitzky performed so gloriously a few weeks ago. I submit that the many of us who feel this way are entitled to some reasonable opportunity to hear such moderns as Honegger, Hindemith, Roussel and others. The conductor must struggle to satisfy all, and since he cannot put on Honegger without temporarily annoying many of his auditors, or the "Pathetic Symphony" without antag-

---

'Gay Nineties' at Pops Again May 18

An all-Russian program will open the Pop concerts' third week at Symphony Hall Monday night. Wednesday night there will be another "Gay Nineties" celebration. Prizes will again be given the best group appearing in old-time costumes. Songhits of 40 years ago and also orchestral pieces that were favorites then will be heard. These "Gay Nineties" nights have made a sensational hit.

J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist at the second Sunday concert, on May 22, when the popular pianist will play Weber's "Concert Piece." Ravel's "Bolero's," Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony and Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria" overture will be other features of this second Sunday bill. Arthur Fiedler's program for tonight follows:

Coronation March ....Meyerbeer
Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn
Aragon, from Suite Espegnole'.....Albeniz
Hejre Kati ....Hubay
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Mediation from Thais...........Massenet
(Solo violin: . Theodorowicz)
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tchaikovsky
New Moon ....Romberg
Estudiantina Waltz ....Waldteufel
Strike Up the Band.............Greshwin

Man."

Second "Gay Nineties" at the Symphony "Pops"

"GAY NINETIES" REPEATED AT POPS

Another Big Audience on Hand for Jolly Evening

By KATHARINE LYONS

Those leg-o-mutton days of the "gay nineties" came back for a second visit to Symphony hall last evening for the sake of the big public that missed out a week ago, when Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, played his first trump card of the season by giving a delightful innovation of a "gay nineties" program.

And it was another grand and glorious night for the Pops.

Ladies with sweeping trains and feather boas, ostrich plumes and birds of paradise, high-collared and high-combed, were properly escorted to their chairs by be-whiskered gentlemen who clung to the ethics of the "nineties" by wearing their plug hats and brown derbys inside the hall. With reckless abandon the gentlemen smoked their pipes and drank their beer while the band played on casion repeated success, yet a wondered which evening, to be othce Adamow-romenade Con-

ninety" days,
r's platform to rough a group
ere were other enthusiasm at ng and enter-arranged and

s. There were Sanroma, who sure of humor
forth to work
wn to the de-
is sentimental Thou" played
tremors and performed in hands. The awarded him tribute from flashes of the slides—edited e manner you

They told of 1893 in the
and the coniblican Presi-
ere flashes of 1895—a natty
counting the were flashes
and James J.
re family al-
ur Fiedler at put the au-
od and made

ectly chosen.
spirits of an eating pretrtenders, lises as "Bart-
nd Flowers,"
the "Stein
the spirit of few notes of
into a singntioned were
lar numbers,
ure to Will-
s "The For-
he Cradle of olo by Paul
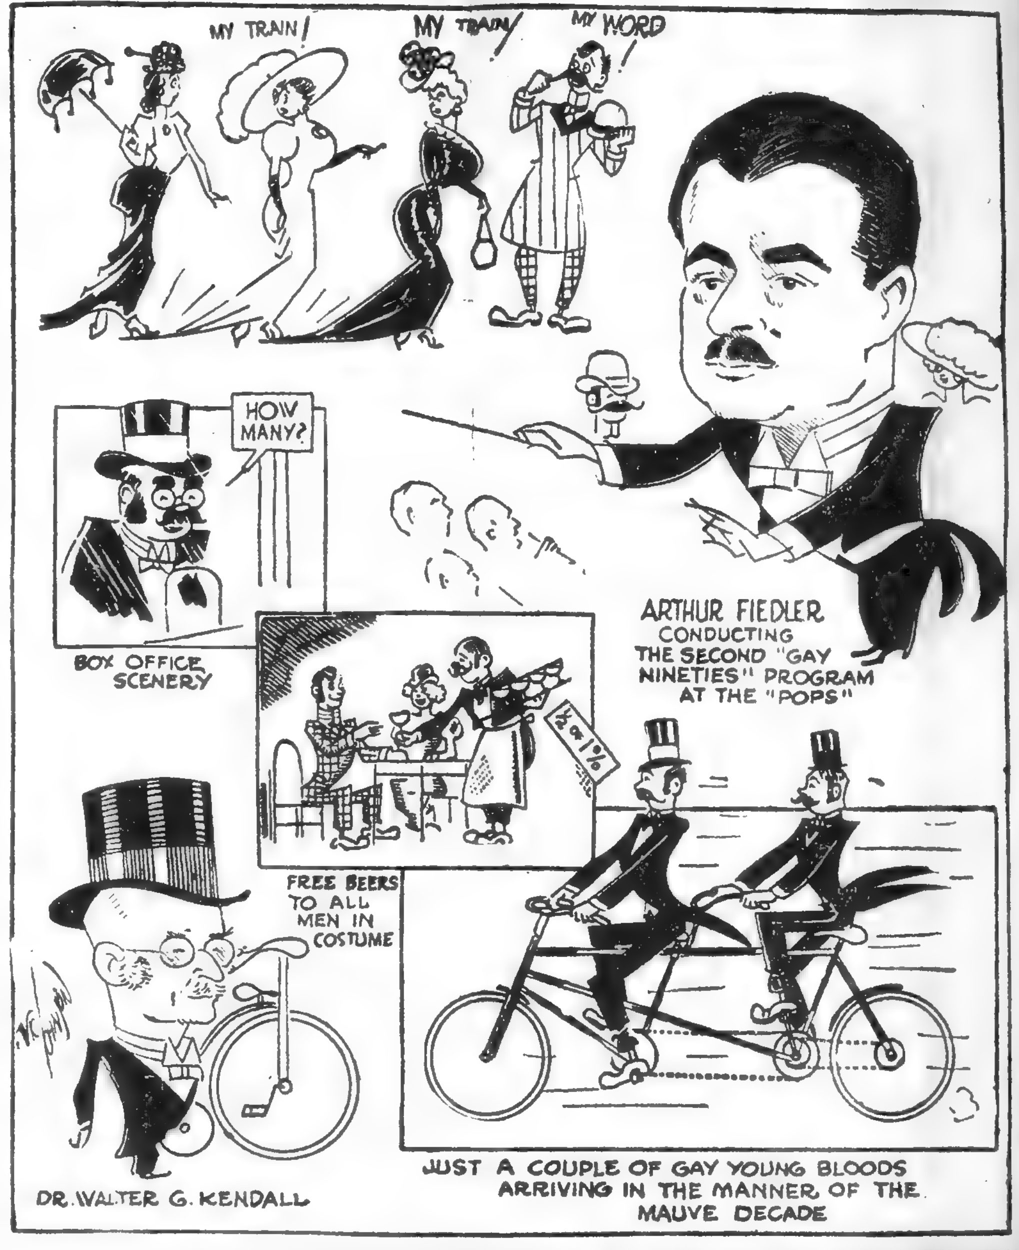
e of popular
"The Bow-
Hot Time in

More "Gay Ninties" at Pops



MY TRAIN!
MY TRAIN!
MY WORD
HOW MANY?
BOX OFFICE SCENERY
½ of 1%
ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTING THE SECOND "GAY NINETIES" PROGRAM AT THE "POPS"
FREE BEERS TO ALL MEN IN COSTUME
DR. WALTER G. KENDALL
JUST A COUPLE OF GAY YOUNG BLOODS ARRIVING IN THE MANNER OF THE MAUVE DECADE

The NORWOOD MESSENGER
NORWOOD, MASS.
Telephone Norwood 1234

Boston "Pops" Still Draw Crowds

Despite some predictions to the contrary, the Pops this season at Symphony Hall is breaking all records in attendance and popularity. These famous concerts which belong with Boston's oldest and most cherished traditions, and yet remain very much "up to the minute", will open next Monday the third week of their 47th season. This is Arthur Fiedler's third season as the conductor of the Pops. His programes, ranging from Handel and Wagner to the "Band Wagon" and "Wintergreen for President", make their appeal to every possible variety of musical taste.

At the Pops one gathers about a table with his friends and smokes or partakes of refreshment while listening to a light programe in superlative performance by a fine symphony orchestra of nearly ninety players.

On Monday, May 16, there will be an all Russian programme. On Wednesday the 18th, there will be a second "Gay Nineties" Night—the first given last Tuesday having been the hit of the season at the Pops. A scond Sunday programme on May 22nd will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria", the score which had not been heard for 85 years in Boston when Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season past. Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Ravel's "Bolero", and Weber's Concert Piece, with Sanroma as piano soloist, will also be played.

The programme for tonight is typical of the musical delights which the Pops afford.

First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; Overture to " Light Cavalry", Suppe; The Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah", Saint-Saens; Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve", de Falla; "Sally in Our Alley", Old English Song, (Arranged for Strings by Frank Bridge); "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg", Excerpts, Wagner; Entrance of the Meistersinger—"Am stillen Herd"—Dance of the Apprentices—Entrance of the Guilds—Prize Song—Greeting to Hans Sachs—Finale.

"Artists' Life," Waltz, Strauss; At Dawning, Cadman-Herbert; Aragonaise, from "The Cid", Massenet.

---

de! Alice Ratcliffe of Newton is shown as she adjusted her bonnet at night at the "Gay 90's" Pop concert. A isic lovers in the costumes of the "Flora-vere present. (Daily Record Photo)

---

y 90's"
Tonight

for the second will be given
ht. All are ind-time clothes.

eatures of the
ted, and new

In his letter Mr. Almirall examines the theory and practice of symphonic program-making; proceeds from generalities to particularities at Symphony Hall; sets out comparative figures as well as preferences and opinions; finally gives judgment in favor of Dr. Koussevitzky. This department thanks Mr. Almirall for his tables—they have saved it some labor—and regrets that it must omit occasional paragraphs from what he himself calls "a nearly interminable letter." With every effort at good faith, it has retained whatever seemed germane to the present discussion:

". . . It has been my observation [writes Mr. Almirall] that among musicians and musical critics Koussevitzky's program-making ranks as the most impor-

---

Overture to the Opera, "William Tell" ....Rossini
Variations on a German Folk-Song in the Styles of Different Masters ("'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen") ....Ochs
News-Flashes of the Nineties by Magic Lantern.
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ......Vollstedt
Selection from the Operetta, "The Fortune-Teller" ....Herbert
Song for Tuba, "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep"..........Knight
Popular Song-Hits

Conductor: A. Fiedler
Soloists:
J. M. Sanromá............Paul Sidow

---

exceeded all performances of works by composers listed in the "modern" table. . . . I wonder whether some of the critics of Koussevitzky's "modernisms" have adequately considered the figures?

.... Spindler
Invitation to the Dance.......Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte solo (selected)
Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma
Overture to William Tell............Rossini
(Cello solo: Jacobus Langendoen)
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen:" variations on a German folksong, in the styles of different masters ....Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties.
by magic lantern
Waltz, Jolly Fellows ....Vollstedt
Selection, The Fortune Teller ....Herbert
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep....Knight
Tuba solo: Mr. Paul Sidow
Popular song hits—
Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay, The Bowery, The Sidewalks of New York, Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Daisy Bell (A Bicycle Built for Two), Comrades, Little Annie Rooney, She May Have Seen Better Days, The Band Played On, After the Ball, A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight.

Arguments, Preferences And Figures

TRANS. MAY 18

Dr. Koussevitzky's Programs, Fact-Finding Defenders Enter the Debate

THERE IS opportunity today for return to the debate over Dr. Koussevitzky's programs. Two letters at hand press for printing. The first, written by Mr. James B. Hobbs of Newton Center, replies in general and in particular to objections raised against them by the conservative—or more truly anti-modernist—wing. It follows hereunder:

"Two letters recently appeared in The Transcript criticizing what the writers consider the excessive emphasis on modern music in the programs of the Symphony Orchestra. It seems only reasonable that a few words be presented for the other side of the case. Not that I do not recognize that any words of mine (or of anyone else, for that matter) will probably have no effect on those who periodically protest at the Koussevitzky type of program, since these different points of view—these different musical tastes—are

tant of his musical abilities. . . . He must in choosing his programs please all types in his audience as far as possible. These include elderly ladies who adore Schubert but for the most part sleep through Sibelius (the Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony) and talk through Toch. Since such persons have an indisputable right to their own predilections (though courtesy to neighbors who also pay admission might suggest quiet during even pieces by Toch), they must be catered to. Even without them the programs would certainly contain the same great proportion of works by the great masters. These after all are the meat and drink of the symphonic repertory. At the other extreme is the almost "lunatic fringe," in Boston very negligible, which regards everything written before 1910 as impossible twaddle. It doubtless deserves scant consideration.

There remains a large body of concert-goers, including musicians, music-students, and merely music lovers like myself, who care not only for the great works of the past but who are interested also in hearing the works of the present. Some of us honestly believe that Honegger's Symphony and Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" are great, and this while still realizing that Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms also left some worth-while things behind. I confess to tremendous admiration for Bruckner's Eighth Symphony which Koussevitzky performed so gloriously a few weeks ago. I submit that the many of us who feel this way are entitled to some reasonable opportunity to hear such moderns as Honegger, Hindemith, Roussel and others. The conductor must struggle to satisfy all, and since he cannot put on Honegger without temporarily annoying many of his auditors, or the "Pathetic Symphony" without antag-

In his letter Mr. Almirall examines the theory and practice of symphonic program-making; proceeds from generalities to particularities at Symphony Hall; sets out comparative figures as well as preferences and opinions; finally gives judgment in favor of Dr. Koussevitzky. This department thanks Mr. Almirall for his tables—they have saved it some labor—and regrets that it must omit occasional paragraphs from what he himself calls "a nearly interminable letter." With every effort at good faith, it has retained whatever seemed germane to the present discussion:

". . . It has been my observation [writes Mr. Almirall] that among musicians and musical critics Koussevitzky's program-making ranks as the most impor-

exceeded all performances of works by composers listed in the "modern" table. . . . I wonder whether some of the critics of Koussevitzky's "modernisms" have adequately considered the figures?

'Gay Nineties' at Pops Again May 18

An all-Russian program will open the Pop concerts' third week at Symphony Hall Monday night. Wednesday night there will be another "Gay Nineties" celebration. Prizes will again be given the best group appearing in old-time costumes. Songhits of 40 years ago and also orchestral pieces that were favorites then will be heard. These "Gay Nineties" nights have made a sensational hit.

J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist at the second Sunday concert, on May 22, when the popular pianist will play Weber's "Concert Piece." Ravel's "Bolero's," Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony and Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria" overture will be other features of this second Sunday bill. Arthur Fiedler's program for tonight follows:

Coronation March .... Meyerbeer
Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn
Aragon, from Suite Espegnole' ..... Albeniz
Hejre Kati .... Hubay
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
Mediation from Thais .... Massenet
(Solo violin: . Theodorowicz)
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikovsky
New Moon .... Romberg
Estudiantina Waltz .... Waldteufel
Strike Up the Band .... Greshwin

Man."

Overture to the Opera. "William Tell' .... Rossini
Variations on a German Folk-Song in the Styles of Different Masters ("'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen") .... Ochs
News-Flashes of the Nineties by Magic Lantern.
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ...... Vollstedt
Selection from the Operetta, "The Fortune-Teller" .... Herbert
Song for Tuba, 'Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" .... Knight
Popular Song-Hits

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Soloists:

J. M. Sanromá .... Paul Sidow

Second "Gay Nineties" at the Symphony "Pops"

"GAY NINETIES" REPEATED AT POPS

Another Big Audience on Hand for Jolly Evening

By KATHARINE LYONS

Those leg-o-mutton days of the "gay nineties" came back for a second visit to Symphony hall last evening for the sake of the big public that missed out a week ago, when Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, played his first trump card of the season by giving a delightful innovation of a "gay nineties" program.

And it was another grand and glorious night for the Pops.

Ladies with sweeping trains and feather boas, ostrich plumes and birds of paradise, high-collared and high-combed, were properly escorted to their chairs by be-whiskered gentlemen who clung to the ethics of the "nineties" by wearing their plug hats and brown derbys inside the hall. With reckless abandon the gentlemen smoked their pipes and drank their beer while the band played on

casion repeated
success, yet a vondered which evening, to be othee Adamowomenade Con-
ninety" days,
r's platform to rough a group
ere were other enthusiasm at

ng and enter-arranged and
s. There were
Sanroma, who sure of humor
forth to work
wn to the de-
is sentimental Thou" played
tremors and performed in hands. The awarded him tribute from flashes of the slides—edited ie manner you

They told of 1893 in the
and the coniblican Presi-
ere flashes of 1895—a natty
counting the
were flashes
and James J.
re family al-
ur Fiedler at put the au-
od and made

ectly chosen.
spirits of an eating pret-
rtenders, lis-
es as "Bart-
nd Flowers,"
the "Stein
the spirit of
few notes of
into a singntioned were
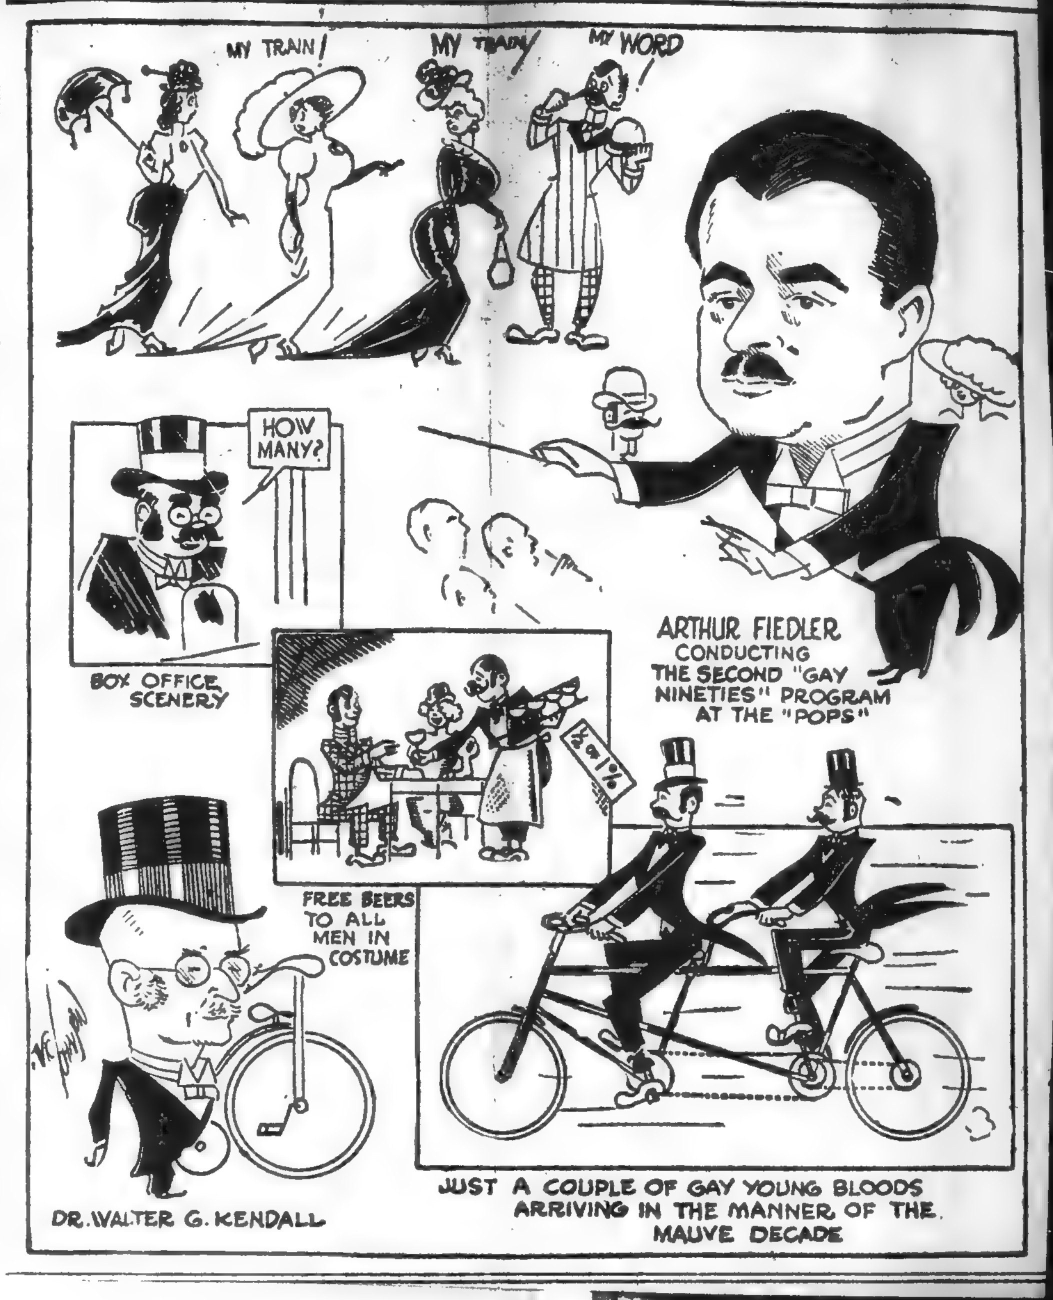
lar numbers,
ure to Will-
s "The For-
he Cradle of
olo by Paul
e of popular
"The Bow-
Hot Time in

BOSTON TRAVELER, THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1932

More "Gay Ninties" at Pops



MY TRAIN!
MY TRAIN!
MY WORD!
HOW MANY?
1/2 of 1%

BOX OFFICE SCENERY

ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTING THE SECOND "GAY NINETIES" PROGRAM AT THE "POPS"

FREE BEERS TO ALL MEN IN COSTUME

DR. WALTER G. KENDALL

JUST A COUPLE OF GAY YOUNG BLOODS ARRIVING IN THE MANNER OF THE MAUVE DECADE

The NORWOOD MESSENGER
NORWOOD, MASS.
Telephone Norwood 1234

in issue of May 17
NORWOOD MESSENGER

Boston "Pops" Still Draw Crowds

Despite some predictions to the contrary, the Pops this season at Symphony Hall is breaking all records in attendance and popularity. These famous concerts which belong with Boston's oldest and most cherished traditions, and yet remain very much "up to the minute", will open next Monday the third week of their 47th season. This is Arthur Fiedler's third season as the conductor of the Pops. His programes, ranging from Handel and Wagner to the "Band Wagon" and "Wintergreen for President", make their appeal to every possible variety of musical taste.

At the Pops one gathers about a table with his friends and smokes or partakes of refreshment while listening to a light programe in superlative performance by a fine symphony orchestra of nearly ninety players.

On Monday, May 16, there will be an all Russian programme. On Wednesday the 18th, there will be a second "Gay Nineties" Night—the first given last Tuesday having been the hit of the season at the Pops. A scond Sunday programme on May 22nd will feature Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria", the score which had not been heard for 85 years in Boston when Arthur Fiedler revived it in the season past. Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Ravel's "Bolero", and Weber's Concert Piece, with Sanroma as piano soloist, will also be played.

The programme for tonight is typical of the musical delights which the Pops afford.

First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; Overture to " Light Cavalry", Suppe; The Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; Bacchannale from "Samson and Delilah", Saint-Saens; Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve", de Falla; "Sally in Our Alley", Old English Song, (Arranged for Strings by Frank Bridge); "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg", Excerpts, Wagner; Entrance of the Meistersinger—"Am stillen Herd"—Dance of the Apprentices—Entrance of the Guilds—Prize Song—Greeting to Hans Sachs—Finale.

"Artists' Life," Waltz, Strauss; At Dawning, Cadman-Herbert; Aragonaise, from "The Cid", Massenet.

Thank you.
S.S.Silverman

---

de! Alice Ratcliffe of Newton is shown as she adjusted her bonnet at night at the "Gay 90s" Pop concert. A sic lovers in the costumes of the "Flora-vere present. (Daily Record Photo)

MAY 19

---

y 90's" Tonight

for the second
will be given
ht. All are in-
d-time clothes.

eatures of the ted, and new

.... Spindler
Invitation to the Dance ...... Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte solo (selected)
Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma
Overture to William Tell .... Rossini
('Cello solo: Jacobus Langendoen)
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen:" variations on a German folksong, in the styles of different masters .... Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties.
by magic lantern
Waltz, Jolly Fellows .... Vollstedt
Selection, The Fortune Teller .... Herbert
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep .... Knight
Tuba solo: Mr. Paul Sidow
Popular song hits—
Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay, The Bowery, The Sidewalks of New York, Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Daisy Bell (A Bicycle Built for Two), Comrades, Little Annie Rooney, She May Have Seen Better Days, The Band Played On, After the Ball, A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Arguments, Preferences And Figures

TRANS. MAY 18

Dr. Koussevitzky's Programs, Fact-Finding Defenders Enter the Debate

THERE IS opportunity today for return to the debate over Dr. Koussevitzky's programs. Two letters at hand press for printing. The first, written by Mr. James B. Hobbs of Newton Center, replies in general and in particular to objections raised against them by the conservative—or more truly anti-modernist—wing. It follows hereunder:

"Two letters recently appeared in The Transcript criticizing what the writers consider the excessive emphasis on modern music in the programs of the Symphony Orchestra. It seems only reasonable that a few words be presented for the other side of the case. Not that I do not recognize that any words of mine (or of anyone else, for that matter) will probably have no effect on those who periodically protest at the Koussevitzky type of program, since these different points of view—these different musical tastes—are evidently only the expressions of fundamentally different philosophies of life.

"However, I should like your recent cor-spondents to know (if they have any doubt about it!) that there are many people who are very glad that Dr. Koussevitzky does not see fit to include on his programs Massenet, Wieniawski, Bizet, Bruch, Dvorák, et al. What should he play from these composers? Massenet's various 'Scènes' are enjoyable enough but suitable for The Pops rather than for Symphony Concerts. The same is true of Bizet's Suites. The other composers mentioned are to many simply boring. How much of Smetana, of Goldmark, of MacDowell, of Grieg could be played without protest from many subscribers? A little, no doubt. The delightful Overture to 'The Bartered Bride' has been played, though not without criticism by some as 'too light.' The 'Rustic Wedding' Symphony might be enjoyable to hear once, though it seems pretty long drawn out these days. For myself I should like to hear the 'Indian Suite' once.

"When we come to Liszt, it is hard to see how he has been much neglected, with the 'Faust Symphony' twice, the First Piano Concerto, 'Mazeppa,' 'The Preludes,' and 'Tasso.' Even this is more than some of us can readily stomach. Saint-Saëns seems to me pretty empty stuff. Elgar has been played several times. Schumann and Mendelsshon are another matter entirely. Perhaps Mendelssohn hasn't fared quite as well as he should, but Schumann has been played as follows since 1924: Overture to 'Manfred,' concerto for 'Cello, Piano Concerto (twice), First Symphony (five times), Second Symphony, Third Symphony (three times), Fourth Symphony (twice).

"None, surely, could accuse Dr. Koussevitzky of neglecting the great classic composers—Bach, Beethoven, Brahms. But there should be no place in the Symphony programs for composers who have been proved by time to be second or third-rate unless they have some special redeeming graces. Undoubtedly many of the moderns are second or third-rate. Those who are, will in general not be played thirty or forty years from now. But time cannot pass judgment unless they are heard.

Conclusions

"When one comes actually to analyze the Symphony programs of say the last two years, it will be found, if one eliminates from the count Strauss and Ravel (who, it would seem, must surely have won their spurs by now), but calls every other living composer (even Elgar!) a 'modern,' that there has been on the average almost exactly one 'modern' per concert. When one considers that most of the modern compositions are relatively short, it is hard to see how this is an extreme proportion. If Dr. Koussevitzky's programs are 'eccentric' or unbalanced, what would Toscanini's be considered? And why is Dr. Koussevitzky so enthusistically commended by leading New York critics for his catholic programs? Does it not mean anything that his programs almost invariably are interesting and stimulating?

"But perhaps that is begging the question. To be sure they are not always perfect for any particular individual. I, for example, should like to hear a symphony by Rakhmaninov, Vaughan Williams's 'London Symphony,' Carpenter's Concertino, Schönberg's 'Verklaerte Nacht,' and other compositions I could mention. But as The Transcript pointed out two weeks or so ago, it is not an easy matter to make up programs for twenty-four concerts. It seems to me that we can trust pretty well to the judgment of the conductor in the matter and that he can do better work if unhampered in his choice."

Theory and Practice

The second and longer letter comes from Mr. Lloyd V. Almirall who is at pains to describe himself as "not a Bostonian" but an "outsider," through three years in residence at Cambridge as student in the Law School. During that time he has been subscriber to every series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in both Boston and Cambridge. In his letter Mr. Almirall examines the theory and practice of symphonic program-making; proceeds from generalities to particularities at Symphony Hall; sets out comparative figures as well as preferences and opinions; finally gives judgment in favor of Dr. Koussevitzky. This department thanks Mr. Almirall for his tables—they have saved it some labor—and regrets that it must omit occasional paragraphs from what he himself calls "a nearly interminable letter." With every effort at good faith, it has retained whatever seemed germane to the present discussion:

". . . It has been my observation [writes Mr. Almirall] that among musicians and musical critics Koussevitzky's program-making ranks as the most important of his musical abilities. . . . He must in choosing his programs please all types in his audience as far as possible. These include elderly ladies who adore Schubert but for the most part sleep through Sibelius (the Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony) and talk through Toch. Since such persons have an indisputable right to their own predilections (though courtesy to neighbors who also pay admission might suggest quiet during even pieces by Toch), they must be catered to. Even without them the programs would certainly contain the same great proportion of works by the great masters. These after all are the meat and drink of the symphonic repertory. At the other extreme is the almost "lunatic fringe," in Boston very negligible, which regards everything written before 1910 as impossible twaddle. It doubtless deserves scant consideration.

There remains a large body of concert-goers, including musicians, music-students, and merely music lovers like myself, who care not only for the great works of the past but who are interested also in hearing the works of the present. Some of us honestly believe that Honegger's Symphony and Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" are great, and this while still realizing that Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms also left some worth-while things behind. I confess to tremendous admiration for Bruckner's Eighth Symphony which Koussevitzky performed so gloriously a few weeks ago. I submit that the many of us who feel this way are entitled to some reasonable opportunity to hear such moderns as Honegger, Hindemith, Roussel and others. The conductor must struggle to satisfy all, and since he cannot put on Honegger without temporarily annoying many of his auditors, or the "Pathetic Symphony" without antagonizing others, it is obvious that all of us must make some allowances.

Obligations

Secondly [writes Mr. Almirall] there is the question of encouragement of modern music. Admittedly such great orchestras as those in Boston, New York and Philadelphia are not experimental chambers. On the other hand the Beethovens and Brahmses of the future must arise from our midst. Not only should any intelligent concert-audience receive an opportunity to hear the best of modern works, but present-day composers must be encouraged within reasonable limits by having their works performed.

Koussevitzky has established an enviable reputation for encouragement of these composers. There may be fair grounds for criticism of some features of his handling of modern works, such as partiality towards certain composers or classes of composers, and failure to repeat the best of the works more frequently instead of introducing quite so many new ones. On the whole, however, he has been eminently successful. For the most part the works presented are worthy at least of a hearing. Some exceptions (such as Stravinsky's Violin-Concerto, or Ravel's new piano-concerto) are excusable considering the position of those composers. Other exceptions, such as the incredibly uninteresting Ode of Copland, may be charitably excused as mistakes. If we cannot enjoy all the new works we hear, we can tolerate them with the thought that perhaps we are educating ourselves, or giving pleasure to others, or lending a helping hand where needed. When the works do not please us we are entitled to dislike them as heartily as we please; and signify our dislike by refusing to applaud. But we should give the works at least a fair hearing.

Thirdly, the prestige of the orchestra must be considered to some extent; and among musicians at least an unalloyed program of classicism and romanticism would be destructive to the great reputation enjoyed by the Boston Orchestra today.

Critics of conductors as program-makers also fail often to consider the actual facts as to works played. It is a truism that bitter recollection of one program (or one section of a program) that was excessively distasteful to the particular listener will often weigh more heavily in the mind than the dimmer recollection of many pleasant and thoroughly enjoyed programs. Thus without doubt many persons will recall and complain of the twenty-third program this year (Martelli–Ravel–Bruckner) in complete forgetfulness of such landmarks as the "Faust" program or the Haydn concert.

Now to Figures

I am inclosing [continues Mr. Almirall] a hasty analysis of the programs for the past season, including all performances at Symphnoy Hall under Koussevitzky, but excluding performances of works under Messrs. Burgin, Cherepnin, Clifton and Holst. [The Tuesday afternoon concert under Fiedler is included since that was really Koussevitzky's program]. While I do not vouch for the complete accuracy of the list, I do not believe there are any serious errors. It shows that there were 143 performances of compositions by acknowledged "masters" as against forty-eight performances by all other composers. This is a ratio of three to one. It must be remembered also that for the most part the "modern" works are relatively very short as compared with the bulk of the works by the "masters." A ratio indicating that Koussevitzky's programs are sixty-seven per cent made up of works of acknowledgd masters indicates a very fair consideration of the majority of the audience.

It is true that the analysis may not fairly represent the ratio between "classical and romantic" music and "modern" as it would be considered by the anonymous critics. But if we should subtract the performances of Bruckner, Mahler, Musorgsky, Ravel, Rimsky-Korsakov, Skriabin, Sibelius, and Stravinsky from the "masters'" table and add them to the "modern" table, the totals would show that music which can conservatively be considered "romantic and classical" had 111 performances as against eighty-one performances for all mus.c otherwise. Since "all music otherwise" is an exceedingly broad field, perhaps the ratio is not radically prejudicial. . . .

It should be added that some argument may be advanced for the inclusion of Prokofiev and Loeffler in the "masters'" table. . . . With Ravel I have considered the Piano Concerto as proper material for the "modern" table, since this division is based to some extent upon musical worth. In the case of Stravinsky, I have included both his new Violin-Concerto and his "Symphony of Psalms" in the "modern" table; the Suites from "Petrushka" and "Pulcinella" in the "masters'" table.

OLD AND MODERN MASTERS

Beethoven	15
Brahms	12
Wagner	11
Strauss	11
Mozart	11
Haydn	9
Ravel	9
Chaikovsky	10
Debussy	7
Bach, J. S.	6
Liszt	5
Corelli	4
D'Indy	4
Stravinsky	4
Mahler	3
Skriabin	3
Sibelius	3
Bach, C. P. E.	2
Bruckner	2
Franck	2
Rakhmaninov	2
Rimsky-Korsakov	2
Schubert	2
Schumann	2
Berlioz	1
Musorgsky	1
	143

OTHER (MODERN) COMPOSERS

Stravinsky	4
Prokofiev	4
Toch	4
Gershwin	3
Sowerby	3
Taylor	3
Berezovsky	2
Copland	2
Daniels	2
Dukelsky	2
Frid	2
Hindemith	2
Loeffler	2
Martelli	2
Morris	2
Pick-Mangiagalli	2
Ravel	2
Schmitt	2
Carpenter	1
Hill	1
Cherepnin	1
	48

It is interesting to note that the performances of works by Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Wagner together exceeded all performances of works by composers listed in the "modern" table. . . . I wonder whether some of the critics of Koussevitzky's "modernisms" have adequately considered the figures?

At The Pops Tonight

"Gay Nineties" Again

Charge of the Hussars........Spindler..
Invitation to the Dance.........Weber
(Scored for Orchestra by Berlioz)
Piano-Pieces ....To Be Announced
Overture to the Opera. "William Tell' ....Rossini
Variations on a German Folk-Song in the Styles of Different Masters ("'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen") ....Ochs
News-Flashes of the Nineties by Magic Lantern.
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ......Vollstedt
Selection from the Operetta, "The Fortune-Teller" ....Herbert
Song for Tuba, 'Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep"..........Knight
Popular Song-Hits

Conductor: A. Fiedler
Soloists:
J. M. Sanromá..............Paul Sidow

'Gay Nineties' at Pops Again May 18

An all-Russian program will open the Pop concerts' third week at Symphony Hall Monday night. Wednesday night there will be another "Gay Nineties" celebration. Prizes will again be given the best group appearing in old-time costumes. Songhits of 40 years ago and also orchestral pieces that were favorites then will be heard. These "Gay Nineties" nights have made a sensational hit.

J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist at the second Sunday concert, on May 22, when the popular pianist will play Weber's "Concert Piece." Ravel's "Bolero's," Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony and Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria" overture will be other features of this second Sunday bill. Arthur Fiedler's program for tonight follows:

Coronation March ....Meyerbeer
Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn
Aragon, from Suite Espegnole'.....Albeniz
Hejre Kati ....Hubay
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Mediation from Thais...........Massenet
(Solo violin: . Theodorowicz)
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tchaikovsky
New Moon ....Romberg
Estudiantina Waltz ....Waldteufel
Strike Up the Band.............Greshwin

Man."

Second "Gay Nineties" at the Symphony "Pops"

A second "Gay Nineties" program will be given at the "Pops" in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening. This novel program, with its attendant features of old costumes, "beer" served in steins, and bicycles checked free of charge, proved extremely popular last week.

All who attend tomorrow are urged to come in their period costumes. A prize will be given the best table. The musical program will include additional pieces like in the "Nineties."

Tonight's program follows:

TUESDAY, MAY 17—First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; overture to "Light Cavalry," Suppe; the Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Spanish dance from "La Vida Breve," de Falla; "Sally in Our Alley," old England song, arranged by Frank Bridge; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," excerpts, Wagner; "Artist's Life," waltz, Strauss; "At Dawning," Cadman-Herbert; argonaise, from "The Cid," Massenet.

BOSTON TRAVELER, THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1932

"GAY NINETIES" REPEATED AT POPS

Another Big Audience on Hand for Jolly Evening

By KATHARINE LYONS

Those leg-o-mutton days of the "gay nineties" came back for a second visit to Symphony hall last evening for the sake of the big public that missed out a week ago, when Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, played his first trump card of the season by giving a delightful innovation of a "gay nineties" program.

And it was another grand and glorious night for the Pops.

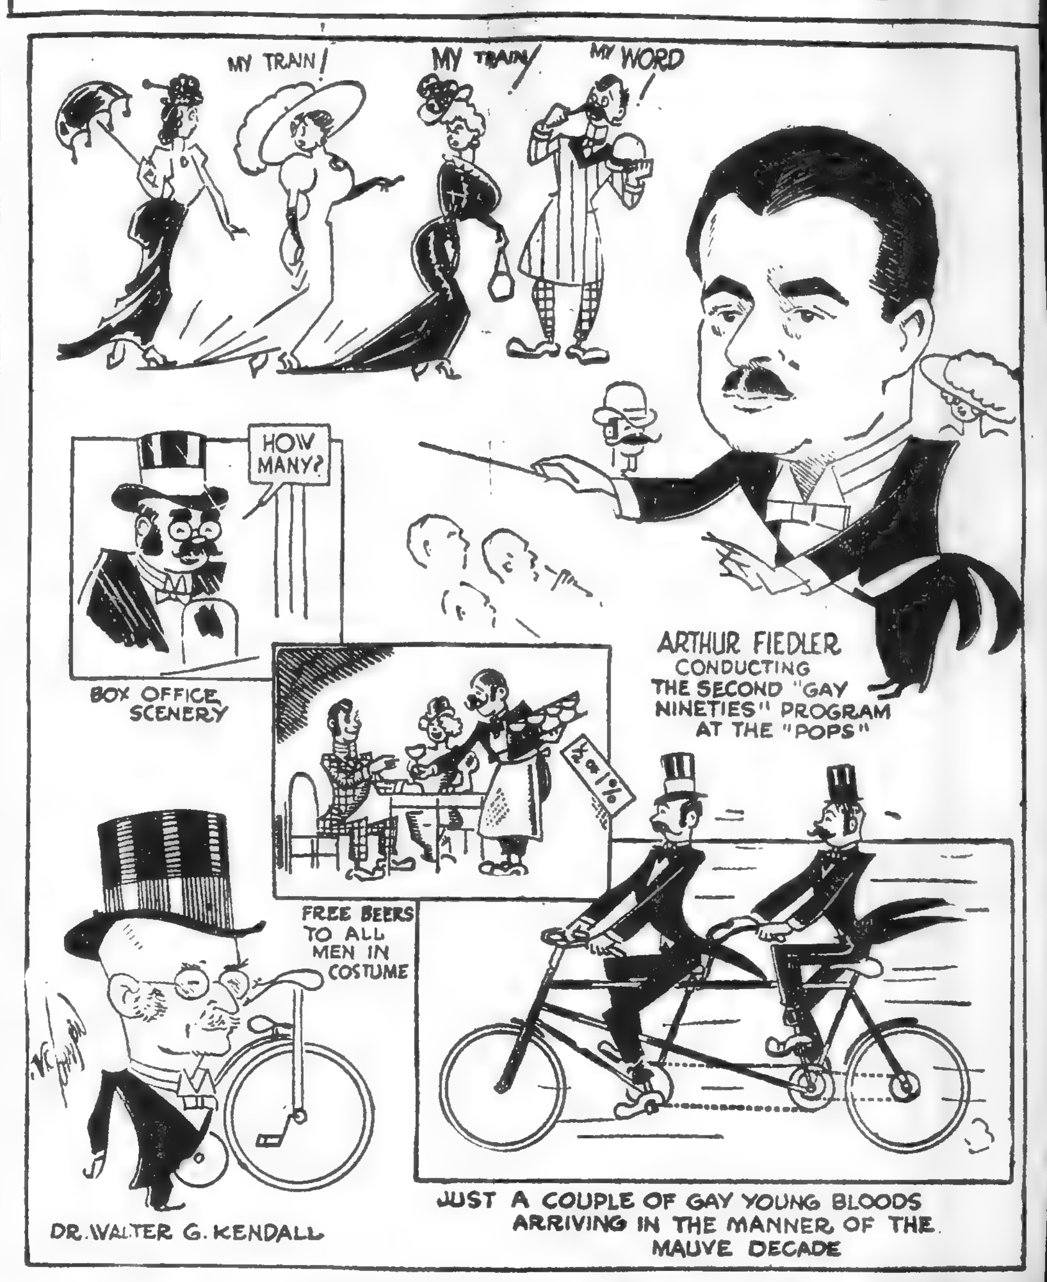
Ladies with sweeping trains and feather boas, ostrich plumes and birds of paradise, high-collared and high-combed, were properly escorted to their chairs by be-whiskered gentlemen who clung to the ethics of the "nineties" by wearing their plug hats and brown derbys inside the hall. With reckless abandon the gentlemen smoked their pipes and drank their beer while the band played on.

Seldom is such an occasion repeated in a week's time with success, yet a visitor to either night wondered which was the greater. Last evening, to be sure, there was no Timothee Adamowski, leader of the Old Promenade Concerts back in those "gay ninety" days, to step up to Mr. Fiedler's platform to conduct the orchestra through a group of old favorites, but there were other novelties to keep the enthusiasm at high pitch.

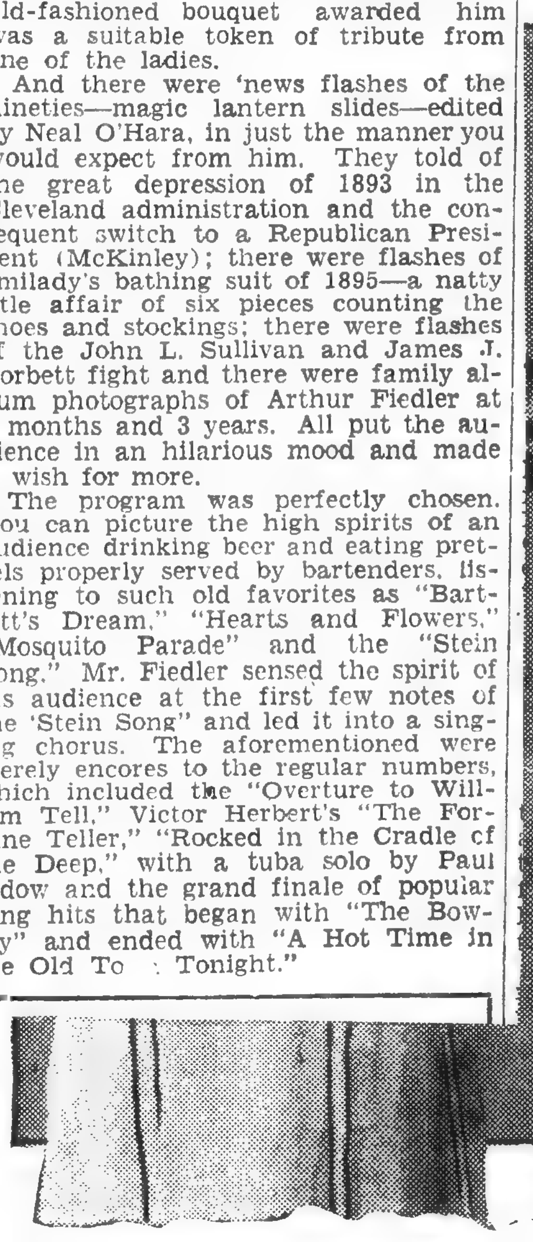
Another very interesting and entertaining program had been arranged and it brought its own thrills. There were the piano solos of Mr. Sanroma, who contributed his own measure of humor to the program, coming forth to work the pianostool up and down to the desired height. There was his sentimental solo of "Alice Where Art Thou" played with all the sentimental tremors and "The Maiden's Prayer" performed in white gloves and crossed hands. The old-fashioned bouquet awarded him was a suitable token of tribute from one of the ladies.

And there were 'news flashes of the nineties—magic lantern slides—edited by Neal O'Hara, in just the manner you would expect from him. They told of the great depression of 1893 in the Cleveland administration and the consequent switch to a Republican President (McKinley); there were flashes of "milady's bathing suit of 1895—a natty litle affair of six pieces counting the shoes and stockings; there were flashes of the John L. Sullivan and James J. Corbett fight and there were family album photographs of Arthur Fiedler at 8 months and 3 years. All put the audience in an hilarious mood and made it wish for more.

The program was perfectly chosen. You can picture the high spirits of an audience drinking beer and eating pretzels properly served by bartenders, listening to such old favorites as "Bartlett's Dream," "Hearts and Flowers," "Mosquito Parade" and the "Stein Song." Mr. Fiedler sensed the spirit of his audience at the first few notes of the 'Stein Song" and led it into a singing chorus. The aforementioned were merely encores to the regular numbers, which included the "Overture to William Tell," Victor Herbert's "The Fortune Teller," "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," with a tuba solo by Paul Sidow and the grand finale of popular song hits that began with "The Bowery" and ended with "A Hot Time in the Old To : Tonight."



More "Gay Ninties" at Pops
MY TRAIN!
MY TRAIN
MY WORD
HOW MANY?
BOX OFFICE SCENERY
ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTING THE SECOND "GAY NINETIES" PROGRAM AT THE "POPS"
FREE BEERS TO ALL MEN IN COSTUME
JUST A COUPLE OF GAY YOUNG BLOODS ARRIVING IN THE MANNER OF THE MAUVE DECADE
DR. WALTER G. KENDALL



Mauve Decade! Alice Ratcliffe of Newton is shown as she adjusted her bonnet at Symphony Hall last night at the "Gay 90s" Pop concert. A goodly crowd of music lovers in the costumes of the "Floradora Sextet" days were present. (Daily Record Photo)

Second "Gay 90's" At Pops Tonight

All seats are taken for the second "Gay 90's" night which will be given in Symphony Hall tonight. All are invited to wear their old-time clothes.

Beer, bicycles and other features of the first night will be repeated, and new ones added.

The program follows:

Charge of the Hussars .... Spindler
Invitation to the Dance ....Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte solo (selected)
Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma
Overture to William Tell ....Rossini
(Cello solo: Jacobus Langendoen)
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen:" variations on a German folksong, in the styles of different masters ....Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties, by magic lantern
Waltz, Jolly Fellows ....Vollstedt
Selection, The Fortune Teller ....Herbert
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep....Knight
Tuba solo: Mr. Paul Sidow
Popular song hits—
Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay, The Bowery, The Sidewalks of New York, Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Daisy Bell (A Bicycle Built for Two), Comrades, Little Annie Rooney, She May Have Seen Better Days, The Band Played On, After the Ball, A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Arguments, Preferences And Figures

TRANS. MAY 18

Dr. Koussevitzky's Programs, Fact-Finding Defenders Enter the Debate

THERE IS opportunity today for return to the debate over Dr. Koussevitzky's programs. Two letters at hand press for printing. The first, written by Mr. James B. Hobbs of Newton Center, replies in general and in particular to objections raised against them by the conservative—or more truly anti-modernist—wing. It follows hereunder:

"Two letters recently appeared in The Transcript criticizing what the writers consider the excessive emphasis on modern music in the programs of the Symphony Orchestra. It seems only reasonable that a few words be presented for the other side of the case. Not that I do not recognize that any words of mine (or of anyone else, for that matter) will probably have no effect on those who periodically protest at the Koussevitzky type of program, since these different points of view—these different musical tastes—are evidently only the expressions of fundamentally different philosophies of life.

"However, I should like your recent correspondents to know (if they have any doubt about it!) that there are many people who are very glad that Dr. Koussevitzky does not see fit to include on his programs Massenet, Wieniawski, Bizet, Bruch, Dvorák, et al. What should he play from these composers? Massenet's various 'Scènes' are enjoyable enough but suitable for The Pops rather than for Symphony Concerts. The same is true of Bizet's Suites. The other composers mentioned are to many simply boring. How much of Smetana, of Goldmark, of MacDowell, of Grieg could be played without protest from many subscribers? A little, no doubt. The delightful Overture to 'The Bartered Bride' has been played, though not without criticism by some as 'too light.' The 'Rustic Wedding' Symphony might be enjoyable to hear once, though it seems pretty long drawn out these days. For myself I should like to hear the 'Indian Suite' once.

"When we come to Liszt, it is hard to see how he has been much neglected, with the 'Faust Symphony' twice, the First Piano Concerto, 'Mazeppa,' 'The Preludes,' and 'Tasso.' Even this is more than some of us can readily stomach. Saint-Saëns seems to me pretty empty stuff. Elgar has been played several times. Schumann and Mendelsshon are another matter entirely. Perhaps Mendelssohn hasn't fared quite as well as he should, but Schumann has been played as follows since 1924: Overture to 'Manfred,' concerto for 'Cello, Piano Concerto (twice), First Symphony (five times), Second Symphony, Third Symphony (three times), Fourth Symphony (twice).

"None, surely, could accuse Dr. Koussevitzky of neglecting the great classic composers—Bach, Beethoven, Brahms. But there should be no place in the Symphony programs for composers who have been proved by time to be second or third-rate unless they have some special redeeming graces. Undoubtedly many of the moderns are second or third-rate. Those who are, will in general not be played thirty or forty years from now. But time cannot pass judgment unless they are heard.

Conclusions

"When one comes actually to analyze the Symphony programs of say the last two years, it will be found, if one eliminates from the count Strauss and Ravel (who, it would seem, must surely have won their spurs by now), but calls every other living composer (even Elgar!) a 'modern,' that there has been on the average almost exactly one 'modern' per concert. When one considers that most of the modern compositions are relatively short, it is hard to see how this is an extreme proportion. If Dr. Koussevitzky's programs are 'eccentric' or unbalanced, what would Toscanini's be considered? And why is Dr. Koussevitzky so enthusistically commended by leading New York critics for his catholic programs? Does it not mean anything that his programs almost invariably are interesting and stimulating?

"But perhaps that is begging the question. To be sure they are not always perfect for any particular individual. I, for example, should like to hear a symphony by Rakhmaninov, Vaughan Williams's 'London Symphony,' Carpenter's Concertino, Schönberg's 'Verklaerte Nacht,' and other compositions I could mention. But as The Transcript pointed out two weeks or so ago, it is not an easy matter to make up programs for twenty-four concerts. It seems to me that we can trust pretty well to the judgment of the conductor in the matter and that he can do better work if unhampered in his choice."

Theory and Practice

The second and longer letter comes from Mr. Lloyd V. Almirall who is at pains to describe himself as "not a Bostonian" but an "outsider," through three years in residence at Cambridge as student in the Law School. During that time he has been subscriber to every series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in both Boston and Cambridge. In his letter Mr. Almirall examines the theory and practice of symphonic program-making; proceeds from generalities to particularities at Symphony Hall; sets out comparative figures as well as preferences and opinions; finally gives judgment in favor of Dr. Koussevitzky. This department thanks Mr. Almirall for his tables—they have saved it some labor—and regrets that it must omit occasional paragraphs from what he himself calls "a nearly interminable letter." With every effort at good faith, it has retained whatever seemed germane to the present discussion:

". . . It has been my observation [writes Mr. Almirall] that among musicians and musical critics Koussevitzky's program-making ranks as the most important of his musical abilities. . . . He must in choosing his programs please all types in his audience as far as possible. These include elderly ladies who adore Schubert but for the most part sleep through Sibelius (the Sibelius of the Fourth Symphony) and talk through Toch. Since such persons have an indisputable right to their own predilections (though courtesy to neighbors who also pay admission might suggest quiet during even pieces by Toch), they must be catered to. Even without them the programs would certainly contain the same great proportion of works by the great masters. These after all are the meat and drink of the symphonic repertory. At the other extreme is the almost "lunatic fringe," in Boston very negligible, which regards everything written before 1910 as impossible twaddle. It doubtless deserves scant consideration.

There remains a large body of concert-goers, including musicians, music-students, and merely music lovers like myself, who care not only for the great works of the past but who are interested also in hearing the works of the present. Some of us honestly believe that Honegger's Symphony and Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" are great, and this while still realizing that Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms also left some worth-while things behind. I confess to tremendous admiration for Bruckner's Eighth Symphony which Koussevitzky performed so gloriously a few weeks ago. I submit that the many of us who feel this way are entitled to some reasonable opportunity to hear such moderns as Honegger, Hindemith, Roussel and others. The conductor must struggle to satisfy all, and since he cannot put on Honegger without temporarily annoying many of his auditors, or the "Pathetic Symphony" without antagonizing others, it is obvious that all of us must make some allowances.

Obligations

Secondly [writes Mr. Almirall] there is the question of encouragement of modern music. Admittedly such great orchestras as those in Boston, New York and Philadelphia are not experimental chambers. On the other hand the Beethovens and Brahmses of the future must arise from our midst. Not only should any intelligent concert-audience receive an opportunity to hear the best of modern works, but present-day composers must be encouraged within reasonable limits by having their works performed.

Koussevitzky has established an enviable reputation for encouragement of these composers. There may be fair grounds for criticism of some features of his handling of modern works, such as partiality towards certain composers or classes of composers, and failure to repeat the best of the works more frequently instead of introducing quite so many new ones. On the whole, however, he has been eminently successful. For the most part the works presented are worthy at least of a hearing. Some exceptions (such as Stravinsky's Violin-Concerto, or Ravel's new piano-concerto) are excusable considering the position of those composers. Other exceptions, such as the incredibly uninteresting Ode of Copland, may be charitably excused as mistakes. If we cannot enjoy all the new works we hear, we can tolerate them with the thought that perhaps we are educating ourselves, or giving pleasure to others, or lending a helping hand where needed. When the works do not please us we are entitled to dislike them as heartily as we please; and signify our dislike by refusing to applaud. But we should give the works at least a fair hearing.

Thirdly, the prestige of the orchestra must be considered to some extent; and among musicians at least an unalloyed program of classicism and romanticism would be destructive to the great reputation enjoyed by the Boston Orchestra today.

Critics of conductors as program-makers also fail often to consider the actual facts as to works played. It is a truism that bitter recollection of one program (or one section of a program) that was excessively distasteful to the particular listener will often weigh more heavily in the mind than the dimmer recollection of many pleasant and thoroughly enjoyed programs. Thus without doubt many persons will recall and complain of the twenty-third program this year (Martelli–Ravel–Bruckner) in complete forgetfulness of such landmarks as the "Faust" program or the Haydn concert.

Now to Figures

I am inclosing [continues Mr. Almirall] a hasty analysis of the programs for the past season, including all performances at Symphnoy Hall under Koussevitzky, but excluding performances of works under Messrs. Burgin, Cherepnin, Clifton and Holst. [The Tuesday afternoon concert under Fiedler is included since that was really Koussevitzky's program]. While I do not vouch for the complete accuracy of the list, I do not believe there are any serious errors. It shows that there were 143 performances of compositions by acknowledged "masters" as against forty-eight performances by all other composers. This is a ratio of three to one. It must be remembered also that for the most part the "modern" works are relatively very short as compared with the bulk of the works by the" masters." A ratio indicating that Koussevitzky's programs are sixty-seven per cent made up of works of acknowledgd masters indicates a very fair consideration of the majority of the audience.

It is true that the analysis may not fairly represent the ratio between "classical and romantic" music and "modern" as it would be considered by the anonymous critics. But if we should subtract the performances of Bruckner, Mahler, Musorgsky, Ravel, Rimsky-Korsakov, Skriabin, Sibelius, and Stravinsky from the "masters' " table and add them to the "modern" table, the totals would show that music which can conservatively be considered "romantic and classical" had 111 performances as against eighty-one performances for all mus.c otherwise. Since "all music otherwise" is an exceedingly broad field, perhaps the ratio is not radically prejudicial. . . .

It should be added that some argument may be advanced for the inclusion of Prokofiev and Loeffler in the "masters' " table. . . . With Ravel I have considered the Piano Concerto as proper material for the "modern" table, since this division is based to some extent upon musical worth. In the case of Stravinsky, I have included both his new Violin-Concerto and his "Symphony of Psalms" in the "modern" table; the Suites from "Petrushka" and "Pulcinella" in the "masters' " table.

OLD AND MODERN MASTERS

Beethoven	15
Brahms	12
Wagner	11
Strauss	11
Mozart	11
Haydn	9
Ravel	9
Chaikovsky	10
Debussy	7
Bach, J. S.	6
Liszt	5
Corelli	4
D'Indy	4
Stravinsky	4
Mahler	3
Skriabin	3
Sibelius	3
Bach, C. P. E.	2
Bruckner	2
Franck	2
Rakhmaninov	2
Rimsky-Korsakov	2
Schubert	2
Schumann	2
Berlioz	1
Musorgsky	1
	143

OTHER (MODERN) COMPOSERS

Stravinsky	4
Prokofiev	4
Toch	4
Gershwin	3
Sowerby	3
Taylor	3
Berezovsky	2
Copland	2
Daniels	2
Dukelsky	2
Frid	2
Hindemith	2
Loeffler	2
Martelli	2
Morris	2
Pick-Mangiagalli	2
Ravel	2
Schmitt	2
Carpenter	1
Hill	1
Cherepnin	1
	48

It is interesting to note that the performances of works by Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Wagner together exceeded all performances of works by composers listed in the "modern" table. . . . I wonder whether some of the critics of Koussevitzky's "modernisms" have adequately considered the figures?

At The Pops Tonight

"Gay Nineties" Again

Charge of the Hussars........Spindler
Invitation to the Dance.........Weber
(Scored for Orchestra by Berlioz)
Piano-Pieces ....To Be Announced
Overture to the Opera. "William Tell' ....Rossini
Variations on a German Folk-Song in the Styles of Different Masters ("'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen") ....Ochs
News-Flashes of the Nineties by Magic Lantern.
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ......Vollstedt
Selection from the Operetta, "The Fortune-Teller" ....Herbert
Song for Tuba, 'Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep"..........Knight
Popular Song-Hits
Conductor: A. Fiedler
Soloists:
J. M. Sanromá............Paul Sidow

'Gay Nineties' at Pops Again May 18

An all-Russian program will open the Pop concerts' third week at Symphony Hall Monday night. Wednesday night there will be another "Gay Nineties" celebration. Prizes will again be given the best group appearing in old-time costumes. Songhits of 40 years ago and also orchestral pieces that were favorites then will be heard. These "Gay Nineties" nights have made a sensational hit.

J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist at the second Sunday concert, on May 22, when the popular pianist will play Weber's "Concert Piece." Ravel's "Bolero's," Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony and Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria" overture will be other features of this second Sunday bill. Arthur Fiedler's program for tonight follows:

Coronation March ....Meyerbeer
Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn
Aragon, from Suite Espegnole'.....Albeniz
Hejre Kati ....Hubay
Irish Rhapsody ....Herbert
Mediation from Thais............Massenet
(Solo violin: . Theodorowicz)
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tchaikovsky
New Moon ....Romberg
Estudiantina Waltz ....Waldteufel
Strike Up the Band.............Greshwin

Man."

Second "Gay Nineties" at the Symphony "Pops"

A second "Gay Nineties" program will be given at the "Pops" in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening. This novel program, with its attendant features of old costumes, "beer" served in steins, and bicycles checked free of charge, proved extremely popular last week.

All who attend tomorrow are urged to come in their period costumes. A prize will be given the best table. The musical program will include additional pieces like in the "Nineties."

Tonight's program follows:

TUESDAY, MAY 17—First Slavonic Dance, Dvorak; overture to "Light Cavalry," Suppe; the Firebird, Berceuse, Stravinsky; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Spanish dance from "La Vida Breve," de Falla; "Sally in Our Alley," old England song, arranged by Frank Bridge; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," excerpts, Wagner; "Artist's Life," waltz, Strauss; "At Dawning," Cadman-Herbert; argonaise, from "The Cid," Massenet.

BOSTON TRAVELER, THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1932

"GAY NINETIES" REPEATED AT POPS

Another Big Audience on Hand for Jolly Evening

By KATHARINE LYONS

Those leg-o-mutton days of the "gay nineties" came back for a second visit to Symphony hall last evening for the sake of the

---

Stolen bases—Frisch, Cardinals, 8; Stripp, Dodgers, 4; Piet and P. Waner, Pirates, 4; Watkins, Cardinals, 4; Klein, Phillies, 4.

AMERICAN LEAGUE

Batting—Foxx, Athletics, .460; Dickey, Yankees, .427.

Runs—Foxx, Athletics, 30; Cochrane, Athletics, 26.

Runs batted in—Averill, Indians, 31; Foxx, Athletics, 30.

Hits—Foxx, Athletics, 46; Porter, Indians, 42; Levey, Browns, 42.

Doubles—Blue, White Sox, 10; Campbell and Goslin, Browns, 10.

Triples—Myer, Senators, 6; Foxx, Athletics, 4.

Home runs—Foxx, Athletics, 10; Ruth, Yankees, 7; Cochrane, Athletics, 7; Gehringer, Tigers, 7; Averill, Indians, 7.

Stolen bases—Blue, White Sox, 7; Chapman, Yankees, 5; Burns, Browns, 5.

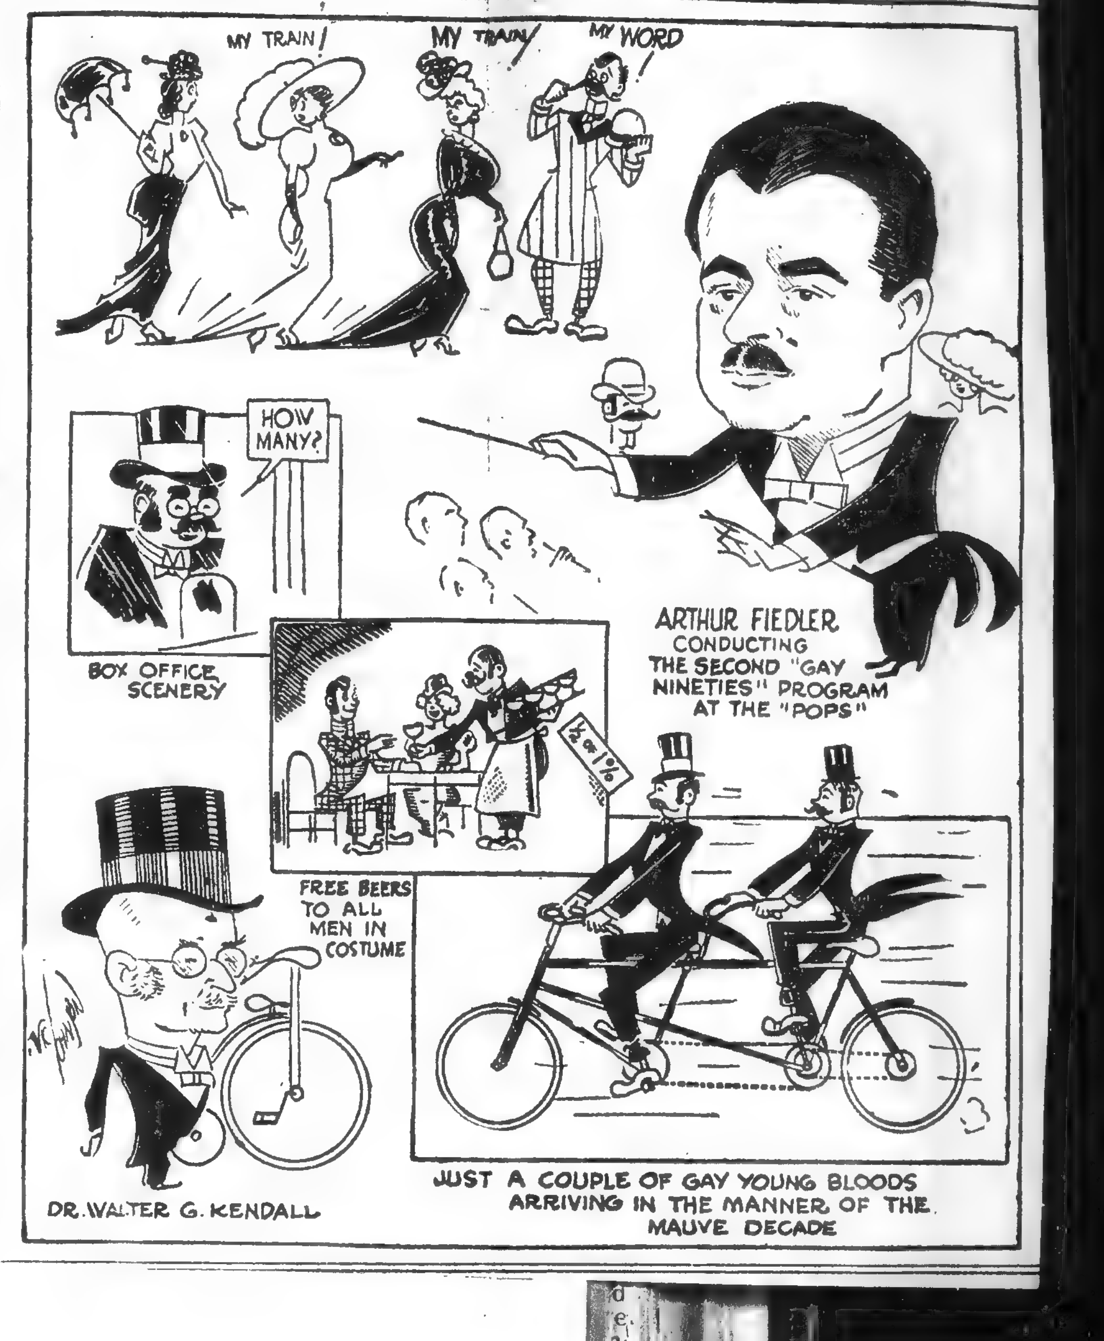
Burgoo King in Chicago Race

CHICAGO, May 19 (AP)—Burgoo King, winner of the Kentucky derby and the Preakness, will go after the rich $50,000 American derby at Washington park, June 18.

The entry of E. R. Bradley's 3-year-old was received today.

Burgoo King will be shipped here after filling engagements in the East, arriving 10 days in advance of the derby.

More "Gay Ninties" at Pops



MY TRAIN!
MY TRAIN!
MY WORD!
HOW MANY?
BOX OFFICE SCENERY
½ of 1%
ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTING THE SECOND "GAY NINETIES" PROGRAM AT THE "POPS"
FREE BEERS TO ALL MEN IN COSTUME
DR. WALTER G. KENDALL
JUST A COUPLE OF GAY YOUNG BLOODS ARRIVING IN THE MANNER OF THE MAUVE DECADE

Mauve Decade! Alice Ratcliffe of Newton is shown as she adjusted her bonnet at Symphony Hall last night at the "Gay 90s" Pop concert. A goodly crowd of music lovers in the costumes of the "Floradora Sextet" days were present. (Daily Record Photo)

Second "Gay 90's" At Pops Tonight

All seats are taken for the second "Gay 90's" night which will be given in Symphony Hall tonight. All are invited to wear their old-time clothes.

Beer, bicycles and other features of the first night will be repeated, and new ones added.

The program follows:

Charge of the Hussars..............Spindler
Invitation to the Dance......Weber-Berlioz
Pianoforte solo (selected)
Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma
Overture to Wiliam Tell...........Rossini
('Cello solo: Jacobus Langendoen)
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen:" variations on a German folksong, in the styles of different masters ....Ochs
News Flashes of the Nineties, by magic lantern
Waltz, Jolly Fellows ....Vollstedt
Selection, The Fortune Teller ....Herbert
Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep....Knight
Tuba solo: Mr. Paul Sidow
Popular song hits—
Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay, The Bowery, The Sidewalks of New York, Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Daisy Bell (A Bicycle Built for Two), Comrades, Little Annie Rooney, She May Have Seen Better Days, The Band Played On, After the Ball, A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1932

'GAY NINETIES' AT POPS AGAIN

Puffed Sleeves and Plumed Hats Rule—Audience Sings Old Songs

SANROMA AMUSES IN 'PARLOR RECITAL'

By FRANCES BLANCHARD

Enticed by the magic words, "Gay Nineties," a record audience filled every seat at the tables and in the balconies of Symphony hall last evening for the second of these enlivening concerts of the season conducted by Arthur Fiedler. Once more those who dressed up for the occasion in the elaborate fol-de-rols of the period, many of them attired in gowns that had graced notable occasions in the family history of their wearers, received tumultuous applause as they entered the auditorium.

This time the grop that provided this enjoyable evening took the precaution to prepare printed copies of the words to the old-time songs, the better to enable every one to participate in the singing, and these sheets, patterned after the old Music Hall "Promenade Concerts," bore advertising and jokes of those days.

SANROMA SOLOIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, in his piano solo, sent his listeners into raptures of laughing delight with his miming of the affected mannerisms of the young man giving a parlor recital—entering wearing his white gloves—twirling down the piano stool, putting in all possible trills and variations, and even performing the "Maiden's Prayer" with his white gloves still on.

Neal O'Hara's witty "News Flashes of the Nineties," set to the accompaniment of old-fashioned pictures of styles in clothes and equipages, brought forth more howls of merriment. And to crown the evening, there was the final chorus singing by the entire house. The old-time theory that the audience enjoys best that in which it personally takes part had its fulfilment when they burst forth spontaneously into the "Stein Song" encore, and when they caroled the gamut of the old choruses such as "The Bowery," "The Sidewalks of New York," "Little Annie Rooney" and "A Hot Time in the Old Town."

MANY ANCIENT GOWNS

Although there were wonderful gowns throughout the audience, many of them bearing all the earmarks of their Parisian ancestry, no one could dispute the wise decision of the judges in awarding the first prize to the group that included Mrs. M. Lawrence Higgins, Mrs. Henry McElwain, Miss Esther Fano of Porto Rico, David McKibbin, Ronald Findlay and Jacques de Lys.

Mrs. McElwain wore an enormous plumed hat and a black velvet dolman weighted down with intricate jet embroidery, over a puffed-sleeved gown of net and pale blue satin, all very dazzling. Mrs. Higgins was in a tightly fitted brown silk buttoned down the front, with a brown hat. Miss Fanos Paris gown was of rich ivory silk with a very long train, and much embroidered. Her big hat bore plumes. The men wore Prince Alberts and Ascot ties, and Mr. McKibbin had a wonderful 'hair" watch chain.

Another very notable group in authentic costumes included Dr. Walter G. Kendall, captain of the Bicycle Club. (He has been captain for moer than 40 years). He brought his old high-wheeled bicycle on which he has ridden more than 10,000 miles. With him were Mr. and Mrs. M. L. Bridgman, the latter in her mother's white silk wedding dress; Mrs. Paul C. McGowan in old-time costume; Mrs. A. J. Williams in a handsome hand-made black, velvet and silk gown and big hat and Mrs. Jennie Pratt.

LARGE PLUMED HATS

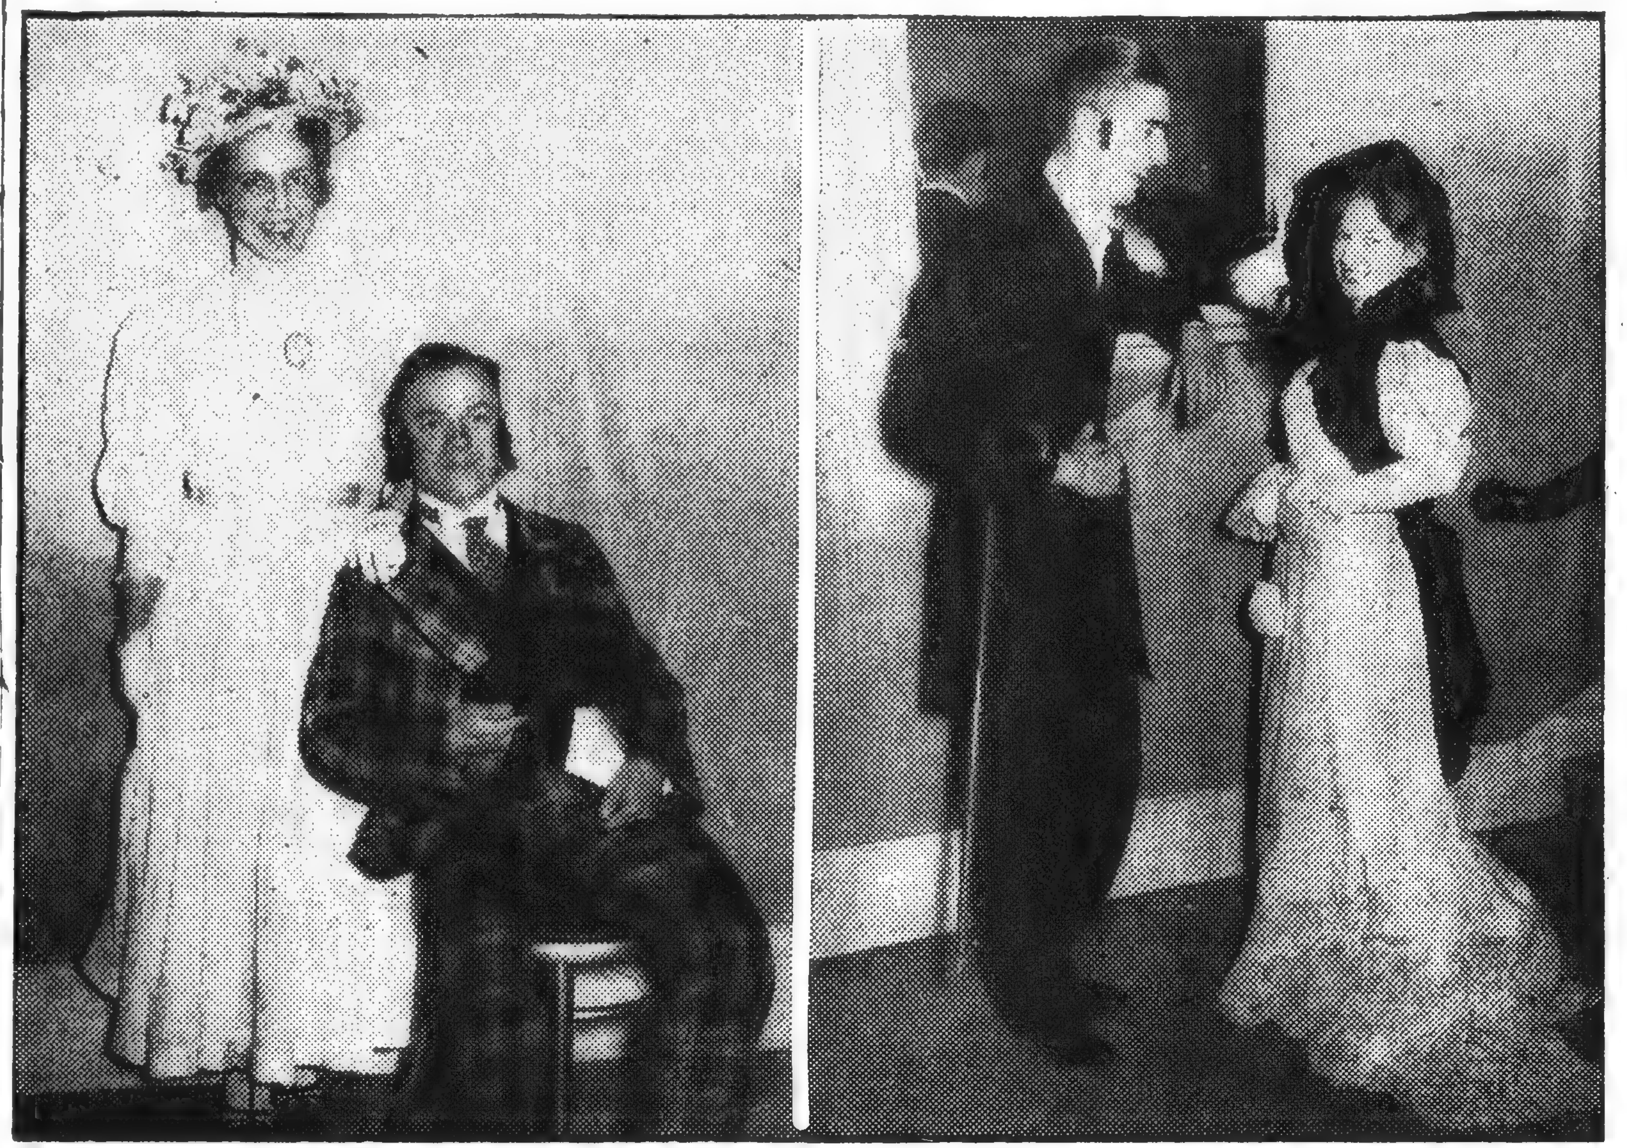
Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, wearing a large dark blue hat with a huge blue plume, came with Mr. and Mrs. Theodore B. Pitman, the latter wearing an ermine stole and plumed hat, and Mrs. Claggett Wilson. A party of young people in lovely old white silk gowns included Miss Barbara Hodges who wore her mother's white silk wedding gown, in off-shoulder effect, and her fiance, Thomas Dunstan; Miss Betty Fitzpatrick, in her grandmother's lact and silk wedding gown; Miss Ka'therine Rustin white, Miss Eleanor Walker, Miss Jane Richardson, George Kuehn, Pryor Percival and Ike Harter.

Miss Francis G. Curtis of Mt. Vernon street wore a cute little bonnet of shirred white velvet edged with brown velvet and a brown velvet dolman-shaped wrap that she had in her coming-out year, 1883. Some of those who were present at the concert a week ago had such a delightful time that they came again, all dressed up. Among these were Dr. and Mrs. Clark Staples. The latter wore a straw hat with high trimming and a tight walking costume with red velvet bodice. Her mother, Mrs. William H. Hall of South Willington, Ct., wore the white lace-trimmed gown and the white "mushroom" hat of net and lilies of the valley in which she was maid of honor at a wedding in 1896. Mrs. Joseph C. Worth of Norwich, Ct., in her mother's satin and lace wedding dress, came up especially for the occasion. Also in that party were Miss Zilla Zinch, Dr. Clarence H. Staples and Dr. Fred Simmons.

Miss Betty Hammond was in a distinguishing black gown and bonnet which had been worn at Grover Cleveland's first inauguration as President. With her was Ralph Farnham. Miss Marjorie Bolton wore her grandmother's French wedding gown of ivory silk and lace and a little black silk cape and hat. Gordon Simpson, who accompanied her, wore a wedding coat that had first been used in 1897 by a friend.

The next feature evening at the Pops will be Lovers' night on May 21.

"GAY NINETIES" AGAIN INVADE SYMPHONY HALL



The Pops concert at Symphony hall again offered the music and mood of the gay and giddy decade, with many of the spectators appearing in the costumes of the period Left to right: Miss Muriel Anderson, Anton Pruckner, Gordon Simpson, Miss Marjorie Bolton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
THREE RIVERS, MICH.
COMMERCIAL

MAY 19 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop" concerts, when Boston symphony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretensions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practice. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LEADER

many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there. The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age", when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretensions. People called "legs", "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practice. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed to-day.

'GAY NINETIES' AGAIN MAKE BOW AT POPS

Beer and Bustles Vie With "Hearts and Flowers"

Beer and bustles . . . "Hearts and Flowers" and Liszt's paraphrase on "Rigoletto" . . . magic lantern views and a barouche . . . bird of paradise feathers and a "high wheeler." . . .

Thus with the best and the worst did the Pops' management honor for the second time last night the "Gay Nineties"—and the great god ballyhoo.

Conceived on the spur of last Wednesday night's "bang-up" crowds—and business—and announced that night for the first time, last night's concert had the signal honor to be a "sell out" two days later. The continued stream of applications forced the management to advertise on Sunday and again yesterday morning that all seats were sold out at Symphony Hall.

Likewise significant of Boston's intense desire to return for a musical hour or so to the mauve decade was the crowd of unsuccessful seat buyers who hovered around the entrance long after the concert started for glimpses of the "ladies and gentlemen" in costumes of the nineties, of which there were considerably more than on the first night. The concert was fully as successful as the first "Gay Nineties" night.

Sanroma Burlesques

But the costumes and the spirit of tomfoolery which refused to be downed during the evening were only two of the "high lights" of the evening. Others were Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist, and "News Flashes of the Nineties," given by courtesy of a magic lantern and Neal O'Hara.

Enter Mr Sanroma, with white gloves several sizes too large for him and a white carnation. With a stern expression, he peered down at an old upholstered piano stool and spun it around with a noble gesture. Then he played in a modern manner Listz' paraphrase of "Rigoletto," which was followed by "Alice, Where Art Thou?" a very dulcet romance.

In the latter number Mr Sanroma showed a remarkable flair for acting, showing his anguished profile at an angle which provoked much laughter despite the lachrymal theme. Occasionally he relieved his tortured soul by sniffing his carnation. At the end he buried his face in a nosegay.

A storm of applause brought Mr Sanroma back for an encore, the "Maiden's Prayer" or something of that nature. He stepped to the piano, dusted off the keyboard with much gusto, and played the piece with his gloves on and with gestures. Meanwhile, a green light flickered on him. It was a rare burlesque.

And "Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay"

The well-rounded program that followed included "Hearts and Flowers," "Jolly Fellows," the whistling waltz, in which the audience participated; "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," a tuba solo by Paul Sidow, and once popular song hits headed by "Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay."

The magic lantern views showed, among other things, the Seven Sutherland Sisters (ask Ma, she knows), a folding table bed enabling a person to drink himself under the table and land in bed, bonnets with flowers fresh from the Vassar daisy chain, open front celluloid collars, six-piece bathing suits (including cotton stockings), and Arthur Fiedler at the age of 18 months.

Only the near-beer and faint odor of moth balls in the corridors told that "the ball was over," never to be actually relived again.

The table which won the costume prize was that of Mrs Henry E. McElwain of 180 Commonwealth av. A costume owned by Mrs McElwain and worn by Mrs Marion L. Higgins of 100 Beacon st, one of her guests, was judged the best costume. Others in costume at the table were Miss Edther A. Fano, David McKibben and Jacques de Lys.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1932

'GAY NINETIES' AT POPS AGAIN

Puffed Sleeves and Plumed Hats Rule — Audience Sings Old Songs

SANROMA AMUSES IN 'PARLOR RECITAL'

By FRANCES BLANCHARD

Enticed by the magic words, "Gay Nineties," a record audience filled every seat at the tables and in the balconies of Symphony hall last evening for the second of these enlivening concerts of the season conducted by Arthur Fiedler. Once more those who dressed up for the occasion in the elaborate fol-de-rols of the period, many of them attired in gowns that had graced notable occasions in the family history of their wearers, received tumultuous applause as they entered the auditorium.

This time the grop that provided this enjoyable evening took the precaution to prepare printed copies of the words to the old-time songs, the better to enable every one to participate in the singing, and these sheets, patterned after the old Music Hall "Promenade Concerts," bore advertising and jokes of those days.

SANROMA SOLOIST

Jesus Maria Sanroma, in his piano solo, sent his listeners into raptures of laughing delight with his miming of the affected mannerisms of the young man giving a parlor recital—entering wearing his white gloves—twirling down the piano stool, putting in all possible trills and variations, and even performing the "Maiden's Prayer" with his white gloves still on.

Neal O'Hara's witty "News Flashes of the Nineties," set to the accompaniment of old-fashioned pictures of styles in clothes and equipages, brought forth more howls of merriment. And to crown the evening, there was the final chorus singing by the entire house. The old-time theory that the audience enjoys best that in which it personally takes part had its fulfilment when they burst forth spontaneously into the "Stein Song" encore, and when they caroled the gamut of the old choruses such as "The Bowery," "The Sidewalks of New York," "Little Annie Rooney" and "A Hot Time in the Old Town."

MANY ANCIENT GOWNS

Although there were wonderful gowns throughout the audience, many of them bearing all the earmarks of their Parisian ancestry, no one could dispute the wise decision of the judges in awarding the first prize to the group that included Mrs. M. Lawrence Higgins, Mrs. Henry McElwain, Miss Esther Fano of Porto Rico, David McKibbin, Ronald Findlay and Jacques de Lys.

Mrs. McElwain wore an enormous plumed hat and a black velvet dolman weighted down with intricate jet embroidery, over a puffed-sleeved gown of net and pale blue satin, all very dazzling. Mrs. Higgins was in a tightly fitted brown silk buttoned down the front, with a brown hat. Miss Fanos Paris gown was of rich ivory silk with a very long train, and much embroidered. Her big hat bore plumes. The men wore Prince Alberts and Ascot ties, and Mr. McKibbin had a wonderful 'hair" watch chain.

Another very notable group in authentic costumes included Dr. Walter G. Kendall, captain of the Bicycle Club. (He has been captain for moer than 40 years). He brought his old high-wheeled bicycle on which he has ridden more than 10,000 miles. With him were Mr. and Mrs. M. L. Bridgman, the latter in her mother's white silk wedding dress; Mrs. Paul C. McGowan in old-time costume; Mrs. A. J. Williams in a handsome hand-made black, velvet and silk gown and big hat and Mrs. Jennie Pratt.

L/RGE PLUMED HATS

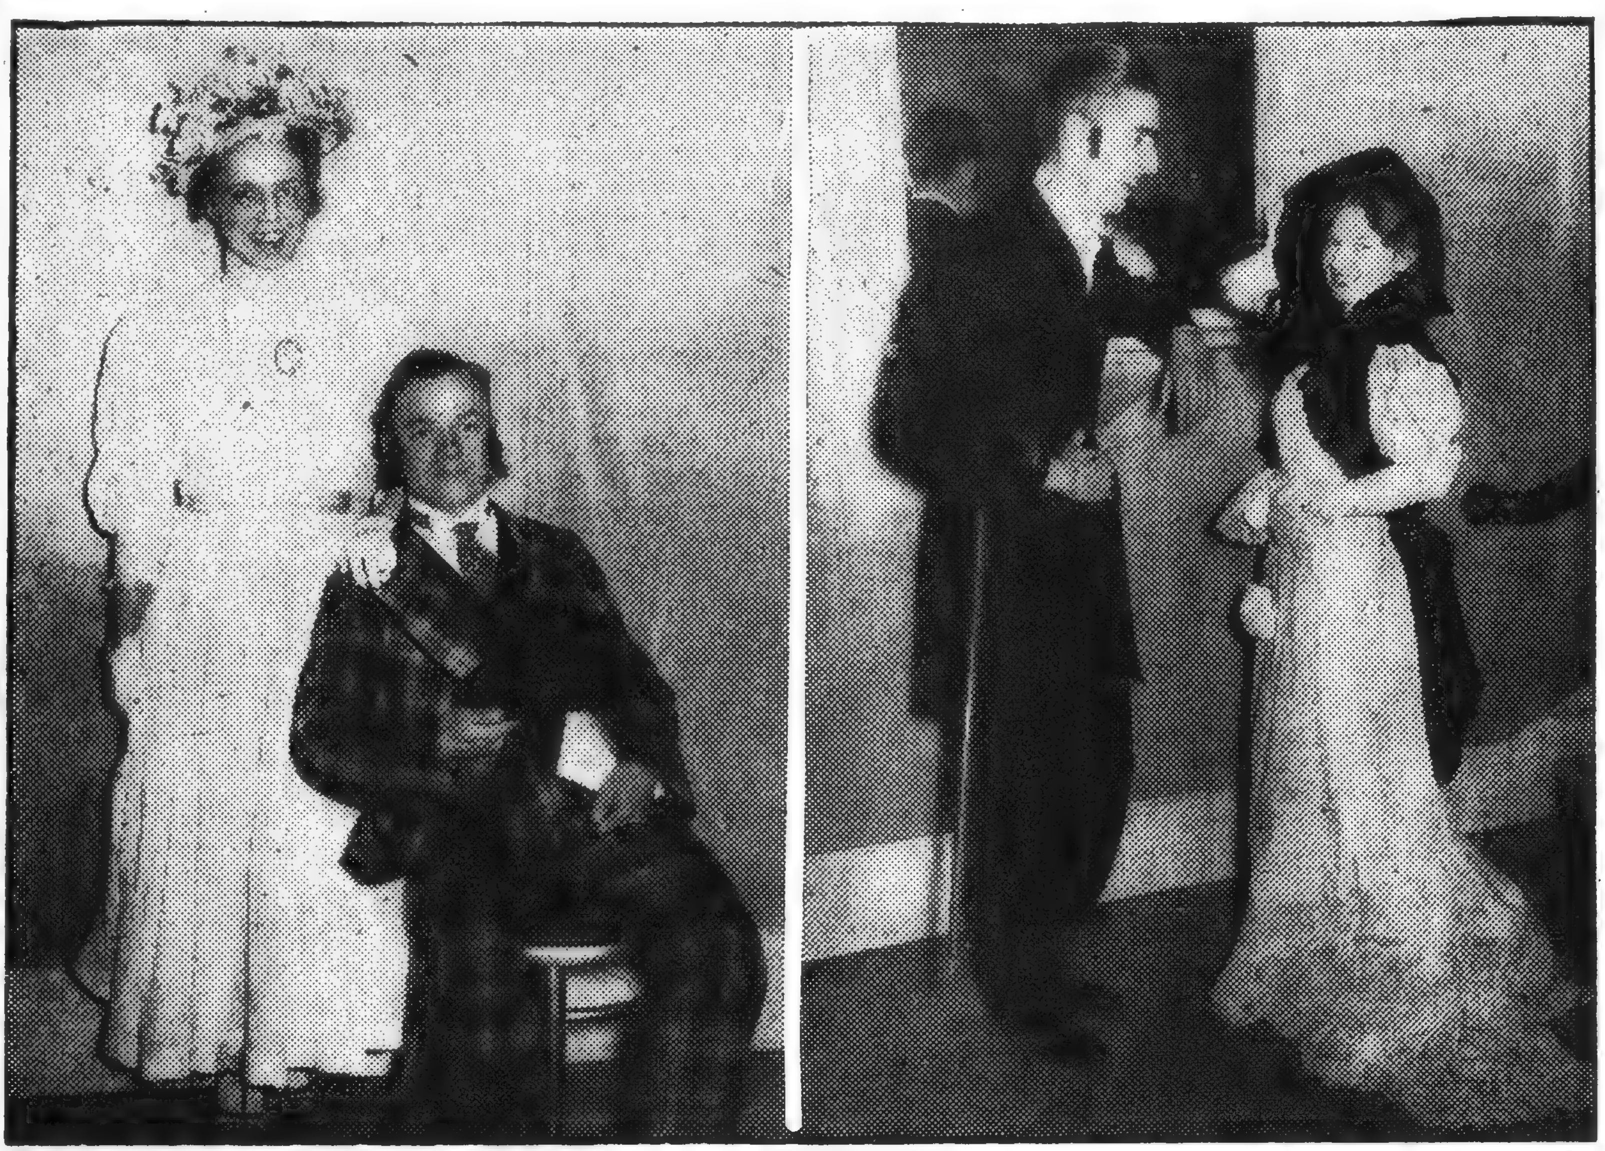
Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, wearing a large dark blue hat with a huge blue plume, came with Mr. and Mrs. Theodore B. Pitman, the latter wearing an ermine stole and plumed hat, and Mrs. Claggett Wilson. A party of young people in lovely old white silk gowns included Miss Barbara Hodges who wore her mother's white silk wedding gown, in off-shoulder effect, and her fiance, Thomas Dunstan; Miss Betty Fitzpatrick, in her grandmother's lact and silk wedding gown; Miss Ka'therine Rustin white, Miss Eleanor Walker, Miss Jane Richardson, George Kuehn, Pryor Percival and Ike Harter.

Miss Francis G. Curtis of Mt. Vernon street wore a cute little bonnet of shirred white velvet edged with brown velvet and a brown velvet dolman-shaped wrap that she had in her coming-out year, 1883. Some of those who were present at the concert a week ago had such a delightful time that they came again, all dressed up. Among these were Dr. and Mrs. Clark Staples. The latter wore a straw hat with high trimming and a tight walking costume with red velvet bodice. Her mother, Mrs. William H. Hall of South Willington, Ct., wore the white lace-trimmed gown and the white "mushroom" hat of net and lilies of the valley in which she was maid of honor at a wedding in 1896. Mrs. Joseph C. Worth of Norwich, Ct., in her mother's satin and lace wedding dress, came up especially for the occasion. Also in that party were Miss Zilla Zinch, Dr. Clarence H. Staples and Dr. Fred Simmons.

Miss Betty Hammond was in a distinguishing black gown and bonnet which had been worn at Grover Cleveland's first inauguration as President. With her was Ralph Farnham. Miss Marjorie Bolton wore her grandmother's French wedding gown of ivory silk and lace and a little black silk cape and hat. Gordon Simpson, who accompanied her, wore a wedding coat that had first been used in 1897 by a friend.

The next feature evening at the Pops will be Lovers' night on May 21.

"GAY NINETIES" AGAIN INVADE SYMPHONY HALL



The Pops concert at Symphony hall again offered the music and mood of the gay and giddy decade, with many of the spectators appearing in the costumes of the period Left to right: Miss Muriel Anderson, Anton Pruckner, Gordon Simpson, Miss Marjorie Bolton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
THREE RIVERS, MICH.
COMMERCIAL

MAY 19 1932

Confessed Lindbergh Faker Arraigned in Homes of Parents He Victimized

PRISONER NO. 13

Constable or Guard at Flemington Jail Prevent Him Harming Self

many of whom wore costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretensions. People called "legs," "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practice. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peace-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEADER
[illegible] – Ind

MAY 19 1932

THE GAY NINETIES

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties", the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston 'Pop' concerts, when Boston symphony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago heard by a great audience many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age", when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of insincere pretensions. People called "legs", "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practice. Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our present frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the tenspots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty distress, and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed to-day.

'GAY NINETIES' AGAIN MAKE BOW AT POPS

Beer and Bustles Vie With "Hearts and Flowers"

Beer and bustles . . . "Hearts and Flowers" and Liszt's paraphrase on "Rigoletto" . . . magic lantern views and a barouche . . . bird of paradise feathers and a "high wheeler." . . .

Thus with the best and the worst did the Pops' management honor for the second time last night the "Gay Nineties"—and the great god ballyhoo.

Conceived on the spur of last Wednesday night's "bang-up" crowds —and business—and announced that night for the first time, last night's concert had the signal honor to be a "sell out" two days later. The continued stream of applications forced the management to advertise on Sunday and again yesterday morning that all seats were sold out at Symphony Hall.

Likewise significant of Boston's intense desire to return for a musical hour or so to the mauve decade was the crowd of unsuccessful seat buyers who hovered around the entrance long after the concert started for glimpses of the "ladies and gentlemen" in costumes of the nineties, of which there were considerably more than on the first night. The concert was fully as successful as the first "Gay Nineties" night.

Sanroma Burlesques

But the costumes and the spirit of tomfoolery which refused to be downed during the evening were only two of the "high lights" of the evening. Others were Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist, and "News Flashes of the Nineties," given by courtesy of a magic lantern and Neal O'Hara.

Enter Mr Sanroma, with white gloves several sizes too large for him and a white carnation. With a stern expression, he peered down at an old upholstered piano stool and spun it around with a noble gesture. Then he played in a modern manner Liszt' paraphrase of "Rigoletto," which was followed by "Alice, Where Art Thou?" a very dulcet romance.

In the latter number Mr Sanroma showed a remarkable flair for acting, showing his anguished profile at an angle which provoked much laughter despite the lachrymal theme. Occasionally he relieved his tortured soul by sniffing his carnation. At the end he buried his face in a nosegay.

A storm of applause brought Mr Sanroma back for an encore, the "Maiden's Prayer" or something of that nature. He stepped to the piano, dusted off the keyboard with much gusto, and played the piece with his gloves on and with gestures. Meanwhile, a green light flickered on him. It was a rare burlesque.

And "Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay"

The well-rounded program that followed included "Hearts and Flowers," "Jolly Fellows," the whistling waltz, in which the audience participated; "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," a tuba solo by Paul Sidow, and once popular song hits headed by "Ta-ra-ra Boom-de-ay."

The magic lantern views showed, among other things, the Seven Sutherland Sisters (ask Ma, she knows), a folding table bed enabling a person to drink himself under the table and land in bed, bonnets with flowers fresh from the Vassar daisy chain, open front celluloid collars, six-piece bathing suits (including cotton stockings), and Arthur Fiedler at the age of 18 months.

Only the near-beer and faint odor of moth balls in the corridors told that "the ball was over," never to be actually relived again.

The table which won the costume prize was that of Mrs Henry E. McElwain of 180 Commonwealth av. A costume owned by Mrs McElwain and worn by Mrs Marion L. Higgins of 100 Beacon st, one of her guests, was judged the best costume. Others in costume at the table were Miss Edther A. Fano, David McKibben and Jacques de Lys.

MISSING
PAGE(S)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

MAY 21 1932

Pop Concerts Promise Fine Entertainment

But Critic Sighs for Refreshments in Good Old Munich Style

By DENOE LEEDY
The Press Music Editor

FROM Severance Hall comes the announcement that, during four weeks of June, "Pop" concerts will be given by an orchestra of 60 players, all members of the Cleveland Orchestra, under the direction of Rudolph Ringwall. There will be three concerts each week. A varied program will be offered on Wednesday evening; on Friday evening the "high-brows" can listen to nothing but symphonic fare; on Saturday afternoon, popular works for those who take their music lightly.

An item not to be missed is that the auditorium of Severance Hall is ice-cooled, and that if the evening be sultry, one can enjoy 90 minutes of music in a climate similar to that of the Adirondacks.

Equally enticing is the 30 minutes' intermission giving opportunity for wandering thru the Fine Arts garden and a chance to enjoy "ice cream and soft drinks in the orchestra lounge."

Here is pleasure for a mere farthing. Where can you go and have your soul beguiled by Euterpe while at the same time Bacchus in all his "non-alcoholic" allure beckons to more wanton pursuits? The Cleveland Orchestra needs no introduction; neither does Rudolph Ringwall. One can be assured that the sounds made will fall pleasantly on the ear.

* * *

The Refreshments

ONLY the refreshments fail to excite. Alas! we shall have to listen to the lusty rhythms of a Johannes Brahms without the "Munchen" that inspired them. There will be no "petit verre" over which to linger while the bright melodies of Bizet or Saint-Saens float thru our heads. On the music alone can we rely for our "intoxication."

Perhaps this is our good fortune. At least, it will prove the stimulating power of good music. And as matters stand, the varied fare of the weeks' programs should satisfy the palates of both those who favor heavy vintages and those inclined to light.

The chance to hear so-called "light" music interests us. Thousands of sparkling overtures and similar pieces by such forgotten masters as Auber, Boieldieu, Marschner, Herold, Adams, Flotow, David, Lortzing, Nicolai and the like might be revived for us. Such works as the Grieg "Peer Gynt" Suite, the Tschaikowsky "Nut-Cracker" Suite, the Sibelius "Valse Triste" and others which now suffer the appellation of "hackneyed," and are consequently omitted from serious programs, might be dusted off and made to glow with renewed beauties.

* * *

College Nights

AND why not add to the festivity of certain evenings by introducing the Boston Symphony custom of college nights—opportunities for the gathering together of alumni. A Western Reserve, Oberlin or Ohio State evening would find many old friends assembled for reminiscences, the enjoyment of music, and the singing of college songs.

There is no reason why the "Pops" should not become just as much an established institution here as in the city of the glorified bean and cod. For almost 50 years Bostonians have seen their musical season end in a series of concerts that have eschewed the formalities of the sacred winter series.

Witness these gay scenes in that respectable metropolis. According to the Boston Globe of June 16, 1896—"Everything last night was crimson in Music Hall, for it was Harvard night at the 'Pops.' Crimson bunting and flags, crimson-colored programs, girls in crimson waists and boys with crimson scarfs drinking crimson wine. The house was packed and strange to say it was an extremely quiet crowd for about two hours, or until No. 11 on the program was reached.

"This was Fair Harvard, and the students in the audience decided that they wanted to give that part of the concert themselves. So about 700 made a rush for the stage. The musicians were panic stricken—fiddles, 'cellos, horns, drums, and the piccolos fled in consternation." But after a thunderous performance of Fair Harvard, we are informed that "quiet was restored and the banished musicians allowed to resume their places." Certainly a jolly time for Victorian Boston—but remember that in those days the refreshments were other than ice cream.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1932

Banter and Blandishment

Waltz from Strauss: "Wine, Woman and Song"

To Be Danced by Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and Others at the Pop Concert Next Saturday

---

BOSTON EVENING AMERICAN • • Largest Evening Circulat

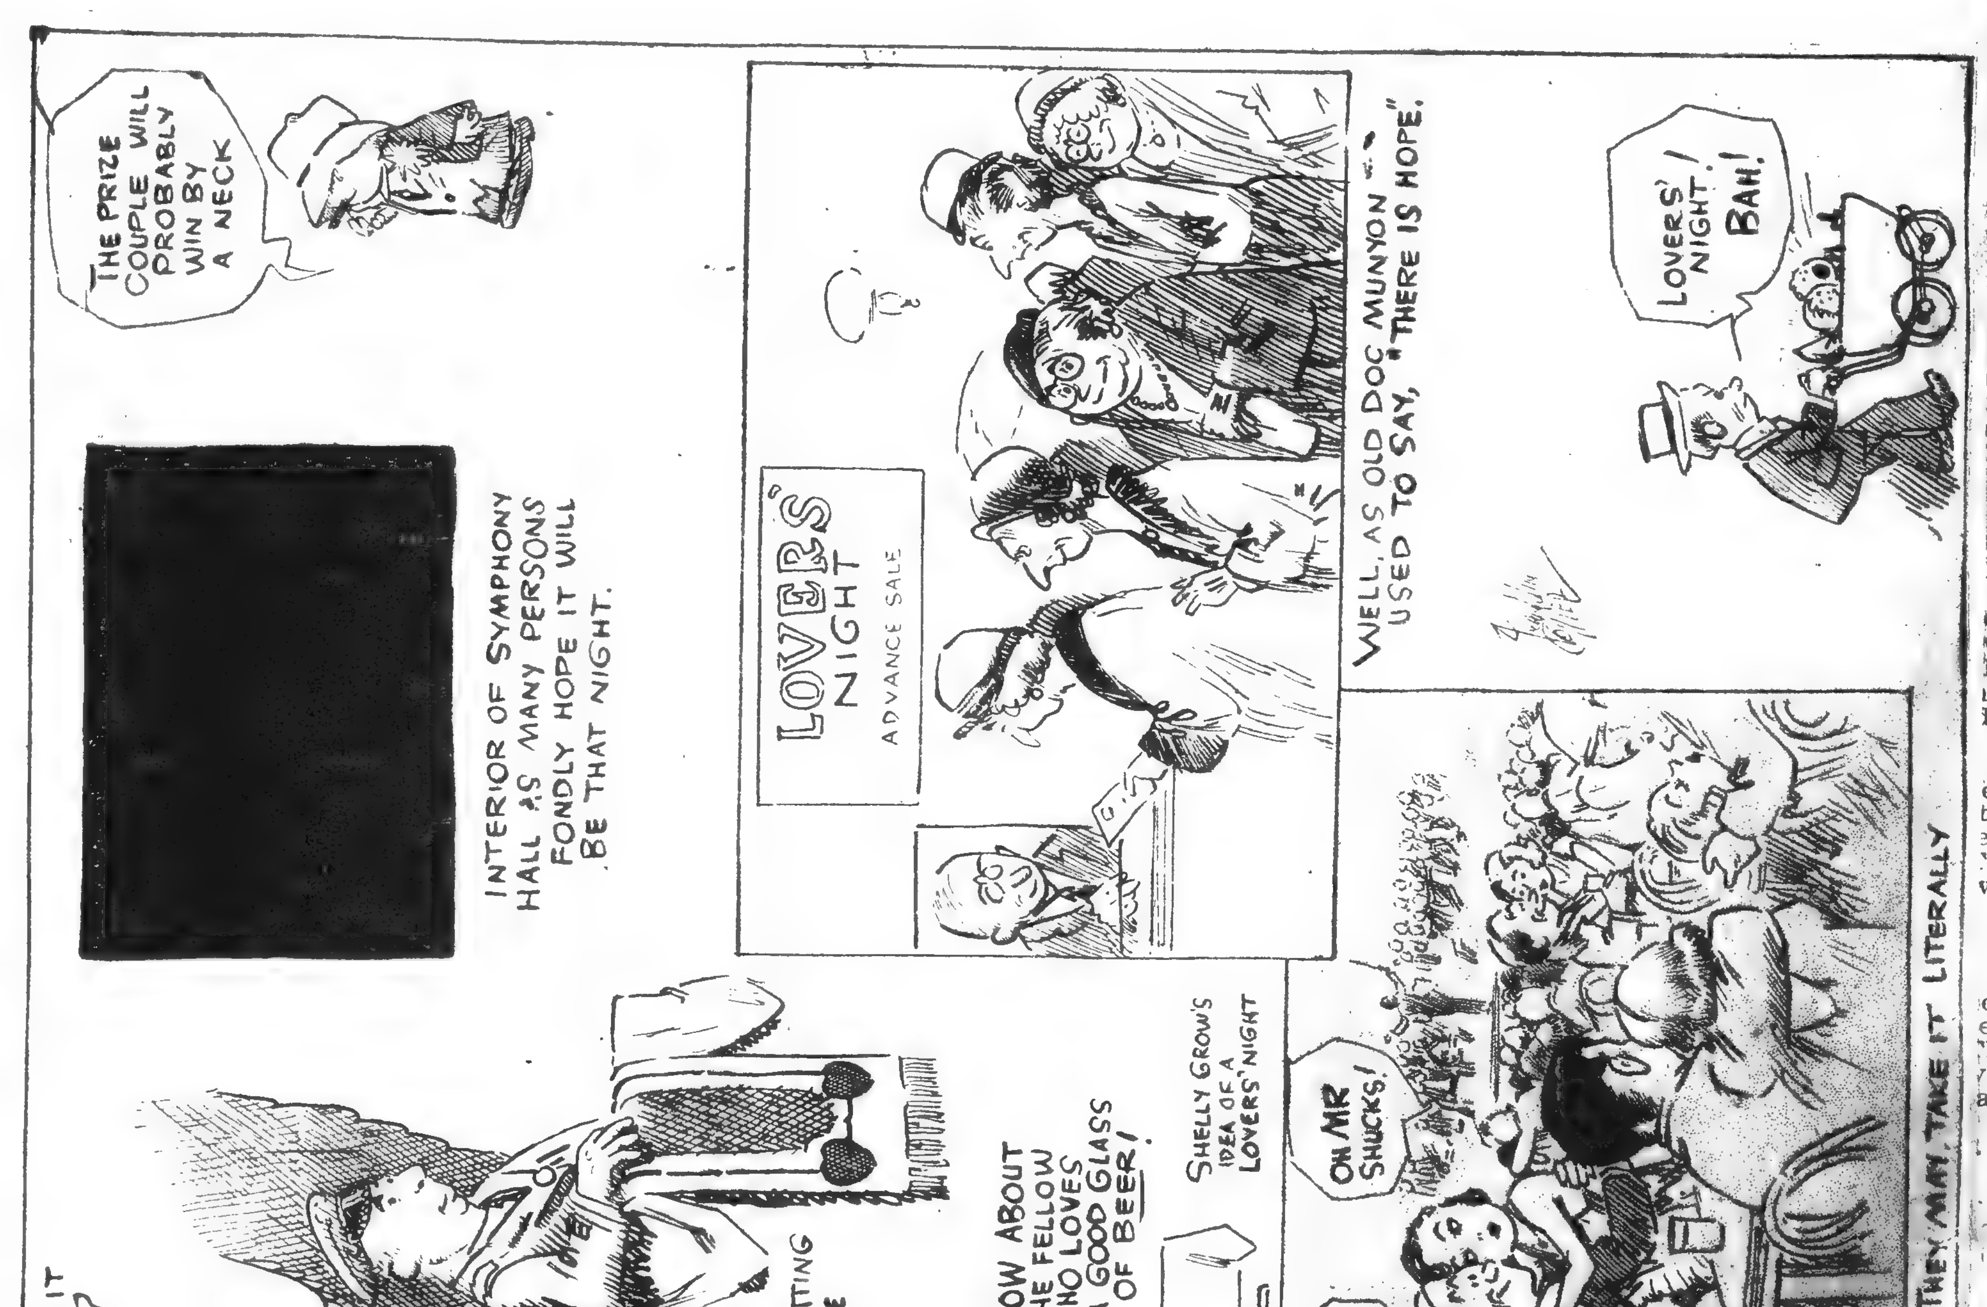
EACOCK AND BURRAGE

Lovers' Night at the Pops :-:

By FRANKLIN COLLIER



THE PRIZE COUPLE WILL PROBABLY WIN BY A NECK
INTERIOR OF SYMPHONY HALL AS MANY PERSONS FONDLY HOPE IT WILL BE THAT NIGHT.
WHAT WILL IT BE LIKE?
THE SAUGUS CHIEF WHO PERMITS PETTING SHOULD HAVE A PLACE OF HONOR
LOVERS' NIGHT
ADVANCE SALE
WELL, AS OLD DOC MUNYON USED TO SAY, "THERE IS HOPE."
HOW ABOUT THE FELLOW WHO LOVES A GOOD GLASS OF BEER!
SHELLY GROW'S IDEA OF A LOVERS' NIGHT
LOVERS'! NIGHT! BAH!
OH MR SHUCKS!
ISN'T THE MUSIC WONDERFUL!
WHAT MUSIC?
THEY MAY TAKE IT LITERALLY

--- Films --- Other A

Maturity Begins

Arthur Fiedler—May, 1932

The Conductor of The Pops from a New Photograph by Boris

Week-End at the Pops

Program for Saturday

Norwegian Bridal Procession......Grieg
Concert Overture, "Fingal's Cave." Mendelssohn
Liebeslieder Waltz, No. 15.....Brahms
(Scored for Orchestra by Gericke)
Four Dances from the Ballet, "La Source" ....Delibes
Finale from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" ...Rimsky-Korsakov
Largo ....Handel
Dance ....Debussy
(Scored for Orchestra by Ravel)
Selection from the Musical Play, "Of Thee I Sing"...............Gershwin
(First Time at These Concerts)
Loin du Bal.....................Gillet
March, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Program for Sunday

Symphony, No. 4, in F Minor, Chaikovsky
Wellington's Victory or The Battle of Vittoria ("Battle Symphony") Beethoven Concert-Piece in F Minor for Piano and Orchestra ....Weber
Bolero ....Ravel

Conductor. A. Fiedler
Pianist: J. M. Sanromá

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—For the season The Pops have taken leave of The Gay Nineties. Until "Lovers' Night"—to anticipate the month of June, month of weddings, month of roses—comes along on May 31 there will be no innovations at Symphony Hall. Events and incidents none the less. Thus tomorrow evening at the fortnightly Sunday concert, Mr. Fiedler will resurrect Beethoven's "Battle Symphony"—all about the battle of Vittoria in Spain at which Wellington's English beat off Napoleon's French. Out of the general din "Rule, Britannia" and "Malbrouck s'en va-t-en guerre" rise to the ear; while in the Finale "God Save the King" intersperses the hurrahs. In short an occasional piece for rejoicing Vienna, but hardly one of Beethoven the master though it earned him no little popularity and a pocketful of money. Last winter at a concert of the Mac Dowell Club, Mr. Fiedler disinterred it. Nearly every one who heard was amused. On Sunday evening, likewise, Mr. Sanromá will play for the first time in public, the piano-part in Weber's "Concert-Piece." Florid, quasi-romantic stuff though it is, young modernists have taken a fancy to it.

Monday brings the annual "Harvard Night," with Dr. Davison and the Glee Club as guests to sing seven choral numbers. Four some from Mr. Holst, as welcome at Symphony Hall as he is at the University. Two are "Before Sleep" and "The Harvard Shore," first sung at the concert at Cambridge last month in the composer's honor. His "St. Paul's Suite" for Strings also stands on the orchestral program. If his health permits, he will conduct in it. The young modernists, said to abound across the Charles, will be entertained with Mussolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry"—steel-sheet and the other appurtenances.

On Tuesday, routine, save for the Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin-Concerto, to be played by the sixteen first violins as at the Sunday concert two weeks ago. . . . On Wednesday, Sibelius's "Finlandia" for the first time this spring; on Thursday, in like case, the waltz that was the favorite "extra" a year ago—from the music to the picture, "Two earts in Three-Four Time." On Friday, miliar numbers; but on Saturday a ance Program" drawn from Chaikov y, Rameau, Ponchielli, Ravel and end g with four visible dances on a cleared age by Messrs. Wiener, Ashermann and eir pupils. These two years they have d a following. The dances are listed low.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
MAY 28 1932

Group of Business Women to Attend Pop Concert.

Thursday, June 2, will be Business and Professional Women's Club night at the Boston Symphony pop concert, and there will be delegations from all over eastern Massachusetts. The audience is expected to be a large one and a special programme is being arranged by the conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Miss Marion Ellis has charge of the Brockton party, which will include Misses A. Gertrude Adams, Elizabeth Brown, Lenore Browne, Ethel Clement, Ada Crocker, Celina Dudley, Marion Ellis, Edith Hammond, Lillian Hooper, Clara Howard, Hazel Lindsay, Alice Maddox, Helen Megathlin, Annie White and Dr. Isabel Miles.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Fourth Week of the "Pops" in Symphony Hall

The second Sunday "Pop" concert this evening will begin the fourth week of the present season. The program this evening will include Beethoven's "The Battle of Vittoria" or "Wellington's Victory." Until Mr Fiedler played this score at an orchestral concert here last Winter, the piece had not been heard in Boston for about 85 years, it is thought.

Beethoven wrote "The Battle of Vittoria" at the suggestion of one Maelzel and for performance on a mechanical music box called the "panharmonicon," which the latter had invented. Maelzel is probably best known today for another invention, the metronome. Beethoven further scored "The Battle of Vittoria" for orchestra, also at Maelzel's suggestion, and—probably in hope of making some money out of the business by appealing to the patriotism and the pride of the English people, dedicated it to the then Prince Regent of England, afterward George IV. The piece, vividly descriptive of the progress of a battle, requires a formidable instrumental apparatus.

Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard Night with many features, including the presence of Gustav Holst, noted English composer, as guest.

Next Saturday evening there will be a dance program ending with an appearance with the orchestra of Hans Wiener and his Dance Group.

The programs of the week follow:

Tonight. Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36. Tchaikovsky; "Wellington's Victory," or "The Battle of Vittoria," Beethoven; Concert Piece in F minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79 (soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma), Weber; "Bolero," Ravel.

Monday, May 23. March "Cruiser Harvard," Strube; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; songs by the Harvard Glee Club: "A Dirge for Two Veterans" (poem by Whitman), Holst; "Fire, Fire, My Heart," Morley; "Before Sleep," Holst; "The Shores of Harvard," Holst; "St Paul's Suite," for string orchestra, Holst; "Rhapsody in Blue" (soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma), Gershwin; songs by the Harvard Glee Club: "Gentley, Johnny, My Jingalo," "The Foggy Dew," English Folk Songs; choruses from the "Mikado," Sullivan; waltz, "Du und Du," from "The Bat," Strauss; Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn), arranged by Kremser; "Lohengrin," prelude to Act III, Wagner; "Fair Harvard."

Tuesday, May 24—Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein; "Carmen," fantasia, Bizet; finale from the violin concerto, Op 64 (the solo part to be played by 16 first violins), Mendelssohn; "Kol Nidrei" (cello solo: Jacobus Langendoen), Bruch; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; "The Skaters," waltz, Waldteufel; Volga Bargemen's song, arranged by Jacchia; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Wednesday, May 25—"Greetings to Bangor," march, R. B. Hall; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; "Il Trovatore," fantasia, Verdi; "Finlandia," symphonic poem, Sibelius; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "Mlle Modiste," selection, Herbert; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Thursday, May 26—March, "Schechenyi Indulo," Fahrbach; "Natchez on the Hill," Powell; Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff; Suite from "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Alma Mater," overture, Hadley; "Dreams," (violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz), Wagner; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time," Stolz; Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.

Friday, May 27—March, "High School Cadets," Sousa; Overture to "La Dame Blanche," Boieldieu; "Tango Argentine," Repper; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "At Dawning," Cadman-Herbert; "Military" Polonaise, Chopin.

Saturday, May 28—Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Ballet Suite, Rameau-Mottl; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Hungarian Dance, Brahms; "Nutcracker," Suite, characteristic dances, Tchaikovsky; "Bolero," Ravel (Hans Wiener and dance group), Ravel; Slovakian peasant dance, Felber; "Ballet Grotesque" (Moment Musicale), Schubert; "Circus," Fucik; "Wine, Women and Song" (waltz), Strauss.

Dancer at Fine Arts Theatre

Edouard du Buron will present a program of various racial dances in the Fine Arts Theatre tomorrow at 9. The recital will precede the regular screen entertainment. Morris Leader, baritone; James Sullivan, percussionist, and Irene Epstein, pianist, will assist in the following program:

"Kwannon" (Buddhist), Strickland; "Danse Fantastique" (Java), Rubenstein; "Prelude," Chopin; "Ritual" (Hebrew), Rubenstein; "Lamento del Caribe" (Aztec), Sequeira; "Sinhalese Devil Dance" (Ceylon), Strickland.

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

The second Sunay Pop concert tonight will open the fourth week of the current season in Symphony hall. Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard night, with many features, including the presence of Gustav Holst, noted English composer, as guest. Next Saturday evening there will be a dance program, ending with an appearance with the orchestra of Hans Wiener and his dancing group. Hans Wiener and Otto Ashermann have given numerous recitals in New York, Boston and elsewhere in recent seasons.

The programs of the week follow:

SUNDAY EVENING, MAY 22

Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36 Tchaikovsky
"Wellington's Victory," or "The Battle of Vittoria"..................Beethoven
Concert Piece in F Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra (Op. 79).........Weber
(Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
"Bolero" ....Ravel

MONDAY EVENING

March, "Cruiser Harvard"..........Strube
Overture to "Oberon"..............Weber
Soviet Iron Foundry..............Mossolov
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
A Dirge for Two Veterans (Poem by Whitman) ....Holst
Fire, Fire, My Heart..............Morley
Before Sleep.......................Holst
The Shores of Harvard.............Holst
St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra Holst
Rhapsody in Blue.................Gershwin
(Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
Gently, Johnny, My Jingalo English Folk Song
The Foggy Dew ......English Folk Song
Choruses from the "Mikado".....Sullivan
Waltz, "Du und Du," from "The Bat" Strauss
Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn)...........Arranged by Kremser
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III.....Wagner
Fair Harvard

TUESDAY EVENING

Coronation March from "The Prophet Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon"...............Thomas
Kammenoi Ostrow...............Rubenstein
"Carmen," Fantasia ....Bizet
Finale from the Violin Concerto, Op. 64 Mendelssohn
(The solo part to be played by 16 first violins)
Kol Nidrei...........................Bruch
(Cello Solo: Jacobus Langendoen)
Marche Slave ....Tchaikovsky
"The Skaters," Waltz ....Waldteufel
Volga Bargemen's Song..Arranged by Jacchia
"Strike up the Band"...............Gershwin

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Greetings to Bangor," March....R. B. Hall
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .....Suppe
Liebestraum ....Liszt-Herbert
"Il Trovatore," Fantasia ....Verdi
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem.......Sibelius
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
"Mlle. Modiste," Selection.......... Herbert
Invitation to the Dance.......Weber-Berlioz
"Stars and Stripes Forever"..........Sousa

THURSDAY EVENING

March, "Schechenyi Indulo"........Fahrbach
"Natchez on the Hill"..................Powell
Prelude in C sharp minor......Rachmaninoff
Suite from "Peer Gynt" ....Grieg
"Alma Mater," Overture.............Hadley
Dreams ....Wagner
(Violin Solo: Julius Theodorowicz)
First Hungarian Rhapsody............Liszt
"The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection....Kern
Two Hearts in 3/4 Time...............Stolz
Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn

FRIDAY EVENING

March, "High School Cadets"..........Sousa
Overture to "La Dame Blanche"....Boieldieu
"Tango Argentine" ....Repper
"Espana," Rhapsody ....Chabrier
"Molly on the Shore" ....Grainger
Overture to "Tannhauser"...........Wagner
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection. .....Gershwin
"At Dawning" ....Cadman-Herbert
Military Polonaise ....Chopin

SATURDAY EVENING

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" Tchaikovsky
Ballet Suite .... Rameau-Mottl
"Valse Triste" ....Sibelius
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Hungarian Dance ....Brahms
"Nutcracker," Suite: Characteristic Dances ....Tchaikovsky
Bolero ....Ravel
Hans Wiener
(And His Dance Group)
Slovakian Peasant Dance .... Felber
Ballet Grotesque (Moment Musicale) Schubert
Circus ....Fucik
Wine, Women and Song (Waltz).... Strauss

HARVARD NIGHT OBSERVED AT POPS

More Than 200 Students Attend—Three Special Features Presented

Sons of fair Harvard and their ladies last night helped to pack Symphony hall, more than 200 attending the annual Harvard night of the Pops.

Three special features were innovations which Conductor Arthur Fiedler, who well knows his audiences, provided for the evening. The Harvard Glee Club sang two series of songs; Dr. Gustav Holst, eminent English composer, who is visiting lecturer in music at Harvard, conducted two of his own works, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston pianist, topped off the evening as soloist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Sanroma was recalled time after time, his own arrangement of Gershwin's piano parts pleasing the audience immensely. Dr. Holst, who will be guest conductor at the Symphony next winter, presented a suite for stringed orchestra and a song dedicated to Dr. Archibald T. Davison and the Harvard Glee Club. Two of his earlier songs were sung by the club.

The Glee Club gave a memorable performance, especially with "Gently, Johnny, My Jingalo," "The Foggy Dew," old English folk songs; choruses from the "Mikado" by Sullivan. The entire audience joined the club in some of the Harvard football songs, and the evening's program closed with "Fair Harvard."

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

This evening brings the second Sunday concert of the current series of Pops at Symphony Hall. Two romantic pieces of the early 19th century figure on Mr. Fiedler's programme. One of them, Beethoven's singular venture into descriptive music, by title "Wellington's Victory or the Battle of Vittoria," had not been heard in Boston for 85 years when Mr. Fiedler himself revived it last winter at a concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra. The second of them is the Concert-Piece in F minor of Weber for piano and orchestra, in which Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist. Ravel's "Bolero" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony complete the list.

* * * *

Tomorrow evening comes the annual Harvard Night, with the inevitable "Cruiser Harvard" March of Strube and the equally inevitable appearance of the Harvard Glee Club. A distinguished composer, Gustav Holst, will be the guest of the evening. Mr. Holst, who is for the present teaching composition at the university, will be represented on the programme by three-part songs and by his "St. Paul's Suite" for string orchestra which he conducted to general pleasure at a pair of Symphony Concerts last winter. The serviceable Mr. Sanroma will once more perform the "Rhapsody in Blue" of Gershwin.

* * * *

The remaining special event of the week will be the apearance at Saturday evening's concert of Hans Wiener and his dance group. Mr. Wiener and his associates will dance to music by Felber, Schubert, Fucik and Johann Strauss. Without exception the other numbers on that evening's programme are also music of the dance, ranging from a ballet suite by Rameau to Ravel's "Bolero," but in them the orchestra holds forth alone.

* * * *

The performance of the Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by the 16 first violinists of the Pops orchestra, which provoked astonishment at the concert of two Sundays ago, will be repeated at the concert of this next Tuesday evening. A bona fide solo performance on the same programme will be Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" from the 'cello of Mr. Langdoen.

* * * *

The programmes of the concerts of Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings adhere closely to the present ways of the Pops. The March "Greetings to Bangor" by R. B. Hall, which heads the first of these lists, has, however, an unfamiliar look. Thursday brings a new overture from the pen of Henry Hadley, by title "Alma Mater," and a resident composer, Charles Repper, will be represented on Friday by his "Tango Argentine." Other native composers on the same programme are Sousa, Gershwin and Cadman.

SCHOOL MUSIC FESTIVAL

DEPARTMENT

POP CONCERTS TO BE BROADCAST

Wednesday Evening June Programs on Network

The Pop concerts, a cultural landmark Boston has revered for 47 years, again this season will find outlet to the nation's music lovers through a series of radio broadcasts. Every Wednesday evening in June the National Broadcasting Company, Inc., is to present the final section of the "Pops" program direct from Symphony hall.

The June concerts will be heard beginning Wednesday evening, June 1, from 10 to 10:45 P. M. over an [illegible] WEAF coast-to-coast network. Station WEEI, originating the entire series, [illegible] by the Boston outlet.

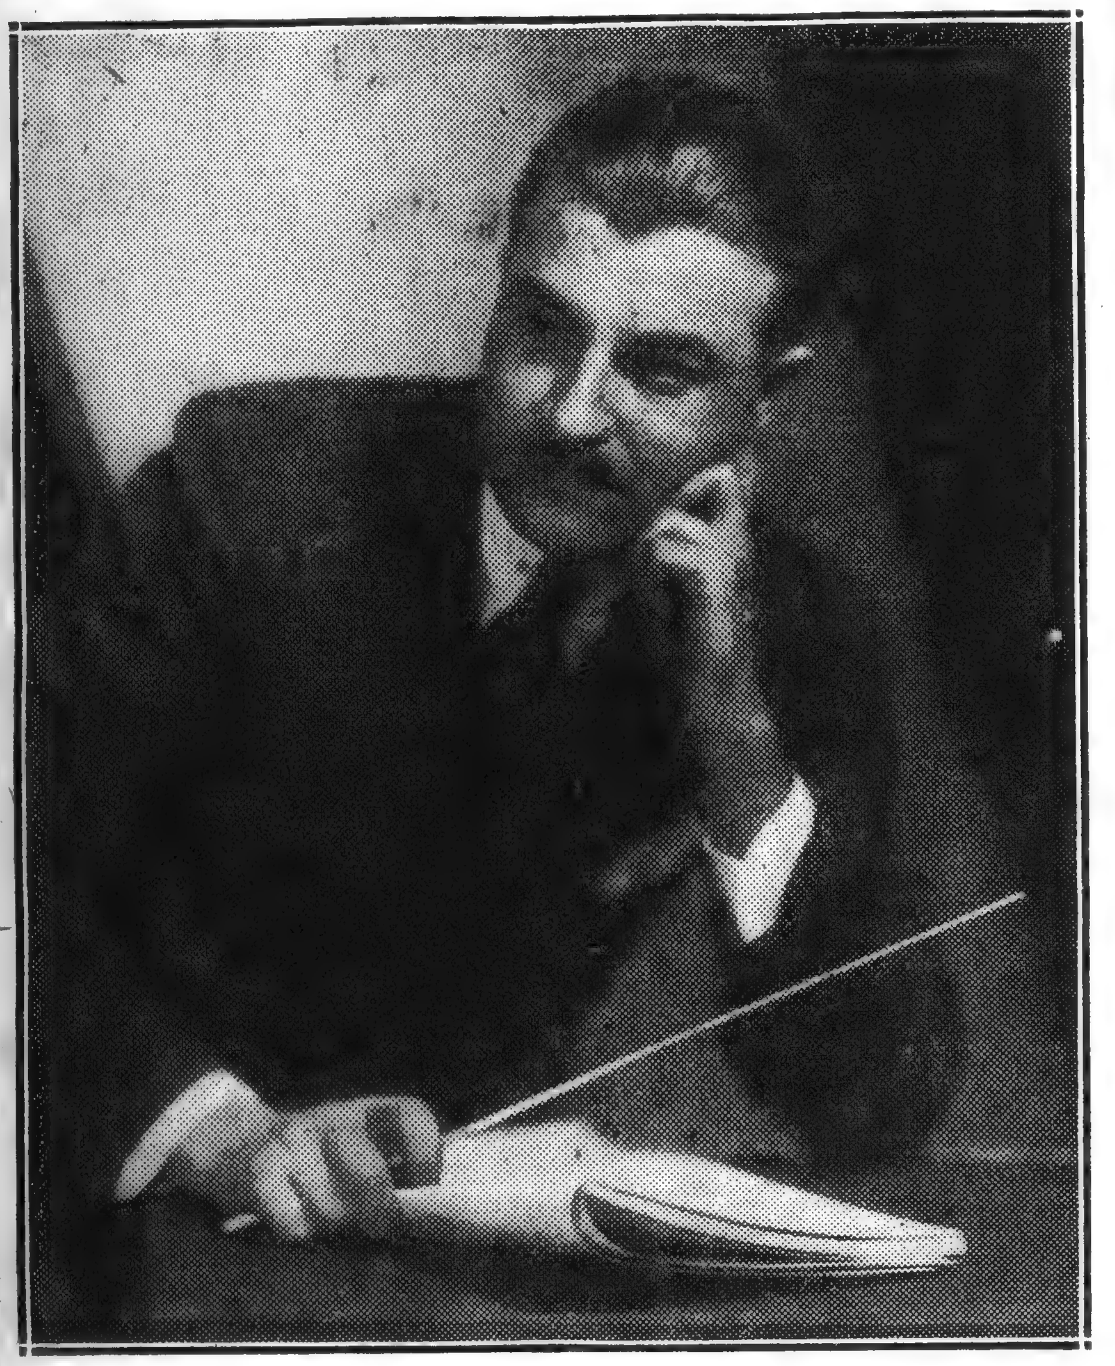
The Pops orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of Boston Symphony, will play the current radio series under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. One of the few native-born conductors, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant, contriving to communicate his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm to an inveterate Pops following. The ever-open question of programs has probably never been more understandingly met than by this conductor. Widely conversant with the classics, the better jazz and the more agreeable "moderns," he provides a repertoire broad enough to please every possible taste.

Upon Arthur F. Edes, WEEI program director and announcer, will rest the responsibility for co-ordinating the various diverse elements in his announcements of each concert. Edes will present his own program notes and comments on the works chosen by Fiedler, [illegible] giving listeners a better understanding of the many unrelated motifs and movements heard. Edes, one of Boston's most competent announcers, was chosen to announce the Pops series because of his familiarity with Boston Symphony and Pops repertoire.

MAKERS OF BOSTON

--- Films --- Other A

Maturity Begins



Arthur Fiedler—May, 1932

The Conductor of The Pops from a New Photograph by Boris

Week-End at the Pops

Program for Saturday

Norwegian Bridal Procession......Grieg
Concert Overture, "Fingal's Cave."
Mendelssohn
Liebeslieder Waltz, No. 15.....Brahms
(Scored for Orchestra by Gericke)
Four Dances from the Ballet, "La Source" ....Delibes
Finale from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" ...Rimsky-Korsakov
Largo ....Handel
Dance ....Debussy
(Scored for Orchestra by Ravel)
Selection from the Musical Play, "Of Thee I Sing"...............Gershwin
(First Time at These Concerts)
Loin du Bal.....................Gillet
March, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Program for Sunday

Symphony, No. 4, in F Minor,
Chaikovsky
Wellington's Victory or The Battle of Vittoria ("Battle Symphony")
Beethoven
Concert-Piece in F Minor for Piano and Orchestra ....Weber
Bolero ....Ravel

Conductor: A. Fiedler
Pianist: J. M. Sanromá

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—For the season The Pops have taken leave of The Gay Nineties. Until "Lovers' Night"—to anticipate the month of June, month of weddings, month of roses—comes along on May 31 there will be no innovations at Symphony Hall. Events and incidents none the less. Thus tomorrow evening at the fortnightly Sunday concert, Mr. Fiedler will resurrect Beethoven's "Battle Symphony"—all about the battle of Vittoria in Spain at which Wellington's English beat off Napoleon's French. Out of the general din "Rule, Britannia" and "Malbrouck s'en va-t-en guerre" rise to the ear; while in the Finale "God Save the King" intersperses the hurrahs. In short an occasional piece for rejoicing Vienna, but hardly one of Beethoven the master though it earned him no little popularity and a pocketful of money. Last winter at a concert of the Mac Dowell Club, Mr Fiedler disinterred it. Nearly every one who heard was amused. On Sunday evening, likewise, Mr. Sanromá will play for the first time in public, the piano-part in Weber's "Concert-Piece." Florid, quasi-romantic stuff though it is, young modernists have taken a fancy to it.

Monday brings the annual "Harvard Night," with Dr. Davison and the Glee Club as guests to sing seven choral numbers. Four some from Mr. Holst, as welcome at Symphony Hall as he is at the University. Two are "Before Sleep" and "The Harvard Shore," first sung at the concert at Cambridge last month in the composer's honor. His "St. Paul's Suite" for Strings also stands on the orchestral program. If his health permits, he will conduct in it. The young modernists, said to abound across the Charles, will be entertained with Mussolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry"—steel-sheet and the other appurtenances.

On Tuesday, routine, save for the Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin-Concerto, to be played by the sixteen first violins as at the Sunday concert two weeks ago. . . . On Wednesday, Sibelius's "Finlandia" for the first time this spring; on Thursday, in like case, the waltz that was the favorite "extra" a year ago—from the music to the picture, "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time." On Friday, familiar numbers; but on Saturday a "Dance Program" drawn from Chaikovsky, Rameau, Ponchielli, Ravel and ending with four visible dances on a cleared stage by Messrs. Wiener, Ashermann and their pupils. These two years they have had a following. The dances are listed below.

THIS CLIPPING
BROCKTO
ENTE
MAY 28

Group o Women to A Pop Concert.

Thursday, June 2, will be Business and Professional Women's Club night at the Boston Symphony pop concert, and there will be delegations from all over eastern Massachusetts. The audience is expected to be a large one and a special programme is being arranged by the conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Miss Marion Ellis has charge of the Brockton party, which will include Misses A. Gertrude Adams, Elizabeth Brown, Lenore Browne, Ethel Clement, Ada Crocker, Celina Dudley, Marion Ellis, Edith Hammond, Lillian Hooper, Clara Howard, Hazel Lindsay, Alice Maddox, Helen Megathlin, Annie White and Dr. Isabel Miles.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Fourth Week of the "Pops" in Symphony Hall

The second Sunday "Pop" concert this evening will begin the fourth week of the present season. The program this evening will include Beethoven's "The Battle of Vittoria" or "Wellington's Victory." Until Mr Fiedler played this score at an orchestral concert here last Winter, the piece had not been heard in Boston for about 85 years, it is thought.

Beethoven wrote "The Battle of Vittoria" at the suggestion of one Maelzel and for performance on a mechanical music box called the "panharmonicon," which the latter had invented. Maelzel is probably best known today for another invention, the metronome. Beethoven further scored "The Battle of Vittoria" for orchestra, also at Maelzel's suggestion, and—probably in hope of making some money out of the business by appealing to the patriotism and the pride of the English people, dedicated it to the then Prince Regent of England, afterward George IV. The piece, vividly descriptive of the progress of a battle, requires a formidable instrumental apparatus.

Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard Night with many features, including the presence of Gustav Holst, noted English composer, as guest.

Next Saturday evening there will be a dance program ending with an appearance with the orchestra of Hans Wiener and his Dance Group.

The programs of the week follow:

Tonight. Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36, Tchaikovsky; "Wellington's Victory," or "The Battle of Vittoria," Beethoven; Concert Piece in F minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79 (soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma), Weber; "Bolero," Ravel.

Monday, May 23. March "Cruiser Harvard," Strube; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; songs by the Harvard Glee Club: "A Dirge for Two Veterans" (poem by Whitman), Holst; "Fire, Fire, My Heart," Morley; "Before Sleep," Holst; "The Shores of Harvard," Holst; "St Paul's Suite," for string orchestra, Holst; "Rhapsody in Blue" (soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma), Gershwin; songs by the Harvard Glee Club: "Gentley, Johnny, My Jingalo," "The Foggy Dew," English Folk Songs; choruses from the "Mikado," Sullivan; waltz, "Du und Du," from "The Bat," Strauss; Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn), arranged by Kremser; "Lohengrin," prelude to Act III, Wagner; "Fair Harvard."

Tuesday, May 24—Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein; "Carmen," fantasia, Bizet; finale from the violin concerto, Op 64 (the solo part to be played by 16 first violins), Mendelssohn; "Kol Nidrei" (cello solo: Jacobus Langendoen), Bruch; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; "The Skaters," waltz, Waldteufel; Volga Bargemen's song, arranged by Jacchia; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Wednesday, May 25—"Greetings to Bangor," march, R. B. Hall; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; "Il Trovatore," fantasia, Verdi; "Finlandia," symphonic poem, Sibelius; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "Mlle Modiste," selection, Herbert; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Thursday, May 26—March, "Schechenyi Indulo," Fahrbach; "Natchez on the Hill," Powell; Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff; Suite from "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Alma Mater," overture, Hadley; "Dreams," (violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz), Wagner; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time," Stolz; Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.

Friday, May 27—March, "High School Cadets," Sousa; Overture to "La Dame Blanche," Boieldieu; "Tango Argentine," Repper; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "At Dawning," Cadman-Herbert; "Military" Polonaise, Chopin.

Saturday, May 28—Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Ballet Suite, Rameau-Mottl; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Hungarian Dance, Brahms; "Nutcracker," Suite, characteristic dances, Tchaikovsky; "Bolero," Ravel (Hans Wiener and dance group), Ravel; Slovakian peasant dance, Felber; "Ballet Grotesque" (Moment Musicale), Schubert; "Circus," Fucik; "Wine, Women and Song" (waltz), Strauss.

Dancer at Fine Arts Theatre

Edouard du Buron will present a program of various racial dances in the Fine Arts Theatre tomorrow at 9. The recital will precede the regular screen entertainment. Morris Leader, baritone; James Sullivan, percussionist, and Irene Epstein, pianist, will assist in the following program:

"Kwannon" (Buddhist), Strickland; "Danse Fantastique" (Java), Rubenstein; "Prelude," Chopin; "Ritual" (Hebrew), Rubenstein; "Lamento del Caribe" (Aztec), Sequeira; "Sinhalese Devil Dance" (Ceylon), Strickland.

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

The second Sunay Pop concert tonight will open the fourth week of the current season in Symphony hall. Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard night, with many features, including the presence of Gustav Holst, noted English composer, as guest. Next Saturday evening there will be a dance program, ending with an appearance with the orchestra of Hans Wiener and his dancing group. Hans Wiener and Otto Ashermann have given numerous recitals in New York, Boston and elsewhere in recent seasons.

The programs of the week follow:

SUNDAY EVENING, MAY 22
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36
Tchaikovsky
"Wellington's Victory," or "The Battle of Vittoria".................Beethoven
Concert Piece in F Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79...........Weber
(Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
"Bolero".............................Ravel

MONDAY EVENING
March, "Cruiser Harvard"..........Strube
Overture to "Oberon"...............Weber
Soviet Iron Foundry..............Mossolov
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
A Dirge for Two Veterans (Poem by Whitman)......................Holst
Fire, Fire, My Heart..............Morley
Before Sleep.......................Holst
The Shores of Harvard.............Holst
St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra
Holst
Rhapsody in Blue.................Gershwin
(Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
Gently, Johnny, My Jingalo
English Folk Song
The Foggy Dew ......English Folk Song
Choruses from the "Mikado"....Sullivan
Waltz, "Du und Du," from "The Bat"
Strauss
Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn)..........Arranged by Kremser
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III.....Wagner
Fair Harvard

TUESDAY EVENING
Coronation March from "The Prophet
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon"..............Thomas
Kammenoi Ostrow.................Rubenstein
"Carmen," Fantasia ....Bizet
Finale from the Violin Concerto, Op. 64
Mendelssohn
(The solo part to be played by 16 first violins)
Kol Nidrei..............................Bruch
(Cello Solo: Jacobus Langendoen)
Marche Slave ....Tchaikovsky
"The Skaters," Waltz...........Waldteufel
Volga Bargemen's Song..Arranged by Jacchia
"Strike up the Band"..............Gershwin

WEDNESDAY EVENING
"Greetings to Bangor," March....R. B. Hall
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Liebestraum ....Liszt-Herbert
"Il Trovatore," Fantasia..............Verdi
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem.......Sibelius
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz
Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.........Liszt
"Mlle. Modiste," Selection..........Herbert
Invitation to the Dance.......Weber-Berlioz
"Stars and Stripes Forever"..........Sousa

THURSDAY EVENING
March, "Schechenyi Indulo"........Fahrbach
"Natchez on the Hill"..................Powell
Prelude in C sharp minor.....Rachmaninoff
Suite from "Peer Gynt".................Grieg
"Alma Mater," Overture...............Hadley
Dreams ....Wagner
(Violin Solo: Julius Theodorowicz)
First Hungarian Rhapsody.............Liszt
"The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection....Kern
Two Hearts in ¾ Time...................Stolz
Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn

FRIDAY EVENING
March, "High School Cadets"..........Sousa
Overture to "La Dame Blanche"....Boieldieu
"Tango Argentine"....................Repper
"Espana," Rhapsody ....Chabrier
"Molly on the Shore"...............Grainger
Overture to "Tannhauser"...........Wagner
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection........Gershwin
"At Dawning".................Cadman-Herbert
Military Polonaise ....Chopin

SATURDAY EVENING
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"
Tchaikovsky
Ballet Suite ....Rameau-Mottl
"Valse Triste"......................Sibelius
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"
Ponchielli
Hungarian Dance ....Brahms
"Nutcracker," Suite: Characteristic Dances ....Tchaikovsky
Bolero ....Ravel
Hans Wiener
(And His Dance Group)
Slovakian Peasant Dance..............Felber
Ballet Grotesque (Moment Musicale)
Schubert
Circus ....Fucik
Wine, Women and Song (Waltz).....Strauss

HARVARD NIGHT OBSERVED AT POPS

More Than 200 Students Attend—Three Special Features Presented

Sons of fair Harvard and their ladies last night helped to pack Symphony hall, more than 200 attending the annual Harvard night of the Pops.

Three special features were innovations which Conductor Arthur Fiedler, who well knows his audiences, provided for the evening. The Harvard Glee Club sang two series of songs; Dr. Gustav Holst, eminent English composer, who is visiting lecturer in music at Harvard, conducted two of his own works, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, Boston pianist, topped off the evening as soloist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Sanroma was recalled time after time, his own arrangement of Gershwin's piano parts pleasing the audience immensely. Dr. Holst, who will be guest conductor at the Symphony next winter, presented a suite for stringed orchestra and a song dedicated to Dr. Archibald T. Davison and the Harvard Glee Club. Two of his earlier songs were sung by the club.

The Glee Club gave a memorable performance, especially with "Gently, Johnny, My Jingalo," "The Foggy Dew," old English folk songs; choruses from the "Mikado" by Sullivan. The entire audience joined the club in some of the Harvard football songs, and the evening's program closed with "Fair Harvard."

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

This evening brings the second Sunday concert of the current series of Pops at Symphony Hall. Two romantic pieces of the early 19th century figure on Mr. Fiedler's programme. One of them, Beethoven's singular venture into descriptive music, by title "Wellington's Victory or the Battle of Vittoria," had not been heard in Boston for 85 years when Mr. Fiedler himself revived it last winter at a concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra. The second of them is the Concert-Piece in F minor of Weber for piano and orchestra, in which Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist. Ravel's "Bolero" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony complete the list.

* * * *

Tomorrow evening comes the annual Harvard Night, with the inevitable "Cruiser Harvard" March of Strube and the equally inevitable appearance of the Harvard Glee Club. A distinguished composer, Gustav Holst, will be the guest of the evening. Mr. Holst, who is for the present teaching composition at the university, will be represented on the programme by three-part songs and by his "St. Paul's Suite" for string orchestra which he conducted to general pleasure at a pair of Symphony Concerts last winter. The serviceable Mr. Sanroma will once more perform the "Rhapsody in Blue" of Gershwin.

* * * *

The remaining special event of the week will be the apearance at Saturday evening's concert of Hans Wiener and his dance group. Mr. Wiener and his associates will dance to music by Felber, Schubert, Fucik and Johann Strauss. Without exception the other numbers on that evening's programme are also music of the dance, ranging from a ballet suite by Rameau to Ravel's "Bolero," but in them the orchestra holds forth alone.

* * * *

The performance of the Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by the 16 first violinists of the Pops orchestra, which provoked astonishment at the concert of two Sundays ago, will be repeated at the concert of this next Tuesday evening. A bona fide solo performance on the same programme will be Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" from the 'cello of Mr. Langdoen.

* * * *

The programmes of the concerts of Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings adhere closely to the present ways of the Pops. The March "Greetings to Bangor" by R. B. Hall, which heads the first of these lists, has, however, an unfamiliar look. Thursday brings a new overture from the pen of Henry Hadley, by title "Alma Mater," and a resident composer, Charles Repper, will be represented on Friday by his "Tango Argentine." Other native composers on the same programme are Sousa, Gershwin and Cadman.

DEPARTMENT

POP CONCERTS TO BE BROADCAST

Wednesday Evening June Programs on Network

The Pop concerts, a cultural landmark Boston has revered for 47 years, again this season will find outlet to the nation's music lovers through a series of radio broadcasts. Every Wednesday evening in June the National Broadcasting Company, Inc., is to present the final section of the "Pops" program direct from Symphony hall.

The June concerts will be heard, beginning Wednesday evening, June 1, from 10 to 10:45 P. M. over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network. Station WEEI, originating the entire series, will by the Boston outlet.

The Pops orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of Boston Symphony, will play the current radio series under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. One of the few native-born conductors, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant, contriving to communicate his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm to an inveterate Pops following. The ever-open question of programs has probably never been more understandingly met than by this conductor. Widely conversant with the classics, the better jazz and the more agreeable "moderns," he provides a repertoire broad enough to please every possible taste.

Upon Arthur F. Edes, WEEI program director and announcer, will rest the responsibility for co-ordinating the various diverse elements in his announcements of each concert. Edes will present his own program notes and comments on the works chosen by Fiedler, thus giving listeners a better understanding of the many unrelated motifs and movements heard. Edes, one of Boston's most competent announcers, was chosen to announce the Pops series because of his familiarity with Boston Symphony and Pops repertoire.

Music

Strange, New Beethoven At Symphony Hall

The 'Battle Symphony' That Filled His Pockets, Weber-Sanroma

May 23 Land

PLAYHOUSES or no playhouses, it is the spring of The Pops. Not only do audiences fill Symphony Hall on special and novel occasions, like the two evenings that recalled "The Gay Nineties." They are scarcely smaller when all things run ordinary course. A Friday or a Tuesday, for example, and every seat is taken—for no discoverable reason except the renewed vogue of the concerts. An announced program has some distinctive quality and beyond recollection floor and balconies are sold in advance. The fortnightly concerts on Sunday evenings reflect this public favor. Two weeks ago there was not an empty place. Yesterday the balconies were as frequented, if on the floor there were a few rows of vacant tables. For the elder public, Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, which filled half the program, does not leap to memory like the Fifth or "The Pathetic." For the younger, Weber's "Concert-Piece" is no substitute for Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," though in both Mr. Sanromá plays the piano-part.

Last winter at a concert of the MacDowell Club Mr. Fiedler disinterred Beethoven's "Battle Symphony." So far as records went, it had not been heard in Boston for eighty-five years. Last evening with a larger and better orchestra he exhibited the relic at The Pops. Now the "Battle Symphony" is not a piece to which the biographers and the commentators point with pride, though Beethoven himself seems to have liked it well enough—when he remembered the money with which it had filled his pockets. In June of 1813 at Vittoria in Spain, Wellington beat off the French; so turned the tide in the Peninsula against Napoleon. The Coalition, then at war with him, were as elated as the Allied and Associated Powers were to be a century later when the French repulsed the Germans at Verdun. In December Beethoven was ready with "Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria."

In those days eminent hands condescended to occasional pieces oftener than they do now; while the long Napoleonic wars had made battle-pictures a fashion. (If you liked, you could hear "The Battle of Jena" arranged for two flutes!) The "Battle Symphony" was produced at a concert that also included the new Seventh; but that master-work was nearly overlooked in the furore over the other. Four days later the concert was repeated "by general desire." There were more performances of the "Battle Symphony" in January and February; again in the autumn of 1814, before emperors, kings and princes assembled in Vienna to decide the fate of Napoleon at Elba. For once in a way Beethoven was popular composer; while he made so much money that he abandoned a projected visit to London to mend his fortunes.

Program-music could hardly be simpler, barer, more objective than this "Battle of Vittoria." The German "primitives," a century or two before, were hardly less external and realistic in their "representations" though they had far less musical resource with which to make them. At stage-left a drum is beaten. Off-stage trumpets sound. The orchestra gradually looses a tune—"Rule, Britannia!" Evidently the sturdy English troops are advancing. . . . At stage-right another drum is beaten. Off-stage the same trumpets call. Now the orchestra unfolds another tune—"Malbrouck s'en va-t-en guerre." (It is not Beethoven's fault that it is almost identical with the American "We Won't Go Home till Morning.") Evidently the quicker-paced French soldiery is taking the field. The contending tunes "mix it up" orchestrally; after a brief engagement "Malbrouck" emerges in disorder and tattered. Beyond a doubt, it was Wellington's Victory."

After pause, celebration. Fanfares and other festal sonorities. Rhythms, progressions and ingenious procedures that 120 years ago betokened popular rejoicing and still betoken them. Finally "God Save the King," treated fugally and whipped by the over-bearing Beethoven into a relatively fast pace, much at odds with that decorous hymn. All of which Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra faithfully and truly "rendered"; all of which a discovering audience heartily applauded. Once more, 119 years later and 4000 miles from Vienna, Beethoven's "Battle Symphony" was money-getter and "popular success." Those were, and are, its reasons for being. Even Chaikovsky's "1812" is a better job.

The modernists fancy Weber and Mendelssohn. The other romantic composers of the nineteenth century, even the great Richard himself, may go hang. When they hear a Symphony or an Overture of Mendelssohn, they clap hands and write laudatory paragraphs. If they happen to be pianists, they add Weber's "Concert-Piece" to their repertory, as Mr. Sanromá did Sunday evening. Yet Weber sketched for it a most romantic and rhetorical program—all about a mediæval châtelaine who pined for her lord absent on Crusade, who saw him in vision wounded, forsaken, dying; then, of a sudden flinging off her trance, beheld the Knight returning, his retinue flashing, his vassals acclaiming. "Love is triumphant! Happiness without end!"

As romantic stuff, the "Concert-Piece" easily keeps company with the three operatic overtures. The transitions sting the Weberian flourish tops off the bravura measures. To this day the glow has little faded; the warmth little cooled. In an unromantic time it is still "effective" piano-music. For this reason or merely because they like it (which is reason enough) the young modernists play it but usually too dryly, like Mr. Borovsky, two years ago at Cambridge. Mr. Sanromá escaped that fault; was melancholy, but not soft and sleazy, with the measures of the longing châtelaine; then struck sparks as he swung into the elation and the bravura, flung them off with the glow and flourish by which they live. At need he played with sweep and glitter, with finesse and feeling, in full rounded performance. In ornate kind he has done nothing so well since he played the piano-part a year ago in Lambert's "The Rio Grande." Scanty as are the rehearsals for a new number at The Pops, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra were responsive and in the vein.

To conclude the Bolero of Ravel. After all these repetitions, it can still make impression upon ears that have heard, maybe, half of them. If the purists will have it so, a virtuoso's trick of orchestral manipulation. Yet quite as probably a tour de force of imaginative and intensifying repetition. H. T. P.

Amusements

KEITH'S
2nd Week
JOHN BARRYMORE
in RKO-Radio's
'State's Attorney'
with Helen Twelvetrees

RKO

KEITH BOSTON
RKO Vaud. with Violet Carlson
EDDIE GARR
Bellitt & Lamb
Other RKO Stars
On Screen
"NO GREATER LOVE"

---

d old world no time has yet refused ar itself in music. Often enough it found the process stimulating.

of which digressions are to wander a concert designed to speed the rting Holst and to bear witness more to the friendly tie, grown er of late, between the University Symphony Hall. At the end of the th Mr. Holst returns to London, ing with him the good memory of k well done, the good will of all n he encountered. A composer of has taught the higher arts of mu- composition, and his students have the gainers. In Symphony Hall in Sanders Theater he has reminded nces out of his own many-sided vement that English music in this nt may not be waived aside. In public relations the fine quality of nan has shone through the erudite accomplished musician. His own sty would deny his stay as an event ur musical vineyards. Others are d to speak or write it for him. e more the general and particular nt to see Mr. Holst mounting the to lead the strings of the orchestra gh the freshness of matter and that blends with scholarship and into the pleasure of the "St. Paul's ." Or to follow him guiding the Club through the fine-spun choral ("Before Sleep") that he wrote in te to it and Dr. Davison, or through bolder outlined and firmer-textured c that sets Mr. Howe's "The Shores rvard." Certain pages of Holst's c—the story goes—stirred the poet is verse-making, whereupon the s re-stirred the composer. . . . een whiles the Glee Club and Dr. on in familiar numbers and familiar y that ranged from the Elizabethan y and folk-song to Sullivan of "The o." An evening (it was easy to) of the younger men all the way he fifties of Mr. Holst through the s of Mr. Gershwin to the twenties lapped "Gently, Johnny, my Jingand "Soviet Iron Foundry" because elt that each was good in kind.

H. T. P.

---

usic in The Land

t The Pops

May 23

OM Mr. Fiedler, conductor of The Pops, comes the following program or "Lovers' Night," announced for ay of next week at those concerts:

Procession from the Opera, "The n Cockerel" .... Rimsky-Korsakov e to the Opera, "The Bartered " .... Smetana of Love .... Liszt-Herbert a from the Opera, "Aida" .... Verdi and "Love-Death" from the "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner and the Beast from the Suite, er Goose" .... Ravel
-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" Chaikovsky n from the Operetta, "Sweet-s" .... Herbert Tango, "Jealousy" .... Gade

At The Pops Tonight

Harvard Program

March, "Cruiser Harvard" ...... Strube
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon" . Weber
Music of Machines .... Mossolov
Choral Numbers:
  A Dirge for Two Veterans ...... Holst
  Fire, Fire, My Heart .... Morley
  Before Sleep .... Holst
  The Shores of Harvard .... Holst
St. Paul's Suite for Strings ...... Holst
Rhapsody in Blue for Piano and Orchestra .... Gershwin
Choral Numbers:
  Gently, Johnny, My Jingalo . Folk-Song
  The Foggy Dew .... Folk-Song
  Choruses from "The Mikado" . Sullivan
Waltz, "Du und Du," from the Operetta, "The Bat" ...... J. Strauss
Prayer of Thanksgiving .... Kremser
Introduction to Act III of the Opera, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Fair Harvard

Conductor: A. Fiedler
Assisting: The Harvard Glee Club
Pianist: J. M. Sanromá

Post

POPULAR PRICED "POPS"

The news from Symphony Hall that the admission price to the "Pops" this summer will be reduced to the old-time quarter of a dollar is in line with reductions in the tariffs of many other good things. For years and years, beginning in old Music Hall, it cost but 25 cents to get into the place of jollity, good cheer and appropriately gay and well-played music. Now there is to be a return to originals, in point of certain charges, at least, and we shall see how it works.

The "Pops"—always so-called, although formally christened "Promenade Concerts" at which there was never much promenading—have been a distinctively Boston institution for more than 45 years. Their musical quality was never so fine as now. The staunchness of their fibre is shown in the remarkable fact that even prohibition has not been able to kill them. A "Pop"-less summer would not be quite so worth living to the dyed-in-the-wool Bostonian.

XT YEAR

Harvard Night at The Pops

THE SECOND Sunday Pop concert tonight will open the fourth week of the season at Symphony Hall.

Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard Night with many features, including the presence of Gustav Holst, noted English composer, as guest.

TONIGHT

"Wellington's Victory," or "The Battle of Vittoria" .... Beethoven
Concert Piece in F Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79 .... Weber
(Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
"Bolero" .... Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36 Tchaikovsky

MONDAY

March "Cruiser Harvard" ...... Strube
Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Soviet Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
  A Dirge for Two Veterans (Poem by Whitman) .... Holst
  Fire, Fire, My Heart .... Morley
  Before Sleep .... Holst
  The Shores of Harvard .... Holst
St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra, Holst
Rhapsody in Blue .... Gershwin
Soloist, esus Maria Sanroma.
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
  Gently, Johny, My Jingale, English Folk Song
  The Foggy Dew, ... English Folk Song
  Choruses from the "Mikado," Sullivan
Waltz, "Du und Du," from "The Bat," Strauss
Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III, Wagner
Fair Harvard.

TUESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Kammenei Ostrow .... Rubinstein
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Bizet
Finale from the Violin Concerto, Op. 64 .... Mendelssohn
(The solo part to be played by sixteen first violins)
Kol Nidrei .... Bruch
('Cello Solo, Jacobus Langendoen)
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
"The Skaters," Waltz ...... Waldteufel
Volga Bargemen's Song, Arr. by Jacchia
Strike Up the Band" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY

"Greetings to Bangor," March R. B. Hall
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ... Suppe
Liebestraum .... Liszt-Herbert
"Il Trovatore," Fantasia .... Verdi
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem . Sibelius
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
"Mlle. Modiste," Selection ..... Herbert
Invitation to the Dance .... Weber-Berlioz
"Stars and Stripes Forever" ..... Sousa

Concert-Chronicle

From the Pops

May 27

THE wind is tempered to the lamb. Mr. Fiedler will not begin the concert on "Lovers' Night" next Tuesday with the clangorous and derisive "Wedding Procession" from Rimsky-Korsakovs "Golden Cockerel." Instead, he will proffer Kreisler's Viennese sweetmeat, "Liebesfreud" or "The Joy of Love." . . . The numbers from Mr. Walton's amusing "Façade" and the "selection" from Mr. Schwartz's "Band Wagon," unheard since the opening concert, will reappear on programs, next week. . . . On Thursday Mme. Longy-Miquelle and Mr. Sanromá will play a Concerto of Mozart for two pianos. . . . Mr. Converse's "California" is also announced for performance. . . . Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," with the members of the orchestra leaving the stage one after another, is included in the Sunday Pop for June 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
Hanover, Pa
(3)
MAY 26 1932

On The Air

The Boston Pop Concerts, which annually invest sedate Symphony Hall in Boston with the atmosphere of a Bavarian music festival, will find outlet again this season to the nation's music lovers through radio. Beginning next Wednesday evening, a series of five concerts will be broadcast from 9 to 9.45 p. m., E. S. T., over an NBC-WEAF network. Station WEEI will originate the programs.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will play under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. A native-born conductor, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant. He reflects in every concert his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm.

The Pops series will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI, whose voice has been heard for many seasons in broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras.

NBC engineers will make special arrangements to pick up the Pops from Boston's great musical center—Symphony Hall—and attempt to capture all of the sterling musicianship that has made the Pops Orchestra one of the notable cultural features of that city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HANOVER, PA.
SUN
MAY 26 1932

On The Air

The Boston Pop Concerts, which annually invest sedate Symphony Hall in Boston with the atmosphere of a Bavarian music festival, will find outlet again this season to the nation's music lovers through radio. Beginning next Wednesday evening, a series of five concerts will be broadcast from 9 to 9.45 p. m., E. S. T., over an NBC-WEAF network. Station WEEI will originate the programs.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will play under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. A native-born conductor, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant. He reflects in every concert his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm.

The Pops series will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI, whose voice has been heard for many seasons in broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras.

NBC engineers will make special arrangements to pick up the Pops from Boston's great musical center—Symphony Hall—and attempt to capture all of the sterling musicianship that has made the Pops Orchestra one of the notable cultural features of that city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
MAY 28 1932

Group of Business Women to Attend Pop Concert.

Thursday, June 2, will be Business and Professional Women's Club night at the Boston Symphony pop concert, and there will be delegations from all over eastern Massachusetts. The audience is expected to be a large one and a special programme is being arranged by the conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Miss Marion Ellis has charge of the Brockton party, which will include Misses A. Gertrude Adams, Elizabeth Brown, Lenore Browne, Ethel Clement, Ada Crocker, Celina Dudley, Marion Ellis, Edith Hammond, Lillian Hooper, Clara Howard, Hazel Lindsay, Alice Maddox, Helen Megathlin, Annie White and Dr. Isabel Miles.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

OW!
0 —$42.50
, $55, $60 SUITS
eason:
/ and need the cash
BOSTON
our Opportunity
OF EXCLUSIVE
LSO SACRIFICED RESERVATIONS
ples!
- - - - - - - - - - - - 95c
- - - - - - - - - - - - 95c
ROCK
D SQUARE
CAMBRIDGE
—WILLIAMS—BROWN—EXETER—
DWAY, NEW YORK CITY

Whelan May Quit Coaching Berth at Lynn English

Report Has Him Taking Berth as Assistant College Coach in Fall

By LeRoy Atkinson

The city of Lynn has heard a distressing rumor. It is being whispered about the North Shore metropolis that Thomas Joseph Whelan is due to conclude a six-year career of coaching at Lynn English High School. The apparently well-founded stories indicate that the popular North Shore mentor is seriously considering an offer to join the football staff of a large New England college as an assistant and that, if all goes well for him during the summer time, Lynn English High will need a new athletic director when the doors open in September.

T. J. Whelan himself refuses to deny or confirm the rumors, but it has been common knowledge for some time that he has seriously pondered the advisability of remaining at Lynn English in his present capacity. His secret ambition is to win a master's degree as a stepping stone to qualify for a headmastership in a high school, and his graduate studies at Boston College are almost concluded.

Whelan's departure from Lynn English depends upon the successful culmination of negotiations between himself and the authorities of the college beckoning him, it is said, and if he leaves the North Shore high school he will step out just as the last of the great athletes who carried English High to considerable fame and glory pass beyond the schoolboy era. Should Whelan remain at English, his troubles will begin in September. The material for the football team will be new and, according to North Shore fans, not the rugged type the school has been drawing in past years.

Dividing the City

With the opening of the Lynn schools for the 1932-33 term a strict division of the city will be enforced by the school committee, and most of the pupils who will attend the new English High building will come from the better sections of the city where, as Whelan once remarked, "there are more tennis players than football players." The West Lynn residents, of the "Mickey Maguire type," will matriculate at Classical High. It probably will require more of a magic touch than even a Whelan hand to turn out championship football teams at English with the regularity that he has created such machines in the past six years.

In 1930 he turned out a State championship football team with Tony Geniawicz as a thunderbolt ball carrier who ran wild over the State to win the title in an avalanche of touchdowns. In 1927 the English team lost only to Waltham High, during the heyday of Nickey LeGrew and Sam Clayman. Two other years of Whelan football at Lynn English resulted in only two defeats each season. The turning point, when all but the seniors in Lynn were forced to go to the nearest high school, came last fall when Whelan's "quarterbackless eleven" lost six games, won three and tied one.

Whelan's experience in sports and coaching is vast. He captured a football team at Worcester Academy and then went to Dartmouth. In the middle of the football season he switched to Georgetown and later caught a forward pass that defeated Dartmouth. He played with the Chicago Cubs, professional baseball team and later with St. Paul and Indianapolis in the American Association. He coached a Washington State football team that defeated Southern California and turned

---

H., vs. Chris
Bluffs, vs. Joe DS
vs. Charles Bel-

mbprints
Lake

v Braves around nal League hive, of the part that
1. His complete as follows:
iebo.d, allowing nnings and win-chary in fourth yn one hit and hary in 10th in-nd losing 4-3 in ebold in fourth,
g Giants 7-4.
game thus far ten hits in first o 1.
ry, in twelfth, at its and winning ary in ninth, al-
ng.
n in seventh, al-
ts and winning red Frankhouse ng against the game yesterday,

nd then retired
Davis drove in game. was iden-
Cantwell was Cantwell like-with none out,
o before forcing base on balls.
itcher, has two ions. He never the ground be-eful to place it dugout, and he beginning of an an the catcher n the game. I refuse to limber while his own
his shin pads, cher has batted to fit on his bench until the tered.

will sometimes tramp on his ons of his coat,
emarks—I say never, no nev-any object, be r bat, violently
pression of disatcher, tried it
e second game ved him into he rest of the
hn Burt Shot-
ners of the dia-ball that they

---

he Farewells Of Gustav Holst

eave-Taking at Harvard Pop, The Persistent Gershwin, Also Machines

May 24 Trans

A PENTHOUSE on Riverside Drive in New York is home to George Gershwin. He condescends to Boston nly when his newest musical play is in reparation at one of the theaters or his test rhapsody impends at Symphony all. If he ever sat within a Pop Conert, he came unbeknownst, which is unkely. Yet this spring he is the comoser there above all other composers. lmost every evening his march from the rst scene in "Of Thee I Sing," brings ohn P. Wintergreen a step nearer the residency—usually two. Once a week average Mr. Fiedler, the orchestra and r. Sanromá play his "Rhapsody in ue," invariably to tumults of applause. A part of these plaudits is the pianist's rtion. Only the composer himself can tdo him in rhythm and resonance, in n and flair, not only for the piano-part t for the Rhapsody as a whole. Now d then Mr. Fiedler joins Mr. Sanromá. this symphonic jazz (as the big wigs ll it) he also excels. But when there five or six insatiable recalls, as there re last evening on the annual "Harrd Night," the lion's share is Mr. rshwin's. Sooner or later he should be re to receive it in person. Even a ershwin Night" would be no half-baked a—the two Rhapsodies; a very "grand" ection from "Of Thee I Sing"; so backrd ad libitum through his musical ys. "Do It Again," "Stairway to Para-" and "Fascinating Rhythm," as Mr. dler may some day remember, are still d tunes.

t is easy to take jazz too seriously as mark of music unmistakably Amerin; easy also to set Mr. Gershwin at st a rung too high on the ladder of erican composers. Yet the fact reins that the "Rhapsody in Blue" is six years old, alive, untarnished, our piece of symphonic jazz that has not l a-borning—or soon after those births. The fact also remains that well yel before an audience as representa- of a cross-section in an American munity as the nightly company at Pops, it wins spontaneous and hearty ponse. The American call of the apsody in Blue" is still irresistible to erican ears and American nerves. It be a bit early to toss jazz into the heap, or to patronize the Gershwin thought too much and worked too h—to his own detriment—over that nd Rhapsody. By a long shot the apsody in Blue" is not yet museum-e.

n this same "Harvard Night," Mr. ler also returned to the "Music of hines," the "Soviet Iron Foundry," "Steel-Sheet Piece," or whatever the ner chooses to call young Mr. Mossos reverberant ten minutes, By all the s of the game, let down from above, audience should have laughed dely, hissed resentfully, or turned with the contempt proper to supepersons disturbed. On the contrary in casual survey, it listened with inst and pleasure; applauded generally, kly and warmly. It seemed, further, ow what the composer was about—atch the rhythm of his turning s and falling hammers; to recognize n of foundries translated into a glori- rather than a merely imitative ; to hear the song of machinery and ntrolling man as well as to see six ing horn-players with the bells of instruments turned outward. In the when the liberals of music were ing the battle for Wagner or Strauss ebussy, it used to be said that the ces were usually better before an nce that listened with no prepossess, no unalterable notion of how music ht to" sound. Such an audience heard this "Music of Machines"; by discoverable sign took it for what . In the perverse courses of this grand old world no time has yet refused to hear itself in music. Often enough it has found the process stimulating.

All of which digressions are to wander from a concert designed to speed the departing Holst and to bear witness once more to the friendly tie, grown closer of late, between the University and Symphony Hall. At the end of the month Mr. Holst returns to London, bearing with him the good memory of work well done, the good will of all whom he encountered. A composer of rank has taught the higher arts of musical composition, and his students have been the gainers. In Symphony Hall and in Sanders Theater he has reminded audiences out of his own many-sided achievement that English music in this present may not be waived aside. In less public relations the fine quality of the man has shone through the erudite and accomplished musician. His own modesty would deny his stay as an event in our musical vineyards. Others are bound to speak or write it for him.

The more the general and particular content to see Mr. Holst mounting the stage to lead the strings of the orchestra through the freshness of matter and mood that blends with scholarship and skill into the pleasure of the "St. Paul's Suite." Or to follow him guiding the Glee Club through the fine-spun choral piece ("Before Sleep") that he wrote in tribute to it and Dr. Davison, or through the bolder outlined and firmer-textured music that sets Mr. Howe's "The Shores of Harvard." Certain pages of Holst's music—the story goes—stirred the poet to his verse-making, whereupon the verses re-stirred the composer. . . . Between whiles the Glee Club and Dr. Davison in familiar numbers and familiar quality that ranged from the Elizabethan Morley and folk-song to Sullivan of "The Mikado." An evening (it was easy to believe) of the younger men all the way from the fifties of Mr. Holst through the thirties of Mr. Gershwin to the twenties that clapped "Gently, Johnny, my Jingalo" and "Soviet Iron Foundry" because they felt that each was good in kind.

H. T. P.

At The Pops Tonight

oronation March from the Opera, "The Prophet" ....Meyerbeer verture to the Opera, "Mignon".Thomas ammenoi Ostrow ....Rubinstein antasia from the Opera, "Carmen," Bizet inale from the Concerto for Violin in E minor ....Mendelssohn
(The Solo-Part Played by Sixteen First Violins)
l Nidrei ....Bruch (Violoncello: J. Langendoen)
v March ....Chaikovsky
altz, "The Skaters"......Waldteufel lga Bargemen's Song, "Ay Ouchem" rch, "Strike Up the Band".Gershwin

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Second "Gay Nineties" Bill at Pops Tonight

There will be another "Gay Nineties" bill at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. It is expected that many patrons will come in costume, as they did last week. An extra feature tonight will be old-time news flashes shown by magic lantern. J. M. Sanroma will play a piano solo. The orchestral numbers follow:

Charge of the Hussars .... Spindler
Invitation to the Dance......Weber-Berliez
Hungarian Lustspiel ....Keler-Bela
Folksong variations ....Ochs
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ....Vollstedt
Selection ....Victor Herbert
"Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep" Knight
Tuba solo ....Paul Sidow
Old-time songs.

Music in The Land

Love at The Pops

FROM Mr. Fiedler, conductor of The Pops, comes the following program for "Lovers' Night," announced for Tuesday of next week at those concerts:

Bridal Procession from the Opera, 'The Golden Cockerel" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to the Opera, "The Bartered Bride" .... Smetana
Dream of Love........'........Liszt-Herbert
Fantasia from the Opera, "Aida"......Verdi
Prelude and "Love-Death" from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde".........Wagner
Beauty and the Beast from the Suite, "Mother Goose" ....Ravel
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" Chaikovsky
Selection from the Operetta, "Sweethearts" ....Herbert Gypsy Tango, "Jealousy" ....Gade
Wedding March from the Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn

Within the frame of a Pop program the conductor makes interesting and amusing choice. On the serious side rise such undying lovers—in spite of their recurring deaths in theaters and concert-halls— as Tristan and Isolde, Romeo and Juliet. Certainly also, Radames and Aida loved devotedly, romantically, to tragic extinction in the subterranean chamber of the priests. On the lighter side Mr. Fiedler invites us, first, to the loves of Marie and Hans, with a stepmother and a "matrimonial agent" intervening, from Smetana's peasant opera, "The Bartered Bride." Not that the overture gives much hint of their honest young distresses or of the comic interventions that would thwart them. But it is full of the good Bohemian tunes that may have soothed them. Second, in "Sweethearts" we shall hear the sentimental lovers of American operetta and musical plays. Obviously they could not be omitted. Think of the hours most Americans of adult age and playgoing habit have spent in the contemplation of them! It is a double pairing of romantic farce that Mendelssohn leads through the corridors of Theseus's palace in his march from "A Midsummer Night's Dream." For once, if memory permits, remember Hermia and Helena, Lysander and Demetrius, the other figures of Shakspeare's and Mendelssohn's young imaginations—not the sons and daughters of the haute bourgeoisie on view up the church-aisle.

Truthfully, and not altogether regrettably, Mr. Fiedler also finds room for lovers cynically viewed. King Dodon in "The Golden Cockerel" was a fond and foolish old man. His "goings-on" in and around the tent of the florid Queen of Shemakha would not edify a Watch and Ward Society. It is to be feared that she put it over on him. Reasonably his people viewed his "Bridal Procession" with leers. Yet there it is to begin a program on "Lovers' Night." . . . As for "Beauty and the Beast," here are the very words with which Ravel tags his music:

"When I think how good-hearted you are, you do not seem to me so ugly."

"Yes, I have, indeed, a kind heart; but I am a monster."

"There are many men more monstrous than you."

"If I had wit, I would invent a fine compliment to thank you, but I am only a beast."

"Beauty, will you be my wife?"

"No, Beast!"

"I die content since I have the pleasure of seeing you again."

"No, dear Beast, you shall not die; you shall live to be my husband!" . . .

Finally Mr. Fiedler admits a gypsy tango, "Jealousy"—his lovers' cycle rounded. . . . Everything but fleshfulness. No doubt the conductor believed Delilah's tune or Thaïs's meditation—both Paris-made—below the occasion.

Post Apr 23 '32

POPULAR PRICED "POPS"

The news from Symphony Hall that the admission price to the "Pops" this summer will be reduced to the old-time quarter of a dollar is in line with reductions in the tariffs of many other good things. For years and years, beginning in old Music Hall, it cost but 25 cents to get into the place of jollity, good cheer and appropriately gay and well-played music. Now there is to be a return to originals, in point of certain charges, at least, and we shall see how it works.

The "Pops"—always so-called, although formally christened "Promenade Concerts" at which there was never much promenading—have been a distinctively Boston institution for more than 45 years. Their musical quality was never so fine as now. The staunchness of their fibre is shown in the remarkable fact that even prohibition has not been able to kill them. A "Pop"-less summer would not be quite so worth living to the dyed-in-the-wool Bostonian.

XT YEAR

Harvard Night at The Pops

THE SECOND Sunday Pop concert tonight will open the fourth week of the season at Symphony Hall.

Tomorrow will be the annual Harvard Night with many features, including the presence of Gustav Holst, noted English composer, as guest.

TONIGHT

"Wellington's Victory," or "The Battle of Vittoria" .... Beethoven
Concert Piece in F Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79 ... Weber
(Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
"Bolero" .... Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36 Tchaikovsky

MONDAY

March "Cruiser Harvard" ...... Strube
Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Soviet Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
A Dirge for Two Veterans (Poem by Whitman) .... Holst
Fire, Fire, My Heart .... Morley
Before Sleep .... Holst
The Shores of Harvard .... Holst
St. Paul's Suite, for String Orchestra, Holst
Rhapsody in Blue .... Gershwin
Soloist, esus Maria Sanroma.
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club:
Gently, Johny, My Jingale, English Folk Song
The Foggy Dew, ...English Folk Song
Choruses from the "Mikado," Sullivan
Waltz, "Du und Du," from "The Bat," Strauss
Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Lohengrin," Prelude to Act III, Wagner
Fair Harvard.

TUESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Kammenei Ostrow .... Rubinstein
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Bizet
Finale from the Violin Concerto, Op. 64 .... Mendelssohn
(The solo part to be played by sixteen first violins)
Kol Nidrei .... Bruch
('Cello Solo, Jacobus Langendoen)
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
"The Skaters," Waltz ...... Waldteufel
Volga Bargemen's Song, Arr. by Jacchia
Strike Up the Band" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY

"Greetings to Bangor," March R. B. Hall
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"...Suppe
Liebestraum .... Liszt-Herbert
"Il Trovatore," Fantasia ....Verdi
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem..Sibelius
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz Strauss
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...... Liszt
"Mlle. Modiste," Selection......Herbert
Invitation to the Dance....Weber-Berlioz
"Stars and Stripes Forever"......Sousa

Concert-Chronicle

From the Pops May 21

THE wind is tempered to the lamb. Mr. Fiedler will not begin the concert on "Lovers' Night" next Tuesday with the clangorous and derisive "Wedding Procession" from Rimsky-Korsakovs "Golden Cockerel." Instead, he will proffer Kreisler's Viennese sweetmeat, "Liebesfreud" or "The Joy of Love.". . . The numbers from Mr. Walton's amusing "Façade" and the "selection" from Mr. Schwartz's "Band Wagon," unheard since the opening concert, will reappear on programs, next week. . . . On Thursday Mme Longy-Miquelle and Mr. Sanromá will play a Concerto of Mozart for two pianos. . . . Mr. Converse's "California" is also announced for performance. . . . Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," with the members of the orchestra leaving the stage one after another, is included in the Sunday Pop for June 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN
Hanover, Pa
(5)
MAY 26 1932

On The Air

The Boston Pop Concerts, which annually invest sedate Symphony Hall in Boston with the atmosphere of a Bavarian music festival, will find outlet again this season to the nation's music lovers through radio. Beginning next Wednesday evening, a series of five concerts will be broadcast from 9 to 9.45 p. m., E. S. T., over an NBC-WEAF network. Station WEEI will originate the programs.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will play under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. A native-born conductor, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant. He reflects in every concert his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm.

The Pops series will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI, whose voice has been heard for many seasons in broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras.

NBC engineers will make special arrangements to pick up the Pops from Boston's great musical center—Symphony Hall—and attempt to capture all of the sterling musicianship that has made the Pops Orchestra one of the notable cultural features of that city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HANOVER, PA.
SUN
MAY 26 1932

On The Air

The Boston Pop Concerts, which annually invest sedate Symphony Hall in Boston with the atmosphere of a Bavarian music festival, will find outlet again this season to the nation's music lovers through radio. Beginning next Wednesday evening, a series of five concerts will be broadcast from 9 to 9.45 p. m., E. S. T., over an NBC-WEAF network. Station WEEI will originate the programs.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will play under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. A native-born conductor, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant. He reflects in every concert his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm.

The Pops series will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI, whose voice has been heard for many seasons in broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras.

NBC engineers will make special arrangements to pick up the Pops from Boston's great musical center—Symphony Hall—and attempt to capture all of the sterling musicianship that has made the Pops Orchestra one of the notable cultural features of that city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

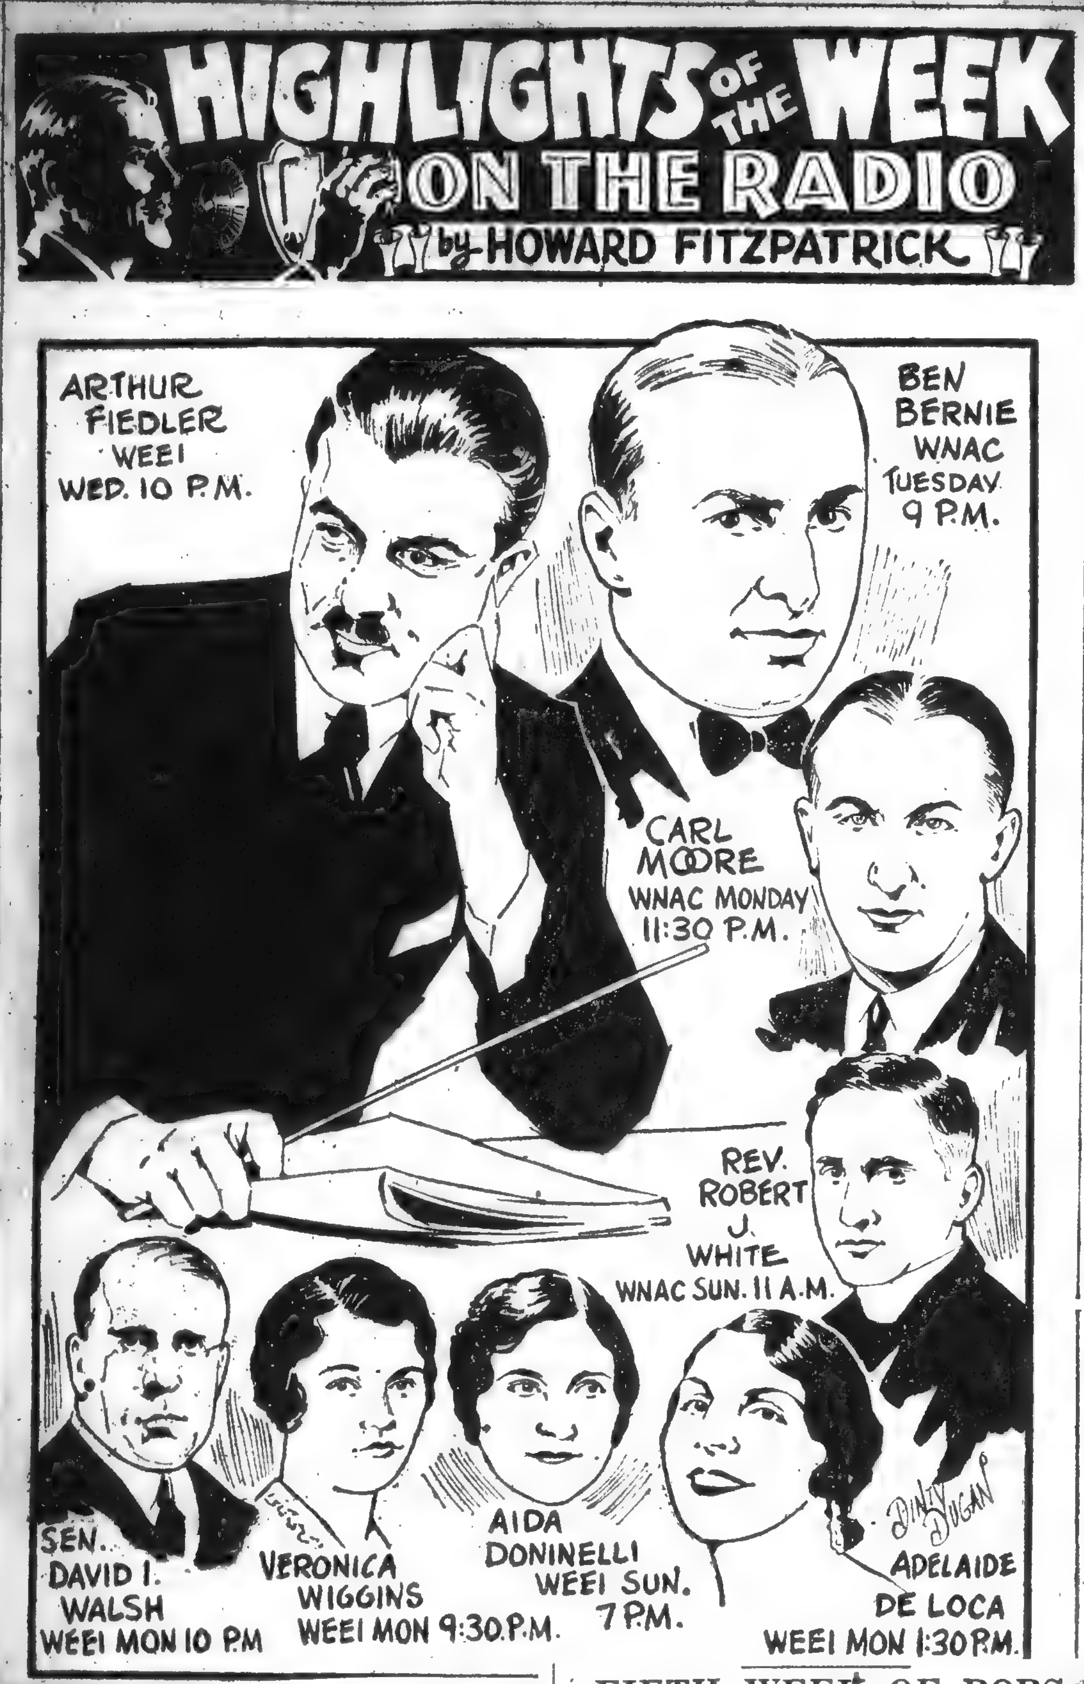
MAY 28 1932

Group of Business Women to Attend Pop Concert.

Thursday, June 2, will be Business and Professional Women's Club night at the Boston Symphony pop concert, and there will be delegations from all over eastern Massachusetts. The audience is expected to be a large one and a special programme is being arranged by the conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Miss Marion Ellis has charge of the Brockton party, which will include Misses A. Gertrude Adams, Elizabeth Brown, Lenore Browne, Ethel Clement, Ada Crocker, Celina Dudley, Marion Ellis, Edith Hammond, Lillian Hooper, Clara Howard, Hazel Lindsay, Alice Maddox, Helen Megathlin, Annie White and Dr. Isabel Miles.

POST, MAY 29, 1932



HIGHLIGHTS OF THE WEEK ON THE RADIO
by HOWARD FITZPATRICK
ARTHUR FIEDLER WEEI WED. 10 P.M.
BEN BERNIE WNAC TUESDAY 9 P.M.
CARL MOORE WNAC MONDAY 11:30 P.M.
REV. ROBERT J. WHITE WNAC SUN. 11 A.M.
SEN. DAVID I. WALSH WEEI MON 10 P.M
VERONICA WIGGINS WEEI MON 9:30 P.M.
AIDA DONINELLI WEEI SUN. 7 P.M.
ADELAIDE DE LOCA WEEI MON 1:30 P.M.
DINTY DUGAN

MUSIC

May 29

Globe

Love Music to Feature Tuesday "Pop" Concert

A program of music inspired by or concerning that greatest of all states and emotions, Love, will be played at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall Tuesday evening. Since that day is the last of the present month, this romantic music will serve as a fitting salute to the coming month of brides and roses.

Inasmuch as the program runs the gamut from Aida's great love and Isolde's immortal passion to Gounod's treatment of Romeo and Juliet, and the rustic marital mixups of "The Bartered Bride," it will be seen that music written about love covers a wide range of styles and subjects.

New England Conservatory Night on Wednesday and Technology Night on Saturday will be open to the public.

The third Sunday concert on June 5 will bring a performance of Haydn's "Farewell" symphony, the first, it is said, to be given in Symphony Hall.

The programs for the week follow:

Monday, May 30—Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; Overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Cavalleria Rusticana," Fantasia, Mascagni; "Egyptian Ballet," Luigini; "Ave Marie," Bach-Gounod; "Overture Solennelle, 1812," Tchaikovsky; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; "Whispering of the Flowers," Bion; "American Patrol," Meacham.

Tuesday, May 31—"Liebesfreud," Kreisler; "The Bartered Bride," Overture, Smetana; "Dream of Love," Liszt-Herbert; "Aida," Fantasia, Verdi; "Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death, Wagner; "Beauty and the Beast," from the Suite "Mother Goose," Ravel; "Romeo and Juliet," Overture Fantasia, Tchaikovsky; "Sweethearts," Selection, Herbert; "Jealousy," Gypsy Tango, Gade; Wedding March, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.

Wednesday, June 1—March, "Queen of Sheba," Gounod; "Danse Macabre," Symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; Suite from "Carmen," Biset; "Facade," Walton; Piano Concerto No. 1, in F sharp minor, First Movement (soloist, Lucille Monaghan), Rachmaninoff; "California," Tone Poem, Converse; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; "Masquerade" (an American Rhapsody), McKinley; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Thursday, June 2—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn), arr by Kremser; "Vienna Blood," waltz, Strauss; "Classical" Symphony, Prokofieff; Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy, Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra in E-flat (soloists, Renee Longy Miquelle, Jesus Maria Sanroma), Mozart; "The Band Wagon," Selection, Schwartz; "Mignon," Entr'acte, Thomas; "Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Friday, June 3. "Entrance of the Boyards," Halvorsen; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Minuet, Boccherini; "The Mikado," selection, Sullivan; "On a Transatlantic Liner," Cella; Ave Maria (solo, violin, harp, organ and strings), Schubert-Wilhelm; "Bolero," Ravel; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; "National Emblem," march, Bagley.

Saturday, June 4. Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Pavane, Ravel; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Fifth Symphony in E minor, second movement, Tchaikovsky; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Rhapsody in Blue" (piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma), Gershwin; "New Moon," selection, Romberg; "Tales from the Vienna Woods," waltz, Strauss; march, "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Sunday, June 5. Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner; Suite Corelli; "Farewell" symphony, Haydn; "The Animals' Carnival, Grand Zoological Fantasia, Saint-Saens; "Pines of Rome," Respighi.

FIFTH WEEK OF POPS

Tomorrow evening, the Pop concerts at Symphony hall will open the fifth week of their 47th season with a special program comprised of Pop favorites. Tuesday evening, Arthur Fiedler will salute the dawning month of brides and roses with a program of love music, showing what a wealth of musical numbers have been inspired by this subject. New England Conservatory night on Wednesday and Technology night on Saturday, like all other nights, will be open to the public.

The program on Sunday, June 5, will bring the first performance in Symphony hall of Haydn's "Farewell" symphony, wherein the composer directed his musicians to blow out their candles one by one and leave the stage in the last movement, with the result that his patrons appreciated the admonitory joke and gave them all a vacation in Vienna.

The week's programs follow:

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 30

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Orpheus"	Offenbach
The Flight of the Bumble Bee, Scherzo	Rimsky-Korsakov
Cavalleria Rusticana, Fantasia	Mascagni
Egyptian Ballet	Luigini
Ave Maria	Bach-Gounod
Overture Solemnelle "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Victor Herbert Favorites	Arranged by Sanford
Whispering of the Flowers	Blon
American Patrol	Meacham

TUESDAY EVENING

Liebesfreud	Kreisler
The Bartered Bride, Overture	Smetana
Dream of Love	Liszt-Herbert
Aida, Fantasia	Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death	Wagner
Beauty and the Beast, from the suite "Mother Goose"	Ravel
Romeo and Juliet, Overture Fantasia	Tchaikovsky
Sweethearts, Selection	Herbert
Jealousy, Gypsy Tango	Gade
Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn

WEDNESDAY EVENING

March, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem	Saint-Saens
Suite from "Carmen"	Bizet
Facade	Walton
Piano Concerto No. 1, in F sharp minor, First Movement	Rachmaninoff
Soloist—Lucille Monaghan
"California," Tone Poem	Converse
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
"Masquerade" (An American Rhapsody)	McKinley
By the Beautiful Blue Danube, Waltz	Strauss
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

THURSDAY EVENING

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn)	Arranged by Kremser
Vienna Blood, Waltz	Strauss
Classical Symphony	Prokofieff
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"	Debussy
Concerto for Two Pianofortes and Orchestra, in E-flat	Mozart
Soloists: Renee Longy Miquelle, Jesus Maria Sanroma
The Band Wagon, Selection	Schwartz
Mignon, Entr'acte	Thomas
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"	Wagner

FRIDAY EVENING

Entrance of the Boyards	Halvorsen
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Minuet	Boccherini
The Mikado, Selection	Sullivan
On a Trans-Atlantic Liner	Cella
Ave Maria (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bolero	Ravel
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection	Gershwin
Love's Dream After the Ball	Czibulka
National Emblem, March	Bagley

SATURDAY EVENING

Hungarian March "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"	Lalo
Pavane	Ravel
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Fifth Symphony in E minor, Second Movement	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Piano solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
New Moon, Selection	Romberg
Tales from the Vienna Woods, Waltz	Strauss
March, "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing"	Gershwin

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 5

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"	Wagner
Suite	Corelli
"Farewell" Symphony	Haydn
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia	Saint-Saens
"Pines of Rome"	Respighi

NEW 'MIKE' FOR POPS BROADCAST

Parabolic Reflectors Will Accentuate Music Quality

An inverse application of the principle of reflection utilized in the automobile headlamp will be made in technical and acoustical preparations for this season's broadcasts of the Boston Pop Concerts from Symphony Hall. This principle, which obtains both for sound as well as light, enables engineers, through the use of the parabolic microphone, to deliver a symphonic work with utmost fidelity of tone.

N. Y. ENGINEERS HERE

The opening Pops broadcast Wednesday evening at 10 to 10:45 p. m. over an NBC-WEAF network, including WEEI, will be made under the direction of W. R. Brown and Charles Grey, New York engineers, who are widely experienced in the broadcasting of symphonic and operatic concerts. They will arrive in Boston tomorrow under instructions from O. B. Hanson, manager of plant operation and engineering for the National Broadcasting Company, Inc.

The parabolic reflector microphone, two of which will be installed in front of the right and left side balconies in Symphony Hall, is one of many new developments of radio engineers. The new microphone has been widely used by NBC since it was perfected, especially for the broadcast of works in the larger forms. The parabolic mike was brought out when it was found that the ordinary condenser types were frequently unsatisfactory, failing to give proper balance or definition.

Unlike the ordinary microphone, the face of the new one is turned away from the artists participating in a broadcast, while facing the diaphram is a parabolic reflector. The reflector catches the sound waves, which reflect into the diaphram of the microphone, thus being focussed harmoniously on the small diaphram of the condenser mike.

Parabolic reflectors may be regulated to assimilate the sound waves within a certain radius, even as a focussed camera or an automobile light's rays cover a specific area. Noises originating outside the focussed area are thus discriminated against and undesirable reverberation also eliminated.

The new microphone, when placed correctly for the broadcasting of a programme, is approximately at a position a person would wish to assume in listening to the programme—rather than being crowded in amongst the instruments and thus closer to one instrument than any other.

The directional sound reflection principle was used in the World war to determine the approximate direction of enemy planes raiding at night. Of course devices then in use were not quality devices, but when the reflector directly faced any enemy plane the sound of the airplane motor was amplified and soldiers fired blindly at the air intruder after the direction was determined.

The installation of NBC microphones will remain in Symphony Hall throughout the Wednesday evening series during June. Engineers Brown and Grey will operate the pickup only for the first Pop concert. They will be succeeded for the four other broadcasts by Boston engineers in charge of Joseph E. Baudino, plant manager of the

---

Pop Concerts for This Week

POST MAY 29

A new kind of Pop programme will be offered at Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening, when Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra of Symphony players perform a list of pieces inspired by the tender passion. On this programme of "love music" are to be found Kreisler's "Liebesfreud"; Smetana's Overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride"; Victor Herbert's arrangement of Liszt's third "Love Dream"; a fantasia on "Aida"; the Prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; the movement entitled "Beauty and the Beast" from Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite; Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture; a selection from Herbert's "Sweethearts"; Gade's Tango, "Jealousy," and for appropriate conclusion the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

* * * *

A cleverly made list is that, one that while sticking to its sentimental text avoids both monotony and over-sweetness. For the other nights of the week, Mr. Fiedler's programmes adhere more closely to the routine, though the concert of Wednesday, the annual New England Conservatory Night, includes compositions by two members of the faculty of that institution, Converse's "California" and McKinley's "Masquerade," while Lucille Monaghan, a post-graduate student, appears as soloist in the first movement of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto in F-sharp minor.

* * * *

The piano will be represented again on Thursday, when Renee Longy Miquelle and Jesus Maria Sanroma present Mozart's Concerto in E flat major for two pianos; and on Saturday Mr. Sanroma will repeat his oft-heard performance of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

* * * *

The third Sunday concert befalls a week from today with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," a suite by Corelli, Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," never before heard in Symphony Hall; Saint-Saens' "Carnival of Animals," and Respighi's "Pines of Rome," on the programme.

* * * *

A former member of the Symphony Orchestra, Alfred Cella, at one time the second harpist, will be represented on Friday's programme by a composition that won favor in New York last season, "On a Trans-Atlantic Liner." Popular favorites from hands both high and humble make the balance of this programme as they do the bulk of all the others of the week

---

HANS WIENER TROUPE GIVE DANCES AT POPS

Novel Program at Concert Wins Sustained Applause

The Pops management provided its patrons a rich treat at last night's concert in the way of four dance numbers, performed by Hans Wiener and his accomplished troupe, to music played by Conductor Arthur Fiedler's band.

After the first seven numbers of the regular program, and many generous extras, the stage was cleared and conductor and band took their position on a platform on the floor, in front of and a little lower than the stage.

The first number, Felber's "Slovakian Peasant Dance," was performed by Mr Wiener, Otto Ashermann, Elizabeth Halpern, Nina Dale, Marjorie Heenzen, Marth Isbell, Kay Pope, Dorothy Sammis and Dorothy Wood, all in colorful costume.

The lavish music and the grace of the dancers combined to make a delight for eye and ear. Then Mr Wiener and one of the girls danced in Schubert's "Ballet Grotesque," and this number, too, provoked the capacity audience to enthusiastic applause.

Mr Wiener gave a solo in Fucik's pantomimic "Circus" and was applauded for nearly two minutes. The entire ballet reappeared in Strauss' "Wine, Women and Song."

THEODOROWICZ POPS SOLOIST

When Handel's "Largo," Schubert's "Ave Maria," or another piece involving a violin solo, is played at the Pops there is always a special regard in the applause for the beautiful playing of Julius Theodorowicz; concertmaster of the Pops these many seasons. Familiar as his name and his playing must be to all Pops fans, probably few know of the background and career of this musician.

Julius Theodorowicz, who as second concertmaster in the winter season of the orchestra sits beside Richard Burgin, first came from Europe to join the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. He left the orchestra for several seasons in order to play second violin to Franz Kneisel in the Kneisel Quartet at the time when Kneisel himself left his post of concertmaster to devote himself to chamber music.

Mr. Theodorowicz is a native of Poland. Before coming to this country he had been known as soloist in many parts of Europe, notably in Vienna, where he served as concertmaster under Komzak and Ziehrer.

THRONGS DANCE AT POPS CONCERT

Symphony Hall Filled at Novelty Event

The novelty of dancing at a Pops concert brought a generous response from a capacity audience at Symphony Hall last night. The combination of the Pops concert orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting, and a dancing group headed by Hans Wiener and Otto Ashermann produced a program that pleased every one despite its length.

The program of dance music was so rich in its beauty that again and again Fiedler was forced to give encores, in which he included dance music not on the regular program. The program included Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," and the Nutcracker Suite by Tchaikovsky; The Ballet Suite by Rameau-Mottl; Valse Triste by Sibelius; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" by Ponchielli; First Hungarian Dance by Brahms, and Bolero by Ravel; to which were added a Spanish Dance from La Vede Brave; Indian War Dance by Skilton; Jealous, a Gypsy tango, by Gade, and a Russian dance.

The combination dancing and musical program included a Slovakian peasant dance, by Felber; Ballet Grotesque (Moment Musical), by Schubert; Circus, by Fucik, and Wine, Woman and Song, by Strauss. The dancing group included Nina Dale, Elizabeth Halpern, Marjorie Heinzen, Marth Isbell, Kay Pope, Dorothy Sammis and Dorothy Wood. Tomorrow night the program will include Pops favorites.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT DODGE, IA.
Messenger & Chronicle

MAY 31 1932

The first of the series of the annual Boston Pop concerts, presented by 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fielder, will go on the air at 8 p. m. The program will be broadcast from the Boston Symphony hall through stations WEAF, New York; WEEI, Boston, and others.

Favored Airs at the Pops

THE POP CONCERTS at Symphony Hall will open the fifth week of their 47th season tomorrow evening.

On Tuesday, May 31, Arthur Fiedler will salute the dawning month of brides and roses with a program of love music, showing what a wealth of musical numbers both great and small have been inspired by this subject.

New England Conservatory Night on Wednesday, and Technology Night on Saturday, will, like all other nights, be open to the public.

The program on Sunday, June 5, will bring the first performances in Symphony Hall of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, wherein the composer directed his musicians to blow out their candles one by one and leave the stage in the last movement, with the result that his patrons appreciated the admonitory joke and gave them all a vacation in Vienna.

MONDAY

Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi
Overture to "Orpheus"	Offenbach
The Flight of the Bumble Bee, Scherzo	Rimsky-Korsakov
Cavalleria Rusticana, Fantasia,	Mascagni
Egyptian Ballet	Luigini
Ave Maria	Bach-Gounod
Overture Solennell "1812,"	Tchaikovsky
Victor Herbert Favorites,	Arranged by Sanford
Whispering of the Flowers	Blon
American Patrol	Meacham

TUESDAY

Liebesfreud	Kreisler
The Bartered Bride, Overture,	Smetana
Dream of Love	Liszt-Herbert
Aida, Fantasia	Verdi
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Love-Death	Wagner
Beauty and the Beast, from the Suite "Mother Goose"	Ravel
Romeo and Juliet, Overture Fantasia,	Tchaikovsky
Sweethearts, Selection	Herbert
Jealousy, Gypsy Tango	Gade
Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn

WEDNESDAY

March, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
Danse Macabre, Symphonic Poem,	Saint-Saens
Suite from "Carmen"	Bizet
Facade	Walton
Piano Concerto No. 1, in F Sharp Minor, First Movement,	Rachmaninoff
Soloist, Lucille Monaghan.
"California," Tone Poem	Converse
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
"Masquerade" (An American Rhapsody)	McKinley
By the Beautiful Blue Danube, Waltz,	Strauss
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

JULIUS THEODOROWICZ, CONCERT MASTER AND SOLOIST OF THE POPS, PLAYING NIGHTLY AT SYMPHONY HALL

Post May 29

TRIUMPH FOR HANS WIENER

SUN. ~~Post~~

Brilliant Dancing at Pops Concert

BY GEORGE BRINTON BEAL

For the first time as a dancer, during his public career in Boston, Hans Wiener, dancing with the full accompaniment of the Pops orchestra under the spirited direction of Arthur Fiedler, in Symphony Hall last evening, rose to something very near greatness. His performance of "Circus" to the music of Fucik. was a bit of remarkable terpsichorean splendor. It brought a capacity audience of the Pops roaring to its feet.

Brilliant pantomime, just the right touch of mock magnificence, dancing after the style of Kreutbverg in his more humorous and less frequent moments, but with a zest and personality all his own, Wiener literally stopped his own show. The applause was continuous and uproarious over a space of considerable time.

Assisted by Otto Ashermann and a dance group of girls, other numbers last evening, filling the final section of the regular Pops concert, included a colorful and fast moving "Slovakian Peasant Dance" by Felber; an amusing "Ballet Grotesque" to Schubert's "Moment Musical," done with masks to good effect; and in closing, a delightfully staged version of "Wine, Women and Song," by Strauss.

The Dance

May 31 Mon

Hans Wiener at the Pops

A lively program of dance music, at the Pops on Saturday evening, was further enlivened by a dance recital making up the last section, given by Mr. Hans Wiener, Mr. Otto Ashermann and their accompanying dance group of young women.

Despite conflicting modern theories regarding the place of music in the dance, it cannot be denied that when an orchestra of the Boston Symphony's caliber provides the music, it is a distinct addition, and one that makes the sometimes tepid offerings of a piano in the background seem anæmic. Never before in the experience of this writer have Mr. Wiener and company been seen to such advantage. The music, under Mr. Fiedler's baton, stimulated the dancers as well as the audience to greater zest and enthusiasm. The wide spaces of the stage allowed room for greater freedom and fullness of expression.

Mr. Wiener chose out of his extensive repertory four eminently suitable numbers. The vivacious "Slovakian Peasant Dance" (music by Felber), in colorful costume, included Mr. Ashermann and members of the group. The "Ballet Grotesque" (to Schubert's Moment Musical), a popular Pops item, was a comic duet in amusing gargoylish masks. Mr. Wiener's solo number, "Circus" (Fučík), a witty interpretation of the mammoth entertainment in epitome, evoked rounds of laughter and applause. It is good to be able to report that Mr. Wiener abided by his artistic convictions and did not yield to the audience's insistent demand for a repetition, which could only have dulled the brilliant spontaneity of the first impression. A Strauss Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," gracefully presented by the entire company, brought the program to an enchanting close.

A darker background would have set the dance patterns in higher relief and given emphasis to the lovely costuming, but it is possible that the pale green hangings used were thought to be more in keeping with the present gay décor of Symphony Hall. M. L.

SIXTH WEEK OF POPS

The last but one of the season's Sun-Pop Pop Concerts takes place this evening. On the programme, Mr. Fiedler has placed Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Suite by Corelli, Saint-Saens' "The Animals Carnival," Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, and Resphighi's "The Pines of Rome."

• • • •

At the concert of tomorrow evening, Hans Wiener and his group of dancers will once more, and for the last time, assist the orchestra, dancing to music by Felber, Schubert Fucik and Strauss. For the rest, the programme embraces more music of the dance.

• • • •

On the programme of Tuesday evening is a former Pops' favorite, the march "Blue White," by Ernst Schmidt, erstwhile conductor of these concerts. Jacobus Langendoen, first 'cellist of the Pops orchestra, will play as a solo on this occasion the "Song to the Evening Star," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

• • • •

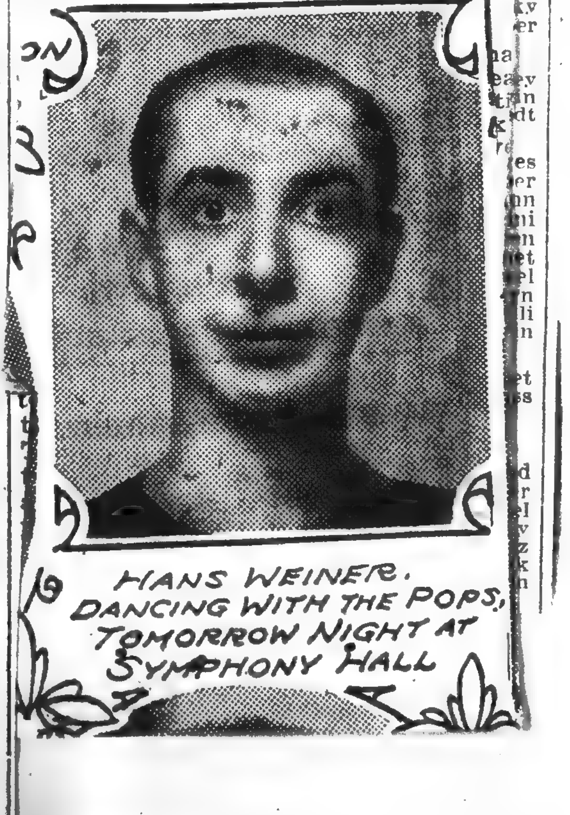
Wednesday's concert brings another solo in the shape of Sullivan's "The Lost Chord," played by the first trumpeter Georges Mager. At this concert the 16 first violinists will repeat their performance of the Finale of Mendelssohn's "Violin Concerto."

• • • •

The annual Tufts Night takes place Thursday. The Glee Club of that college will sing, and the soloist of the evening will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will be heard in Weber's Concert Piece for piano and orchestra.

• • • •

The concerts of Friday and Saturday are without special features. The programme of each is an assembling of pieces new and old, light and semi-serious, all of them being of marked appeal. On Friday, Jerome Kern rubs elbows with Weber and Schumann. On Sunday Mr. Schwartz of "The Band Wagon" stands between Dvorak and Tchaikovsky.



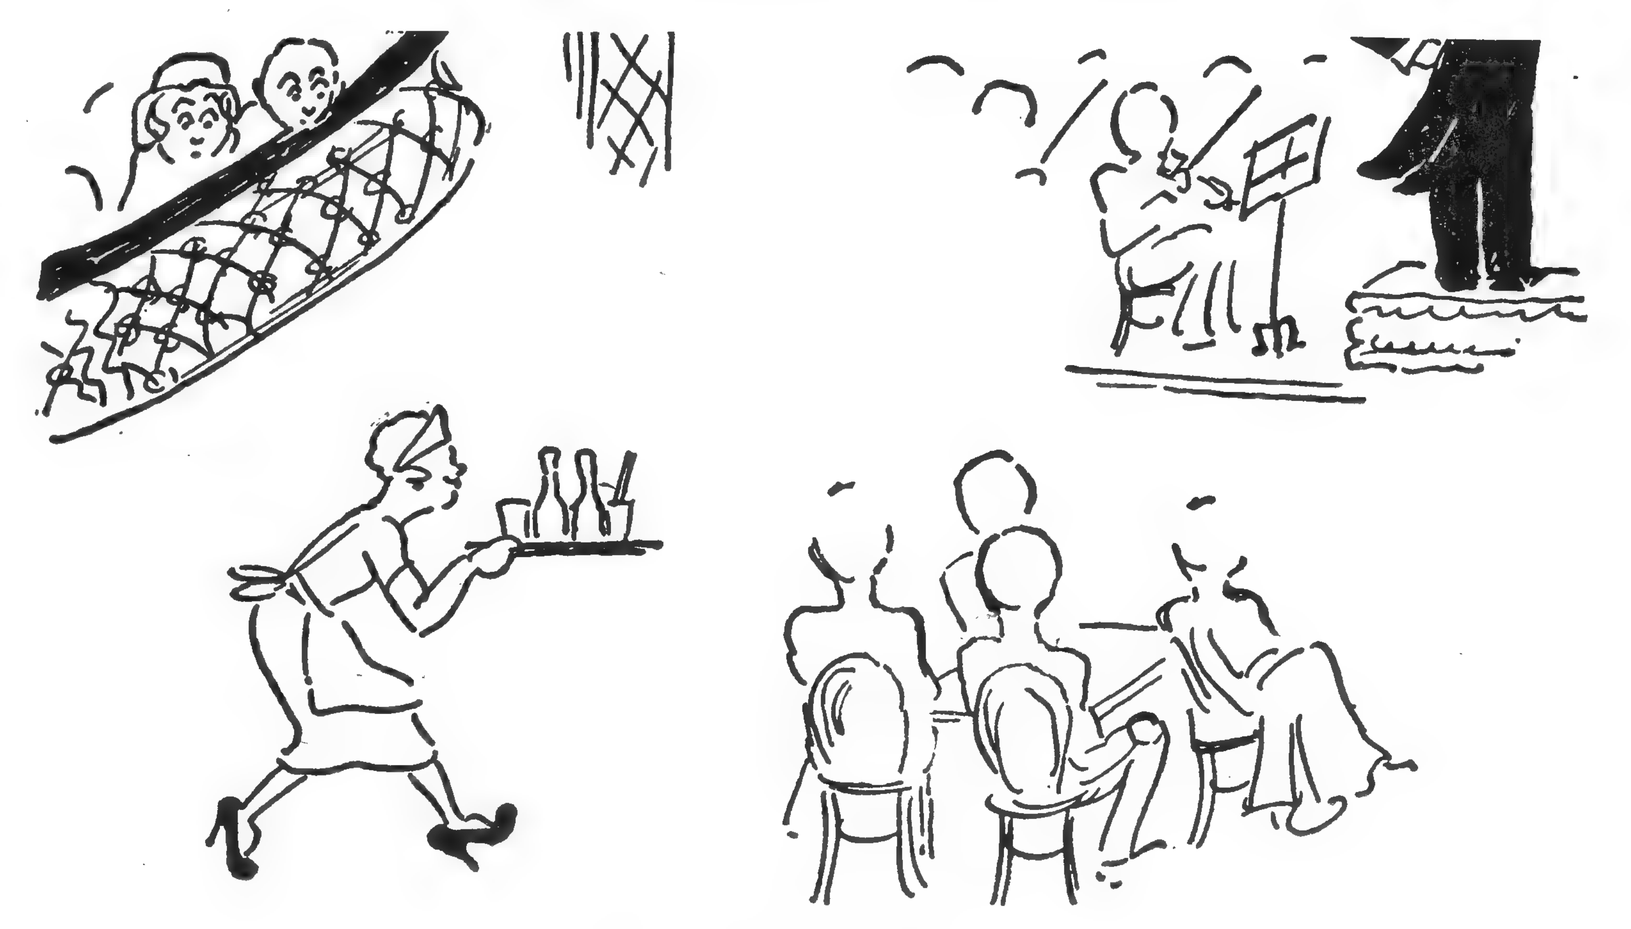
HANS WEINER. DANCING WITH THE POPS, TOMORROW NIGHT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Post June 5

June 1 | BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESD

d Players --- Music and Musician

Program-Notes to The Pops



Marginal Sketches

Assembled on a Postcard by the Management

SIXTH WEEK OF POPS

Hans Wiener and his group of dancers, whose appearance with the Pops orchestra last week was one of the events of the Pops season at Symphony hall, will again dance to the accompaniment of the Pops orchestra tomorrow evening. This will be their last appearance this season. The week's concerts will open tonight with the last Sunday concert but one of the season. Arthur Fiedler and the Pops orchestra will be heard in the following programs in the course of the week:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 5

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Wagner
Suite .... Corelli
"Farewell" Symphony (B. & H. No. 87), Haydn
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia .... Saint-Saens
Introduction and Royal March of the Lions, Cocks and Hens, Tortoises, The Elephant, Kangaroos, Personages with long ears, The Cuckoo in the depth of the forest, Pianists, The Swan, Finale.
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome" .. Respighi

MONDAY EVENING

Polonaise .... Chopin
Three German Dances .... Mozart
Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior" ... Grossman
"Polovetzkian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin
Ballet Music from "Faust," "Walpurgis Night" .... Gounod
Two Hungarian Dances .... Brahms
"Bolero" .... Ravel
Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and Dance Group
Slovakian Peasant Dance .... Felber
"Ballet Grotesque" (Moment Musical), Schubert
"Circus" .... Fucik
"Wine, Woman, and Song," Waltz .... Strauss

TUESDAY EVENING

March, "Blue White" .... Schmidt
Overture to "Euryanthe" .... Weber
"Rosamunde," ballet .... Schubert
"Tales from Johann Strauss" .... Korngold
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen": Variations on a German Folksong, in the styles of different masters .... Ochs
"Tannhauser," Introduction and Song to the Evening Star .... Wagner
'Cello Solo: Jacobus Langdendoen
"Bolero" .... Ravel
"Show Boat," Selection .... Kern
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango .... Gade
March, "Up the Street" .... Morse

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Cortege of the Sardar .... Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
"Siegfried": The Ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhilde's Rock .... Wagner
"The Lost Chord" .... Sullivan
Trumpet Solo: Georges Mager
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz. Strauss
Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or."

Week-End Pops

Program for Saturday

Hungarian March, "Rákóczy" ... Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "The King of Ys" .... Lalo
Pavane for a Dead Infanta .... Ravel
Bacchanal from the Opera, "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saëns
Andante Cantabile from the Symphony in E-minor, No. 5 .... Chaikovsky
Overture to the Opera, "Tannhäuser" Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue for Piano and Orchestra .... Gershwin
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" .... Romberg
Waltz, "Tales from Vienna-Woods" J. Strauss
March, "Wintergreen for President" Gershwin

Conductor: A. Fiedler
Pianist: J. M. Sanromá

Program for Sunday

Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers" .... Wagner
Suite for Orchestra .... Corelli
Farewell Symphony .... Haydn
The Animals' Carnival .... Saint-Saëns
(Pianists: Messrs. Sanromá and Litwin)
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome" Respighi

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—The particular diversion that Mr. Fiedler proposes for the third "Sunday Pop," tomorrow, is Haydn's "Farewell Symphony." Accarding to the legend, Haydn put it to paper when one of the Eserházy princes stricken with economy—an infectious disease in those times as well as ours—was about to disband his orchestra. Not only put it to paper but out of his own head added humorous "business" in the finale. Singly or in groups, the players put out the candles that light the music-sheets, leave their seats, vanish through the door until only the conductor is left, desolate. All of which will be enacted at Symphony Hall on Sunday. Other engaging numbers are Saint-Saëns's "Zoölogical Fantasia," with instrumental humors for beasts, birds and pianists; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" with the gramaphonic nightngale and the slogging march of the legions of Cæsar Augustus—or Benito Mussolini.

For week days, Monday will bring a program of dance-music that includes the tribal ballet from "Prince Igor" and the "Walpurgis-Night" ballet from "Faust"; that ends with the four numbers danced on the stage a week ago by the Wiener-Aschemann Ensemble. . . . "Show Boat" is revived in New York, and on Tuesday the "selection" from Mr. Kern's music—"Deep River" not forgotten—will return to Pop programs. . . . For Wednesday there is nothing new. . . . Thursday is the annual evening of Tufts College, with its songs. For the first time also at a week-day Pop, Mr. Sanromá will play Weber's Concert-Piece. . . . Ravel's "La Valse" has place on Friday; Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice" on Saturday.

Guest at Pops

Theodore Cella will be the guest of the Pops tonight where he will conduct his suite, "On a Trans-Atlantic Liner."

Guest Conductor at Pops Tonight

Theodore Cella, who has many friends in this city, has come over from New York to be the guest of the Pops, where he will conduct his suite, "On a Trans-atlantic Liner," tonight. Since Mr. Cella served as harpist beside Alfred Holy in the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1915 to 1920, he has won a very considerable name for himself both as virtuoso and composer.

In the first year of Mr. Monteux, he accepted the post of first harpist for the New York Philharmonic orchestra, which distinguished position he still holds. Cella's "Through the Pyrenees" figured on the last program of Sir Thomas Beecham in the English conductor's term as guest of the New York Philharmonic orchestra in the season past.

The ideas for "On a Transatlantic Liner" came to Mr. Cella on the famous voyage of the New York Philharmonic orchestra to Europe two years ago when they made their triumphant tour. The suite had its first performance at the stadium concerts last summer. The movements carry the hearer from port to port: Departure, dancing, moonlight, sunrise and landing.

AT THE POPS

The following program introducing a new score by Theodore Cella, first harpist of the New York Philharmonic and former member of this orchestra, will be presented at the Pops tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards .... Halvorsen
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .. Wagner
Minuet .... Boccherini
"The Mikado," selection .... Sullivan
On a Transatlantic Liner .... Cella
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bolero .... Ravel
Of Thee I Sing, selection .... Gershwin
Love's Dream After the Ball .... Czibulka
National Emblem, march .... Bagley

Around the Pops

"Lovers' Night"

Trans June 1

THE middle-aged, rather than th young, listen to love-music in tently, emotionally. The young—let us say romantically and regard less of this realistic age—have enoug of it within themselves. Turn bac to the young princes and the youn princesses that strew the pages of Th Arabian Nights. They sat in garden beside fountains; they spoke of love; th hours lengthened—into silences. Neve once, to the best of recollection, did the summon the court-musicians. Their ow words were music enough, in each other ears. . . . Lorenzo and his Jessica out of Shakspeare, are further proo Barely wed, they sit toward midnight i Portia's moonlit garden. In the dis tance music sounds. They call it "th food of love" or some such pretty Eliza bethan phrase. Forthwith they begin t talk it down with poetized rhapsodie about lovers dead and gone, ending wit themselves, much alive and unmistak ably full-tongued. So much for Sche herazade and Shakspeare. After al they were talkers, not listeners. M Shaw, who, like the rest of us, is in clined to see humankind in his ow image, has given us his word for it.

At the Pop Concert last evening we a the tables and in the balconies we listeners—to a program of love-mus A casual glance around Symphony H was assurance that, for the most pa we were sufficiently middle-aged. Th say that actresses must have touch those years to play Juliet to admirati Perhaps listeners must also be of the to respond to her and to her Romeo Chaikovsky's fading Overture-Fantas It was one of Mr. Fiedler's chosen nun bers for this "Lovers' Night." So als was the Prelude and Closing Scene fro "Tristan and Isolde." But for the Wagner wrought a spell in tones Shakspeare spun a spell in words f Montague's son and Capulet's daughte By such magic, each pair, according its kind, lives on undiminished.

One other twain of Mr. Fiedler's cho were rather lost in the tonal shu Radames and Aida certainly loved d votedly. Being pagans, they set praye books at naught and even death did n part them. But how was the listener find them out when most of the condu tor's fantasia was thundering out t ensemble of Act Two? Nobody in the amorous senses would call that a love solitude. To make no bones about the success of the evening was Mr. Fie ler's fourth pair—no other than Beau and the Beast, rather cynically ove heard by Monsieur Joseph-Maurice R vel of Paris. The success beat highe when Beast was mouthing through t double-bassoon. To little purpose Beau twittered back. In fact there was satisfying the audience until Mr. Pille as bassoonist for Beast, had bowed a individual acknowledgment. Perhaps t young were more numerous than fir glance suggested.

For the rest, Mr. Fiedler proffered lov tinged with melancholy in the manner Vienna and Mr. Kreisler who, as its di tinguished son, ought to know. Or lo "guey" with Lisztian sentiment. (A chi at preparatory school who had someho broken bounds said that was the w "they" spelt the word). Or love prest simo and in dance-rhythm, as in Sm tana's overture to "The Bartered Bride. They were innocent modernists, thes Bohemian peasants. For so love went the jazz-age, though the rhythm was exactly that of the polka. . . . Love, a according to Victor Herbert's operett "Sweethearts"—and, of course, the S Eve. Post, "clean-cut" and that sort thing. A tweak of "Jealousy" in a tang Ben Jonson and Sir Henry Bishop of t amorous eye; twice over the waltz fro "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time." Lov in the pictures was not to be overlooke though if we must have that, protested fellow-journalist from a local rag, wh not "Of thee I sing, baby," or Mr. Gers win with theme-song? Instead, it was t wedding march from Mendelssohn music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream that bundled the lovers away. Afte ward, as you may remember if you hav lately seen the play, the fairies did a b of house-cleaning.

Gershwiniana

This department bows as gracefully it may, being stiff-jointed at the end a season, to the rod of just correctio It said in its haste that Mr. Gershw had never graced a Pop Concert with h presence. On the contrary, as more th one vigilant correspondent has remind it, he listened to his own "American Paris" when Mr. Casella produced it June of 1929; bowed his thanks; was ge erally and heartily recognized. All th evening, writes one that sat at the ne table, he smiled his enjoyment. Th more reason for a second "Gershwi Night."

In Prospect

Messrs. Wiener, Aschmann and thei ensemble will dance again at the conce of Monday next, June 6. . . . Th annual "Request Program" will be playe on Tuesday, June 14. Until Thursda June 9, choices of three pieces may b sent to Mr. Fiedler. H. T. P.

TRIUMPH FOR HANS WIENER

SUN. Post

Brilliant Dancing at Pops Concert

BY GEORGE BRINTON BEAL

For the first time as a dancer, during his public career in Boston, Hans Wiener, dancing with the full accompaniment of the Pops orchestra under the spirited direction of Arthur Fiedler, in Symphony Hall last evening, rose to something very near greatness. His performance of "Circus" to the music of Fucik, was a bit of remarkable terpsichorean splendor. It brought a capacity audience of the Pops roaring to its feet.

Brilliant pantomime, just the right touch of mock magnificence, dancing after the style of Kreutbverg in his more humorous and less frequent moments, but with a zest and personality all his own, Wiener literally stopped his own show. The applause was continuous and uproarious over a space of considerable time.

Assisted by Otto Ashermann and a dance group of girls, other numbers last evening, filling the final section of the regular Pops concert, included a colorful and fast moving "Slovakian Peasant Dance" by Felber; an amusing "Ballet Grotesque" to Schubert's "Moment Musical," done with masks to good effect; and in closing, a delightfully staged version of "Wine, Women and Song," by Strauss.

The Dance

Hans Wiener at the Pops

A lively program of dance music, at the Pops on Saturday evening, was further enlivened by a dance recital making up the last section, given by Mr. Hans Wiener, Mr. Otto Ashermann and their accompanying dance group of young women.

Despite conflicting modern theories regarding the place of music in the dance, it cannot be denied that when an orchestra of the Boston Symphony's caliber provides the music, it is a distinct addition, and one that makes the sometimes tepid offerings of a piano in the background seem anæmic. Never before in the experience of this writer have Mr. Wiener and company been seen to such advantage. The music, under Mr. Fiedler's baton, stimulated the dancers as well as the audience to greater zest and enthusiasm. The wide spaces of the stage allowed room for greater freedom and fullness of expression.

Mr. Wiener chose out of his extensive repertory four eminently suitable numbers. The vivacious "Slovakian Peasant Dance" (music by Felber), in colorful costume, included Mr. Ashermann and members of the group. The "Ballet Grotesque" (to Schubert's Moment Musical), a popular Pops item, was a comic duet in amusing gargoylish masks. Mr. Wiener's solo number, "Circus" (Fučík), a witty interpretation of the mammoth entertainment in epitome, evoked rounds of laughter and applause. It is good to be able to report that Mr. Wiener abided by his artistic convictions and did not yield to the audience's insistent demand for a repetition, which could only have dulled the brilliant spontaneity of the first impression. A Strauss Waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," gracefully presented by the entire company, brought the program to an enchanting close.

A darker background would have set the dance patterns in higher relief and given emphasis to the lovely costuming, but it is possible that the pale green hangings used were thought to be more in keeping with the present gay décor of Symphony Hall.

M. L.

New Dairy Plant
Furnished by METAL UNIT SCREEN CO.
30 Lincoln Avenue
Saugus, Mass.
Telephone SAUgus 423

NATIONAL'S CREAM CHEESE
ARTESIAN WELL

National C
We extend to you o success in your new Hobson

---

lege will sing, evening will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will be heard in Weber's Concert Piece for piano and orchestra.

* * * *

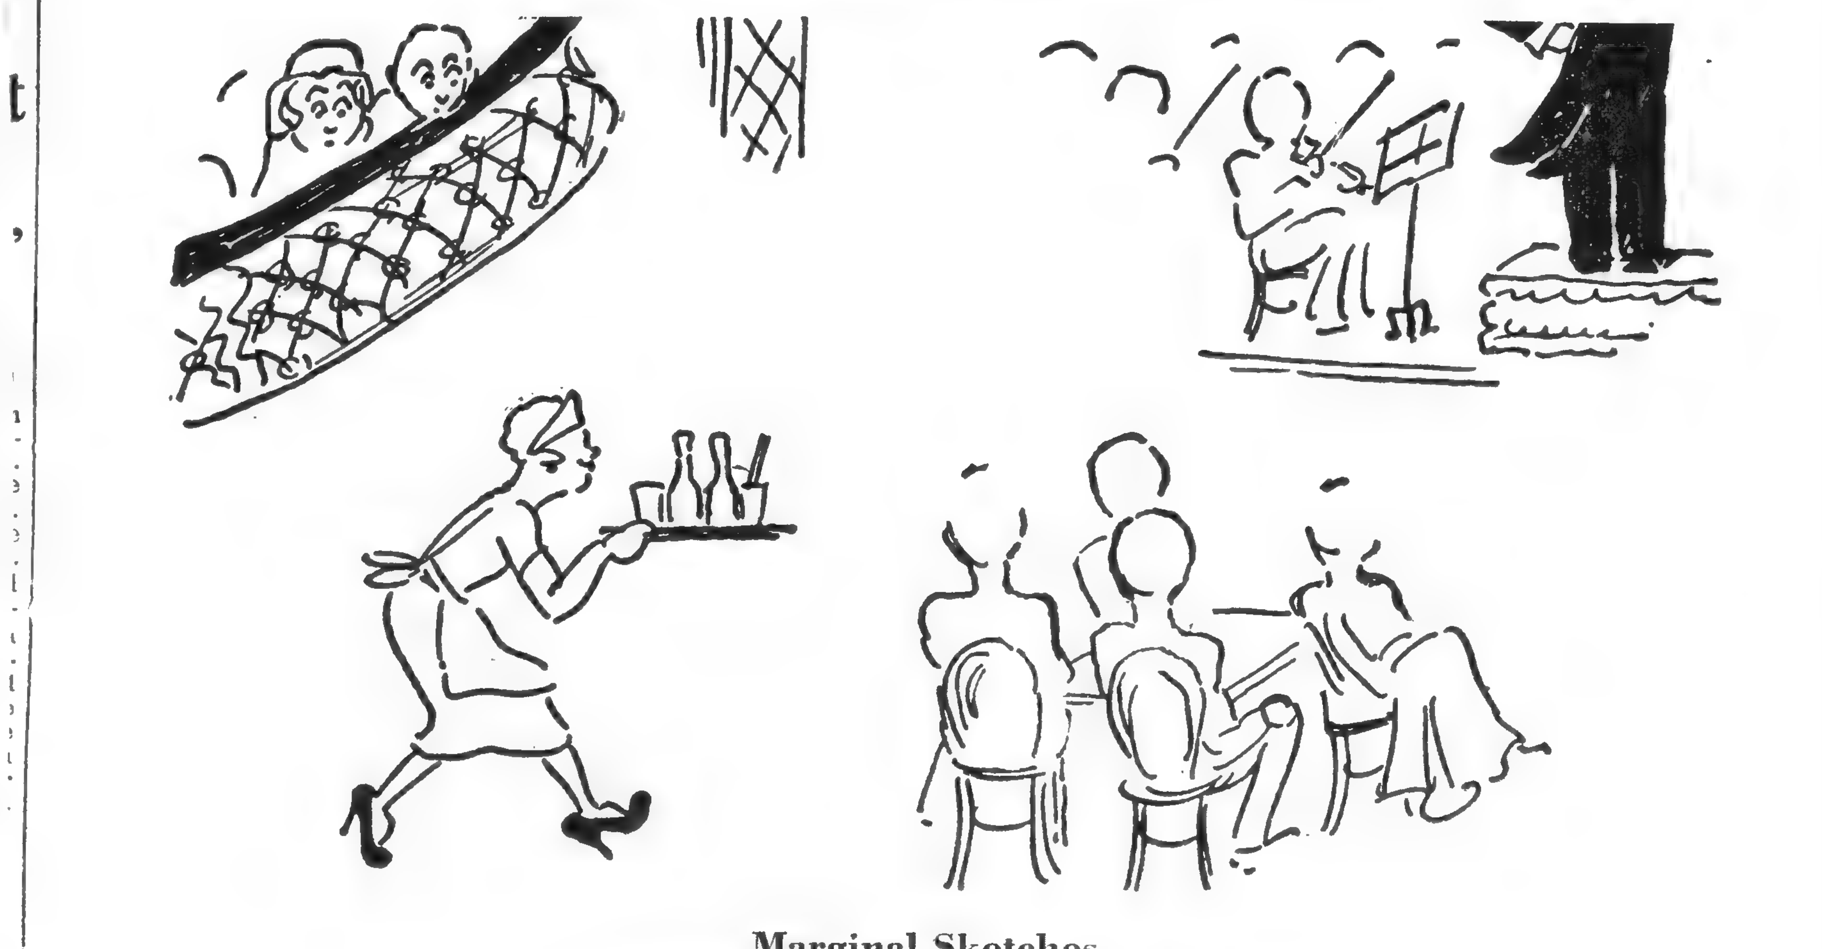
The concerts of Friday and Saturday are without special features. The pro-

Post June 5

June 1

d Players --- Music and Musicians

Program-Notes to The Pops



Marginal Sketches

Assembled on a Postcard by the Management

SIXTH WEEK OF POPS

Hans Wiener and his group of dancers, whose appearance with the Pops orchestra last week was one of the events of the Pops season at Symphony hall, will again dance to the accompaniment of the Pops orchestra tomorrow evening. This will be their last appearance this season. The week's concerts will open tonight with the last Sunday concert but one of the season. Arthur Fiedler and the Pops orchestra will be heard in the following programs in the course of the week:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 5

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." ..... Wagner
Suite ..... Corelli
"Farewell" Symphony (B. & H. No. 37). ..... Haydn
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia ..... Saint-Saens
Introduction and Royal March of the Lions, Cocks and Hens, Tortoises, The Elephant, Kangaroos, Personages with long ears, The Cuckoo in the depth of the forest, Pianists, The Swan, Finale.
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome" ..... Respighi

MONDAY EVENING

Polonaise ..... Chopin
Three German Dances ..... Mozart
Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior" ..... Grossman
"Polovetzkian Dances" from "Prince Igor." ..... Borodin
Ballet Music from "Faust," "Walpurgis Night" ..... Gounod
Two Hungarian Dances ..... Brahms
"Bolero" ..... Ravel
Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and Dance Group
Slovakian Peasant Dance ..... Felber
"Ballet Grotesque" (Moment Musical). ..... Schubert
"Circus" ..... Fucik
"Wine, Woman, and Song," Waltz ..... Strauss

TUESDAY EVENING

March, "Blue White" ..... Schmidt
Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
"Rosamunde," ballet ..... Schubert
"Tales from Johann Strauss" ..... Korngold
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen"; Variations on a German Folksong, in the styles of different masters ..... Ochs
"Tannhauser," Introduction and Song to the Evening Star ..... Wagner
'Cello Solo: Jacobus Langdendoen
"Bolero" ..... Ravel
"Show Boat," Selection ..... Kern
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango ..... Gade
March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Cortege of the Sardar ..... Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro." ..... Mozart
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet
"Siegfried": The Ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhilde's Rock ..... Wagner
"The Lost Chord" ..... Sullivan
Trumpet Solo: Georges Mager
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz. ..... Strauss
Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or." ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Finale of the Violin Concerto in E minor. ..... Mendelssohn
(The solo part to be played by 16 violins)
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," (Old Dutch Hymn) ..... Arranged by Kremser
Overture Solennelle, "1812" ..... Tchaikovsky

THURSDAY EVENING

"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg ..... Wagner
Overture to "Orpheus" ..... Offenbach
Soviet Iron Foundry ..... Mossolov
Tufts College songs
Marche Slave ..... Tchaikovsky
Concert piece, for piano and orchestra ..... Weber
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
Tufts Glee Club, with orchestra
Overture, "Alma Mater" ..... Henry Hadley
"Of Thee I Sing," selection ..... Gershwin
"Jolly Fellows," waltz ..... Vollstedt

FRIDAY EVENING

March, "Second Connecticut" ..... Reeves
Overture to "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
"Traumerei" ..... Schumann
"La Boheme," Fantasia ..... Puccini
"La Goyita" ..... Langendoen
"Meditation" from "Thais" ..... Massenet
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem ..... Ravel
"The Cat and the Fiddle," selection ..... Kern
Serenade ..... Toselli
"Strike Up the Band" ..... Gershwin

SATURDAY EVENING

"Carmen," prelude ..... Bizet
Overture to "The Bat" ..... Strauss
"Sally in Our Alley," Old English song
(Arranged for strings by Frank Bridge)
"Faust," ballet music: "Walpurgis Night," ..... Gounod
"Espana," rhapsody ..... Chabrier
"Largo" ..... Handel
Caprice Italien ..... Tchaikovsky
"Band Wagon," selection ..... Schwartz
"Humoresque" ..... Dvorak
Cheyenne Indian War Dance ..... Skilton

Week-End Pops

Program for Saturday

Hungarian March, "Rákóczy" ..... Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Tho King of Ys" ..... Lalo
Pavane for a Dead Infanta ..... Ravel
Bacchanal from the Opera, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saëns
Andante Cantabile from the Symphony in E-minor, No. 5 ..... Chaikovsky
Overture to the Opera, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue for Piano and Orchestra ..... Gershwin
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" ..... Romberg
Waltz, "Tales from Vienna-Woods" ..... J. Strauss
March, "Wintergreen for President" ..... Gershwin

Conductor: A. Fiedler
Pianist: J. M. Sanromá

Program for Sunday

Prelude to the Opera, "The Mastersingers" ..... Wagner
Suite for Orchestra ..... Corelli
Farewell Symphony ..... Haydn
The Animals' Carnival ..... Saint-Saëns
(Pianists: Messrs. Sanromá and Litwin)
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome" ..... Respighi

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—The particular diversion that Mr. Fiedler proposes for the third "Sunday Pop," tomorrow, is Haydn's "Farewell Symphony." Accarding to the legend, Haydn put it to paper when one of the Eserházy princes stricken with economy—an infectious disease in those times as well as ours—was about to disband his orchestra. Not only put it to paper but out of his own head added humorous "business" in the finale. Singly or in groups, the players put out the candles that light the music-sheets, leave their seats, vanish through the door until only the conductor is left, desolate. All of which will be enacted at Symphony Hall on Sunday. Other engaging numbers are Saint-Saëns's "Zoological Fantasia," with instrumental humors for beasts, birds and pianists; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" with the gramaphonic nightingale and the slogging march of the legions of Cæsar Augustus—or Benito Mussolini.

For week days, Monday will bring a program of dance-music that includes the tribal ballet from "Prince Igor" and the "Walpurgis-Night" ballet from "Faust"; that ends with the four numbers danced on the stage a week ago by the Wiener-Aschemann Ensemble. . . . "Show Boat" is revived in New York, and on Tuesday the "selection" from Mr. Kern's music—"Deep River" not forgotten—will return to Pop programs. . . . For Wednesday there is nothing new. . . . Thursday is the annual evening of Tufts College, with its songs. For the first time also at a weekday Pop, Mr. Sanromá will play Weber's Concert-Piece. . . . Ravel's "La Valse" has place on Friday; Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice" on Saturday.

---

the bill.

Guest Conductor at Pops Tonight

Theodore Cella, who has many friends in this city, has come over from New York to be the guest of the Pops, where he will conduct his suite, "On a Transatlantic Liner," tonight. Since Mr. Cella served as harpist beside Alfred Holy in the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1915 to 1920, he has won a very considerable name for himself both as virtuoso and composer.

In the first year of Mr. Monteux, he accepted the post of first harpist for the New York Philharmonic orchestra, which distinguished position he still holds. Cella's "Through the Pyrenees" figured on the last program of Sir Thomas Beecham in the English conductor's term as guest of the New York Philharmonic orchestra in the season past.

The ideas for "On a Transatlantic Liner" came to Mr. Cella on the famous voyage of the New York Philharmonic orchestra to Europe two years ago when they made their triumphant tour. The suite had its first performance at the stadium concerts last summer. The movements carry the hearer from port to port: Departure, dancing, moonlight, sunrise and landing.

Guest at Pops

Theodore Cella will be the guest of the Pops tonight where he will conduct his suite, "On a Trans-Atlantic Liner."

AT THE POPS

The following program introducing a new score by Theodore Cella, first harpist of the New York Philharmonic and former member of this orchestra, will be presented at the Pops tonight:

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Minuet ..... Boccherini
"The Mikado," selection ..... Sullivan
On a Transatlantic Liner ..... Cella
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bolero ..... Ravel
Of Thee I Sing, selection ..... Gershwin
Love's Dream After the Ball ..... Czibulka
National Emblem, march ..... Bagley

Around the Pops

"Lovers' Night"

Trans June 1

THE middle-aged, rather than th young, listen to love-music intently, emotionally. The young—let us say romantically and regardless of this realistic age—have enough of it within themselves. Turn bac to the young princes and the youn princesses that strew the pages of Th Arabian Nights. They sat in garden beside fountains; they spoke of love; th hours lengthened—into silences. Neve once, to the best of recollection, did the summon the court-musicians. Their ow words were music enough, in each other' ears. . . . Lorenzo and his Jessica out of Shakspeare, are further proo Barely wed, they sit toward midnight i Portia's moonlit garden. In the distance music sounds. They call it "th food of love" or some such pretty Elizabethan phrase. Forthwith they begin t talk it down with poetized rhapsodie about lovers dead and gone, ending wit themselves, much alive and unmistakably full-tongued. So much for Scheherazade and Shakspeare. After al they were talkers, not listeners. Mr Shaw, who, like the rest of us, is inclined to see humankind in his ow image, has given us his word for it.

At the Pop Concert last evening we a the tables and in the balconies we listeners—to a program of love-musi A casual glance around Symphony Ha was assurance that, for the most pa we were sufficiently middle-aged. Th say that actresses must have touch those years to play Juliet to admiratio Perhaps listeners must also be of the to respond to her and to her Romeo Chaikovsky's fading Overture-Fantas It was one of Mr. Fiedler's chosen numbers for this "Lovers' Night." So als was the Prelude and Closing Scene fro "Tristan and Isolde." But for the Wagner wrought a spell in tones Shakspeare spun a spell in words f Montague's son and Capulet's daughte By such magic, each pair, according its kind, lives on undiminished.

One other twain of Mr. Fiedler's choi were rather lost in the tonal shuf Radames and Aida certainly loved d votedly. Being pagans, they set praye books at naught and even death did n part them. But how was the listener find them out when most of the condu tor's fantasia was thundering out th ensemble of Act Two? Nobody in the amorous senses would call that a love solitude. To make no bones about the success of the evening was Mr. Fiedler's fourth pair—no other than Beau and the Beast, rather cynically ove heard by Monsieur Joseph-Maurice Ravel of Paris. The success beat highe when Beast was mouthing through th double-bassoon. To little purpose Beau twittered back. In fact there was satisfying the audience until Mr. Pille as bassoonist for Beast, had bowed a individual acknowledgment. Perhaps th young were more numerous than fir glance suggested.

For the rest, Mr. Fiedler proffered lov tinged with melancholy in the manner Vienna and Mr. Kreisler who, as its distinguished son, ought to know. Or lov "guey" with Lisztian sentiment. (A chi at preparatory school who had someho broken bounds said that was the wa "they" spelt the word). Or love prest simo and in dance-rhythm, as in Sm tana's overture to "The Bartered Bride. They were innocent modernists, the Bohemian peasants. For so love went the jazz-age, though the rhythm was exactly that of the polka. . . . Love, a according to Victor Herbert's operett "Sweethearts"—and, of course, the S Eve. Post, "clean-cut" and that sort thing. A tweak of "Jealousy" in a tang Ben Jonson and Sir Henry Bishop of th amorous eye; twice over the waltz fro "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time." Lov in the pictures was not to be overlooke though if we must have that, protested fellow-journalist from a local rag, wh not "Of thee I sing, baby," or Mr. Gers win with theme-song? Instead, it was th wedding march from Mendelssohn music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream that bundled the lovers away. Afterward, as you may remember if you hav lately seen the play, the fairies did a b of house-cleaning.

Gershwiniana

This department bows as gracefully it may, being stiff-jointed at the end a season, to the rod of just correctio It said in its haste that Mr. Gershw had never graced a Pop Concert with h presence. On the contrary, as more tha one vigilant correspondent has remind it, he listened to his own "American Paris" when Mr. Casella produced it i June of 1929; bowed his thanks; was generally and heartily recognized. All th evening, writes one that sat at the ne table, he smiled his enjoyment. Th more reason for a second "Gershwi Night."

In Prospect

Messrs. Wiener, Aschmann and the ensemble will dance again at the conce of Monday next, June 6. . . . Th annual "Request Program" will be playe on Tuesday, June 14. Until Thursda June 9, choices of three pieces may b sent to Mr. Fiedler.

H. T. P.

Herald June 5

COSTUMES OF THE "GAY NINETIES." Society ladies in the hats and dresses of their grandmothers' day which they wore at the "Pops" (second evening). Left to right: Muriel Perice, Helen Lewis, Korine Hartley, Elda Needham, Emily Day, and Beatrice Kelsey.

(Boston Herald)

Sixth Week of "Pops"

The sixth week of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will begin this evening with the last Sunday concert but one of the season. The players retiring from the stage after their work in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony will make place for the amusing recreations of the pianists and other creatures of the forest in Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals." In conclusion Respighi's beautiful symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," will express sonorously the souls and the history of various flora in and about Rome.

Hans Wiener and his group of dancers, who appeared at the "Pops" last week, will again dance t accompaniment of the "Pops" orchestra tomorrow evening. This will be their last appearance this season.

The programs for the week are as follows:

Tonight.—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner; Suite, Corelli; "Farewell" Symphony (B. & H. No 37), Haydn; "The Animals' Carnival, Grand Zoological Fantasia," Saint-Saens; Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome," Respighi.

Globe

Monday, June 6—Polonaise, Chopin; three German dances, Mozart; Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman; "Polovetzkian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin; ballet music from "Faust," "Walpurgis Night," Gounod; two Hungarian dances, Brahms; "Bolero," Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and dance group, Ravel; Slovakian peasant dance, Felber; "Ballet Grotesque" (moment musical), Schubert; "Circus," Fucik; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltz, Strauss.

Tuesday, June 7—March, "Blue White," Schmidt; overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; "Rosamunde," ballet, Schubert; "Tales from Johann Strauss," Korngold; "'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen,' variations on a German folksong in the styles of different masters, Ochs; "Tannhauser," introduction and song to the Evening Star ('cello solo, Jacobus Langendoen), Wagner; "Bolero," Ravel; "Show Boat," selection, Kern; "Jealousy, Gypsy tango, Gade; march, "Up the Street,' Morse

Wednesday, June 8—"Cortege of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov; overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; Carillon from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; "Siegfried, the ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhildes rock, Wagner; "The Lost Chord" (trumpet solo, Georges Mager), Sullivan; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; finale of the violin concerto in E minor (the solo part to be played by 16 violins), Mendelssohn; "Prayer of Thanksgiving' (old Dutch hymn), arranged by Kremser; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Thursday, June 9—"Tannhauser," "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg," Wagner; Overture to Orpheus," Offenbach; Soviet Iron Foundry, Mossolov; Tufts College Songs; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; Concert Piece, for piano and orchestra (soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma), Weber; Tufts Glee Club, with orchestra; Overture, "Alma Mater," Henry Hadley; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Jolly Fellows," waltz, Vollstedt.

Friday, June 10—March, "Second Connecticut," Reeves; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; "Traumerei," Schumann; "La Boheme, "fantasia, Puccini; "La Govita," Langendoen; "Meditations," from "Thais," Massenet; "La Valse," Choregraphic poem, Ravel; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; Serenade, Toselli; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Saturday, June 11—"Carmen," prelude, Bizet; Overture to "The Bat," Strauss; "Sally in Our Alley," Old English song (arranged for strings by Frank Bridge); "Faust," ballet music; "Walpurgis Night," Gounod; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "Largo," Handel; "Caprice Italian, Tchaikovsky; "Band Wagon," selection, Schwartz; "Humoresque," Dvorak; "Cheyenne Indian War Dance," Skilton.

Dances Repeated at Pops

HANS WIENER and his group of dancers, whose appearance at Symphony Hall last week was one of the events of the Pops season, will dance again there tomorrow evening. This will be their last appearance this season.

The week's concerts will open tonight with the last Sunday concert but one of the season. Arthur Fiedler and the Pops orchestra will be heard in the following programs in the course of the week:

TONIGHT

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" .Wagner
Suite .... Corelli
"Farewell" Symphony (B. & H. No. 37) .... Haydn
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia .... Saint-Saens
Introduction and Royal March of the Lions, Cocks and Hens, Tortoises, the Elephant, Kangaroos, Personages with Long Ears, the Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest, Pianists, the Swan, Finale.
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome." Respighi

MONDAY

Polonaise .... Chopin
Three German Dances .... Mozart
Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman
"Polovetzkian Dances" from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
Ballet Music from "Faust," "Walpurgis Night" .... Gounod
Two Hungarian Dances ...... Brahms
"Bolero" .... Ravel
Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and Dance Group
Slovakian Peasant Dance .... Felber
"Ballet Grotesque" (Moment Musical) Schubert
"Circus" .... Fucik
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltz, Strauss

TUESDAY

March, "Blue White" .... Schmidt
Overture to "Euryanthe" ...... Weber
"Rosamunde," Ballet .... Schubert
"Tales from Johann Strauss," Korngold
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogan"; Variations on a German Folksong, in the Styles of Different Masters, Ochs
"Tannhauser," Introduction and Song to the Evening Star .... Wagner
'Cello Solo, Jacobus Langendoem.
"Bolero" .... Ravel
"Show Boat," Selection .... Kern
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango .... Gade
March, "Up the Street" .... Morse

WEDNESDAY

Cortege of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," .... Mozart
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" .....Bizet
"Siegfried": The Ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhilde's Rock .... Wagner
"The Lost Chord" .... Sullivan
Trumpet Solo, Georges Mager
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz .... Strauss
Wedding March from "La Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov
Finale of the Violin Concerto in E Minor .... Mendelssohn
(The solo part to be played by 16 violins)
"Prayer of Thanksgiving" (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Third Sunday "Pop" Concert

Mr Fiedler played an agreeable and well-diversified program at the third Sunday "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall last evening. With Corelli's delightful Suite for strings—which has found place and welcome on many Symphony programs—and Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," the conductor spanned the years between the 17th and 20th centuries. There were also the prelude to Wagnr's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, and Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals."

Haydn's famous Symphony was played according to original directions, the musicians reading their parts by candlelight, and leaving each when his work was finished. Mr Fiedler and the leaders of his two violin sections ended the piece on a virtually dark and empty stage, and, at the last, solemnly extinguished their lights. If not the first time that this Symphony has been so played in Symphony Hall, last evening's performance was one of but very few.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" seems to one person to be one of the works by which the Italian composer will be known in years to come. It is very imaginative, very clever, and—what is quite as important—eloquently expository of its title. The work has, moreover, a certain vitality, a certain sincerity which are the first requisites of music which would live.

The "Pines" is quite another matter from the noisy and empty "Metamorphoseon" that had a brief and not particularly fortunate existence at Symphony concerts during the 50th anniversary year. The instrumentation of the "Pines" remains a tour de force. It took a master's mind to conceive the string parts in "The Pines of the Villa Borghese."

If Wagner's prelude and Corelli's Suite were not accorded the clarity and precision which is necessary to these pieces at their best, these qualities were partly made up by gusto and emotional intensity.

Saint-Saens' carnival piece is no doubt one of the happiest attempts ever made at writing humorous music. It bears yearly repetition well. Indeed, more is the pity that Saint-Saens is not among the living at the present time, for he might compose a sort of sequel to this work. He could begin with, say, the "crooners."

The final concert of this series will be given June 19. Mr Sanroma will be soloist in the first Boston performance of George Gershwin's Piano concerto in F.

Pops Tonight

The following program is announced by Arthur Fiedler for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege of the Sirdar (Ippolitov-Ivanov); Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" (Mozart); Valse Triste (Sibelius); Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" (Bizet); "Siegfried": The Ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhilde's Rock (Wagner); The Last Chord (Sullivan); trumpet solo, Georges Mager; By the Beautiful Blue Danube, Waltz (Strauss); Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" (Rimsky-Korsakov); Finale of the Violin Concerto in E Minor (Mendelssohn). (The solo part to be played by 16 violins); Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn) (Arranged by Kremser); Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" (Tchaikovsky).

Boston Orchestra Tonight In Notable Program

Meriden Record June 8

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violine concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10:45 p. m. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "Le Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire first violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this bit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de ferce of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

Simmons Night at Pops to Open Commencement

Amer June 10

Alumnæ and Seniors to Share in Class Day Tomorrow

"Simmons Night" at Pops tonight begins the Simmons Commencement program which will be concluded Monday with the senior supper in the college refectory. Returning alumnae and students will share in the activities of Class Day tomorrow. A garden party in honor of the twenty-fifth reunion class will be held in the college yard in the early afternoon and at four the seniors will begin their last program as a class.

"The Shepherd in the Distance," an Eastern fantasy in pantomime will be given on the Brookline avenue campus to the rhythmic beating of a professional music maker. Members of the college orchestra will play the musical interludes. Sylvia A. McLaughlin '32, Bangor, Me., will play the female lead as the fairy princess. Remaining members of the cast are: Juniors—Catherine S. Tidd, White Plains, N. Y.; Patricia M. Willson, Hartford, Conn.; Pearle R. Putman, Southbridge; Barbara H. Beck, West Roxbury; Elizabeth P. McKenzie, Meriden, Conn.; Miriam F. Wiggin, Ports-

---

Request Night at Pops

Amer 10

The ballots for Request Night at the Pops have been counted, the vote being the heaviest ever known at the concerts. All tickets having been taken for Request Night next Tuesday, even before the announcement of the program, it will be repeated on Thursday, June 16. The numbers are:

Bolero, Ravel. Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky. "Rhapsody in Blue," Gershwin, Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. Largo, Handel. "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz, Strauss. "Jalousie," Gypsy Tango, Gade. Overture to "William Tell," Rossini. "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert. Valse Triste, Sibelius. "Peer Gynt" Suite, Grieg. Two Hearts in Three-Quarter Time, Stolz, "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin. "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar. Country Gardens, Grainger.

Amer June 8

Mager Feature of Concert

A feature of the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be the appearance of Georges Mager in Sullivan's "Lost Chord," for trumpet solo with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Mager is one of the Pops' produest assets, being first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter season as well as the Pops. This French musician is as versatile as he is talented. Indeed, his very first appearance in Boston was as a tenor soloist in the French army band with which he came to America in 1918.

—Purdy photo

George Mager

He was engaged at that time to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not a sa trumpeter, as even his present friends may suppose, but as a viola player. Having acquired high honors in the Paris Conservatory on both of these totally different instruments, he changed to the trumpet in a moment of need and developed to the high point of virtuosity which has long made him one of the finest among the Boston Symphony Orchestra's many star players.

June 10

Pops to Celebrate Bunker Hill Day

The Pops in Symphony hall will present a special program on Bunker Hill day, Friday, June 17, as a courtesy to the George Washington memorial campaign now being conducted in Massachusetts.

Early Colonial marches, popular in Washington's day; Victor Herbert's favorites, including the American Fantasy, and many Pops favorites will feature the program.

All interested in the completion of the George Washington memorial building should support the program. Seats will be reserved early as the Pops management anticipates another of its crowed houses, which have made the 1932 season outstanding.

POPS REQUEST PROGRAM

The ballots for Request Night at the Pops having been counted, the result is announced from Symphony hall. The vote has been the heaviest ever known at the Pop concerts. All tickets having already been taken for Request Night next Tuesday, June 14, even before the announcement of the program, it will be repeated two days later—on Thursday, June 16.

The numbers are listed (including encores) in their order of preference as determined by the vote of the Pops public. Ravel's "Bolero" obtained first place by a large margin, while the "1812" Overture outdistanced "The Rhapsody in Blue" by only a few votes.

Bolero ....Ravel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue"..............Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
Largo ....Handel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz. Strauss
"Jalousie," Gypsy Tango ....Gade
Overture to "William Tell"........Rossini
"Liebestraum" ....Liszt-Herbert
Valse Triste ....Sibelius
"Peer Gynt" Suite.......................Grieg
Two Hearts in ¾ Time....................Stolz
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing"...................Gershwin
"Pomp and Circumstance"..............Elgar
Country Gardens ....Grainger

Herald June 10

POPS REQUEST PROGRAM

The ballots for Request night at the Pops have been counted. The vote has been the heaviest ever known at the Pop concerts. All tickets having already been taken for Request night next Tues, June 14, even before the announcement of the program, it will be repeated two days later—on Thursday, June 16.

The numbers are here listed (including encores) in their order of preference as determined by the vote of the Pops public. Ravel's Bolero obtained first place by a large margin, while the "1812" Overture outdistanced The Rhapsody in Blue by only a few votes.

Bolero ....Ravel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ...Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue"................Gershwin
Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Largo" ....Handel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz ....Strauss
"Jalousie," Gypsy Tango"................Gade
Overture to "William Tell".........Rossini
"Lieberstraum" ....Liszt-Herbert
Valse Triste ....Sibelius
"Peer Gynt" Suite.......................Grieg
Two Hearts in ¾ Time....................Stolz
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing"..................Gershwin
"Pomp and Circumstance"..............Elgar
Country Gardens.....................Grainger

June 10

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION

Herald June 5

COSTUMES OF THE "GAY NINETIES." Society ladies in the hats and dresses of their grandmothers' day which they wore at the "Pops" (second evening). Left to right: Muriel Perice, Helen Lewis, Korine Hartley, Elda Needham, Emily Day, and Beatrice Kelsey.

(Boston Herald)

Sixth Week of "Pops"

The sixth week of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will begin this evening with the last Sunday concert but one of the season. The players retiring from the stage after their work in Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony will make place for the amusing recreations of the pianists and other creatures of the forest in Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals." In conclusion Respighi's beautiful symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," will express sonorously the souls and the history of various flora in and about Rome.

Hans Wiener and his group of dancers, who appeared at the "Pops" last week, will again dance t accompaniment of the "Pops" orchestra tomorrow evening. This will be their last appearance this season.

The programs for the week are as follows:

Tonight.—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner; Suite, Corelli; "Farewell" Symphony (B. & H. No 37), Haydn; "The Animals' Carnival, Grand Zoological Fantasia," Saint-Saens; Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome," Respighi.

Monday, June 6—Polonaise, Chopin; three German dances, Mozart; Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman; "Polovetzkian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin; ballet music from "Faust," "Walpurgis Night," Gounod; two Hungarian dances, Brahms; "Bolero," Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and dance group, Ravel; Slovakian peasant dance, Felber; "Ballet Grotesque" (moment musical), Schubert; "Circus," Fucik; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltz, Strauss.

Tuesday, June 7—March, "Blue White," Schmidt; overture to "Euryanthe," Weber; "Rosamunde," ballet, Schubert; "Tales from Johann Strauss," Korngold; "'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogen,' variations on a German folksong in the styles of different masters, Ochs; "Tannhauser," introduction and song to the Evening Star ('cello solo, Jacobus Langendoen), Wagner; "Bolero," Ravel; "Show Boat," selection, Kern; "Jealousy, Gypsy tango, Gade; march, "Up the Street," Morse

Wednesday, June 8—"Cortege of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov; overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; Carillon from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; "Siegfried, the ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhildes rock, Wagner; "The Lost Chord" (trumpet solo, Georges Mager), Sullivan; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; finale of the violin concerto in E minor (the solo part to be played by 16 violins), Mendelssohn; "Prayer of Thanksgiving" (old Dutch hymn), arranged by Kremser; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Thursday, June 9—"Tannhauser," "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg," Wagner; Overture to Orpheus," Offenbach; Soviet Iron Foundry, Mossolov; Tufts College Songs; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; Concert Piece, for piano and orchestra (soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma), Weber; Tufts Glee Club, with orchestra; Overture, "Alma Mater," Henry Hadley; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Jolly Fellows," waltz, Vollstedt.

Friday, June 10—March, "Second Connecticut," Reeves; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; "Traumerei," Schumann; "La Boheme, "fantasia, Puccini; "La Govita," Langendoen; "Meditations," from "Thais," Massenet; "La Valse," Choregraphic poem, Ravel; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; Serenade, Toselli; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Saturday, June 11—"Carmen," prelude, Bizet; Overture to "The Bat," Strauss; "Sally in Our Alley," Old English song (arranged for strings by Frank Bridge); "Faust," ballet music: "Walpurgis Night," Gounod; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "Largo," Handel; "Caprice Italian, Tchaikovsky; "Band Wagon," selection, Schwartz; "Humoresque," Dvorak; "Cheyenne Indian War Dance," Skilton.

Dances Repeated at Pops

HANS WIENER and his group of dancers, whose appearance at Symphony Hall last week was one of the events of the Pops season, will dance again there tomorrow evening. This will be their last appearance this season.

The week's concerts will open tonight with the last Sunday concert but one of the season. Arthur Fiedler and the Pops orchestra will be heard in the following programs in the course of the week:

TONIGHT

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" . Wagner
Suite .... Corelli
"Farewell" Symphony (B. & H. No. 37) .... Haydn
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia .... Saint-Saens
Introduction and Royal March of the Lions, Cocks and Hens, Tortoises, the Elephant, Kangaroos, Personages with Long Ears, the Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest, Pianists, the Swan, Finale.
Symphonic Poem, "Pines of Rome." Respighi

MONDAY

Polonaise .... Chopin
Three German Dances .... Mozart
Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman
"Polovetzkian Dances" from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin
Ballet Music from "Faust," "Walpurgis Night" .... Gounod
Two Hungarian Dances .... Brahms
"Bolero" .... Ravel
Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and Dance Group
Slovakian Peasant Dance .... Felber
"Ballet Grotesque" (Moment Musical) Schubert
"Circus" .... Fucik
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltz, Strauss

TUESDAY

March, "Blue White" .... Schmidt
Overture to "Euryanthe" .... Weber
"Rosamunde," Ballet .... Schubert
"Tales from Johann Strauss," Korngold
"'S Kommt ein Vogel Geflogan"; Variations on a German Folksong, in the Styles of Different Masters, Ochs
"Tannhauser," Introduction and Song to the Evening Star .... Wagner
'Cello Solo, Jacobus Langendoem.
"Bolero" .... Ravel
"Show Boat," Selection .... Kern
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango .... Gade
March, "Up the Street" .... Morse

WEDNESDAY

Cortege of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," .... Mozart
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" .....Bizet
"Siegfried": The Ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhilde's Rock .... Wagner
"The Lost Chord" .... Sullivan
Trumpet Solo, Georges Mager
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz .... Strauss
Wedding March from "La Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov
Finale of the Violin Concerto in E Minor .... Mendelssohn
(The solo part to be played by 16 violins)
"Prayer of Thanksgiving" (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Third Sunday "Pop" Concert

Mr Fiedler played an agreeable and well-diversified program at the third Sunday "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall last evening. With Corelli's delightful Suite for strings—which has found place and welcome on many Symphony programs—and Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Pines of Rome," the conductor spanned the years between the 17th and 20th centuries. There were also the prelude to Wagnr's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, and Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals."

Haydn's famous Symphony was played according to original directions, the musicians reading their parts by candlelight, and leaving each when his work was finished. Mr Fiedler and the leaders of his two violin sections ended the piece on a virtually dark and empty stage, and, at the last, solemnly extinguished their lights. If not the first time that this Symphony has been so played in Symphony Hall, last evening's performance was one of but very few.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" seems to one person to be one of the works by which the Italian composer will be known in years to come. It is very imaginative, very clever, and—what is quite as important—eloquently expository of its title. The work has, moreover, a certain vitality, a certain sincerity which are the first requisites of music which would live.

The "Pines" is quite another matter from the noisy and empty "Metamorphoseon" that had a brief and not particularly fortunate existence at Symphony concerts during the 50th anniversary year. The instrumentation of the "Pines" remains a tour de force. It took a master's mind to conceive the string parts in "The Pines of the Villa Borghese."

If Wagner's prelude and Corelli's Suite were not accorded the clarity and precision which is necessary to these pieces at their best, these qualities were partly made up by gusto and emotional intensity.

Saint-Saens' carnival piece is no doubt one of the happiest attempts ever made at writing humorous music. It bears yearly repetition well. Indeed, more is the pity that Saint-Saens is not among the living at the present time, for he might compose a sort of sequel to this work. He could begin with, say, the "crooners."

The final concert of this series will be given June 19. Mr Sanroma will be soloist in the first Boston performance of George Gershwin's Piano concerto in F.

Pops Tonight

The following program is announced by Arthur Fiedler for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege of the Sirdar (Ippolitov-Ivanov); Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" (Mozart); Valse Triste (Sibelius); Carillon from "L'Arlesienne" (Bizet); "Siegfried": The Ascent of Siegfried to Brunnhilde's Rock (Wagner); The Last Chord (Sullivan); trumpet solo, Georges Mager; By the Beautiful Blue Danube, Waltz (Strauss); Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" (Rimsky-Korsakov); Finale of the Violin Concerto in E Minor (Mendelssohn). (The solo part to be played by 16 violins); Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn) (Arranged by Kremser); Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" (Tchaikovsky).

Boston Orchestra Tonight In Notable Program

Meriden Record Jun 8

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violine concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10:45 p. m. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "Le Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire first violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this bit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

Simmons Night at Pops to Open Commencement

Jun 10

Alumnæ and Seniors to Share in Class Day Tomorrow

"Simmons Night" at Pops tonight begins the Simmons Commencement program which will be concluded Monday with the senior supper in the college refectory. Returning alumnae and students will share in the activities of Class Day tomorrow. A garden party in honor of the twenty-fifth reunion class will be held in the college yard in the early afternoon and at four the seniors will begin their last program as a class.

"The Shepherd in the Distance," an Eastern fantasy in pantomime will be given on the Brookline avenue campus to the rhythmic beating of a professional music maker. Members of the college orchestra will play the musical interludes. Sylvia A. McLaughlin '32, Bangor, Me., will play the female lead as the fairy princess. Remaining members of the cast are: Juniors—Catherine S. Tidd, White Plains, N. Y.; Patricia M. Willson, Hartford, Conn.; Pearle R. Putman, Southbridge; Barbara H. Beck, West Roxbury; Elizabeth P. McKenzie, Meriden, Conn.; Miriam F. Wiggin, Ports-

---

Request Night at Pops

Amer

The ballots for Request Night at the Pops have been counted, the vote being the heaviest ever known at the concerts. All tickets having been taken for Request Night next Tuesday, even before the announcement of the program, it will be repeated on Thursday, June 16. The numbers are:

Bolero, Ravel. Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky. "Rhapsody in Blue," Gershwin, Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. Largo, Handel. "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz, Strauss. "Jalousie," Gypsy Tango, Gade. Overture to "William Tell," Rossini. "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert. Valse Triste, Sibelius. "Peer Gynt" Suite, Grieg. Two Hearts in Three-Quarter Time, Stolz. "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin. "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar. Country Gardens, Grainger.

Mager Feature of Concert

Amer Jun 8

A feature of the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be the appearance of Georges Mager in Sullivan's "Lost Chord," for trumpet solo with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Mager is one of the Pops' produest assets, being first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter season as well as the Pops. This French musician is as versatile as he is talented. Indeed, his very first appearance in Boston was as a tenor soloist in the French army band with which he came to America in 1918.

—Purdy photo

George Mager

He was engaged at that time to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not a sa trumpeter, as even his present friends may suppose, but as a viola player. Having acquired high honors in the Paris Conservatory on both of these totally different instruments, he changed to the trumpet in a moment of need and developed to the high point of virtuosity which has long made him one of the finest among the Boston Symphony Orchestra's many star players.

Pops to Celebrate Bunker Hill Day

The Pops in Symphony hall will present a special program on Bunker Hill day, Friday, June 17, as a courtesy to the George Washington memorial campaign now being conducted in Massachusetts.

Early Colonial marches, popular in Washington's day; Victor Herbert's favorites,including the American Fantasy, and many Pops favorites will feature the program.

All interested in the completion of the George Washington memorial building should support the program. Seats will be reserved early as the Pops management anticipates another of its crowed houses, which have made the 1932 season outstanding.

POPS REQUEST PROGRAM

The ballots for Request Night at the Pops having been counted, the result is announced from Symphony hall. The vote has been the heaviest ever known at the Pop concerts. All tickets having already been taken for Request Night next Tuesday, June 14, even before the announcement of the program, it will be repeated two days later—on Thursday, June 16.

The numbers are listed (including encores) in their order of preference as determined by the vote of the Pops public. Ravel's "Bolero" obtained first place by a large margin, while the "1812" Overture outdistanced "The Rhapsody in Blue" by only a few votes.

Bolero .... Ravel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812", Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
Largo .... Handel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz Strauss
"Jalousie," Gypsy Tango .... Gade
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
"Liebestraum" .... Liszt-Herbert
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Grieg
Two Hearts in ¾ Time .... Stolz
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger

Herald June 10

POPS REQUEST PROGRAM

The ballots for Request night at the Pops have been counted. The vote has been the heaviest ever known at the Pop concerts. All tickets having already been taken for Request night next Tues, June 14, even before the announcement of the program, it will be repeated two days later—on Thursday, June 16.

The numbers are here listed (including encores) in their order of preference as determined by the vote of the Pops public. Ravel's Bolero obtained first place by a large margin, while the "1812" Overture outdistanced The Rhapsody in Blue by only a few votes.

Bolero .... Ravel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Largo" .... Handel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz .... Strauss
"Jalousie," Gypsy Tango .... Gade
Overture to "William Tell" .... Liszt-Herbert
"Liebestraum" .... Sibelius
Valse Triste .... Grieg
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Stolz
Two Hearts in ¾ Time .... "Of "Wintergreen for President," from Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger

Trans. Jun 11

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—In a manner of speaking, next week at The Pops is a broken week. Thus on Monday, the graduating classes from all the colleges of Boston University have taken the whole hall for the annual "night" preceding Commencement. Consequently there will be no room for the general public—the first Pop of the season with closed doors.

Tuesday will bring the annual "Request Program." For this concert again every table and every place above stairs are already taken. To meet this public demand, the "Request Program" will be repeated on Thursday. The significant new item is Ravel's "Bolero," which piece led all the others in the voting. With "Wintergreen's March" from "Of Thee I Sing," it has established itself this spring in general favor. Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Mr. Sanromá as pianist, also stood high in the balloting. Otherwise the "Request Program" is the usual hodge-podge of long-standing preferences: Chaikovsky's "1812"; Handel's Largo; Strauss's "Blue Danube" Waltz; the Suite from Grieg's incidental music to "Peer Gynt"; among the encore pieces, Sibelius's "Valse Triste" and Grainger's "Country Gardens."

For Friday, June 17, Mr. Fiedler has assembled a "Holiday Program," with a side-glance at the Washington Bi-Centenary in an arrangement of marches from his time and in Hayden Wood's Southern Rhapsody, "Virginia." A novel number is Grainger's "Spoon River"—an "American Folk-Dance for Edgar Lee Masters, Poet of Pioneers." Dances from German's English operetta, "Nell Gwynn," also diversify the program.

Wednesday and Saturday are the only two routine evenings. On Wednesday Mr. Fiedler will bring back to the repertory the sensuous Viennese waltzes from Richard Strauss's "Rosenkavalier." Saturday two classics—Corelli's Suite for Strings and Beethoven's third "Leonora" Overture—have place . . . On Sunday, June 19, as already announced, Gershwin's Piano-Concerto will be played for the first time in Boston. For the first time also another pianist than the composer—Mr. Sanromá—will take the solo-part. Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1"— the locomotive piece—and the waltz from Strauss's opera, "Intermezzo," are also on the program.

Haydn Music at the Pops

Amer Jun 11

The Pop concert at Symphony Hall next Sunday will feature Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, wherein the composer directed his musicians to blow out their candles one by one and leave the stage in the last movement, with the result that his patrons appreciated the admonitory joke and gave them all a vacation in Vienna. The program will also include Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," a suite of Corelli, Saint-Saens' "Animals' Carnival" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Globe Jun 12

Seventh Week of "Pops"

A program of requested music Tuesday evening will begin the seventh week of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall for the general public, the concert tomorrow evening having been taken over by Boston University.

The ballot for Request Night is the heaviest on record at the "Pops"; so clear were the favorite numbers, indeed, that the program will be repeated Thursday evening. Ravel's "Bolero" had almost twice as many votes as any other piece; Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture led Gershwin's "Rhapsody In Blue" by a close margin, with Handel's "Largo" not far behind.

Friday evening, in recognition of Bunker Hill Day, the program will include pieces of Colonial flavor, among them a suite of campaign marches of the American Revolution.

At the final Sunday concert, a week from tonight, Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the solo part in the first Boston performance of George Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F. The Waltz from Richard Strauss' opera "Intermezzo," will likewise have its first performance in this city.

Programs of the week follow:

Tuesday, June 14, Request Night, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Peer Gynt" Suite, Grieg; "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Largo, Handel; "Bolero," Ravel; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz, Strauss; "Rhapsody in Blue" (soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma), Gershwin; encores, "Jalousie," Gypsy Tango, Gade; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; "Two Hearts in ¾ Time," Stolz; "Country Gardens," Grainger; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Wednesday, June 15. "Marche Militaire," Schubert; Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Beethoven; "Arabesques," Witek; "Hejre Kati," Scene de la Czardas, Hubay; "Rosenkavalier," Waltzes, R. Strauss; "Londonderry Air" (for violin solo, string orchestra and harp), arr. by Sir Hamilton Harty; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "Sweethearts," Selection, Herbert; Praeludium, Jaernefelt; "Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik.

Thursday, June 16—Request program repeated.

Friday, June 17 — "Washington Post," march, Sousa; "Light Cavalry," overture, Suppe; "Spoon River," American folk dance (for Edgar Lee Masters, poet of pioneers), Grainger; "Nell Gwyn," dance suite, German; marches from the days of George Washington, arranged by Adolf Schmid; "Virginia," a Southern rhapsody, Haydn Wood; "Ouverture Solennelle, 1812," Tchaikovsky; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; "To a Wild Rose," MacDowell; "American Fantasy," Herbert.

Saturday, June 18. Aragonaise from "The Cid," Massenet; Suite (for string orchestra), Corelli; "Peer Gynt" Suite, Grieg; "Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, Wagner; Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Beethoven; "Sally in Our Alley," arranged for string orchestra by Frank Bridge; "Girls of Baden," waltz, Komzak; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; Intermezzo from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; "Only One Vienna," march, Schrammel.

Sunday, June 19. (Last Sunday Concert). Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Waltz from the Opera "Intermezzo" (first performance in Boston), R. Strauss; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; Concerto in F, for Pianoforte and Orchestra (first performance in Boston); soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Herald June 12

POPS BROADCASTS SATURDAY NIGHTS

Time Changed for Last Three Air Programs

Availing itself of a preferential broadcast period made available by the NBC, the Symphony hall management of the Boston Pop concerts has announced a change in schedule for the last three programs. The Pops, which have been heard on Wednesday evenings at 10 to 10:45 over an NBC network, will hereafter be broadcast on Saturday evenings at 9:15 to 10 over the same network.

The first program under the new schedule will be next Saturday evening, the series concluding with the broadcast on July 2. No further change will be made in the schedule, it was stated. The remaining programs will be under the conductorship of Arthur Fiedler, and will be announced, as in the past, by Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI.

While broadcasting of Pops is a comparatively recent innovation at Symphony hall, the concerts themselves date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. The project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season was then started. They were modeled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables installed, so that one might sip wine or beers, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a Strauss waltz or a popular march.

The Pops' "Request Night"

Probably the people at Symphony hall really do count the ballots for the request program, but it must be pretty much of a formality, like the Republican convention's selection of its candidate. These numbers might just as well be printed on the program six months in advance: Handel's Largo (which, while now revered like a sacred hymn, originated as a casual song in an opera, "Xerxes"), Tchaikovsky's "1812" (the communists in the second balcony still cheer this despite its generous inclusion of the Russian imperial anthem), Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" (now as typically British as John Bull himself), Strauss's "Danube," and Rossini's "William Tell." Then, every season, a few ephemeral favorites arise. This year they are

Herald June 12

Ravel's Bolero (that musical stunt left over from Dr. Koussevitzky's repertoire), Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" (still much better than his second), "Zwei Herzen in Drei-Viertel Takt" (a survivor of the 1931 Pops season and played, for some reason, by Mr. Fiedler with a distressingly elephantine swing), and Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President," the rowdy torchlight parade number with drunken echoes of "The Gang's All Here" and "A Hot Time in the Old Town" from "Of Thee I Sing." With all these solid troupers, old and young, one wonders how Percy Grainger's dainty "Country Gardens" happened to win a place on Tuesday night's list!

Post Jun 19

POPS NEARING END

But two weeks remain of the present season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Tonight brings the final Sunday evening concert with the local premiere of two interesting compositions: George Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F major, composed for Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, and the waltz in a Bavarian tavern from Richard Strauss' opera "Intermezzo," which is based on an episode in the composer's married life. This "domestic comedy," as Strauss styles it, is as yet unknown in this country, though the first performance took place eight years ago. One of the several orchestral interludes has been heard at the Symphony Concerts. The soloist in Gershwin's Concerto will be Jesus Maria Sanroma.

* * * *

Other numbers on this evening's programme are Weber's overture to "Oberon," the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan," Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1," and Tchaikovsky's Overture "1812."

* * * *

The other concerts of the week will offer the usual assortment of operatic numbers, "grand" or otherwise, symphonic fragments, waltzes, marches and orchestral tid-bits; in short, music for every taste.

* * * *

Two former members of the Symphony Orchestra will have their compositions performed this week. On Thursday Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra will play the Caprice, "Tilla," by Rudolph Nagel, and on the following evening, a piece entitled "Carnival," from the pen of Alfred Cella. Mr. Cella, onetime second harpist and now a member of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, will conduct his composition. At the same concert Pasquale Amerena, flutist, will appear as soloist in a Mazurka from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Christmas Eve."

SEVENTH WEEK OF POPS

The annual request night at the Pops comes on Tuesday of this week and since all seats for this particular concert have been sold in advance the programme will be repeated on Thursday. It is announced at Symphony Hall that the balloting for this request programme is the heaviest on record.

The piece that received by far the greatest number of votes was Ravel's "Bolero"; behind in its order came Tschaikovsky's Overture "1812," Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and Handel's Largo. Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," Liszt's "Love Dream" as transcribed by Herbert, Rossini's "William Tell" Overture and Strauss' "Blue Danube" Waltz. In Gershwin's Rhapsody Mr. Sanroma will be the solo pianist.

For encores the request programme will offer Gade's "Jalousie," Sibelius' "Valse Triste," Stolz's "Two Hearts in 3—4 Time," Grainger's "Country Gardens," and "Wintergreen for President" from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing."

* * * *

Tomorrow evening's Pop Concert has been taken over by Boston University.

Post Jun 12

Wednesday evening brings a programme of the usual sort with a novelty in the shape of a piece of Anton Witek, former concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, by title "Arabesques."

* * * *

The programme of Friday's concert has a patriotic flavor appropriate to Bunker Hill Day. Sousa's "Washington Post" March, Granger's "Spoon River," a set of marches from the days of Washington, Wood's Rhapsody "Virginia" and Herbert's American Fantasy are among the chosen numbers."

* * * *

Mr. Fiedler's list for Saturday evening is one more sample of his skill in programme making that has made the present season of Pops unprecedentedly popular.

The final Sunday concert which takes place a week from tonight will introduce to Boston Gershwin's Concerto in F major, with Mr. Sanroma as the pianist, and a waltz from Richard Strauss' opera "Intermezzo." Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1," the Prelude, and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan," and Tschaikovsky's "1812," will make the rest.

Trans. June 18

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—In twenty-five years no series of Pop Concerts has been so well attended as that now drawing to a close. Judge Mr. Fiedler's programs and conducting as the hearer may, beyond doubt they catch the town above those of most of his predecessors—not once or twice a week but evening after evening. Though he and the orchestra have now but a fortnight to go, he continues to diversify the repertory with fresh pieces. For the final Sunday Pop, tomorrow evening, the program includes the Waltz in Richard Strauss's operatic comedy, "Intermezzo," as yet unheard in Boston; Mr. Gershwin's Piano-Concerto likewise for the first time in this capital of the arts; Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1," the locomotive piece so-called, now nine years old and bidding fair to outlast the other "music of machines" for which it first set example. In the Concerto, the indispensable Sanromá will play the piano-part. Six years ago in New York it taxed Mr. Gershwin himself.

On Monday next the program runs familiar course. . . . On Tuesday it includes the Variations on the Austrian National Hymn from a String-Quartet of Haydn, to be played at Symphony Hall by all the violins, violas and violoncellos. . . . On Wednesday the potpourri from Mr. Schwartz's "Band Wagon" will be played again—the first music from a review to establish itself at The Pops. . . . Mr. Nagel's Caprice, "Tilla," and Strauss's Waltz, "Southern Roses," reappear on Thursday. . . . On Friday there is room for another of Mr. Cella's symphonic sketches of travel. By title it is "Carnival." The composer will be conductor. The Mazurka of the Stars, in which they are playing at Blind Man's Buff, also has place—from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Christmas Eve." . . . The program for Saturday includes the First Movement of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the March Movement from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony." Saint-Saëns's Zoölogical Carnival lightens the list.

MODERN, BEACON, FENWAY

Herald Jun 12

SEVENTH WEEK OF POPS

The seventh week of the Pop concerts in Symphony hall brings the annual "Request" program on Tuesday night next. All tickets have been taken even before the program was announced, it will be repeated next Thursday, June 16. On Friday evening, June 17, the coincidence of Bunker Hill day and the bi-centennial of George Washington brings a program of colonial flavor including a suite of the campaign marches of the American revolution.

Next Sunday, June 19, will be the last Sunday pop concert of the season with two notable novelties which Arthur Fiedler is to introduce to the Pops. George Gershwin's concerto in F will then be played with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. This score, first performed in New York several seasons ago with outstanding success, has three movements with a piano part of great brilliance. The Waltz from Richard Strauss's opera "Intermezzo" will also have its first performance hereabouts.

The concert of tomorrow night has been taken over by Boston University. The remaining programs follow:

TUESDAY EVENING
REQUEST NIGHT

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Peer Gynt, suite	Grieg
Liebestraum	Liszt-Herbert
Ouverture Solennelle, 1812	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Largo	Handel
Bolero	Ravel
By the Beautiful Blue Danube, waltz	Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
Encores:
Jalousie, Gypsy tango	Gade
Valse Triste	Sibelius
Two Hearts in ¾ Time	Stolz
Wintergreen for President, from "Of Thee I Sing"	Gershwin

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Marche Militaire	Schubert
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"	Beethoven
Arabesques	Witek
Heire Kati, scene de la Czardas	Hubay
Rosenkavalier, Waltzes	R. Strauss
Londonderry Air. Arr. by Sir Hamilton Harty (For violin solo, string orchestra and harp)
First Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Sweethearts, selection	Herbert
Praeludium	Jaernefelt
Entrance of the Gladiators	Fucik

THURSDAY EVENING

Request program repeated.

FRIDAY EVENING

Washington Post, March	Sousa
Light Cavalry, Overture	Suppe
Spoon River, American folk dance (For Edgar Lee Masters, poet of pioneers)	Grainger
Nell Gwyn, dance suite	German
Marches from the days of George Washington	Arranged by Adolf Schmid
Virginia, a southern rhapsody	Haydn Wood
Ouverture Solennelle, 1812	Tchaikovsky
Victor Herbert Favorites	Arr. by Sanford
To a Wild Rose	MacDowell
American Fantasy	Herbert

SATURDAY EVENING

Aragonaise from The Cid	Massenet
Suite (for string orchestra)	Corelli
Peer Gynt, suite	Grieg
"Lohengrin," introduction to Act 3	Wagner
Overture to Leonore, No. 3	Beethoven
Sally in Our Alley, arranged for string orchestra by Frank Bridge.
Girls of Baden, waltz	Komzak
Of Thee I Sing, selection	Gershwin
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Only One Vienna, march	Schrammel

SUNDAY EVENING

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Waltz from the opera "Intermezzo," (First performance in Boston)	R. Strauss
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra (First performance in Boston)	Gershwin
Overture Solennelle, 1812	Tchaikovsky

Last Fortnight of "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall, with the concluding Sunday concert this evening, enter upon their last two weeks.

Globe Jun 19

Tonight the program is given added interest by inclusion of George Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F and the Waltz from Richard Strauss' opera "Intermezzo." Both works will be played for the first time in Boston. Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the solo part in the concerto, said by some to be the most brilliant piano part the composer has yet written. The concerto was first performed in 1925 by the New York Symphony Society upon whose commission it was written.

Strauss' "Intermezzo," a "domestic comedy," was first performed in Dresden in 1924. The work is in gay and lyrical vein, and is based upon an incident in the composer's life whereby a misunderstanding about a barmaid whom he had really never met, threatened briefly to disrupt his domestic happiness.

Programs for this week follow:

Tonight—Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Waltz from the opera "Intermezzo" (first performance in Boston), R. Strauss; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra (first time in Boston), Gershwin; overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Monday, June 20—"Under the Double Eagle," march, J. Wagner; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; Second Norwegian Dance, Grieg; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltz, Strauss; polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Dubinashka," Russian folk song, arranged by Jacchia; triumphal march from "Aida," Verdi.

Tuesday, June 21—"On the Mall," march, Goldman; overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; variations on the Austrian national anthem, from the string quartet, Op. 76, No. 3, Haydn; Sixth Hungarian Dance, Brahms; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "In the Spring," for string orchestra, Grieg; Fourth Symphony, finale, Tchaikovsky; "The Fortune Teller," selection, Herbert; Song of the Volga Boatmen, arranged by Agide Jacchia; "Panaderos," Spanish dance, Glazounov.

Wednesday, June 22—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Danse Macabre," symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; "Hopak," from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," Moussorgsky; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Ballet Suite, Rameau-Mottl; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "The Band Wagon," selection, Schwartz; "Jealousy," Gypsy tango, Gade; "Lohengrin," introduction to Act III, Wagner.

Thursday, June 23. Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; overture to "Raymond," Thomas; "Liebesleid," Kreisler; "Samson and Delilah," fantasia, Saint-Saens; "Tilla," caprice, Nagel; Ave Marie (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; harp, organ and strings), Schubert-Wilhelmj; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Roses from the South," waltz, Strauss; "Song of India," from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Up the Street," march, Morse.

Friday, June 24. "Father of Victory," march, Ganne; "Fingal's Cave," overture, Mendelssohn; "Mazurka of the Stars," from "Christmas Eve" (flute solo, Pasquale Amerena), Rimsky-Korsakov; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "Carnival" (first performance; conducted by the composer), Cella; "Prayer of Thanksgiving" (old Dutch hymn), Kremser; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Scherzo, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Strike up the Band," Gershwin.

Saturday, June 25. "Marche Militaire," Schubert; "Unfinished Symphony," first movement, Schubert; "Pathetic Symphony," No. 6, third movement, Tchaikovsky; Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "The Animals' Carnival," grand zoological fantasia, Saint-Saens; "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes," arranged for string orchestra by Alfred Pochon; prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; "Two Hearts in Three-Quarter Time," waltz, Stolz; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Word comes to Symphony Hall from Vienna that Dr. Koussevitzky's concert last Thursday in the music-festival there was notably successful. He led the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society through a program that assembled a Concerto of Emmanuel Bach; Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony"; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë"; Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony." A distinguished audience, many musicians included, heard the concert; applauded heartily; finally cheered the conductor.

Trans Jun 15

Music in The Land

Gershwin in F

ONLY four days away is the performance at The Pops next Sunday evening of George Gershwin's Concerto in F major for Piano and Orchestra—his one work of large dimensions as yet unheard in Boston. Program-notes are now in order. First the flowing words in which Walter Damrosch introduced the Concerto when it was played for the first time anywhere at a concert of the Symphony Society in New York on Dec. 3, 1925. They are quoted from the late H. O. Osgood's handbook, "So This Is Jazz" (Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1926):

> Various composers have been walking around jazz like a cat around a plate of hot soup, waiting for it to cool, so that they could enjoy it without burning their tongues, hitherto accustomed only to the more tepid liquid distilled by cooks of the classical school. Lady Jazz, adorned with her intriguing rhythms, has danced her way around the world, even as far as the Eskimos of the North and the Polynesians of the South-Sea Isles. But for all her travels and her sweeping popularity, she has encountered no knight who could lift her to a level that would enable her to be received as a respectable member of musical circles.
>
> George Gershwin seems to have accomplished this miracle. He has done it boldly by dressing this extremely independent and up-to-date young lady in the classic garb of a Concerto. Yet he has not detracted one whit from her fascinating personality. He is the prince who has taken Cinderella by the hand and openly proclaimed her a princess to the astonished world, no doubt to the fury of her envious sisters.

After a thorough analysis of the Concerto with illustrations from the score, Mr. Osgood proceeds: "Messrs. Damrosch and Gershwin played the piece three times in New York and a few more on trips of the orchestra to outside cities. To judge by the enthusiasm displayed, the audiences heartily enjoyed it. In the nature of things it could hardly expect the popular success of that startlingly projected novelty, the 'Rhapsody in Blue,' though from the musician's standpoint the Concerto is much better. . . . It more than carried out the promise of the Rhapsody in proving the adaptability of jazz elements to compositions in the larger forms. I know of no other American work that has such a large percentage of originality. One can point to one or two things, though in no sense plagiarisms, that recall Rakhmaninov's second Piano-Concerto. There is a Debussy-like descending chord-passage used two or three times in the second movement, but by far the greater part of it is Gershwin. He made the orchestration himself, for straight symphony orchestra, without saxophone or banjos. The omission of them seems rather a pity. As a whole the orchestration came off very well. . . ."

Last Sunday Pops Tomorrow Evening

Trav Jun 18

With the last Sunday concert of the season tomorrow night, the Pops enters upon the last two weeks of their 47th season. Arthur Fiedler will give the first Boston performances of two notable scores tomorrow night: Gershwin's pianoforte concerto in F, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the waltz from Richard Strauss's opera "Intermezzo."

Gershwin's concerto in three movements was written for and first performed by the New York Symphony society. The pianoforte part is probably the most brilliant this composer has written.

Richard Strauss's "Intermezzo," a "domestic comedy," was first performed in Dresden in 1924. The opera is in way lyrical vein, and is based upon an incident in the composer's life whereby a misunderstanding about a barmaid, whom he really had never met, threatened for a moment to disrupt his domestic happiness.

Tomorrow's program will also include Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Prelude and Love-Death to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1" and Tchaikovsky's Ouverture Solennelle, "1812."

Tonight's program will be as follows:

Aragonaise from "The Cid"	Massenet
Suite (for string orchestra)	Corelli
"Peer Gynt" suite	Grieg
"Lohengrin," introduction to Act III.	Wagner
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3	Beethoven
Sally In Our Alley...Arranged for string orchestra by Frank Bridge
"Girls of Baden," waltz	Komzak
"Of Thee I Sing," selection	Gershwin
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Only One Vienna, march	Schrammel

2

EIGHTH WEEK OF POPS

June 19

With the last Sunday concert of the 47th season tonight, the Pops enter on the final fortnight of summer programs. This evening's list includes the first Boston performances of two notable scores, Gershwin's Concerto in F, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the waltz from Richard Strauss's opera, "Intermezo." Gershwin's concerto, in three movements, was written for and first performed by the New York Symphony Society. Richard Strauss's "Intermezzo," a "domestic comedy," was first performed in Dresden in 1924. The opera is in gay and lyrical vein, and is based upon an incident in the composer's life whereby a misunderstanding about a barmaid whom he really had never met threatened for a moment to disrupt his domestic happiness.

The programs of the week follow:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 19

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
Waltz from the opera "Intermezzo" .... R. Strauss
(First performance in Boston)
"Pacific 2-3-1" .... Honegger
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra .... Gershwin
(First performance in Boston)
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tchaikovsky
Soloist, J. M. Sanroma

MONDAY EVENING

"Under the Double Eagle," march . J. Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Second Norwegian Dance .... Grieg
"Wine, Woman and Song," waltz ... Strauss
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" . Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"Of Thee I Sing," selection .... Gershwin
"Dubinushka," Russian folk song
Arranged by Jacchia
Triumphal March from "Aida" .... Verdi

TUESDAY EVENING

"On the Mall," march .... Goldman
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" .... Suppe
Variations on the Austrian national anthem, from the string quartet, Op. 76, No. 3* .... Haydn
Sixth Hungarian Dance .... Brahms
"Espana," rhapsody .... Chabrier
"In the Spring," for string orchestra . Grieg
Fourth Symphony, Finale .... Tchaikovsky
"The Fortune Teller," selection .... Herbert
Song of the Volga Bargemen
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
"Panaderos," Spanish dance .... Glazounov

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
"Danse Macabre," symphonic poem
Saint-Saens
"Hopak," from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" .... Moussorgsky
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" .. Rossini
Ballet Suite .... Rameau-Mottl
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .... Tchaikovsky
"The Band Wagon," selection .... Schwartz
"Jealousy," Gypsy tango .... Gade
"Lohengrin," introduction to act III. Wagner

THURSDAY EVENING

Coronation march from "The Prophet"
Meyerbeer
Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
"Liebesleid" .... Kreisler
"Samson and Delilah," Fantasia Saint-Saens
"Tilla," Caprice .... Nagel
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; harp, organ and strings)
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
"Roses from the South," waltz .... Strauss
"Song of India," from "Sadko"
Rimsky-Korsakov
"Up the Street," march .... Morse

FRIDAY EVENING

"Father of Victory," march .... Ganne
"Fingal's Cave," overture .... Mendelssohn
"Mazurka of the Stars," from "Christmas Eve" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Flute solo, Pasquale Amerena
Invitation to the Dance .... Weber-Berlioz
"Carnival" .... Cella
(First performance, conducted by the composer)
Prayer of Thanksgiving (old Dutch hymn) .... Kremser
"The Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner
Victor Herbert Favorites. Arranged by Sanford
"The Flight of the Bumble Bee," scherzo
Rimsky-Korsakov
"Strike Up the Band" .... Gershwin

SATURDAY EVENING

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
"Unfinished Symphony," first movement
Schubert
"Pathetic Symphony," No. 6, third movement .... Tchaikovsky
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" .... Berlioz
"The Animals' Carnival," grand zoological fantasia .... Saint-Saens
"Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes"
Arranged for string orchestra by Alfred Pochon berg" .... Wagner
"The Cat and the Fiddle," selection .... Kern
"Two Hearts in ¾ Time" waltz .... Stolz
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

---

Music

At the Pops

Two novelties were included in the program of the final Sunday concert of the Pops season, given in Symphony Hall last night: the Waltz from Richard Strauss's opera, "Intermezzo," and the Gershwin Piano Concerto in F. The other numbers were the Overture to Weber's "Oberon," the "Tristan" Prelude and "Love-Death," Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1," and the "1812" Overture.

The Strauss waltz is pleasing enough stuff, of course brilliantly orchestrated, but hardly so interesting even as the much-abused waltz of the "Rosenkavalier." Mr. Gershwin's Concerto, written for Mr. Damrosch and his New York Symphony in 1925, shows the composer ill at ease in symphonic society. At times his music is distantly reminiscent of the classic or romantic composers—there is an echo of the "Dresden Amen"—at other times there is a conscientious but self-conscious injection of the rhythm of the Charleston and of "blues" tunes. The piece falls between jazz and the classical concerto. The material is not salient, nor is the orchestration effective. We still prefer Mr. Gershwin in the theater. One "Wintergreen for President" is worth a dozen of these concert-hall experiments.

Mr. Sanromá played the piano part with fine abandon, and Mr. Fiedler gave proof that he had studied the score thoroughly. The orchestra did its part nobly; but as Young Michael remarked recently on hearing the "Rhapsody in Blue" from this orchestra, "It's very good, but of course the Boston Symphony ruins jazz, just as a jazz orchestra would ruin classical music." The piece had a rousing reception, with many recalls for Mr. Sanromá.

L. A. S.

Gershwin Concerto at Pops

adv Jun 19

With the last Sunday Pop concert of the season tonight, Arthur Fiedler will give the first Boston performances of two notable scores: Gershwin's Pianoforte Concerto in F, with Sanroma as soloist, and the Waltz from Richard Strauss' Opera "Intermezzo."

Gershwin's Concerto in three movements was written for and first performed by the New York Symphony Society. The pianoforte part is probably the most brilliant this composer has written.

Richard Strauss' "Intermezzo," a "domestic comedy," was first performed in Dresden in 1924. The opera is in a gay and lyrical vein, and is based upon an incident in the composer's life whereby a misunderstanding about a barmaid whom he really never met threatened for a moment to disrupt his domestic happiness.

Programs follow:

SUNDAY

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
Waltz from the opera "Intermezzo," R. Strauss
(First performance in Boston).
"Pacific 2-3-1" .... Honegger
Concerto in F, for Pianoforte and Orchestra .... Gershwin
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky
Soloist: J. M. Sanroma.

JESUS MARIA SANROMA
Soloist in George Gershwin's Concerto in F, at the Pops this evening.

Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
"Liebesleid" .... Saint-Saens
"Tilla," Caprice .... Nagel
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; harp, organ and strings).
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
"Roses from the South," Waltz, Strauss
"Song of India," from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov
"Up the Street," March .... Morse

June 20

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "POPS"

[From the Chicago Post]

The radio last week served to demonstrate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra "Pops" are still flourishing in full vigor. Not only concerts delightful in themselves, but recalling to countless numbers scattered over the entire land the joys and days gone by.

For more than forty years these "Pops" have been an essential feature of summer life in Boston. And what national cataclysms have they not survived?

When the U. S. A. went on the water wagon the wise ones shook their mournful heads, saying, "It is all over with the 'Pops.' Cannot run such concerts without beer and pretzels."

Nobody would dispute that beer and pretzels form a joyful addition to the pleasures of summer concerts. But nevertheless Boston continued to make the grade though serving only soft drinks.

Even this present so-called depression has not overwhelmed them in its universal disaster. Over forty years of age—and still going strong despite no beer and no money.

Can be done in effete and tottering East, but seemingly not in the young and lusty West. Now, Watson, what would you make of that?

Boston One of Nation's Gay Cities

New York Paper Is Envious of "Swell Times" Hereabouts

June 19 Post

New York looks with a gentle envy at Boston and takes a few good natured pokes at our ancient city, the while. Father Knickerbocker calls Boston "the most assured, sufficient and amiable" community in the land and advises his sons to emulate Boston's inhibition shelving. An editorial writer in the New York Herald-Tribune slyly gives Boston mock credit for her gayety thus:

Only in Boston

Only in Boston, a community which astute observers of the human comedy recognize as being one of the most assured, sufficient and amiable in the land, would the patrons of "pop concerts," in compliance with a casual programme suggestion, turn out to a man or woman in the gay rigs of the '90s. "Pops," if you don't know about them, are a series of post-season symphonies, with not too severely classical programmes that every year are held in the chaste purlieus of Symphony Hall, which, for the occasion, is metamorphosed into a sort of ancient beer garden, with tables in place of orchestra stalls and light refreshment service and smoking. Some of the bright young men from Harvard occasionally fortify their light refreshments, the overture to "William Tell" and "Marche Slave" are invariably on the programme, everyone knows all the musicians personally and a perfectly swell time is had by all concerned. Last week a series of gay '90s programmes brought out entire audiences in side-whiskers, leg-o'-mutton sleeves, huge hats and button boots.

Boston Is "That Way"

Boston is very much that way. Contrary to a widespread tradition, it is a gay town. This week at the races at the Country Club Sam Shaw will make his inevitable appearance with the smartest of coaches and four, Nason Hamlin will don his racing tailcoat and gray top hat and everyone who is anyone will be there in rat-catcher suits to see and be seen. No town which can boast of such an institution as the St. Botolph Club, with its Sunday evening supper group, The Bund, could be anything but a gay town in a pleasingly Edwardian way. Manhattan, with all its formal discretion of conduct and metropolitan self-consciousness, could take a lesson in inhibition-shelving from Boston.—Herald-Tribune.

NEW PIECES AT POP CONCERT

Strauss Waltz and Gershwin Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two pieces had their first Boston performance at the Pop concert of last evening, each of them important because of its authorship rather than for its instrinsic quality. The one was a waltz, a scene in a Bavarian village tavern from Strauss' automiographical opera of marital misunderstandings, "Intermezzo," produced in 1924 but as yet unknown to American audiences. The other was the concerto in F major that George Gershwin wrote on commission for Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra soon after the much more famous "Rhapsody in Blue" had brought him into notice as the first composer of musical comedies and of jazz to evince symphonic aspirations.

The music of Strauss, more in place in the opera than out of it, is facile, agreeable music scored for orchestra with extreme felicity. For this operatic comedy Strauss employs a band of less than 50, and the instrumental texture is a delight from first to last.

When Mr. Gershwin's concerto was first performed he himself was the pianist, and he once played the last and most effective of the three movements in Symphony Hall, with William Daly supplying an arrangement of the orchestral part on a second piano. The pianist last evening was Mr. Sanroma, who discharged his task with the utmost dexterity and aplomb, winning at the end round after round of applause.

So exacting a form as the piano concerto lay quite outside Mr. Gershwin's powers at the time when this piece was written. Formally the music is weak, even amateurish. There is little symphonic feeling in the orchestral portion, which is all too often noisy and blatant, and the piano is treated on the whole awkwardly and more as an instrument of percussion than of song or of suave sonority. Thematically Mr. Gershwin tries here and there to write in the severer style of the concert hall, but for the rest he relapses into the idiom that was native to him; and this oscillation between the two antipodal musical manners is disconcerting. The "Rhapsody in Blue was both a more genuine and a more successful effort. It should be added that Mr. Fiedler conducted the performance as though he believed in the music and the orchestra seconded him ably.

MUSIC

Globe June 20

SYMPHONY HALL

Final Sunday "Pop" Concert

George Gershwin's piano concerto in F, receiving its first performance in Boston, was the focal point of interest at the final Sunday "Pop" concert of the season last evening. There was another item, the waltz from Richard Strauss' opera, "Intermezzo," also marked "First time in Boston," but Gershwin's music apparently eclipsed it in the popular mind. Jesus Maria Sanroma was soloist in the concerto.

Gershwin's piece was composed upon commission of the New York Symphony Society and was first played by that orchestra in 1925. It followed the "Rhapsody in Blue," which had served to place the composer, in the esteem of forward-looking musicians and the general public, as one of the most original and audacious composers of lighter music of the time. That opinion has since proved wholly justified.

The concerto, as a whole, does not equal the "Rhapsody" in the saliency of material or in freedom and individuality of style. There is definite impression that the composer here set himself to write within the bounds of a time-honored musical form, the limits of which lessened his gusto and cramped his style.

There are reminiscences, to be sure, of the "Rhapsody," but in many pages of the concerto, abandon, wild rhythms and sheer fantasy have given way to attempts at scholarly, academic writing. This is especially true of much of the piano part, which, however, is exceedingly brilliant and no doubt exceedingly difficult.

The concerto is more cool, more flippant than the "Rhapsody" and much more subtle. Of the three movements, the two allegros are by all odds the best in every respect. The long, monotonous, slow movement—andante con moto—seems to be only a show of respect for the concerto form, and, to one listener, entirely unexpressive of George Gershwin's unique musical mind.

Mr Sanroma's playing, a marvel of physical dexterity, once more gave evidence that he is one of the best players of modern music likely to be heard anywhere today. Mr Fiedler's energetic conducting drew from the orchestra players the peculiar rhythmic emphasis which is the foundation of all jazz music.

Stamping of feet as well as handclapping brought conductor and soloist back to the stage several times.

According to the canons of sound criticism, no work should be accorded a figurative "thumbs up" or "thumbs down" after but one hearing. Therefore, emphatic opinion on Strauss' Waltz is deferred. The piece can be described, however, as modern in character, with appropriately acid harmonies embellishing a theme which impressed most of its total lack of distinction. It is intricate, fussy music, without any trace of sensuousness. In substance and in treatment, the Waltz is a type of music with which Ravel, for instance probably could do much more than has been done by the composer.

In the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Mr Fiedler did some of the most precise and sensitive conducting one has ever heard from him. The Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" lacked dramatic fire, due, probably to the extremely slow tempo at which they were played. An inadvertence on the part of a woodwind somewhat marred the close of the Prelude. Remaining numbers were Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

Esplanade Concerts Are Now Assured

Season Will Begin July 7 and Run Through Aug. 3 — Funds Still Needed, However

Jun 23

Arthur Fiedler announces that there will be a four-weeks' season of Esplanade Concerts, from July 7 to Aug. 3, inclusive. The orchestra leader, however, has found it difficult this year to raise all the funds through personal contacts and he appeals to all music-lovers to assist him in this important undertaking. The amount needed is approximately $12,000 and an Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund has been established at the Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, where contributions may be sent.

Last year the concerts were underwritten by five prominent men in Boston, and through the help of Mr. Fiedler's personal contacts and the assistance of the newspapers, the funds were secured. As this is a particularly difficult time to raise money, Mr. Fiedler urges each person who attended the Esplanade Concerts last year to send in at least a dollar and as the audiences last season totalled between twenty and thirty thousand, it can be seen how quickly the necessary amount could be secured in this manner. Mr. Fiedler feels sure, moreover, that if the necessary amount is obtained this year, the concerts will probably be assured for years to come.

2

EIGHTH WEEK OF POPS

With the last Sunday concert of the 47th season tonight, the Pops enter on the final fortnight of summer programs. This evening's list includes the first Boston performances of two notable scores, Gershwin's Concerto in F, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the waltz from Richard Strauss's opera, "Intermezo." Gershwin's concerto, in three movements, was written for and first performed by the New York Symphony Society. Richard Strauss's "Intermezzo," a "domestic comedy," was first performed in Dresden in 1924. The opera is in gay and lyrical vein, and is based upon an incident in the composer's life whereby a misunderstanding about a barmaid whom he really had never met threatened for a moment to disrupt his domestic happiness.

The programs of the week follow:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 19

Overture to "Oberon"..............Weber
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde" ....Wagner
Waltz from the opera "Intermezzo" R. Strauss
(First performance in Boston)
"Pacific 2-3-1" ....Honegger
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra ....Gershwin
(First performance in Boston)
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ..Tchaikovsky
Soloist, J. M. Sanroma

MONDAY EVENING

"Under the Double Eagle," march.J. Wagner
Overture to "Mignon"..............Thomas
Second Norwegian Dance ....Grieg
"Wine, Woman and Song," waltz....Strauss
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin".Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin"..............Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
"Of Thee I Sing," selection.......Gershwin
"Dubinushka," Russian folk song Arranged by Jacchia
Triumphal March from "Aida". ......Verdi

TUESDAY EVENING

"On the Mall," march..............Goldman
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"......Suppe
Variations on the Austrian national anthem, from the string quartet, Op. 76, No. 3*..............Haydn
Sixth Hungarian Dance ....Brahms
"Espana," rhapsody ....Chabrier
"In the Spring," for string orchestra...Grieg
Fourth Symphony, Finale.......Tchaikovsky
"The Fortune Teller," selection......Herbert
Song of the Volga Bargemen Arranged by Agide Jacchia
"Panaderos," Spanish dance......Glazounov

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Pomp and Circumstance"..............Elgar
"Danse Macabre," symphonic poem Saint-Saens
"Hopak," from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" ....Moussorgsky
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"..Rossini
Ballet Suite ....Rameau-Mottl
Valse Triste..............Sibelius

UNE 21, at 2 P. M. ing 4 days

rtant sale we have ever held.
ur collection at our Boston to our studios at 58 Charles pose of this stock for immedi-n purchases.

Telephone KEN more 2281

Monday, June 20

Monday on

Gershwin Concerto at Pops

adv Jn 19

With the last Sunday Pop concert of the season tonight, Arthur Fiedler will give the first Boston performances of two notable scores: Gershwin's Pianoforte Concerto in F, with Sanroma as soloist, and the Waltz from Richard Strauss' Opera "Intermezzo."

Gershwin's Concerto in three movements was written for and first performed by the New York Symphony Society. The pianoforte part is probably the most brilliant this composer has written.

Richard Strauss' "Intermezzo," a "domestic comedy," was first performed in Dresden in 1924. The opera is in a gay and lyrical vein, and is based upon an incident in the composer's life whereby a misunderstanding about a barmaid whom he really never met threatened for a moment to disrupt his domestic happiness.

Programs follow:

SUNDAY

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
Prelude and Love-Death, "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner
Waltz from the opera "Intermezzo," R. Strauss
(First performance in Boston).
"Pacific 2-3-1" ....Honegger
Concerto in F, for Pianoforte and Orchestra ....Gershwin
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky
Soloist: J. M. Sanroma.

MONDAY

"Under the Double Eagle," March, J. Wagner
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Second Norwegian Dance .... Grieg
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltz, Strauss
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ...... Wagner
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ......Liszt
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection ...Gershwin
"Dubinushka," Russian Folk Song, Arranged by Jacchia
Triumphal March from "Aida" ..Verdi

TUESDAY

"On the Mall," March .... Goldman
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" ..Suppe
Variations on the Austrian National Anthem, from the String Quartet, Op. 76, No. 3 .... Haydn
Sixth Hungarian Dance .... Brahms
"Espana," Rhapsody .... Chabrier
"In the Spring," for String Orchestra .... Grieg
Fourth Symphony, Finale ..Tchaikovsky
"The Fortune Teller," Selection, Herbert
Song of the Volga Bargemen, Arranged by Agide Jacchia
"Panaderos," Spanish Dance ..Glazounov

WEDNESDAY

"Pomp and Circumstance" ...... Elgar
"Danse Macabre," Symphonic Poem, Saint-Saens
"Hopak," from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" .... Moussorgsky
Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini
Ballet Suite .... Rameau-Mottl
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Ouverture Solennelle "1812," Tchaikovsky
"The Band Wagon," Selection, Schwartz
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango .... Gade
"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, Wagner

THURSDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" ....Meyerbeer
Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
"Liebesleid" .... Saint-Saens
"Tilla," Caprice ....Nagel
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Solo violin, J. Theodorowicz; harp, organ and strings).
Overture to "Rienzi" .... Wagner
"Roses from the South," Waltz, Strauss
"Song of India," from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov
"Up the Street," March .... Morse

Music

At the Pops

Two novelties were included in the program of the final Sunday concert of the Pops season, given in Symphony Hall last night: the Waltz from Richard Strauss's opera, "Intermezzo," and the Gershwin Piano Concerto in F. The other numbers were the Overture to Weber's "Oberon," the "Tristan" Prelude and "Love-Death," Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1," and the "1812" Overture.

The Strauss waltz is pleasing enough stuff, of course brilliantly orchestrated, but hardly so interesting even as the much-abused waltz of the "Rosenkavalier." Mr. Gershwin's Concerto, written for Mr. Damrosch and his New York Symphony in 1925, shows the composer ill at ease in symphonic society. At times his music is distantly reminiscent of the classic or romantic composers—there is an echo of the "Dresden Amen"—at other times there is a conscientious but self-conscious injection of the rhythm of the Charleston and of "blues" tunes. The piece falls between jazz and the classical concerto. The material is not salient, nor is the orchestration effective. We still prefer Mr. Gershwin in the theater. One "Wintergreen for President" is worth a dozen of these concert-hall experiments.

Mr. Sanromá played the piano part with fine abandon, and Mr. Fiedler gave proof that he had studied the score thoroughly. The orchestra did its part nobly; but as Young Michael remarked recently on hearing the "Rhapsody in Blue" from this orchestra, "It's very good, but of course the Boston Symphony ruins jazz, just as a jazz orchestra would ruin classical music." The piece had a rousing reception, with many recalls for Mr. Sanromá.

L. A. S.

Trans. June 20

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "POPS"

[From the Chicago Post]

The radio last week served to demonstrate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra "Pops" are still flourishing in full vigor. Not only concerts delightful in themselves, but recalling to countless numbers scattered over the entire land the joys and days gone by.

For more than forty years these "Pops" have been an essential feature of summer life in Boston. And what national cataclysms have they not survived?

When the U. S. A. went on the water wagon the wise ones shook their mournful heads, saying, "It is all over with the 'Pops.' Cannot run such concerts without beer and pretzels."

Nobody would dispute that beer and pretzels form a joyful addition to the pleasures of summer concerts. But nevertheless Boston continued to make the grade though serving only soft drinks.

Even this present so-called depression has not overwhelmed them in its universal disaster. Over forty years of age—and still going strong despite no beer and no money.

Can be done in effete and tottering East, but seemingly not in the young and lusty West. Now, Watson, what would you make of that?

Boston One of Nation's Gay Cities

New York Paper Is Envious of "Swell Times" Hereabouts

June 19 Post

New York looks with a gentle envy at Boston and takes a few good natured pokes at our ancient city, the while. Father Knickerbocker calls Boston "the most assured, sufficient and amiable" community in the land and advises his sons to emulate Boston's inhibition shelving. An editorial writer in the New York Herald-Tribune slyly gives Boston mock credit for her gayety thus:

Only in Boston

Only in Boston, a community which astute observers of the human comedy recognize as being one of the most assured, sufficient and amiable in the land, would the patrons of "pop concerts," in compliance with a casual programme suggestion, turn out to a man or woman in the gay rigs of the '90s. "Pops," if you don't know about them, are a series of post-season symphonies, with not too severely classical programmes that every year are held in the chaste purlieus of Symphony Hall, which, for the occasion, is metamorphosed into a sort of ancient beer garden, with tables in place of orchestra stalls and light refreshment service and smoking. Some of the bright young men from Harvard occasionally fortify their light refreshments, the overture to "William Tell" and "Marche Slave" are invariably on the programme, everyone knows all the musicians personally and a perfectly swell time is had by all concerned. Last week a series of gay '90s programmes brought out entire audiences in side-whiskers, leg-o'-mutton sleeves, huge hats and button boots.

Boston Is "That Way"

Boston is very much that way. Contrary to a widespread tradition, it is a gay town. This week at the races at the Country Club Sam Shaw will make his inevitable appearance with the smartest of coaches and four, Nason Hamlin will don his racing tailcoat and gray top hat and everyone who is anyone will be there in rat-catcher suits to see and be seen. No town which can boast of such an institution as the St. Botolph Club, with its Sunday evening supper group, The Bund, could be anything but a gay town in a pleasingly Edwardian way. Manhattan, with all its formal discretion of conduct and metropolitan self-consciousness, could take a lesson in inhibition-shelving from Boston.—Herald-Tribune.

NEW PIECES AT POP CONCERT

Strauss Waltz and Gershwin Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two pieces had their first Boston performance at the Pop concert of last evening, each of them important because of its authorship rather than for its instrinsic quality. The one was a waltz, a scene in a Bavarian village tavern from Strauss' automiographical opera of marital misunderstandings, "Intermezzo," produced in 1924 but as yet unknown to American audiences. The other was the concerto in F major that George Gershwin wrote on commission for Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra soon after the much more famous "Rhapsody in Blue" had brought him into notice as the first composer of musical comedies and of jazz to evince symphonic aspirations.

The music of Strauss, more in place in the opera than out of it, is facile, agreeable music scored for orchestra with extreme felicity. For this operatic comedy Strauss employs a band of less than 50, and the instrumental texture is a delight from first to last.

When Mr. Gershwin's concerto was first performed he himself was the pianist, and he once played the last and most effective of the three movements in Symphony Hall, with William Daly supplying an arrangement of the orchestral part on a second piano. The pianist last evening was Mr. Sanroma, who discharged his task with the utmost dexterity and aplomb, winning at the end round after round of applause.

So exacting a form as the piano concerto lay quite outside Mr. Gershwin's powers at the time when this piece was written. Formally the music is weak, even amateurish. There is little symphonic feeling in the orchestral portion, which is all too often noisy and blatant, and the piano is treated on the whole awkwardly and more as an instrument of percussion than of song or of suave sonority. Thematically Mr. Gershwin tries here and there to write in the severer style of the concert hall, but for the rest he relapses into the idiom that was native to him; and this oscillation between the two antipodal musical manners is disconcerting. The "Rhapsody in Blue was both a more genuine and a more successful effort. It should be added that Mr. Fiedler conducted the performance as though he believed in the music and the orchestra seconded him ably.

Globe MUSIC June 20

SYMPHONY HALL

Final Sunday "Pop" Concert

George Gershwin's piano concerto in F, receiving its first performance in Boston, was the focal point of interest at the final Sunday "Pop" concert of the season last evening. There was another item, the waltz from Richard Strauss' opera, "Intermezzo," also marked "First time in Boston," but Gershwin's music apparently eclipsed it in the popular mind. Jesus Maria Sanroma was soloist in the concerto.

Gershwin's piece was composed upon commission of the New York Symphony Society and was first played by that orchestra in 1925. It followed the "Rhapsody in Blue," which had served to place the composer, in the esteem of forward-looking musicians and the general public, as one of the most original and audacious composers of lighter music of the time. That opinion has since proved wholly justified.

The concerto, as a whole, does not equal the "Rhapsody" in the saliency of material or in freedom and individuality of style. There is definite impression that the composer here set himself to write within the bounds of a time-honored musical form, the limits of which lessened his gusto and cramped his style.

There are reminiscences, to be sure, of the "Rhapsody," but in many pages of the concerto, abandon, wild rhythms and sheer fantasy have given way to attempts at scholarly, academic writing. This is especially true of much of the piano part, which, however, is exceedingly brilliant and no doubt exceedingly difficult.

The concerto is more cool, more flippant than the "Rhapsody" and much more subtle. Of the three movements, the two allegros are by all odds the best in every respect. The long, monotonous, slow movement—andante con moto—seems to be only a show of respect for the concerto form, and, to one listener, entirely unexpressive of George Gershwin's unique musical mind.

Mr Sanroma's playing, a marvel of physical dexterity, once more gave evidence that he is one of the best players of modern music likely to be heard anywhere today. Mr Fiedler's energetic conducting drew from the orchestra players the peculiar rhythmic emphasis which is the foundation of all jazz music.

Stamping of feet as well as handclapping brought conductor and soloist back to the stage several times.

According to the canons of sound criticism, no work should be accorded a figurative "thumbs up" or "thumbs down" after but one hearing. Therefore, emphatic opinion on Strauss' Waltz is deferred. The piece can be described, however, as modern in character, with appropriately acid harmonies embellishing a theme which impressed most of its total lack of distinction. It is intricate, fussy music, without any trace of sensuousness. In substance and in treatment, the Waltz is a type of music with which Ravel, for instance probably could do much more than has been done by the composer.

In the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Mr Fiedler did some of the most precise and sensitive conducting one has ever heard from him. The Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" lacked dramatic fire, due, probably to the extremely slow tempo at which they were played. An inadvertence on the part of a woodwind somewhat marred the close of the Prelude. Remaining numbers were Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

Esplanade Concerts Are Now Assured

Season Will Begin July 7 and Run Through Aug. 3 — Funds Still Needed, However

Jn 23 Tran

Arthur Fiedler announces that there will be a four-weeks' season of Esplanade Concerts, from July 7 to Aug. 3, inclusive. The orchestra leader, however, has found it difficult this year to raise all the funds through personal contacts and he appeals to all music-lovers to assist him in this important undertaking. The amount needed is approximately $12,000 and an Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund has been established at the Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, where contributions may be sent.

Last year the concerts were underwritten by five prominent men in Boston, and through the help of Mr. Fiedler's personal contacts and the assistance of the newspapers, the funds were secured. As this is a particularly difficult time to raise money, Mr. Fiedler urges each person who attended the Esplanade Concerts last year to send in at least a dollar and as the audiences last season totalled between twenty and thirty thousand, it can be seen how quickly the necessary amount could be secured in this manner. Mr. Fiedler feels sure, moreover, that if the necessary amount is obtained this year, the concerts will probably be assured for years to come.

The Concerto Of Gershwin At The Pops

Six Years Late Bostonians Hear a Notable Music, Honegger as Well

Trans June 30

LAST winter Dr. Koussevitzky passioned himself for Mr. Gershwin's Second Rhapsody. With more or less éclat it was produced at the Symphony Concerts; played to three audiences in Boston and two in New York. Six years ago last December when Mr. Gershwin's Piano-Concerto was heard for the first times in Manhattan, he, like his fellow-guardians of Euterpe's temples, looked the other way. What Mr. Damrosch had commissioned from Mr. Gershwin, they might play where and when they liked. "The rest was silence." Yet last evening when the Concerto in F major finally emerged at Symphony Hall from Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Sanromá, it proved more interesting in itself, more deserving in pervasive quality, more Gershwin-like at nearly every turn, than the reclaimed Second Rhapsody. It assembled, besides, an audience that nearly filled the house; listened eagerly; recalled pianist, conductor and both together with unflagging ardor.

The performance, moreover, admirably disclosed the new piece. Thanks to both Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Fiedler, the Symphony Orchestra plays music more or less impregnated with jazz in better understanding, livelier accent and keener spirit than either Mr. Stokowski's Philadelphians or Mr. Stock's Chicagoans. Once more the contingent for the Pop Concerts was on its mettle, as it has been evening after evening through the current series. With his flair for the music of his own time, the conductor was quick to feel and impose the composer's phrasing and accents. In turn, Mr. Sanromá played the piano-part undaunted by the Gershwinian exactions, renewing the Gershwinian verve and brilliance. For Mr. Gershwin hears in imagination his solo-parts as though he himself were playing them. What with Gershwin's Concerto after Ravel's and with Weber's "Concert-Piece" between, the pianist has reason for the summer holiday he will soon begin.

Not that the new-old Concerto escapes audible shortcomings. For the first and, thus far, the only time in his career, Mr. Gershwin is confining himself within a classic form that he had obviously to explore before he undertook to fill it. At moments he is doing nothing else, with appreciable effort and not too appreciable result. Yet, by and large, he achieves the sort of concerto to be expected in these times—sufficiently orthodox to warrant the name, sufficiently freehanded to bear witness to the date, 1925, and to individual temperament. If the purists listen in vain for sonata-like progress through the first movement, they may console their ears with the original invention and the skillful treatment of the slow division; with a finale built opulently upon themes already sounded. Only one, moreover—the songful theme of the first allegro—is commonplace and cheap in melodic and harmonic suggestion.

For the first time, likewise, Mr. Gershwin is scoring for a full symphony orchestra unalloyed with the clarinets, the saxophones or the banjos of jazz-usage. He does the job to the purpose, though with tentative moments when he would deploy the strings; with other moments of wilful forbearance from jazz-effects when a Ravel, with no past to live down, would unhesitatingly use them. If the hearer likes, he may complain of the "grandioso" section that is climax to the first allegro, to the sound and fury around and above the final chord in F major. Such rhetoric is ancient and honorable component of piano-concertos. Two generations before Mr. Gershwin Liszt set it a-swirling across the market-places of music. Yet in degree it was hardly unknown to the finales of Ludwig van Beethoven and Johannes Brahms.

On the other side of the ledger there are distinctive merits in the Concerto in F, excelling any discoverable in the Second Rhapsody . . . The introductory measures with thumped kettle-drums may be noisy; but they seize the ear. The Charleston rhythm keeps in vigorous motion the recurring commonplaces of the first Allegro. They are interspersed, moreover, with measures that are symphonic music infused with jazz, unmistakably akin to those accounted high merit in Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" or Mr. Lambert's "The Rio Grande." . . . The germinating motiv of the slow movement, the melody that it generates, the harmonic background, the instrumental coloring, are symphonic "blues" well and truly invented and conducted; the succeeding measures upspring from them; for rhetoric or imagination, the final leap from A minor to D-flat hits the ear hard. . . The reiterated rhythms of the finale belong to the age of Stravinsky without direct imitation; while the last trills of the whole orchestra are vivid companion-piece to the drum-beats of the beginning.

Mr. Gershwin's Second Rhapsody is an inhibited music, worked over and over for technical prowess, dry-polished until every meager measure shines through; whereas on many a page of the Concerto he regains the outflinging ardors of the "Rhapsody in Blue." Nowhere in his music for the concert-hall has he written with such individual, sustained and penetrating invention as in the "Blues" that are slow movement. To hear the Second Rhapsody was to invite Mr. Gershwin back to his musical plays and his Americans in Paris. To listen to the slow movement and the finale of the Concerto is to bid him continue his symphonic progress.

Mr. Fiedler further diversified the program with a waltz from Richard Strauss's conjugal opera, "Intermezzo," hitherto unheard in Boston; with a repetition of Honegger's "locomotive piece," less often played nowadays than when it was new, strange and debatable. The waltz, from a tavern-scéne, suggests the setting. It is less sensuous than the waltzes that haunt Baron Ochs in "Der Rosencavalier"; more rough-surfaced than the waltzes for court-balls from the other branch of the Straussian house. It may even hint that no Münchener, though he be Richard himself, may quite catch the Viennese accent and swing. But the old hand is laying on the instrumental color. The trumpets sound the tavern and the folk. Not a note from the wood-winds but tells.

As for "Pacific 2-3-1" it were a late day to wrangle over the descriptive ingenuities; the cumulating rhythm; the song of speed and steel and steam through which it vibrates. The machine-age transfused into tones, with not only resource but imagination. A journalistic music, it is easy to say, for a passing day and fashion—"the machine-in-art." Yet the youngsters of The Pops listen with a thrill in their eyes and care not two pins for dissonances or atonalities along the way. To such music as "Pacific 2-3-1" they listen instinctively as they might, were it ever played, to Honegger's sonorities of sport and stadiums in "Rugby"? And they, as middle age and old age will almost never remember, are the generation that is alive.

H. T. P.

Music in The Land

"Rebus" for Symphony Hall

ACCORDING to the New York Times, conductors of American orchestras, seeking in Paris the music of the risen Markevitch, have parted the spoils as follows: to Dr. Koussevitzky for Boston, the Symphonic Suite, "Rebus," the young composer's largest and ripest work, suggested by an imaginary ballet; to Mr. Stokowski for Philadelphia, the Partita for Piano and Chamber Orchestra, lately produced, but an earlier piece than "Rebus"; to Mr. Rodzinski for Los Angeles, the Concerto Grosso for Orchestra. After the first performance of "Rebus," last December in Paris, Monsieur H. Prunières described the piece, also for The Times:

"The Suite is composed of six parts joined together; Prelude; Dance; Gigue; Variations; Fugue; Parade. All these movements are rapid in tempo. There is no andante by way of contrast; but the composer has avoided monotony not only by varying the rhythms but also by giving each division a different character and color. The Prelude, a masterly music, charms with play of novel timbres. The horns give themselves up to buffoonery, while the happy woodwinds play around like a troop of schoolboys let out into the fields, each one amusing himself and still amusing the group. The vivacious and witty Gigue leads to the Variations in a more moderate tempo and of a notable originality. Long melodic phrases unfold themselves as in Musorgsky; while above them swarms an agitated mass of rhythmic motivs curiously interlaced in a subtle counterpoint. It is extraordinary to see the young composer remain master of this gushing fountain of ideas and rhythms, pursuing each other and renewing themselves indefatigably in an immense crescendo.

"The fugue is brilliant and sensational. There is nothing austere or pedantic about it. Dominated by an invincible energy, it proceeds at a rapid pace, with play of highly complex counterpoint. Rhythms pile on top of each other; sound against each other; but the principal melodic line never ceases to dominate this confusion. Nor does the fugue deviate from its headlong path toward its amazing conclusion. Musically and logically 'Rebus' should end here; but Markevitch clinging to the scenario of the ballet, follows the fugue with a Parade. One single phrase repeated to a rapid and syncopated rhythm goes on for ten minutes with immense energy. First the strings, then the wind, and finally the brass enter and assist in a crescendo achieved with a master hand, but which musically seems inferior to what has gone before."

Organists' Concert

Mr. Gershwin's Piano-Concerto fared so well at The Pops last evening that it will be repeated on Thursday evening June 30. . . . "That" Request Program for its unsated audience will also be repeated on Monday, June 27.

BOSTON'S FUNNY "GAY NINETIES" CRAZE

Girls Who Have Tried Them Say the Fashions Were a Nuisance—Men Condemn Whiskers, But Wouldn't Mind Return to Gay Waistcoats

Globe June 5

"SEEMS LIKE RUNNING IN A SACK RACE"

"PULL HARDER. OOF!"
Didn't girls use to believe in breathing?

"Oof! I'd give a dollar—and—and a quarter—if I had it—oof—to be able to—oof—really breathe for five minutes!"

The remark was gasped on the installment plan by a young feminine voice overheard in an uptown Boston restaurant on a recent evening.

"Eleanor, my deah, remember your manners!" another young woman's voice retorted with a shocked inflection.

"Yes, indeedy, don't you know it's unladylike to breathe?" rose a third soprano.

The reporter traced the voices. The gasping one came from a young woman whose apparent Junoesque stature was emphasized by the wooden erectness with which she sat at her table.

Those Whiskers

Atop her towering head was a small hat, somehow suggesting a bird's nest, decked with a handful of daisies or something of the sort, with one of them rising ambitiously about six inches above the rest. It nodded importantly, with jolly effect, at every slightest conversational move of the head of the wearer.

Her breathlessness was obviously due to a waspwaisted gown. Her severely erect posture was explained by a jacket which pinioned her shoulders. Four young women in waspwaisted attire and hats of rare vintage sat at the table. The quartet were in the company of two bewhiskered men.

There was one set of whiskers of the bicycle handlebar type. Another reduced the countenance of the bearer to something akin to the two-eyes-in-a-thicket appearance of a schnauzer pintscher pup.

In the shadow of the whiskerage displays were two lofty stiff collars —a "wing" and a "choker"—and ties with knots as large as tennis balls, cut from material of resplendent pattern. The coat lapels were cut so high as to seem about to join the linen collars in a conspiracy to choke the wearers.

A glance at the vests raised the question as to whether the gentlemen had each arrived in the right vest but the wrong suit, or the wrong vest but the right suit.

Gasped It Was Good Fun

This strange dinner party was but one betokening the fact that men and women, young and old, by the hundreds, were seized of late throughout Greater Boston by an overmastering desire to resume the funny fashions and not very high-tensioned life of the so-called Gay Nineties.

Without expectations of any such frenzied result, the announcement of a Pops program including music of the Nineties had been issued with the remark that patrons could attend in appropriate costume if they desired. No one seems to have any idea why such a motion should appeal to the public as it did.

But the fact remains that in a short time following the announcement no seats were to be had at Symphony Hall. Such a crowd—arriving both to see and be seen—had to be turned away, that the affair was repeated. This time all seats were snapped up even quicker than before. And again a huge crowd was turned away disappointed.

Now why, and why, and again why?

Well, the gasping girl who would have given $1.25 (if she'd had it) for five minutes of real breathing, declared that it was "darn good fun." One of her companions, who discovered that her authentic Gay Nineties gown, cape, petticoats and things weighed eight pounds—this girl declared it was "gra-and"! And there you are.

Over an Hour to Dress

One man who had assumed whiskers guessed that the thing appealed "on account of the depression." He went on to explain that when you tried to look forward nowadays, you didn't have much idea where you were going. But when you looked back to the '90s, you did have something definite, on account of family traditions and the books and magazines in the attic—in cases where people have an attic today. And when you thought it over, he wound up, it seemed "restful to duck out of these high blood-pressure times and just stroll along living life like a slow movie."

"Why, you old Question Mark, it's been an education!" squealed one girl. "Before now it was only a rumor to me that I live in times that have made progress. Now I know.

"It took me an hour and eight minutes of quick work to frizz my hair and get into these duds. Dozens and dozens of buttons and teeny hooks and eyes, a good many of them hidden away in the quaintest places. Kept me guessing.

"The time I wasted, too, struggling into these high-necked shoes—fishing for any number of buttons with a button hook, and then having to wrestle with them! Imagine me—a business girl—having to put up with that today, especially when I commute and have to catch a 7 o'clock bus."

"And my dear, these skirts!" a protest rose from the opposite side of the table. "After parking my car, I had to walk about 10 blocks. Parking would be like that at such a time. Well, from the way all these yards of heavy goods in this long skirt, added to my long, stiff petticoat, and the way the wind pushed against it all, as if I were standing behind a sail—why, I was as tired as if I'd walked five miles when I got to the hall. It's an informal dress, too."

They Have Learned a Lot

"They used to wear practically as much skirt to play tennis, mind you!" the tall girl cut in. "A picture I saw in an old book proves that. My friend and I got out our rackets and tried to play tennis in these skirts. We wanted to get an idea of what the old-time girls felt like when they thought they were acting athletic and whizzing around. It was a howl. Dashing in to a rally was like doing a sack race."

"Another thing about these trailing skirts," the girl with the brown eyes put in. "Although I've been trying to keep mine hitched up with my hands, I shudder to think how many billions of microbes it must have dragged into anyhow, as I walked around. And according to a photo of a street scene I found in a Boston Guide Book of the Nineties, the women just didn't seem to mind galumphing along and letting their skirts sweep the sidewalks and streets. Whew—no wonder the girls were inclined to be weak in those days!"

"We learned a lot," she of the boyish bob contributed, "when a bunch of us began trying on a collection of clothes saved from the Nineties by our families and neighbors. Well, those we thought were small girls were too broad-shouldered and too large-waisted for the old-time dresses for big girls. In fact, all of us were too broad-shouldered. Muscles, my boy, perhaps? The tall ones among us had a hard time finding skirts long enough."

"Speaking of learning things, girls, remember what Mrs B. said?"

There was a quartet of laughter. Which explained nothing, and the reporter insisted on explanation.

Acquiring a Wasp Waist

"Well, it was this way," the tall girl began. "My neighbor wore this dress in the 90s. When she showed it to me, I said it looked impossible for me to get inside such a small-waisted gown. 'I'll tell you how I used to do it,' she said. 'It was simple after the corset went on. And the way I got that on was to tie the ends of the corset strings to a bedpost and walk away until my waist was small enough.' Oof! It didn't appeal to me. I got out my sewing kit, for once, and remade that waist a reasonable size."

"Ditto for mine."

"And mine."

"And mine."

"Funny thing about the hit this Gay Nineties revival made with everybody," the brown-eyed one observed. "I think it might have flopped last year. But this year the styles have come out with some touches that were swiped from those of the Nineties. Look at the emphasis on broad-shoulder and curve effects. It was interesting to look up the original models that supplied those ideas. And here's what interested me especially. Whereas the fashions of the Nineties used to heap materials on the shoulders to make them look wide, so that the waist would look very slim, nowadays we seem to really have broad shoulders."

"We're a powerful race, we are!" the smallest girl chuckled—by Laning Humphrey.

THE DAY'S HEAVY DATE
Tea, gossip and repartee.

GATHERING DAISIES WHEN MOTHER WAS A GIRL

222

DAILY RECORD PLATFORM (427)

1—New England Materials and Labor for New England public works.
2—Adequate Protective Tariff for New England industries.
3—Radio Equipment for Police Departments.
4—Expulsion of Sweat Shops.
5—Modification of Volstead Act to permit Light Wines and Beer under Federal regulation.
6—Lower and more equable insurance rates.

Jun. 24

Musical Banknotes

Many thousands of Boston music lovers have enjoyed, during past summer seasons, the Esplanade concerts, where music selected with discrimination and played with rare beauty has delighted huge outdoor audiences.

Arthur Fiedler

This year Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the concerts, finds the way extremely difficult in raising sufficient money to assure for Boston these notable performances of its own Symphony Orchestra players. It is a year when wealthy patrons, who have previously underwritten the concerts, find it impossible to continue their financial support.

It is to the music lovers themselves Mr. Fiedler now makes his appeal, believing that this year, as never before, fine music is urgently needed.

The amount needed to assure these concerts for Boston is approximately $12,000. An Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund will be established at the Merchants National Bank, 28 State st., Boston, where contributions will be received.

Mr. Fiedler is appealing to each person who attended Esplanade concerts last year—and, on many evenings, the audience numbered between twenty and thirty thousand. He asks that each send a contribution; a dollar or more if possible, and less if necessary. Any contribution will be welcome and will aid in bringing the concerts to the thousands who have enjoyed them.

Boston's outdoor music on the Esplanade has become famed throughout the country. The concerts have brought joy to many. It is to be hoped that citizens of a great center of music will support a feature of such importance and such beauty.

June 24

Midsummer Music

Once more there is promise of music along the Charles. That restful enjoyment which Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra have given the people of Boston in summers of the past will come again to the Esplanade in July and August. Judging from the unanimous praise long since won by these concerts the promise of another season is welcome indeed. A legion of Bostonians has found pleasure in them—a legion remarkably compounded of plebes and patricians. People of the most experienced taste have thought well of them, whether from a single visit or from many. To thousands more, who have gone to the riverbank after the heat of the day—because no other place offered save chairs by the curbstone of noisy streets in the North, West and South Ends—they have been an exceptional privilege. To some among them, these concerts beside the Charles have been, we need not doubt, a kind of midsummer night's dream.

But now, for the popular appreciation so freely expressed in the past, a practical test has come. All who have enjoyed these concerts in the past, and who hope to enjoy them again, are asked to send, if they possibly can, a check for the sum of a dollar or more to the treasurer of the Esplanade Concerts in care of the Merchants' National Bank. We hope that a large number of the beneficiaries will see their duty, and promptly perform it. From a legion of well-nigh 30,000 people who have found delight in Mr. Fielder's excellent programs in recent years, the subscription of the whole cost of the new season, which is only $12,000, should be quickly forthcoming.

June 24

THE ESPLANADE CONCERTS

Distinctly pleasing is the news that the outdoor concerts on the Charles river esplanade will probably be resumed this summer. In their brief history they have firmly established themselves as a Boston institution, and their suspension this year, depression or no depression, would leave a palpable void. But Mr. Fiedler cannot go through with his schedule of four weeks of concerts, beginning July 7, until a substantial part of the necessary fund is subscribed. Since many of the citizens who have underwritten the concerts in the past are now unable to give so generously, the $12,000 needed must come, for the most part, from small contributors. As Mr. Fiedler points out, more than 20,000 persons heard the final concert last summer, and if each of them gave $1 the fund would be immediately oversubscribed.

The large attendance at the Pops this season, and the frequent letters in our Mail Bag about Mr. Fiedler's plans, indicate that the public's interest in good orchestral music is as keen and as appreciative as ever. We hope that this interest can be translated into dollars. Contributions —and they need not be checks this time!—should be sent to the Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund, Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, Boston. Those who contribute immediately will encourage others to do so and will also enable Mr. Fiedler to complete his arrangements. Many a mickle will make music on the esplanade this summer!

THE ESPLANADE CONCERTS

The address of the Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund is at the Merchants National Bank, 28 State street. Those who enjoyed the open-air concerts last year, and expect to do so this year, should make a note of the address and send in any contribution that they can afford.

Announcement was made yesterday that the season would not be abandoned, that it would begin on the night of July 7 and extend for a month. But $12,000 is needed to finance the season, one of the most worth while innovations of recent years in Bostonian chronicles. This is not an easy time in which to raise money, but it should be possible to meet this challenge to municipal pride.

EDITORIAL PAGE OF THE America

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1932

What the Hearst Papers Advocate] No. 7 [Federal sales tax and excise taxes to replace the income tax, which has degenerated into a racket.

Music for the Masses
The Esplanade Concerts

The Esplanade concerts are unexcelled in the entertainment they supply the people of Boston.

They are given in the natural amphitheater of the Charles River Basin, a scene of rare beauty.

They are played in the cool of the summer evening, when the people seek respite from the heat and troubles of the day.

They furnish popular classical music by an orchestra of Boston Symphony players under Arthur Fiedler, who takes high rank among the conductors of the world.

They attract an audience of 20,000 people night after night, who enjoy the works of the masters in this cool retreat of natural charm.

Boston should be glad to maintain this institution, which is not exceeded in the United States and which rivals the open-air concerts of Berlin and Heidelburg.

Unlike Germany, our government provides no subsidy for this event, which affords so much enjoyment for so many of our people. No fee is charged here. The Esplanade concerts must rely upon the generous contributions of the public who derive the pleasure from them.

Mr. Fiedler informs us that the plans have been completed to resume the concerts on July 7. But the funds are missing. The sum of $12,000 is needed. Small as well as large contributions are desired. If the audience of 20,000 people sent but $1 apiece, the requirements would be met.

The contributions should be sent to the Arthur Fiedler Concert Fund, Merchants National Bank, 28 State street. By all means donate. Every reader of these lines will realize that there is a special requirement for entertainment for the public in times like these.

OPEN JULY 7 ON ESPLANADE

$12,000 Needed to Stage Concerts

A four-weeks' season of Esplanade Concerts will commence July 7 and run through to Aug. 3, it was announced yesterday by Arthur Fiedler, orchestra leader.

The concerts will be held despite the difficulty this year in rasing the funds necessary to make the concerts possible. The amount necessary is $12,000 and an Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund has been established at the Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, for the purpose of raising the money.

Harpist Guest at Pops

Theodore Cella, the young first harpist of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra who has made a considerable name for himself as a composer, will be the guest of honor at the Pops tonight, conducting the first performance of his "Carnival." Mr. Cella started his career as harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the seasons 1915-1920. His "Through the Pyrenees" figured on the last program of Sir Thomas Beecham in the English conductor's term as guest of the New York Philharmonic in New York last winter.

Theodore Cella

Esplanade Concerts

FREE evening concerts on the Charles River esplanade by Symphony players led by Arthur Fiedler are a delightful feature of Boston life.

This year it has been found necessary to appeal to the public to help raise the $12,000 necessary to conduct the season of music. To any one who has attended even one of the concerts it is unnecessary to explain why this good work should be supported.

Checks may be mailed to the Esplanade Concert Fund, Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, Boston. Conductor Fiedler suggests that if listeners would send even $1 each, his problem would be solved in a few days.

Traveler Jun 25

Nine More Nights of Pop Concerts

There are only nine more nights for people who have been promising themselves to get up to hear, with Arthur Fiedler, conducting, a Pop concert of enjoyable music.

This season has been one of the most successful of "Pops" since the opening night, May 4. There have been several innovations introduced to Pops followers, the most outstanding being the "Gay Nineties" night. The first night, the house was sold out four days in advance, and upon repeating, the house sold out a week in advance. With only a casual announcement, the people took up the idea of dressing to suit the occasion, wearing costumes such as their fathers wore when courting the neighborhood belle. The people entered into the singing of "Sweet Rosie O'Grady," "After the Ball" and "Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom-De-Ay" with great spirit and applauded generously the couple who cakewalked up and down the centre aisle.

The third request program is to be given June 27, and there is a great demand for tickets. On June 30th Gershwin's concerto in F for pianoforte and orchestra is to be repeated after the fine reception given this number on Sunday, June 19. Mr. Gershwin should have a warm spot in his heart for Boston as the Pop patrons have enjoyed and encouraged the playing of his numbers. The most popular of these are the "Rhapsody in Blue" with Sanroma as soloist, "Wintergreen for President" from "Of Thee I Sing," which number has had to be repeated each time it has been played.

Pops Continue to Draw

There have been no visible signs of depression in the Pops Concert season which is now approaching its final week. In fact, not even the oldest inhabitant can recall a more brilliant or popular series of concerts than that which Mr. Arthur Fiedler has directed at Symphony Hall since May 4.

There have been several innovations this year, the most outstanding being the "Gay Nineties" night. The first night the house was sold out four days in advance, and upon repeating, the house was sold a week in advance. With only a casual announcement, the people took up the idea of dressing to suit the occasion, wearing costumes such as their fathers wore when courting their neighborhood sweethearts.

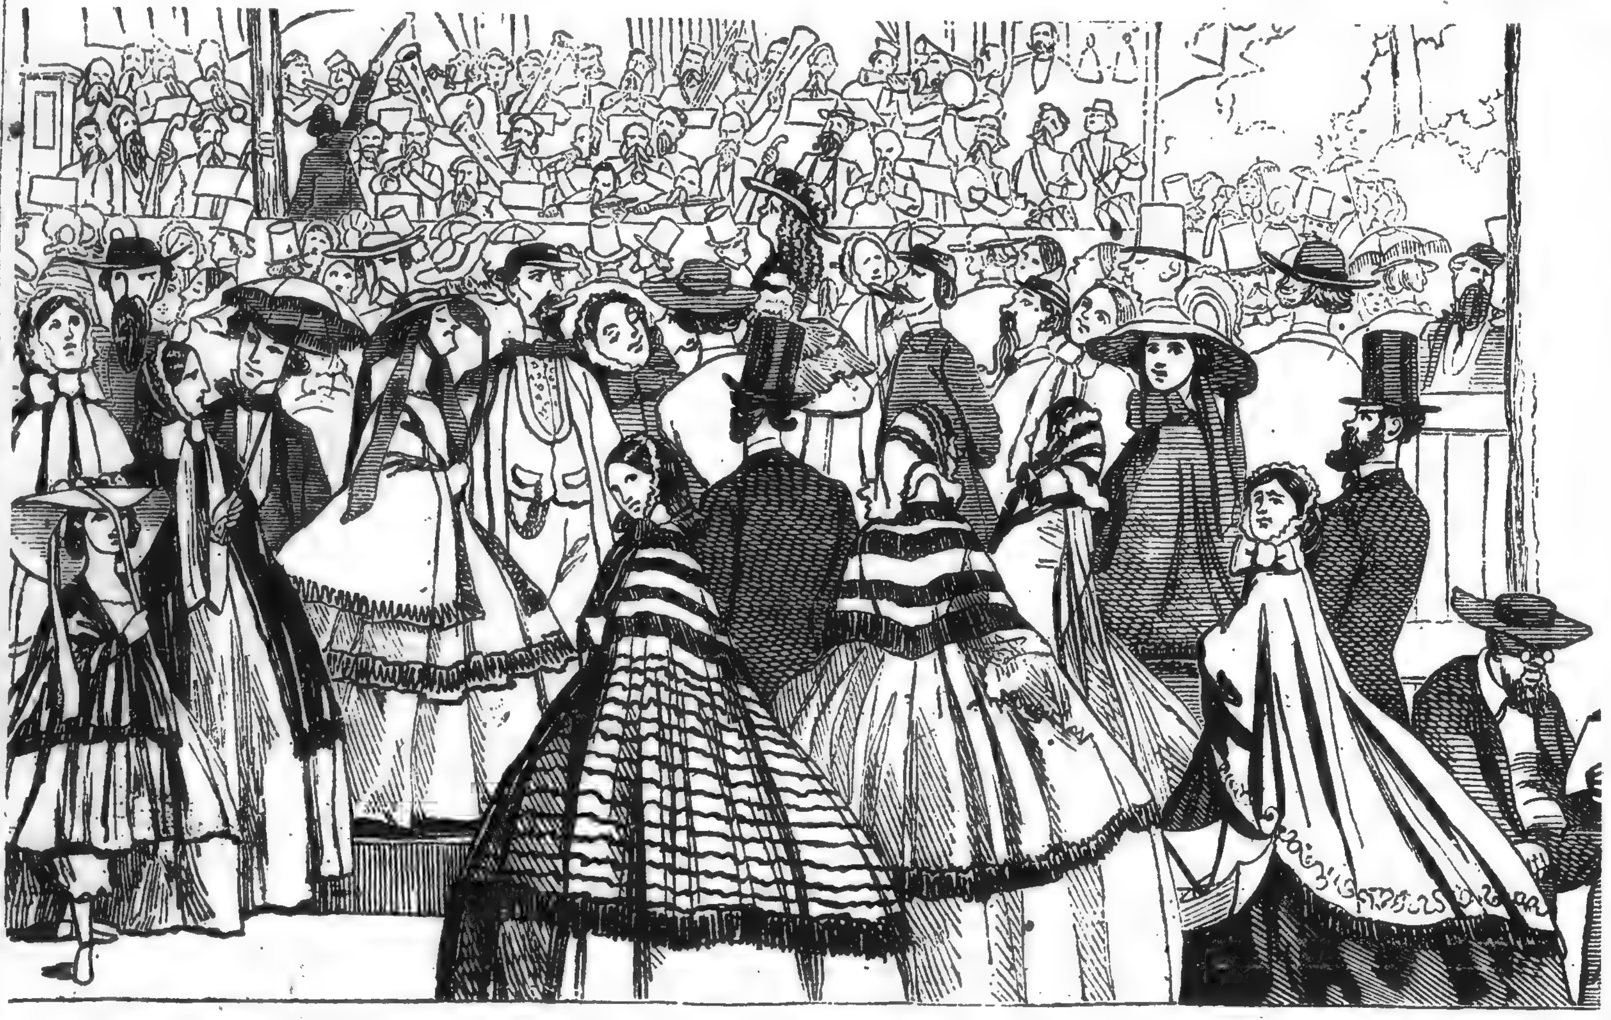
The third request program is to be given next Monday, and on the following Thursday Gershwin's Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra, is to be repeated. This number was accorded an enthusiastic reception in a recent Sunday program.

Mr. Gershwin's compositions have been frequently heard by Pops patrons. The most popular of these, perhaps, have been "Rhapsody in Blue," with Sanroma as soloist, and "Wintergreen For President," from "Of phony hall since May 4. to be repeated each time it was played.

Amusements

Esplanade Concerts Depend on 50,000 "Feel-Like-a-Millionaires"

As Depression Halts Usual Backing, Conductor Fiedler Appeals to His Great Summer Night Audiences—That Sunset Story!



An old print of what corresponded to Boston's Esplanade concerts in grandfather's day. Men and women dressed in the height of fashion enjoying an open-air orchestra concert. (Harper's 1859).

"The Esplanade concerts WON'T have to stop—will they?"

From tired business man of State street to bundle girl of Washington street department store, that question has echoed and re-echoed, in office, shop and tenement of Greater Boston since the first summery day of June.

If you have not asked it yourself, it probably was asked of you. And anyone known to be a newsman or newswoman has continually been besieged with the question.

The idea of Arthur Fiedler, four years ago, of giving nightly open air concerts of fine orchestral music by 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, free to the public, in a pleasant spot on the Charles River esplanade, very quickly became an institution for which Bostonians showed pride and affection.

Comfort With Music

At the Esplanade concerts, you didn't have to think whether you were dressed just so, or whether you had the right concert-going manner and said the right things. You walked off the sidewalk just as you were and stood on the big patch of grass by the Charles river, or sat on a camp stool or collapsing chair, and maybe lit a cigarette or pipe. Then you heard the rich, singing, instrumental tones of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, colored and shaded and filled with living rhythms by the trained art and youthful zest of the conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

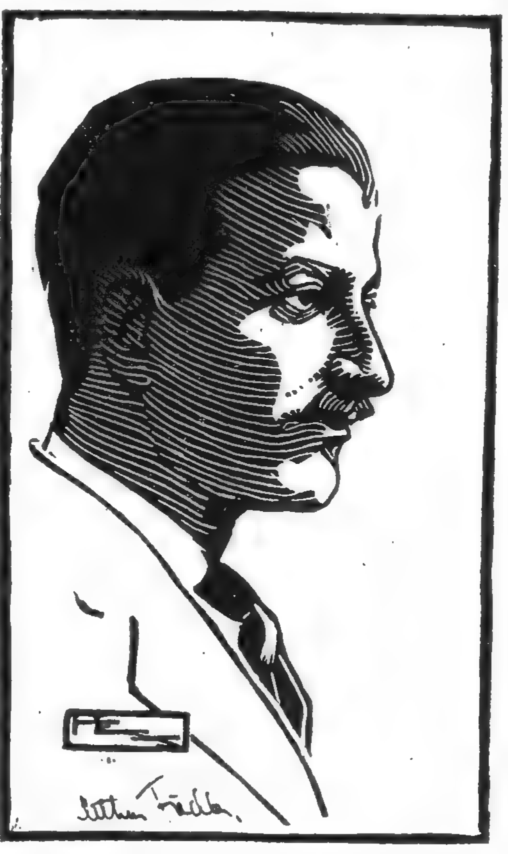
You listened, watched the sun go down in gorgeous color symphonies over the water, watched the moon rise. And yet you did not have to feel an effort of listening. You seemed to breathe and bathe in music. You had a comfortable feeling that you did not have to know music—you observed it, and it convinced you that to be alive was a great thing. Whoever sat beside you, or ahead or behind—whether above your station in life, or below—was all right.

That was all made possible for three summers by a little group of citizens of some means and a great deal of public spirit. They put up the running expenses, and kept their names unknown to the public which benefited. The donors were convinced of the public benefit and let that be their reward, instead of personal publicity. But the depression made big inroads on their financial resources. They could no longer put up the concert fund among a small group of donors.

Show Must Go On

It looked as if the beloved Esplanade Concerts would have to be given up this summer. People would understand—many other things had been interrupted by poor business conditions. But although people would understand, those concerts meant so much to them.

A good musician has ingrained in him that fine tradition of the actor: "The show must go on." Chopin went through with an announced concert in London when he was so ill he had to be carried to the hall. Fiedler had compunctions about walking out on his Esplanade patrons. But he could not secure the services of 50 "crack" musicians for weeks of nightly concerts without the means to do it, when playing summer engagements was their bread and butter.



Portrait study of Arthur Fiedler, the man who made the Esplanade concerts popular.

The solution came as a sudden inspiration.

"One day," Mr. Fiedler explained, "I was stopped on the street by a man I didn't remember ever seeing. He introduced himself as an old friend. Then, with a laugh at my puzzled expression, he said: 'Why, I'm one of your Esplanade Concert listeners. Never missed a programme if I could possibly help it.' He asked whether it would be possible to continue the concerts this season. I told him I was practically certain they would have to discontinue. "Oh, if I only had money!' he said with a groan. Then he began waving his pipe angrily. 'When it comes to a prize fight,' he raved, 'they can get their Five Hundred Millionaires to make everything fine. And yet the Esplanade Concerts have to be dropped!'

50,000 Millionaires

"Mention of millionaires clicked with a little story I'd heard from a plain clothes police officer on duty at the Esplanade. There was never anything for him to do on account of our concert crowds in three seasons, but his duty was to be on watch. One night, he told me, his attention was attracted by three young fellows who had a rather rough and ready style of dress and actions. He thought they might be up to something, so he kept within eye-shot and ear-shot. He began laughing his head off when he came to the next part of his story.

" 'You were playing that Hungarian Rhapsody,' he said, 'and the three fellows turned out just to be hunting a fine place for hearing. They found it. Then one of 'em threw out his chest and said: "Say, just listen to that, When I hear stuff like that, I feel like a millionaire even when I have to bum a cigarette." '

"Well," Mr. Fiedler explained, "mention of the 500 millionaires of Madison Square Garden put me in mind of the police officer's story.

"I have 50,000 millionaires!" I said to myself. "If the Esplanade Concerts made people feel like millionaires, why, my audiences ran to about 50,000 a week, for a month, during three summers. Among all those, I'm sure there must be 50,000 millionaires."

And that is the thought with which Arthur Fiedler is going ahead with his plans to put on free open-air orchestral concerts at the Esplanade again this summer, beginning on the night of July 7.

The 50,000 Esplanade millionaires are invited by Mr. Fiedler to send contributions to the Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund, care of Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, or Mrs. Eliazbeth Grant, 74 Marlborough street.

Whole Outlook Changed

"You know," the young director said, with that boyish, flashing grin which is typical of him, "a thing I like about my Esplanade listeners is that when they talk to me, as they often do, they say what they think—which is usually something I wouldn't think of their saying.

"A woman came to me before one concert.

" 'Oh, Mr. Fiedler,' she said. 'I must tell you how my whole outlook has been changed by this.' She made a sweeping gesture toward the river, that included everything from me and my assembling musicians to the acoustic shell and the electric clock across the water.

" 'It's SO lovely,' she told me.

"I'm glad—" I started, but she rushed on.

" 'Such richness!'

"I'm glad if—" I began.

" 'Such harmony!'

"It's a pleasure—" I tried again.

" 'Not pleasure only,' my dear Mr. Fiedler, she swept along. 'Life-living beauty! Something so—so unutterable! Why, do you know, Mr. Fiedler, long after you had all gone away, I used to come down here at the same time. I would bring my friends—make up a car full, then drive in from Woburn.'

"It's wonderful to hear that our music made such an impression," I got out at last.

" 'Oh—' the woman murmured. 'Did I forget to, er—. Why, I had no objection to the music—of course. But what I was talking about was the sunsets. You see, before I moved to Woburn, I lived not far from the Esplanade for 15 years. Well, I began coming down to your concerts. And the way you had the acoustic shell located got me to looking at just the right point to notice those marvelous sunsets on the Charles, those rich color harmonies on the clouds and water, for the first time in my life.

" 'I was so excited that I missed the sunsets after your concerts closed. So I drove down quite a few times afterwards with friends, in order that they could enjoy them.' "

"I consider that my uniquest compliment for the Esplanade concerts," Mr. Fiedler concluded.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, conductor of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. He is one of Boston's most popular musical leaders.
(Boston Herald-Boris.)

FINAL WEEK OF POPS

The unprecedentedly successful season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall enters upon its final week tomorrow evening with a repetition of the "request programme." Other features of these last six concerts are the repetition on Thursday evening of Gershwin's Concerto in F, with Mr. Sanroma as solo pianist; the appearance of Mr. Theodorowicz, concert master of the Pops orchestra, as solo violinist Wednesday evening, playing the Meditation from Massenet's "Thais"; and the repetition of Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry," one of the important novelties of the season, on Friday.

For the closing night, next Saturday, Mr. Fiedler has planned a special programme on which the names of Gershwin and Wagner figure prominently. Mr. Sanroma will on this occasion take part in a final performance of Ghershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," a piece of which the Pops audiences seemingly cannot have too much.

Following a three days' rest, Mr. Fiedler and the greater part of his musicians will be heard nightly, except Saturday, on the Charles River Esplanade for a season of four weeks.

Post June 26

Herald J 26

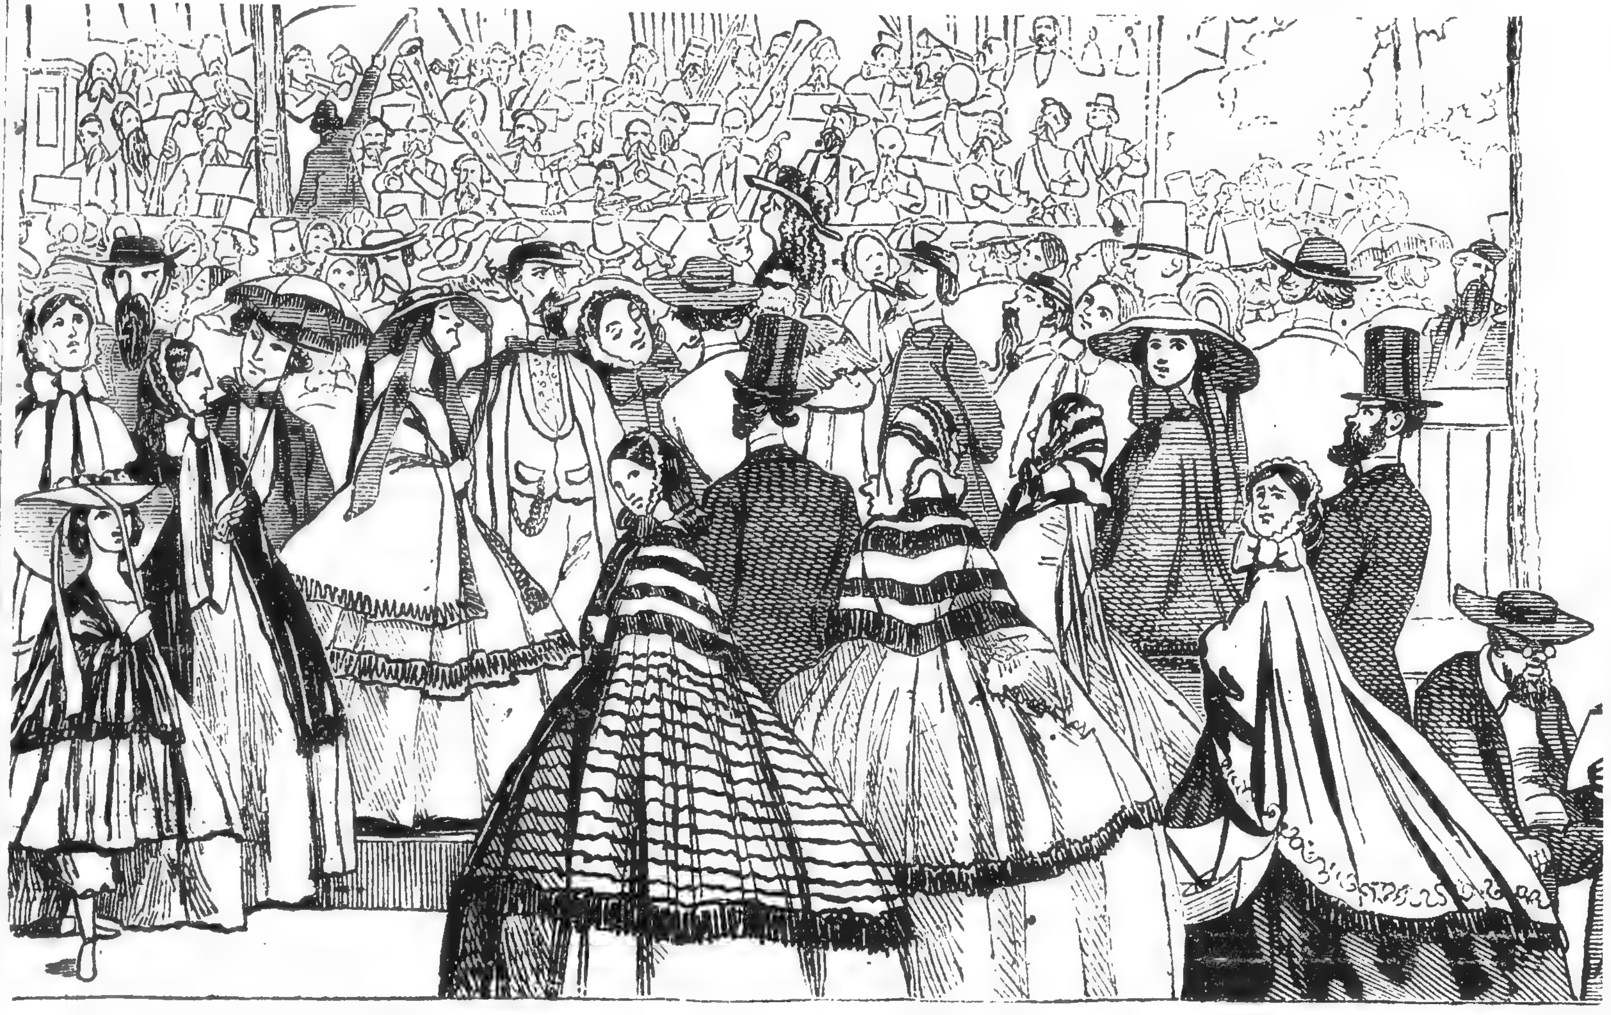
JACOBUS LANGENDOEN
'Cello soloist of the Pops, entering tomorrow evening on their final week.

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, POPULAR PIANO SOLOIST TO PLAY WITH THE POPS TOMORROW NIGHT, ON THURSDAY NIGHT, AND AGAIN ON THE CLOSING NIGHT OF THE SEASON, NEXT SATURDAY, AT SYMPHONY HALL

Post June 26

Esplanade Concerts Depend on 50,000 "Feel-Like-a-Millionaires"

As Depression Halts Usual Backing, Conductor Fiedler Appeals to His Great Summer Night Audiences—That Sunset Story!



An old print of what corresponded to Boston's Esplanade concerts in grandfather's day. Men and women dressed in the height of fashion enjoying an open-air orchestra concert. (Harper's 1859).

"The Esplanade concerts WON'T have to stop—will they?"

From tired business man of State street to bundle girl of Washington street department store, that question has echoed and re-echoed, in office, shop and tenement of Greater Boston since the first summery day of June.

If you have not asked it yourself, it probably was asked of you. And anyone known to be a newsman or newswoman has continually been besieged with the question.

The idea of Arthur Fiedler, four years ago, of giving nightly open air concerts of fine orchestral music by 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, free to the public, in a pleasant spot on the Charles River esplanade, very quickly became an institution for which Bostonians showed pride and affection.

Comfort With Music

At the Esplanade concerts, you didn't have to think whether you were dressed just so, or whether you had the right concert-going manner and said the right things. You walked off the sidewalk just as you were and stood on the big patch of grass by the Charles river, or sat on a camp stool or collapsing chair, and maybe lit a cigarette or pipe. Then you heard the rich, singing, instrumental tones of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, colored and shaded and filled with living rhythms by the trained art and youthful zest of the conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

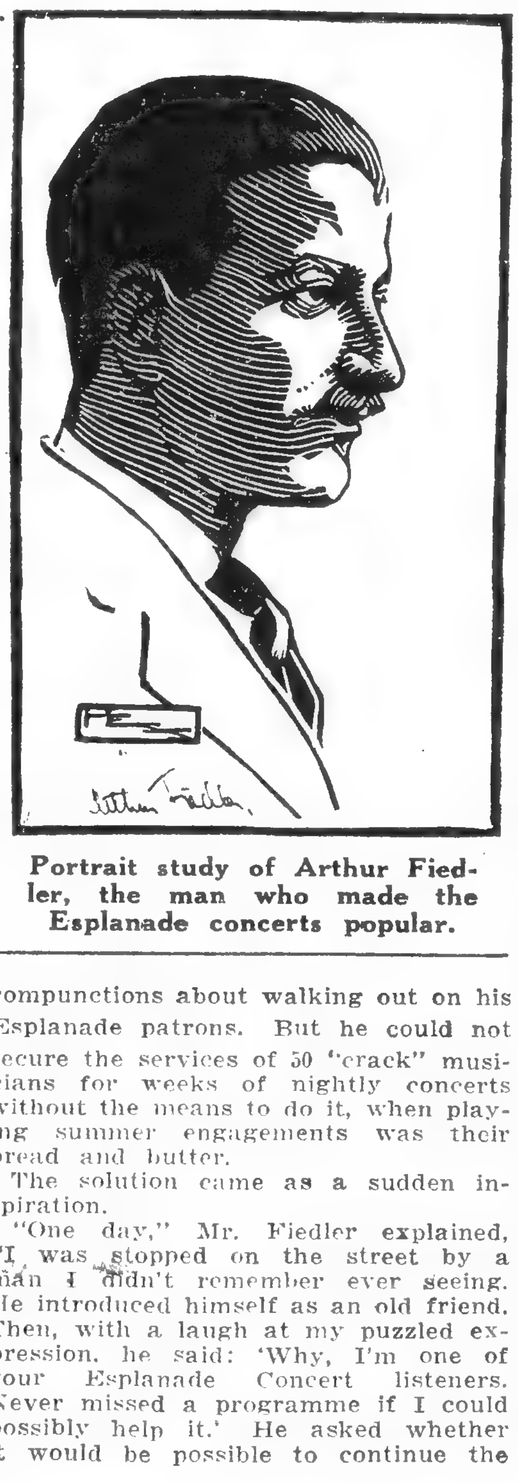
You listened, watched the sun go down in gorgeous color symphonies over the water, watched the moon rise. And yet you did not have to feel an effort of listening. You seemed to breathe and bathe in music. You had a comfortable feeling that you did not have to know music—you observed it, and it convinced you that to be alive was a great thing. Whoever sat beside you, or ahead or behind—whether above your station in life, or below—was all right.

That was all made possible for three summers by a little group of citizens of some means and a great deal of public spirit. They put up the running expenses, and kept their names unknown to the public which benefited. The donors were convinced of the public benefit and let that be their reward, instead of personal publicity. But the depression made big inroads on their financial resources. They could no longer put up the concert fund among a small group of donors.

Show Must Go On

It looked as if the beloved Esplanade Concerts would have to be given up this summer. People would understand—many other things had been interrupted by poor business conditions. But although people would understand, those concerts meant so much to them.

A good musician has ingrained in him that fine tradition of the actor: "The show must go on." Chopin went through with an announced concert in London when he was so ill he had to be carried to the hall. Fiedler had compunctions about walking out on his Esplanade patrons. But he could not secure the services of 50 "crack" musicians for weeks of nightly concerts without the means to do it, when playing summer engagements was their bread and butter.



Portrait study of Arthur Fiedler, the man who made the Esplanade concerts popular.

The solution came as a sudden inspiration.

"One day," Mr. Fiedler explained, "I was stopped on the street by a man I didn't remember ever seeing. He introduced himself as an old friend. Then, with a laugh at my puzzled expression, he said: 'Why, I'm one of your Esplanade Concert listeners. Never missed a programme if I could possibly help it.' He asked whether it would be possible to continue the concerts this season. I told him I was practically certain they would have to discontinue. "Oh, if I only had money!" he said with a groan. Then he began waving his pipe angrily. 'When it comes to a prize fight,' he raved, 'they can get their Five Hundred Millionaires to make everything fine. And yet the Esplanade Concerts have to be dropped!'

50,000 Millionaires

"Mention of millionaires clicked with a little story I'd heard from a plain clothes police officer on duty at the Esplanade. There was never anything for him to do on account of our concert crowds in three seasons, but his duty was to be on watch. One night, he told me, his attention was attracted by three young fellows who had a rather rough and ready style of dress and actions. He thought they might be up to something, so he kept within eye-shot and ear-shot. He began laughing his head off when he came to the next part of his story.

" 'You were playing that Hungarian Rhapsody,' he said, 'and the three fellows turned out just to be hunting a fine place for hearing. They found it. Then one of 'em threw out his chest and said: "Say, just listen to that, When I hear stuff like that, I feel like a millionaire even when I have to bum a cigarette." '

"Well," Mr. Fiedler explained, "mention of the 500 millionaires of Madison Square Garden put me in mind of the police officer's story.

"I have 50,000 millionaires!" I said to myself. "If the Esplanade Concerts made people feel like millionaires, why, my audiences ran to about 50,000 a week, for a month, during three summers. Among all those, I'm sure there must be 50,000 millionaires."

And that is the thought with which Arthur Fiedler is going ahead with his plans to put on free open-air orchestral concerts at the Esplanade again this summer, beginning on the night of July 7.

The 50,000 Esplanade millionaires are invited by Mr. Fiedler to send contributions to the Arthur Fiedler Esplanade Concert Fund, care of Merchants National Bank, 28 State street, or Mrs. Eliazbeth Grant, 74 Marlborough street.

Whole Outlook Changed

"You know," the young director said, with that boyish, flashing grin which is typical of him, "a thing I like about my Esplanade listeners is that when they talk to me, as they often do, they say what they think—which is usually something I wouldn't think of their saying.

"A woman came to me before one concert.

" 'Oh, Mr. Fiedler,' she said. 'I must tell you how my whole outlook has been changed by this.' She made a sweeping gesture toward the river, that included everything from me and my assembling musicians to the acoustic shell and the electric clock across the water.

" 'It's SO lovely,' she told me.

"I'm glad——" I started, but she rushed on.

" 'Such richness!'

"I'm glad if——" I began.

" 'Such harmony!'

"It's a pleasure—" I tried again.

" 'Not pleasure only,' my dear Mr. Fiedler, she swept along. 'Life-living beauty! Something so—so unutterable! Why, do you know, Mr. Fiedler, long after you had all gone away, I used to come down here at the same time. I would bring my friends—make up a car full, then drive in from Woburn.'

"It's wonderful to hear that our music made such an impression," I got out at last.

" 'Oh—' the woman murmured. 'Did I forget to, er— Why, I had no objection to the music—of course. But what I was talking about was the sunsets. You see, before I moved to Woburn, I lived not far from the Esplanade for 15 years. Well, I began coming down to your concerts. And the way you had the acoustic shell located got me to looking at just the right point to notice those marvelous sunsets on the Charles, those rich color harmonies on the clouds and water, for the first time in my life.

" 'I was so excited that I missed the sunsets after your concerts closed. So I drove down quite a few times afterwards with friends, in order that they could enjoy them.' "

"I consider that my uniquest compliment for the Esplanade concerts," Mr. Fiedler concluded.

ARTHUR FIEDLER, conductor of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. He is one of Boston's most popular musical leaders.

(Boston Herald-Boris.)

FINAL WEEK OF POPS

The unprecedentedly successful season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall enters upon its final week tomorrow evening with a repetition of the "request programme." Other features of these last six concerts are the repetition on Thursday evening of Gershwin's Concerto in F, with Mr. Sanroma as solo pianist; the appearance of Mr. Theodorowicz, concert master of the Pops orchestra, as solo violinist Wednesday evening, playing the Meditation from Massenet's "Thais"; and the repetition of Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry," one of the important novelties of the season, on Friday.

For the closing night, next Saturday, Mr. Fiedler has planned a special programme on which the names of Gershwin and Wagner figure prominently. Mr. Sanroma will on this occasion take part in a final performance of Ghershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," a piece of which the Pops audiences seemingly cannot have too much.

Following a three days' rest, Mr. Fiedler and the greater part of his musicians will be heard nightly, except Saturday, on the Charles River Esplanade for a season of four weeks.

Post Jun 26

Herald J 26

JACOBUS LANGENDOEN

'Cello soloist of the Pops, entering tomorrow evening on their final week.

UNE HERBER
"B
TON

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, POPULAR PIANO SOLOIST TO PLAY WITH THE POPS TOMORROW NIGHT, ON THURSDAY NIGHT, AND AGAIN ON THE CLOSING NIGHT OF THE SEASON, NEXT SATURDAY, AT SYMPHONY HALL

Post June 26

WS SE

National Broadcasting Company, Inc.

Pops Conductor

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pop Concerts, Who Will Lead an Orchestra of 85 in the June Wednesday-night Series over an NBC-WEAF network.

The Observant Citizen

Post Jun 29

Good-by, Venus!

The brightest of all the planets now ceases to be an Evening Star, and today becomes a Morning Star, for the benefit of the milkmen, the night watchmen and others whose duties take them abroad before sunrise.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

If the reader is not included in the legion of night-workers, he might be surprised to discover how early the morning twilight begins, just now.

The first flush of dawn now appears in the east at about three o'clock, Boston time.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Today we have two minutes less sunlight than we had on the first day of summer, but the loss is on the sunrise end of the day, all except a few seconds.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Today, in the church calendar, is the feast of Saints Peter and Paul.

Since the third or fourth century, this date has been celebrated in honor of the two Apostles jointly.

Their names appear together on a great number of churches throughout America and Europe.

In our own city, the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul is at 53 West Broadway, South Boston.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Here is an explanation as to why the leader of a great orchestra conducts even the more familiar numbers from the printed score, instead of from memory.

Boston's distinguished musician, Arthur Fiedler, has kindly given me some idea of the work involved in leading such a fine orchestra as that of the Pops.

I recently mentioned the fact that he conducted "from the book" instead of from memory. He tells me:

"The average musical score, in comparison to a piano part of two lines, has anywhere from eight to 20 lines, designating exactly what each instrument is playing at each moment.

"To memorize this, as you can readily see, is quite a task."

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

The magnitude of the task referred to by Mr. Fiedler is indicated by the following statement as to the past season:

"Since the opening night, May 4, I have conducted 33 different overtures, 18 suites, 18 classical waltzes, 7 rhapsodies, 4 dance numbers, 11 operatic fantasies, 29 marches, 11 musical comedy selections, 4 complete symphonies, 4 pot-pourri, and 130 miscellaneous numbers, including some of the ultra-modern compositions such as 'Soviet Iron Foundry,' 'Pacific,' works by Stravinsky, etc.

"In addition to this I have played 76 different encores.

"If my arithmetic is correct, this makes a total of 345 different compositions performed at the Pops this season.

"The season comprises 56 concerts, which means that I have played an average of over 6 new compositions each night."

Incidentally, it is a fact that Mr. Fiedler does not "use a book" in conducting many of the more frequently played encore numbers.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

BOSTON'S POP CONCERTS ON NBC NETWORK

BOSTON, May 00—The Boston Pop Concerts, which annually invest sedate Symphony Hall with the atmosphere of a Bavarian music festival, will find outlet again this season to the nation's music lovers through radio. Beginning Wednesday evening, June 1, a series of five concerts will be broadcast at 10 to 10:45 p. m., E. D. S. T., over an NBC-WEAF network. Station WEEI will originate the programs.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will play under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. One of few native-born conductors, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant. He reflects in every concert his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm.

The Pops series will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI, whose voice has been heard for many seasons in broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras.

NBC engineers will make special arrangements to pick up the Pops from Boston's great musical center—Symphony Hall—and attempt to capture all of the sterling musicianship that has made the Pops Orchestra one of the notable cultural features of the city.

The one large work by George Gershwin as yet unheard in Boston will be played at the Pop Concert on Sunday evening, June 19—his Concerto in F major for Piano and Orchestra. It was written on commission from the New York Symphony Orchestra and produced at its concert, under Walter Damrosch, on Dec. 3, 1925. Mr. Gershwin then played the piano-part—"because no one else could." Mr. Sanromá will take it at Symphony Hall. The Concerto runs in three movements: the first, in the rhythm of a Charleston; the second, a tragicomic blues; the third, a breathless finale.

Dances Embroider The Pop Concert

FOR a final evening, yesterday, the dance returned to The Pops, drawing to Symphony Hall an audience that filled both floor and balconies. After a concert of seven dance-numbers—German, French, Hungarian, Polish, Russian; after the inevitable Bolero of Ravel in which by this time Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra have become highly specialized, the conductor and a considerable number of his musicians descended to an improvised pit. Upon the stage, hung with the usual drapery, Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and an assisting ensemble of six demoiselles then had their inning. They began with a "Slovakian Peasant Dance," after the usual manner of the kind—bright-colored dress, movements, singly or in group, to lively rhythm, an air of semi-coquettish rusticity. Next a Grotesque Dance by Mr. Ashermann and Miss Dale, both comically masked, affecting humorous gaucherie, moving to the familiar "Moment Musical" of Schubert, which for Terpsichore's sweet sake has been put, by example from Isadora, to strange uses.

Then Mr. Wiener himself in "Circus"—pantomime, touched with parody and interspersed with dancing steps, of the wire-walker, the strong man and other entertainers of the tent, all amusing and review-like. Finally, dances to Strauss's waltz of fascination, "Wine, Woman and Song," in which the demoiselles plied a more or less seductive design and Mr. Wiener ventured leaps and bounds, more or less Russian and conquering. In sum, the dance as amiable and popular entertainment warmly received by an eager audience. It even had Mr. Wiener's "Circus" twice over.

The Pops Conclude Saturday

Glob Jun 26

THE POP CONCERTS will bring their 47th season to a close next Saturday, July 2d, in Symphony Hall, when Arthur Fiedler will stress the music of Wagner and of Gershwin, on his final program.

Tomorrow night the Request Program will have its third performance.

On Thursday night, Gershwin's Concerto in F, the first Boston performance of which last Sunday at the Pops was one of the events of the season, will be repeated again with Sanroma as soloist.

Programs follow:

MONDAY

Request Program (Repeated)

"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Grieg
Overture Solennelle, "1812" . Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Largo .... Handel
Bolero .... Ravel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz .... Strauss
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma

TUESDAY

"El Capitan," march .... Sousa
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
"Valse Triste" .... Sibelius
"Samson and Delilah," Bacchanale Saint-Saens
Facade .... Walton
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Nutcracker," ballet suite .. Tchaikovsky
"Espana," waltz .... Waldteufel
Perpetuum Mobile .... Strauss
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY

"Szechenyi Indulo," march ... Fahrbach
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Third Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Biset
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
"Thais," meditation .... Massenet
(Violin solo: J. Theodorowicz)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
"Of Thee I Sing," selection .... Gershwin
'Loin du Bal" .... Gillet
Cheyenne Indian War Dance ..... Skilton

THURSDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Bat" .... Strauss
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
"Aida," Fantasia .... Verdi
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra .... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"New Moon," selection .... Romberg
Two Fairy Tales .... Komzak
"Only One Vienna," march ... Schrammel

FRIDAY

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" .... Berlios
Overture to "Figaro" .... Mozart
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Madame Butterfly," Fantasia .. Puccini
Soviety Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
"Scheherazade," the Prince and the Princess .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
Dubinushka, Russian Folk song Arranged by Jacchia
"Jolly Fellows," waltz .... Vollstedt

SATURDAY

Closing Night

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Song of the Evening Star, from "Tannhauser' .... Wagner
Violoncello solo: J. Langendoen
Overture, from "Tannhauser" ... Wagner
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Band Wagon," selection .. Schwartz
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
MAY 27 1932

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Herald Jun 26

The Pop concerts will bring their 47th season to a close next Saturday, July 2, in Symphony hall, when Arthur Fiedler will stress the music of Wagner and of Gershwin, on his final program. Tomorrow night the Request program will have its third performance. On Thursday night, Gershwin's Concerto in F, the first Boston performance of which last Sunday at the Pops was one of the events of the season, will be repeated again with Sanroma as soloist.

The programs of the week, assembling what is most popular in the Pops repertory, will be as follows:

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 27

Request Program (repeated)

"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Grieg
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" . Tschaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Largo .... Handel
Bolero .... Ravel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz .... Strauss
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma

TUESDAY EVENING

"El Capitan," march .... Sousa
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
"Valse Trieste" .... Sibelius
"Samson and Delilah," Bacchanale Saint-Saens
Facade .... Walton
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Nut Cracker," ballet suite .. Tchaikovsky
"Espana," waltz .... Waldteufel
Perpetuum Mobile .... Strauss
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Szechenyi Indulo," march ...... Fahrbach
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Third Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Bizet
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
"Thais," Meditation .... Massenet
(Violin solo—J. Theodorowicz)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
"Of Thee I Sing," selection ...... Gershwin
"Loin du Bal" .... Gillet
Cheyenne Indian War Dance .... Skilton

THURSDAY EVENING

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Bat" .... Strauss
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
"Aida," Fantasia .... Verdi
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra .... Gershwin
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"New Moon," Selection .... Romberg
Two Fairy Tales .... Komzak
"Only One Vienna," march .... Schrammel

FRIDAY EVENING

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" .... Berlioz
Overture to "Figaro" .... Mozart
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Madame Butterfly," Fantasia ...... Puccini
Soviety Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
"Scheherazade," The Prince and the Princess .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
Dubinushka Russian Folk Song Arranged by Jacchia
"Jolly Fellows," waltz .... Vollstedt

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 2

Closing Night

Entrance of the Guests Into the Warburg. Song to the Evening Star (violoncello solo, J. Langendoen). Overture.... From "Tannhauser," Wagner
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger
Marche Slav .... Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Piano solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Band Wagon," selection ..... Schwartz
"Prayer of Thanksgiving" (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUN 1 1932

RADIO NEWS

FIEDLER CONDUCTS BOSTON "POP"

Modern and Classic Airs Included in Radio Program

Hartford, June 1—Modern and

EDITORIAL

The Gay Nineties

A reminiscence of the so-called "gay nineties," the last decade of the 19th century, was given at the Boston "Pop" concerts recently, when Boston Symphony orchestra players presented music of 40 years ago, heard by a great audience, many of whom wore 19th century costumes. One sees many references now to the period referred to, and some people wish they were back there.

The years 1890 to 1899 were the height of the "Victorian age," when Queen Victoria reigned in England, a period which highbrows now view with contempt. It is called a time of "insincere pretensions." People called "legs" "limbs," they wore bathing suits that swept the ground, they pretended a virtue and piety they did not practice, is claimed by some "Modernists." Our modern age is considered to be emancipated from these restraints, exalting sincerity as the highest good.

But much of our modern frankness and liberalism is only another name for cynicism and skepticism. We are told to enjoy our coarsest impulses, and consider them noble. The world never made progress by imitating the beasts of the field.

The life of the "gay nineties" seems singularly barren to us now. No automobiles, no movies, no radios. How toilsomely they jogged around behind lazy old Dobbin, seeing only a little fragment of the world. Yet they found their gaiety in simple ways. Instead of burning up the ten-spots in swift motor parties, they had evenings of happiness singing college songs on the doorsteps, and dancing in the barn, while the ruminating cows peacefully chewed their cuds and looked on in wonder.

It was an age that started innumerable movements for relief of poverty, distress and oppression. This interest in making a better world was a more creative spirit than the hopeless cynicism so often expressed today.

---

* * * *

WTAM carries the Boston pop concert, played by 85 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at 9 o'clock tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
HERALD
MAY 31 1932

TODAY'S RADIO PROGRAM

An inverse application of the principle of reflection utilized in the automobile headlamp will be made in technical and acoustical preparations for this season's broadcasts of the Boston Pop Concerts from Symphony hall. This principle, which obtains both for sound as well as light enables engineers through the use of the parabolic microphone to deliver a symphonic work with utmost fidelity of tone.

The opening Pops broadcast Wednesday evening at 10 to 10:45 P. M. (EDST) over an NBC-WEAF network will be made under the direction of W. R. Brown and Charles Grey, New York engineers who are widely experienced in the broadcasting of symphonic and operatic concerts. They will arrive in Boston tomorrow under instructions from O. B. Hanson, manager of plant operation and engineering for the National Broadcasting Company, Inc.

The Parabolic reflector microphone, two of which will be installed in front of the right and left side balconies in Symphony hall, is one of many new developments of radio engineers. The new microphone has been widely used by NBC since it was perfected, especially for the broadcast of works in the larger forms. The parabolic mike was brought out when it was found that the ordinary condenser types were frequently unsatisfactory, failing to give proper balance or definition.

Unlike the ordinary microphone, the face of the new one is turned away from the artists participating in a broadcast, while facing the diaphragm is a parabolic reflector. The reflector catches the sound waves, which reflect into the diaphragm of the microphone, thus being focused harmoniously on small diaphragm of the condenser mike.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
JUN 1 1932

Boston Symphony Pop Concerts Begin Tonight

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10:45 p. m. over an WEAF coast-to-coast network.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the fire Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:

Arthur Fiedler

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
"Masquerade," An American Rhapsody .... McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

The orchestra of 85 Symphony players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston, son of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet.

WS SE

National Broadcasting Company, Inc.

Pops Conductor

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pop Concerts, Who Will Lead an Orchestra of 85 in the June Wednesday-night Series over an NBC-WEAF network.

BOSTON'S POP CONCERTS ON NBC NETWORK

BOSTON, May 00—The Boston Pop Concerts, which annually invest sedate Symphony Hall with the atmosphere of a Bavarian music festival, will find outlet again this season to the nation's music lovers through radio. Beginning Wednesday evening, June 1, a series of five concerts will be broadcast at 10 to 10:45 p. m., E. D. S. T., over an NBC-WEAF network. Station WEEI will originate the programs.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will play under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. One of few native-born conductors, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant. He reflects in every concert his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm.

The Pops series will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI, whose voice has been heard for many seasons in broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras.

NBC engineers will make special arrangements to pick up the Pops from Boston's great musical center—Symphony Hall—and attempt to capture all of the sterling musicianship that has made the Pops Orchestra one of the notable cultural features of the city.

The Observant Citizen

Post Jun 29

Good-by, Venus!

The brightest of all the planets now ceases to be an Evening Star, and today becomes a Morning Star, for the benefit of the milkmen, the night watchmen and others whose duties take them abroad before sunrise.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

If the reader is not included in the legion of night-workers, he might be surprised to discover how early the morning twilight begins, just now.

The first flush of dawn now appears in the east at about three o'clock, Boston time.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Today we have two minutes less sunlight than we had on the first day of summer, but the loss is on the sunrise end of the day, all except a few seconds.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Today, in the church calendar, is the feast of Saints Peter and Paul.

Since the third or fourth century, this date has been celebrated in honor of the two Apostles jointly.

Their names appear together on a great number of churches throughout America and Europe.

In our own city, the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul is at 53 West Broadway, South Boston.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Here is an explanation as to why the leader of a great orchestra conducts even the more familiar numbers from the printed score, instead of from memory.

Boston's distinguished musician, Arthur Fiedler, has kindly given me some idea of the work involved in leading such a fine orchestra as that of the Pops.

I recently mentioned the fact that he conducted "from the book" instead of from memory. He tells me:

"The average musical score, in comparison to a piano part of two lines, has anywhere from eight to 20 lines, designating exactly what each instrument is playing at each moment.

"To memorize this, as you can readily see, is quite a task."

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

The magnitude of the task referred to by Mr. Fiedler is indicated by the following statement as to the past season:

"Since the opening night, May 4, I have conducted 33 different overtures, 18 suites, 18 classical waltzes, 7 rhapsodies, 4 dance numbers, 11 operatic fantasies, 29 marches, 11 musical comedy selections, 4 complete symphonies, 4 pot-pourri, and 130 miscellaneous numbers, including some of the ultra-modern compositions such as 'Soviet Iron Foundry,' 'Pacific,' works by Stravinsky, etc.

"In addition to this I have played 76 different encores.

"If my arithmetic is correct, this makes a total of 345 different compositions performed at the Pops this season.

"The season comprises 56 concerts, which means that I have played an average of over 6 new compositions each night."

Incidentally, it is a fact that Mr. Fiedler does not "use a book" in conducting many of the more frequently played encore numbers.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Carnation H

The one large work by George Gershwin as yet unheard in Boston will be played at the Pop Concert on Sunday evening, June 19—his Concerto in F major for Piano and Orchestra. It was written on commission from the New York Symphony Orchestra and produced at its concert, under Walter Damrosch, on Dec. 3, 1925. Mr. Gershwin then played the piano-part—"because no one else could." Mr. Sanromá will take it at Symphony Hall. The Concerto runs in three movements: the first, in the rhythm of a Charleston; the second, a tragicomic blues; the third, a breathless finale.

Dances Embroider The Pop Concert

FOR a final evening, yesterday, the dance returned to The Pops, drawing to Symphony Hall an audience that filled both floor and balconies. After a concert of seven dance-numbers—German, French, Hungarian, Polish, Russian; after the inevitable Bolero of Ravel in which by this time Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra have become highly specialized, the conductor and a considerable number of his musicians descended to an improvised pit. Upon the stage, hung with the usual drapery, Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and an assisting ensemble of six demoiselles then had their inning. They began with a "Slovakian Peasant Dance," after the usual manner of the kind—bright-colored dress, movements, singly or in group, to lively rhythm, an air of semi-coquettish rusticity. Next a Grotesque Dance by Mr. Ashermann and Miss Dale, both comically masked, affecting humorous gaucherie, moving to the familiar "Moment Musical" of Schubert, which for Terpsichore's sweet sake has been put, by example from Isadora, to strange uses.

Then Mr. Wiener himself in "Circus"—pantomime, touched with parody and interspersed with dancing steps, of the wire-walker, the strong man and other entertainers of the tent, all amusing and review-like. Finally, dances to Strauss's waltz of fascination, "Wine, Woman and Song," in which the demoiselles plied a more or less seductive design and Mr. Wiener ventured leaps and bounds, more or less Russian and conquering. In sum, the dance as amiable and popular entertainment warmly received by an eager audience. It even had Mr. Wiener's "Circus" twice over.

The Pops Conclude Saturday

Globe Jun 26

THE POP CONCERTS will bring their 47th season to a close next Saturday, July 2d, in Symphony Hall, when Arthur Fiedler will stress the music of Wagner and of Gershwin, on his final program.

Tomorrow night the Request Program will have its third performance.

On Thursday night, Gershwin's Concerto in F, the first Boston performance of which last Sunday at the Pops was one of the events of the season, will be repeated again with Sanroma as soloist.

Programs follow:

MONDAY

Request Program (Repeated)

"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Grieg
Overture Solennelle, "1812" . Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Largo .... Handel
Bolero .... Ravel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz .... Strauss
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma

TUESDAY

"El Capitan," march .... Sousa
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
"Valse Triste" .... Sibelius
"Samson and Delilah," Bacchanale .... Saint-Saens
Facade .... Walton
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Nutcracker," ballet suite .. Tchaikovsky
"Espana," waltz .... Waldteufel
Perpetuum Mobile .... Strauss
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY

"Szechenyi Indulo," march ... Fahrbach
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Third Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Biset
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
"Thais," meditation .... Massenet
(Violin solo: J. Theodorowicz)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
"Of Thee I Sing," selection .... Gershwin
"Loin du Bal" .... Gillet
Cheyenne Indian War Dance ..... Skilton

THURSDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Bat" .... Strauss
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
"Aida," Fantasia .... Verdi
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra .... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"New Moon," selection .... Romberg
Two Fairy Tales .... Komzak
"Only One Vienna," march... Schrammel

FRIDAY

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" .... Berlios
Overture to "Figaro" .... Mozart
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Madame Butterfly," Fantasia .. Puccini
Soviety Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
"Scheherazade," the Prince and the Princess .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
Dubinushka, Russian Folk song Arranged by Jacchia
"Jolly Fellows," waltz .... Vollstedt

SATURDAY

Closing Night

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Song of the Evening Star, from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Violoncello solo: J. Langendoen
Overture, from "Tannhauser" ... Wagner
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Band Wagon," selection . Schwartz
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

LAST WEEK OF POPS

Herald J 26

The Pop concerts will bring their 47th season to a close next Saturday, July 2, in Symphony hall, when Arthur Fiedler will stress the music of Wagner and of Gershwin, on his final program. Tomorrow night the Request program will have its third performance. On Thursday night, Gershwin's Concerto in F, the first Boston performance of which last Sunday at the Pops was one of the events of the season, will be repeated again with Sanroma as soloist.

The programs of the week, assembling what is most popular in the Pops repertory, will be as follows:

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 27

Request Program (repeated) .... Elgar
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Grieg
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... "1812" .. Tschaikovsky
Ouverture Solennelle .... Rossini
Overture to "William Tell" .... Handel
Largo .... Ravel
Bolero
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," .... Strauss waltz .... Gershwin
"Rhapsody in Blue"
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma

TUESDAY EVENING .... Sousa
"El Capitan," march .... Thomas
Overture to "Mignon" .... Sibelius
"Valse Trieste"
"Samson and Delilah," Bacchanale Saint-Saens
.... Walton
Facade .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Ave Maria .... Tchaikovsky
"Nut Cracker," ballet suite ...... Waldteufel
"Espana," waltz .... Strauss
Perpetuum Mobile
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY EVENING .... Fahrbach
"Szechenyi Indulo," march ...... Goldmark
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Dvorak
Third Slavonic Dance .... Bizet
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Herbert
Irish Rhapsody .... Massenet
"Thais," Meditation
(Violin solo—J. Theodorowicz)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La ...... Ponchielli Gioconda" .... Gershwin
"Of Thee I Sing," selection .... Gillet
"Loin du Bal" .... Skilton
Cheyenne Indian War Dance

THURSDAY EVENING

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
.... Strauss
Overture to "The Bat" .... Bach-Gounod
Ave Maria .... Verdi
"Aida," Fantasia
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and .... Gershwin orchestra
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma ...... Romberg
"New Moon," Selection .... Komzak
Two Fairy Tales .... Schrammel
"Only One Vienna," march

FRIDAY EVENING .... Berlioz
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" .... Mozart
Overture to "Figaro" .... Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Puccini
"Madame Butterfly," Fantasia .... Mossolov
Soviety Iron Foundry
"Scheherazade," The Prince and the Princess .... Rimsky-Korsakov
.... Liszt
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Kreisler
Liebesfreud
Dubinushka Russian Folk Song Arranged by Jacchia
"Jolly Fellows," waltz .... Vollstedt

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 2

Closing Night

Entrance of the Guests Into the Warburg. Song to the Evening Star (violoncello solo, J. Langendoen).
Overture... From "Tannhauser," Wagner
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger
Marche Slav .... Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Piano solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Band Wagon," selection ..... Schwartz
"Prayer of Thanksgiving" (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUN 1 1932

RADIO NEWS

FIEDLER CONDUCTS BOSTON "POP"

Modern and Classic Airs Included in Radio Program

Hartford, June 1—Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard from 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductor, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody .... McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries" Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

MAY 27 1932

Marsh
One
1
Ropes Dr
Salem Beverly

peal is by action of house and sen and then ratification by 36 states, said, and she was confident "We'll be dead before that happens."

"There is another way," she adm ted, referring to a possible refere dum. "But there is no presedent it. It opens the way to enormous use of money. That is what we fe

"We women say that it is da

Bread, Not Daily Beer

we are praying for now. We thi that is what ought to concern o political leaders.

"We are very much pleased by th ine stand in congress of four Mass husetts representatives, Mr. Dallin er, Mr. Luce, Mr. Underhill and Mr

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

JUN 1 - 1932

WTAM carries the Boston pop concert, played by 85 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at 9 o'clock tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
HERALD

MAY 31 1932

TODAY'S RADIO PROGRAM

An inverse application of the principle of reflection utilized in the automobile headlamp will be made in technical and acoustical preparations for this season's broadcasts of the Boston Pop Concerts from Symphony hall. This principle, which obtains both for sound as well as light enables engineers through the use of the parabolic microphone to deliver a symphonic work with utmost fidelity of tone.

The opening Pops broadcast Wednesday evening at 10 to 10:45 P. M. (EDST) over an NBC-WEAF network will be made under the direction of W. R. Brown and Charles Grey, New York engineers who are widely experienced in the broadcasting of symphonic and operatic concerts. They will arrive in Boston tomorrow under instructions from O. B. Hanson, manager of plant operation and engineering for the National Broadcasting Company, Inc.

The Parabolic reflector microphone, two of which will be installed in front of the right and left side balconies in Symphony hall, is one of many new developments of radio engineers. The new microphone has been widely used by NBC since it was perfected, especially for the broadcast of works in the larger forms. The parabolic mike was brought out when it was found that the ordinary condenser types were frequently unsatisfactory, failing to give proper balance or definition.

Unlike the ordinary microphone, the face of the new one is turned away from the artists participating in a broadcast, while facing the diaphragm is a parabolic reflector. The reflector catches the sound waves, which reflect into the diaphragm of the microphone, thus being focused harmoniously on small diaphragm of the condenser mike.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JUN 1 1932

Boston Symphony Pop Concerts Begin Tonight

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10:45 p. m. over an WEAF coast-to-coast network.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under

Arthur Fiedler

his baton for each of the fire Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
"Masquerade," An American Rhapsody .... McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube .... Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

The orchestra of 85 Symphony players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston, son of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet.

WS SE

National Broadcasting Company, Inc.

Pops Conductor

Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pop Concerts, Who Will Lead an Orchestra of 85 in the June Wednesday-night Series over an NBC-WEAF network.

BOSTON'S POP CONCERTS ON NBC NETWORK

BOSTON, May 00—The Boston Pop Concerts, which annually invest sedate Symphony Hall with the atmosphere of a Bavarian music festival, will find outlet again this season to the nation's music lovers through radio. Beginning Wednesday evening, June 1, a series of five concerts will be broadcast at 10 to 10:45 p. m., E. D. S. T., over an NBC-WEAF network. Station WEEI will originate the programs.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will play under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. One of few native-born conductors, Fiedler in his third season finds his popularity still ascendant. He reflects in every concert his own ardent musical feeling and enthusiasm.

The Pops series will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI, whose voice has been heard for many seasons in broadcasts of the Boston Symphony and Pops orchestras.

NBC engineers will make special arrangements to pick up the Pops from Boston's great musical center—Symphony Hall—and attempt to capture all of the sterling musicianship that has made the Pops Orchestra one of the notable cultural features of the city.

The Observant Citizen

Post Jun 29

Good-by, Venus!

The brightest of all the planets now ceases to be an Evening Star, and today becomes a Morning Star, for the benefit of the milkmen, the night watchmen and others whose duties take them abroad before sunrise.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

If the reader is not included in the legion of night-workers, he might be surprised to discover how early the morning twilight begins, just now.

The first flush of dawn now appears in the east at about three o'clock, Boston time.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Today we have two minutes less sunlight than we had on the first day of summer, but the loss is on the sunrise end of the day, all except a few seconds.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Today, in the church calendar, is the feast of Saints Peter and Paul.

Since the third or fourth century, this date has been celebrated in honor of the two Apostles jointly.

Their names appear together on a great number of churches throughout America and Europe.

In our own city, the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul is at 53 West Broadway, South Boston.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Here is an explanation as to why the leader of a great orchestra conducts even the more familiar numbers from the printed score, instead of from memory.

Boston's distinguished musician, Arthur Fiedler, has kindly given me some idea of the work involved in leading such a fine orchestra as that of the Pops.

I recently mentioned the fact that he conducted "from the book" instead of from memory. He tells me:

"The average musical score, in comparison to a piano part of two lines, has anywhere from eight to 20 lines, designating exactly what each instrument is playing at each moment.

"To memorize this, as you can readily see, is quite a task."

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

The magnitude of the task referred to by Mr. Fiedler is indicated by the following statement as to the past season:

"Since the opening night, May 4, I have conducted 33 different overtures, 15 suites, 18 classical waltzes, 7 rhapsodies, 4 dance numbers, 11 operatic fantasies, 29 marches, 11 musical comedy selections, 4 complete symphonies, 4 pot-pourri, and 130 miscellaneous numbers, including some of the ultra-modern compositions such as 'Soviet Iron Foundry,' 'Pacific,' works by Stravinsky, etc.

"In addition to this I have played 76 different encores.

"If my arithmetic is correct, this makes a total of 345 different compositions performed at the Pops this season.

"The season comprises 56 concerts, which means that I have played an average of over 6 new compositions each night."

Incidentally, it is a fact that Mr. Fiedler does not "use a book" in conducting many of the more frequently played encore numbers.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

The one large work by George Gershwin as yet unheard in Boston will be played at the Pop Concert on Sunday evening, June 19—his Concerto in F major for Piano and Orchestra. It was written on commission from the New York Symphony Orchestra and produced at its concert, under Walter Damrosch, on Dec. 3, 1925. Mr. Gershwin then played the piano-part—"because no one else could." Mr. Sanromá will take it at Symphony Hall. The Concerto runs in three movements: the first, in the rhythm of a Charleston; the second, a tragicomic blues; the third, a breathless finale.

Dances Embroider The Pop Concert

Trans. June 29

FOR a final evening, yesterday, the dance returned to The Pops, drawing to Symphony Hall an audience that filled both floor and balconies. After a concert of seven dance-numbers—German, French, Hungarian, Polish, Russian; after the inevitable Bolero of Ravel in which by this time Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra have become highly specialized, the conductor and a considerable number of his musicians descended to an improvised pit. Upon the stage, hung with the usual drapery, Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and an assisting ensemble of six demoiselles then had their inning. They began with a "Slovakian Peasant Dance," after the usual manner of the kind—bright-colored dress, movements, singly or in group, to lively rhythm, an air of semi-coquettish rusticity. Next a Grotesque Dance by Mr. Ashermann and Miss Dale, both comically masked, affecting humorous gaucherie, moving to the familiar "Moment Musical" of Schubert, which for Terpsichore's sweet sake has been put, by example from Isadora, to strange uses.

Then Mr. Wiener himself in "Circus"—pantomime, touched with parody and interspersed with dancing steps, of the wire-walker, the strong man and other entertainers of the tent, all amusing and review-like. Finally, dances to Strauss's waltz of fascination, "Wine, Woman and Song," in which the demoiselles plied a more or less seductive design and Mr. Wiener ventured leaps and bounds, more or less Russian and conquering. In sum, the dance as amiable and popular entertainment warmly received by an eager audience. It even had Mr. Wiener's "Circus" twice over.

The Pops Conclude Saturday

[illegible] 26

THE POP CONCERTS will bring their 47th season to a close next Saturday, July 2d, in Symphony Hall, when Arthur Fiedler will stress the music of Wagner and of Gershwin, on his final program.

Tomorrow night the Request Program will have its third performance.

On Thursday night, Gershwin's Concerto in F, the first Boston performance of which last Sunday at the Pops was one of the events of the season, will be repeated again with Sanroma as soloist.

Programs follow:

MONDAY

Request Program (Repeated)
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Grieg
Overture Solennelle, "1812" . Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Largo .... Handel
Bolero .... Ravel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz .... Strauss
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma

TUESDAY

"El Capitan," march .... Sousa
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
"Valse Triste" .... Sibelius
"Samson and Delilah," Bacchanale .... Saint-Saens
Facade .... Walton
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Nutcracker," ballet suite .. Tchaikovsky
"Espana," waltz .... Waldteufel
Perpetuum Mobile .... Strauss
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY

"Szechenyi Indulo," march ... Fahrbach
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Third Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Biset
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
"Thais," meditation .... Massenet
(Violin solo: J. Theodorowicz)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
"Of Thee I Sing," selection .... Gershwin
'Loin du Bal" .... Gillet
Cheyenne Indian War Dance ..... Skilton

THURSDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Bat" .... Strauss
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
"Aida" Fantasia .... Verdi
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra .... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"New Moon," selection .... Romberg
Two Fairy Tales .... Komzak
"Only One Vienna," march ... Schrammel

FRIDAY

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ... Berlios
Overture to "Figaro" .... Mozart
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Madame Butterfly," Fantasia .. Puccini
Soviety Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
"Scheherazade," the Prince and the Princess .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ...... Liszt
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
Dubinushka, Russian Folk song Arranged by Jacchia
"Jolly Fellows," waltz .... Vollstedt

SATURDAY

Closing Night
Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Song of the Evening Star, from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Violoncello solo: J. Langendoen
Overture, from "Tannhauser" ... Wagner
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Band Wagon," selection . Schwartz
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
MAY 27 1932

Marsh
One
Ropes Dr
Salem Beverly

peal is by action of house and sen and then ratification by 36 states, said, and she was confident "We'll be dead before that happens."

"There is another way," she adm ted, referring to a possible refere dum. "But there is no presedent it. It opens the way to enormous use of money. That is what we fe "We women say that it is da

Bread, Not Daily Beer

we are praying for now. We thi that is what ought to concern political leaders.

"We are very much pleased by the line stand in congress of four Mass husetts representatives, Mr. Dallin er, Mr. Luce, Mr. Underhill and Mr

---

LAST WEEK OF POPS

[illegible] 26

The Pop concerts will bring their 47th season to a close next Saturday, July 2, in Symphony hall, when Arthur Fiedler will stress the music of Wagner and of Gershwin, on his final program. Tomorrow night the Request program will have its third performance. On Thursday night, Gershwin's Concerto in F, the first Boston performance of which last Sunday at the Pops was one of the events of the season, will be repeated again with Sanroma as soloist.

The programs of the week, assembling what is most popular in the Pops repertory, will be as follows:

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 27

Request Program (repeated)
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Grieg
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" .. Tschaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Largo .... Handel
Bolero .... Ravel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz .... Strauss
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma

TUESDAY EVENING

"El Capitan," march .... Sousa
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
"Valse Trieste" .... Sibelius
"Samson and Delilah," Bacchanale Saint-Saens
Facade .... Walton
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Nut Cracker," ballet suite .... Tchaikovsky
"Espana," waltz .... Waldteufel
Perpetuum Mobile .... Strauss
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Szechenyi Indulo," march ...... Fahrbach
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Third Slavonic Dance .... Dvorak
"Carmen," Fantasia .... Bizet
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
"Thais," Meditation .... Massenet
(Violin solo—J. Theodorowicz)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
"Of Thee I Sing," selection ...... Gershwin
"Loin du Bal" .... Gillet
Cheyenne Indian War Dance .... Skilton

THURSDAY EVENING

Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Overture to "The Bat" .... Strauss
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
"Aida," Fantasia .... Verdi
Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra .... Gershwin
Soloist—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"New Moon," Selection .... Romberg
Two Fairy Tales .... Komzak
"Only One Vienna," march ..... Schrammel

FRIDAY EVENING

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" .... Berlioz
Overture to "Figaro" .... Mozart
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Madame Butterfly," Fantasia ..... Puccini
Soviety Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
"Scheherazade," The Prince and the Princess .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
Dubinushka, Russian Folk Song Arranged by Jacchia
"Jolly Fellows," waltz .... Vollstedt

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 2

Closing Night
Entrance of the Guests Into the Warburg. Song to the Evening Star (violoncello solo, J. Langendoen). Overture.... From "Tannhauser," Wagner
"Pomp and Circumstance" .... Elgar
Country Gardens .... Grainger
Marche Slav .... Tchaikovsky
"Rhapsody in Blue" .... Gershwin
Piano solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Band Wagon," selection ..... Schwartz
"Prayer of Thanksgiving" (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
"Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUN 1 1932

RADIO NEWS

FIEDLER CONDUCTS BOSTON "POP"

Modern and Classic Airs Included in Radio Program

Hartford, June 1—Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard from 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductor, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon" Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries" Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
JUN 1 - 1932

WTAM carries the Boston pop concert, played by 85 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at 9 o'clock tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
HERALD

MAY 31 1932

TODAY'S RADIO PROGRAM

An inverse application of the principle of reflection utilized in the automobile headlamp will be made in technical and acoustical preparations for this season's broadcasts of the Boston Pop Concerts from Symphony hall. This principle, which obtains both for sound as well as light enables engineers through the use of the parabolic microphone to deliver a symphonic work with utmost fidelity of tone.

The opening Pops broadcast Wednesday evening at 10 to 10:45 P. M. (EDST) over an NBC-WEAF network will be made under the direction of W. R. Brown and Charles Grey, New York engineers who are widely experienced in the broadcasting of symphonic and operatic concerts. They will arrive in Boston tomorrow under instructions from O. B. Hanson, manager of plant operation and engineering for the National Broadcasting Company, Inc.

The Parabolic reflector microphone, two of which will be installed in front of the right and left side balconies in Symphony hall, is one of many new developments of radio engineers. The new microphone has been widely used by NBC since it was perfected, especially for the broadcast of works in the larger forms. The parabolic mike was brought out when it was found that the ordinary condenser types were frequently unsatisfactory, failing to give proper balance or definition.

Unlike the ordinary microphone, the face of the new one is turned away from the artists participating in a broadcast, while facing the diaphragm is a parabolic reflector. The reflector catches the sound waves, which reflect into the diaphragm of the microphone, thus being focused harmoniously on small diaphragm of the condenser mike.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
JUN 1 1932

Boston Symphony Pop Concerts Begin Tonight

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10:45 p. m. over an WEAF coast-to-coast network.

Arthur Fiedler

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the fire Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:

Overture to "Oberon" .... Weber
"Masquerade," An American Rhapsody .... McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube" .... Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

The orchestra of 85 Symphony players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston, son of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

JUN 1 - 1932

June Programs of Boston Pop Concert on Air

WTIC Wil Jolin NBC Network for Broadcast from Symphony Hall Tonight.

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first progam of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard from 10 to 10.45 over WTIC and NBC coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. His inaugural broadcast will include the following numbers:

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Masquerade, an American Rhapsody	McKinley
By the Beautiful Blue Danube	Strauss
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 1 - 1932

Fiddler Conducts First Boston "Pop"

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon"................Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"...Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries"........Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new hight of popularity. Mr Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 1 - 1932

FIEDLER CONDUCTS FIRST BOSTON "POP"

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon"................Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"...Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries"........Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new hight of popularity. Mr Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, OHIO
TIMES-PRESS

JUN 1 - 1932

WTAM, at 9, broadcasts the first of a series of "Pop Concerts" by the Boston Symphony orchestra, playing from Symphony hall, Boston.

Grace Moore, WTAM at 8, sings "Wanting You" and "The Desert Song." Others on the program are the Revelers and Wilfred Pelletier's orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN
HERALD

JUN 1 1932

Through the Static

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston "Pop Concerts," beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10:45 p. m., over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 1 1932

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony Hall, the first of a series of pop concerts will be heard over a NBC-WEAF network, through station WEEI, at 10 o'clock tonight. The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler. The series willl be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI.

Every Wednesday evening in June NBC will present one of these Fiedler concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, O.
ADVOCATE

JUN 1 - 1932

* * *

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony hall, the first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over WEAF network through Station WEEI, Boston, tonight, at 9 p. m. The Pops orchestra is composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
JOURNAL

JUN 1 - 1932

The first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over WEAF and NBC chain at 9 o'clock. The orchestra composed of eighty-five musicians of the Boston Symphony.

9

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN

Hanover Pa.

JUN 1 1932

On The Air

The initial concert in the series of Boston "Pops" will be heard this evening at 9 o'clock from WEAF and associated stations, with Arthur Fiedler conducting an orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The concert will come from Symphony Hall in Boston. Opening with the overture to "Oberon," by Weber, the program will continue with "Masquerade," McKinley, and "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss, and conclude with "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner. The program is scheduled to last 45 minutes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM .TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

JUN 1 - 1932

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony hall, the first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network, through station WEEI, Boston, Wednesday, at 9 P. M. The Pops orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler, one of a few native-born conductors.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

JUN 1 - 1932

* * *

FIRST of a series of Boston Symphony programs is relayed by WTAM at 9 tonight . . . with Will Cuppy, clam-digging hermit of Jones Island, telling WGAR dialers "How to Tell Your Friends From Apes" tomorrow at 4. Yolanda Norris, who is a singer despite the fact that she was born on a snake farm in Brazil, appears on the program with him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ARLINGTON, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 2 1932

Boston Pops Now On "Air

Modern and classical compositions shared importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts which began last evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, was heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI was the announcer.

ARTHUR FIELDER
Conductor of the Boston Pop Concerts, whose baton will actuate an orchestra of 85 musicians in the June Wednesday night series to be broadcast over an NBC-WEAF network

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the next four Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony.

The Pop concerts, now in the 47th season, are a summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are likewise given at Symphony Hall—the Orchestra's special home. They follow the European custom, otherwise scarcely known in this country, of combining a symphonic program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables where one may drink, smoke or converse with one's friends while listening to music. The Orchestra of 85 Symphony Players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

ARTHUR F. EDES
WEEI program director, who will announce the coming series of Boston Pop Concerts over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet.

Fiedler obtained his education in Boston, completed his musical studies in Europe, and returned to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when still a young man. He is known not only as the conductor of the Pops, but as the conductor of the Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River in mid-summer, the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the MacDowell Club and his own Boston Sinfonietta. The abilities of this leader are familiar to the radio public for previous Pops broadcasts, Esplanade Concerts and smaller groups which he has led before the microphone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HAVERHILL, MASS
EVE. GAZETTE

JUN 2 1932

MUSIC MIS

News Notes

The Pops, fifth week of their 47th season, at Boston Symphony hall, will prove the ingenuity of Arthur Fiedler, conductor, when programs of special character will be given in honor of groups that are a part of the Pops season. New England Conservatory will have its annual evening Wednesday, June 1. The Longy school, Cambridge, will receive its initial honor from the Pops, Thursday, June 2. Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which has annually been the gayest of special nights, will conclude the week Saturday evening, June 4, when Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano solo in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." The following evening, Sunday, June 4, Sanroma will play with Mme. Longy-Miquelle, Mozart's Concerto in E flat for two pianos. Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" will be played for the first time in Symphony hall at the third of this season's Sunday Pops.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.

JUN 3 1932

POPS ATTENDED BY PARTY OF 16

Sixteen members of the Brockton Business and Professional Women's club formed a party Thursday night to attend the pops of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall, Boston, when Business and Professional Women's club night was observed. The trip was made in the cars of Miss Helen Megathlin, Miss Lillian Rowe and Miss Ethel Clement. Plans for reservations were in charge of the recreation committee, Miss Marion H. Ellis, chairman, Miss Therese Courteau, Miss Edith Carter, Miss Phyllis Reynolds, Miss Gertrude Brownell and Miss Elizabeth Kites.

Those in the party included Miss Helen Megathlin, Miss A. Gertrude Adams, Miss Lillian Hooper, Miss Ada Crocker, Dr. Isobel Miles, Miss Lillian Rowe, Miss Mabel Walker, Miss Annie White, Miss Hazel Lindsay, Miss Edith Hammond, Miss Alice Maddox, Miss Ethel Clement, Miss Elizabeth Brown, Miss Celina Dudley, Miss Lenore Brown and Miss Marion H. Ellis. The annual club outing will be June 14.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JUN 8 1932

Boston Orchestra Tonight In Notable Program

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violine concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10:45 p. m. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "Le Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire first violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this bit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SOUTH BEND, IND.
NEWS TIMES

JUN 5 1932

HALF N

By Jay Walz

A series of summer concerts to be broadcast by the Boston Concert orchestra got underway Wednesday night with Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, presenting a mixed program of modern and classical compositions.

There are to be five Wednesday night broadcasts altogether in this series, and the 85 musicians playing under Mr. Fiedler's baton are drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The concerts, now in the 47th season, are really a summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are given at Symphony hall—the orchestra's home.

They follow the European custom of combining a musical program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables, where one may drink, smoke or converse with friends while listening to the orchestra.

# #

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a Bostonian, son of Emanuel Fiedler, a German musician, who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

For his first concert, broadcast Wednesday night by the National Broadcasting Co., Mr. Fiedler of-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ARLINGTON, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 8 1932

THIS CLIPPING FROM MEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

JUN 8 - 1932

Pop Concert On Air Tonight

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violin concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10.45 P. M. (EDST). Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "The Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this hit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

This second broadcast tonight in the 47th. season of Boston Pops will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI. It is his second season of fellowship with Pop broadcasts and the huge parabolic microphones used by NBC engineers in the pick-up of Symphony Hall concerts.

The Boston symphony pop concert is scheduled by KGO for 45 minutes beginning at 6 and the summer symphony from Rochester comes at 7:15 for a quarter hour over the same station.

5

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

JUN 1 - 1932

June Programs of Boston Pop Concert on Air

WTIC Wil Jolin NBC Network for Broadcast from Symphony Hall Tonight.

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first progam of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard from 10 to 10.45 over WTIC and NBC coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. His inaugural broadcast will include the following numbers:

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Masquerade, an American Rhapsody	McKinley
By the Beautiful Blue Danube	Strauss
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 1 - 1932

Fiddler Conducts First Boston "Pop"

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon"................	Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody	McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"...	Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries"........	Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new hight of popularity. Mr Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

---

of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon"................	Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody	McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"...	Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries"........	Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new hight of popularity. Mr Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, OHIO
TIMES-PRESS

JUN 1 - 1932

WTAM, at 9, broadcasts the first of a series of "Pop Concerts" by the Boston Symphony orchestra, playing from Symphony hall, Boston.

Grace Moore, WTAM at 8, sings "Wanting You" and "The Desert Song." Others on the program are the Revelers and Wilfred Pelletier's orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN
HERALD

JUN 1 1932

Through the Static

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston "Pop Concerts," beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10:45 p. m., over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 1 1932

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony Hall, the first of a series of pop concerts will be heard over a NBC-WEAF network, through station WEEI, at 10 o'clock tonight. The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler. The series willl be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI.

Every Wednesday evening in June NBC will present one of these Fiedler concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, O.
ADVOCATE

JUN 1 - 1932

* * *

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony hall, the first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over WEAF network through Station WEEI, Boston, tonight, at 9 p. m. The Pops orchestra is composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
JOURNAL

JUN 1 - 1932

The first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over WEAF and NBC chain at 9 o'clock. The orchestra composed of eighty-five musicians of the Boston Symphony.

9

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN

Shenandoah Pa.

JUN 1 1932

On The Air

The initial concert in the series of Boston "Pops" will be heard this evening at 9 o'clock from WEAF and associated stations, with Arthur Fiedler conducting an orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The concert will come from Symphony Hall in Boston. Opening with the overture to "Oberon," by Weber, the program will continue with "Masquerade," McKinley, and "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss, and conclude with "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner. The program is scheduled to last 45 minutes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

JUN 1 - 1932

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony hall, the first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network, through station WEEI, Boston, Wednesday, at 9 P. M. The Pops orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler, one of a few native-born conductors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

JUN 1 - 1932

* * *

FIRST of a series of Boston Symphony programs is relayed by WTAM at 9 tonight . . . with Will Cuppy, clam-digging hermit of Jones Island, telling WGAR dialers "How to Tell Your Friends From Apes" tomorrow at 4. Yolanda Norris, who is a singer despite the fact that she was born on a snake farm in Brazil, appears on the program with him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ARLINGTON, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 2 1932

Boston Pops Now On "Air

Modern and classical compos tions shared importance in t first program of a June rad series of Boston Pop Concer which began last evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, was heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI was the announcer.

ARTHUR FIELDER
Conductor of the Boston Pop Concerts, whose baton will actuate an orchestra of 85 musicians in the June Wednesday night series to be broadcast over an NBC-WEAF network

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the next four Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony.

The Pop concerts, now in the 47th season, are a summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are likewise given at Symphony Hall—the Orchestra's special home. They follow the European custom, otherwise scarcely known in this country, of combining a symphonic program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables where one may drink, smoke or converse with one's friends while listening to music. The Orchestra of 85 Symphony Players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

ARTHUR F. EDES
WEEI program director, who will announce the coming series of Boston Pop Concerts over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet.

Fiedler obtained his education in Boston, completed his musical studies in Europe, and returned to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when still a young man. He is known not only as the conductor of the Pops, but as the conductor of the Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River in mid-summer, the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the MacDowell Club and his own Boston Sinfonietta. The abilities of this leader are familiar to the radio public for previous Pops broadcasts, Esplanade Concerts and smaller groups which he has led before the microphone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HAVERHILL, MASS
EVE. GAZETTE

JUN 2 1932

MUSIC MIS

News Notes

The Pops, fifth week of their 47th season, at Boston Symphony hall, will prove the ingenuity of Arthur Fiedler, conductor, when programs of special character will be given in honor of groups that are a part of the Pops season. New England Conservatory will have its annual evening Wednesday, June 1. The Longy school, Cambridge, will receive its initial honor from the Pops, Thursday, June 2. Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which has annually been the gayest of special nights, will conclude the week Saturday evening, June 4, when Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano solo in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." The following evening, Sunday, June 4, Sanroma will play with Mme. Longy-Miquelle, Mozart's Concerto in E flat for two pianos. Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" will be played for the first time in Symphony hall at the third of this season's Sunday Pops.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.

JUN 3 1932

POPS ATTENDED BY PARTY OF 16

Sixteen members of the Brockton Business and Professional Women's club formed a party Thursday night to attend the pops of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall, Boston, when Business and Professional Women's club night was observed. The trip was made in the cars of Miss Helen Megathlin, Miss Lillian Rowe and Miss Ethel Clement. Plans for reservations were in charge of the recreation committee, Miss Marion H. Ellis, chairman, Miss Therese Courteau, Miss Edith Carter, Miss Phyllis Reynolds, Miss Gertrude Brownell and Miss Elizabeth Kites.

Those in the party included Miss Helen Megathlin, Miss A. Gertrude Adams, Miss Lillian Hooper, Miss Ada Crocker, Dr. Isobel Miles, Miss Lillian Rowe, Miss Mabel Walker, Miss Annie White, Miss Hazel Lindsay, Miss Edith Hammond, Miss Alice Maddox, Miss Ethel Clement, Miss Elizabeth Brown, Miss Celina Dudley, Miss Lenore Brown and Miss Marion H. Ellis. The annual club outing will be June 14.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JUN 8 1932

Boston Orchestra Tonight In Notable Program

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violine concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10:45 p. m. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "Le Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire first violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this bit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SOUTH BEND, IND.
NEWS TIMES

JUN 5 1932

HALF N

By Jay Walz

A series of summer concerts to be broadcast by the Boston Concert orchestra got underway Wednesday night with Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, presenting a mixed program of modern and classical compositions.

There are to be five Wednesday night broadcasts altogether in this series, and the 85 musicians playing under Mr. Fiedler's baton are drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The concerts, now in the 47th season, are really a summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are given at Symphony hall—the orchestra's home.

They follow the European custom of combining a musical program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables, where one may drink, smoke or converse with friends while listening to the orchestra.

# #

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a Bostonian, son of Emanuel Fiedler, a German musician, who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

For his first concert, broadcast Wednesday night by the National Broadcasting Co., Mr. Fiedler of-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ARLINGTON, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 8 1932

Pop Concert On Air Tonight

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violin concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10.45 P. M. (EDST). Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "The Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this hit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

This second broadcast tonight in the 47th. season of Boston Pops will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI. It is his second season of fellowship with Pop broadcasts and the huge parabolic microphones used by NBC engineers in the pick-up of Symphony Hall concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OAKLAND, CALIF.
POST-ENQUIRER

JUN 8 - 1932

The Boston symphony pop concert is scheduled by KGO for 45 minutes beginning at 6 and the summer symphony from Rochester comes at 7:15 for a quarter hour over the same station.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

JUN 1 - 1932

June Programs of Boston Pop Concert on Air

WTIC Wil Jolin NBC Network for Broadcast from Symphony Hall Tonight.

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first progam of a June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard from 10 to 10.45 over WTIC and NBC coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony. His inaugural broadcast will include the following numbers:

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Masquerade, an American Rhapsody	McKinley
By the Beautiful Blue Danube	Strauss
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 1 - 1932

Fiddler Conducts First Boston "Pop"

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon"...............Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"...Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries"........Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new hight of popularity. Mr Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

---

of a June radio series of Boston Pop concerts, beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over WTIC. Arthur F. Edes of station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony. His inaugural Pops broadcast will include the following numbers:—

Overture to "Oberon"...............Weber
"Masquerade," an American Rhapsody McKinley
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube"...Strauss
"The Ride of the Valkyries"........Wagner

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new hight of popularity. Mr Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, OHIO
TIMES-PRESS

JUN 1 - 1932

WTAM, at 9, broadcasts the first of a series of "Pop Concerts" by the Boston Symphony orchestra, playing from Symphony hall, Boston.

Grace Moore, WTAM at 8, sings "Wanting You" and "The Desert Song." Others on the program are the Revelers and Wilfred Pelletier's orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN
HERALD

JUN 1 1932

Through the Static

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the first program of a June radio series of Boston "Pop Concerts," beginning this evening from Symphony hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard at 10 to 10:45 p. m., over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI will be the announcer.

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 1 1932

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony Hall, the first of a series of pop concerts will be heard over a NBC-WEAF network, through station WEEI, at 10 o'clock tonight. The Pops Orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler. The series willl be announced by Arthur F. Edes of WEEI.

Every Wednesday evening in June NBC will present one of these Fiedler concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, O.
ADVOCATE

JUN 1 - 1932

* * *

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony hall, the first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over WEAF network through Station WEEI, Boston, tonight, at 9 p. m. The Pops orchestra is composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
POTTSVILLE, PA.
JOURNAL

JUN 1 - 1932

The first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over WEAF and NBC chain at 9 o'clock. The orchestra composed of eighty-five musicians of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SUN

Baltimore Md.

JUN 1 1932

On The Air

The initial concert in the series of Boston "Pops" will be heard this evening at 9 o'clock from WEAF and associated stations, with Arthur Fiedler conducting an orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The concert will come from Symphony Hall in Boston. Opening with the overture to "Oberon," by Weber, the program will continue with "Masquerade," McKinley, and "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss, and conclude with "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner. The program is scheduled to last 45 minutes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
JUN 1 - 1932

From Boston's great musical center, Symphony hall, the first of a series of Pop Concerts will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network, through station WEEI, Boston, Wednesday, at 9 P. M. The Pops orchestra, composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler, one of a few native-born conductors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

JUN 1 - 1932

* * *

FIRST of a series of Boston Symphony programs is relayed by WTAM at 9 tonight . . . with Will Cuppy, clam-digging hermit of Jones Island, telling WGAR dialers "How to Tell Your Friends From Apes" tomorrow at 4. Yolanda Norris, who is a singer despite the fact that she was born on a snake farm in Brazil, appears on the program with him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ARLINGTON, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 2 1932

Boston Pops Now On "Air

Modern and classical compostions shared importance in th first program of a June rad series of Boston Pop Concer which began last evening from Symphony Hall. The opening broadcast, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, was heard at 10 to 10.45 p. m. over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI was the announcer.

ARTHUR FIELDER
Conductor of the Boston Pop Concerts, whose baton will actuate an orchestra of 85 musicians in the June Wednesday night series to be broadcast over an NBC-WEAF network

Mr. Fiedler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the next four Wednesday evening broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony.

The Pop concerts, now in the 47th season, are a summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are likewise given at Symphony Hall—the Orchestra's special home. They follow the European custom, otherwise scarcely known in this country, of combining a symphonic program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables where one may drink, smoke or converse with one's friends while listening to music. The Orchestra of 85 Symphony Players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

ARTHUR F. EDES
WEEI program director, who will announce the coming series of Boston Pop Concerts over an NBC-WEAF coast-to-coast network

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet.

Fiedler obtained his education in Boston, completed his musical studies in Europe, and returned to become a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when still a young man. He is known not only as the conductor of the Pops, but as the conductor of the Esplanade Concerts on the Charles River in mid-summer, the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the MacDowell Club and his own Boston Sinfonietta. The abilities of this leader are familiar to the radio public for previous Pops broadcasts, Esplanade Concerts and smaller groups which he has led before the microphone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HAVERHILL, MASS
EVE. GAZETTE

JUN 2 1932

MUSIC MIS

News Notes

The Pops, fifth week of their 47th season, at Boston Symphony hall, will prove the ingenuity of Arthur Fiedler, conductor, when programs of special character will be given in honor of groups that are a part of the Pops season. New England Conservatory will have its annual evening Wednesday, June 1. The Longy school, Cambridge, will receive its initial honor from the Pops, Thursday, June 2. Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which has annually been the gayest of special nights, will conclude the week Saturday evening, June 4, when Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the piano solo in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." The following evening, Sunday, June 4, Sanroma will play with Mme. Longy-Miquelle, Mozart's Concerto in E flat for two pianos. Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" will be played for the first time in Symphony hall at the third of this season's Sunday Pops.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.

JUN 3 1932

POPS ATTENDED BY PARTY OF 16

Sixteen members of the Brockton Business and Professional Women's club formed a party Thursday night to attend the pops of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall, Boston, when Business and Professional Women's club night was observed. The trip was made in the cars of Miss Helen Megathlin, Miss Lillian Rowe and Miss Ethel Clement. Plans for reservations were in charge of the recreation committee, Miss Marion H. Ellis, chairman, Miss Therese Courteau, Miss Edith Carter, Miss Phyllis Reynolds, Miss Gertrude Brownell and Miss Elizabeth Kites.

Those in the party included Miss Helen Megathlin, Miss A. Gertrude Adams, Miss Lillian Hooper, Miss Ada Crocker, Dr. Isobel Miles, Miss Lillian Rowe, Miss Mabel Walker, Miss Annie White, Miss Hazel Lindsay, Miss Edith Hammond, Miss Alice Maddox, Miss Ethel Clement, Miss Elizabeth Brown, Miss Celina Dudley, Miss Lenore Brown and Miss Marion H. Ellis. The annual club outing will be June 14.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JUN 8 1932

Boston Orchestra Tonight In Notable Program

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violine concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10:45 p. m. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "Le Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire first violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this bit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SOUTH BEND, IND.
NEWS TIMES

JUN 5 1932

HALF N

By Jay Walz

A series of summer concerts to be broadcast by the Boston Concert orchestra got underway Wednesday night with Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, presenting a mixed program of modern and classical compositions.

There are to be five Wednesday night broadcasts altogether in this series, and the 85 musicians playing under Mr. Fiedler's baton are drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The concerts, now in the 47th season, are really a summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are given at Symphony hall—the orchestra's home.

They follow the European custom of combining a musical program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables, where one may drink, smoke or converse with friends while listening to the orchestra.

# #

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a Bostonian, son of Emanuel Fiedler, a German musician, who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

For his first concert, broadcast Wednesday night by the National Broadcasting Co., Mr. Fiedler offered Weber's overture to "Oberon," "Masquerade," an American rhapsody by Carl McKinley, Strauss' "Blue Danube Waltzes," and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

# #

and C sack
we

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violin concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10.45 P. M. (EDST). Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "The Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this hit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

This second broadcast tonight in the 47th. season of Boston Pops will be announced by Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI. It is his second season of fellowship with Pop broadcasts and the huge parabolic microphones used by NBC engineers in the pick-up of Symphony Hall concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OAKLAND, CALIF.
POST-ENQUIRER

JUN 8 - 1932

The Boston symphony pop concert is scheduled by KGO for 45 minutes beginning at 6 and the summer symphony from Rochester comes at 7:15 for a quarter hour over the same station.

226

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEADER
Rockville, Conn

JUN 8 1932

"Masquerade" by Carl McKinley, was heard over the radio on Thursday evening played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, at one of their popular concerts. Mr. McKinley who was in the audience was called to the stage by continued applause. This composition is being played by all leading orchestras here, and in Germany.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

JUN 8 1932

Boston Orchestra Tonight In Notable Program

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violine concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10:45 p. m. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "Le Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire first violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this bit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JUN 8 1932

BOSTON 'POPS' HEARD ON WWJ

Arthur Fiedler Directs 85 Musicians in Light Summer Music.

By ROBERT KELLY.

The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again are well into their early summer popular music season. This is a fact now known to the entire nation since one of these delightful light programs already has been broadcast from Symphony Hall in the Hub. Here is the setting which WWJ listeners may visualize as they hear tonight's program at 9:15 o'clock. The vast cool reaches of Symphony Hall with the orchestra chairs removed and replaced by tables. The decorations in green. Yellow-attired waitresses moving about among the tables serving soft drinks and sandwiches. Eighty-five musicians, directed by Arthur Fiedler, playing the more melodious classics, a modern trifle now and then, or something from musical comedy. An effort has been made to create the atmosphere of a "European evening."

• • • •

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 12 1932

POP CONCERTS TO CHANGE SCHEDULE

Will Broadcast Saturday Nights For Final Three Programs—Hour Altered, Too

Availing itself of a preferential broadcast period made available by the National Broadcasting company, the Symphony Hall management of the Boston Pop concerts has announced a change in schedule for the last three programs. The Pops, which have been heard on Wednesday evenings at 10 to 10.45 over an NBC-WEAF network, will hereafter be broadcast on Saturday evenings at 9.15 to 10 over the same network.

The first program under the new schedule will be next Saturday evening the Pops series concluding with the broadcast on July 2. No further change will be made in the schedule it was stated. The remaining programs will be under the conductorship of Arthur Fiedler and will be announced, as in the past, by Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI.

While broadcasting of Pops is a comparatively recent innovation at Symphony hall, the concerts themselves date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only ~~four years~~ old. The project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season was then started. They were modeled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables installed, so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a Strauss waltz or a march by Sousa.

The experiment was an immediate success. The "Promenade Concerts" soon came to be called "Pops"—whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks, no one has ever determined. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved to its own splendid auditorium, Symphony hall, then just completed.

Many conductors have come and gone, among them Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski, Andre Maquarre, Gustave Strube. The last three Pops conductors have been Agide Jacchia, who stressed the musical side; Alfred Sasella, the distinguished Italian composer-conductor-pianist, and Mr Fiedler, under whom the Pops have taken on a new and youthful vitality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 12 1932

FIEDLER CONDUCTS HUB POP CONCERTS

Modern, Classical Works Played Over Radio by Symphony

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts which began last Wednesday night from Symphony hall. The broadcasts, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, are heard at 10 o'clock over WTAG. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI is the announcer.

M. Feidler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday night broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the rangs of the Boston Symphony.

The ~~Pop~~ concerts, now in the 47th season, are a Summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are likewise given at Symphony hall—the chestra's special home. They follow the European custom, otherwise scarcely known in this county, of combining a symphonic program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables where one may drink, smoke or converse with one's friends while listening to music. The orchestra of 85 symphony players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
POST

JUN 15 1932

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "POPS."

The radio last week served to demonstrate that the Boston Symphony orchestra "Pops" are still flourishing in full vigor. Not only concerts delightful in themselves, but recalling to countless numbers scattered over the entire land the joys and days gone by.

For more than forty years these "Pops" have been an essential feature of summer life in Boston. And what national catacylsms have they not survived?

When the U. S. A. went on the water waggon the wise ones shook their mournful heads saying, "It is all over with the 'Pops.' Cannot run such concerts without beer an pretzels."

Nobody would dispute that beer and pretzels form a joyful addition to the pleasure of summer concerts. But, nevertheless, Bosto continued to make the grade though servin only soft drinks.

Even this present so-called depression ha not overwhelmed them in its universal disaste Over forty years of age—and still going stron despite no beer and no money.

Can be done in effete and tottering eas but, seemingly, not in the young and lust west. Now, Watson, what would you make that?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, OHIO
TIMES-PRESS

JUN 18 1932

SYMPHONY ON AIR TONIGHT

Pop Concert is Scheduled From Boston

By MARTIN STOVER

POP concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra become a Saturday feature beginning today.

Tonight's program, WTAM, 8:15-9, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler, widely known conductor, and relayed from Symphony Hall, Boston. Heretofore, the pop programs have been heard on Wednesday.

A second program to look out for is the address by Charles Francis Coe, author-newspaperman, WGAR at 9, on "The Next Heavyweight Champion—Sharkey or Schmeling." As an added attraction a German sports authority will be heard from Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JUN 24 1932

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "POPS."

(Chicago Post.)

The radio last week served to demonstrate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra "Pops" are still flourishing in full vigor. Not only concerts delightful in themselves, but recalling to countless numbers scattered over the entire land the joys and days gone by.

For more than forty years these "Pops" have been an essential feature of summer life in Boston. And what national cataclysms have they not survived?

When the U. S. A. went on the water wagon the wise ones shook their mournful heads, saying, "it is all over with the 'Pops.' Cannot run such concerts without beer and pretzels."

Nobody would dispute that beer and pretzels form a joyful addition to the pleasures of summer concerts. But nevertheless Boston continued to make the grade though serving only soft drinks.

Even this present so-called depression has not overwhelmed them in its universal disaster. Over forty years of age—and still going strong despite no beer and no money.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

JUN 19 1932

Theodore Cella, first harpist of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, conducted his own composition, "On a Trans-Atlantic Liner," at a "Pop" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on June

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JUN 26 1932

BOSTON'S "POP" CONCERTS

BOSTON, June 22, 1932.

DESPITE the depression, the Boston "Pops" have been astonishingly successful this season, sold-out houses being an almost nightly circumstance. It has been customary to begin the "Pops" season at the end of May, but this year, in the hope of stimulating thought away from business distress, the opening concert took place in the middle of May, and interest in the programs has been cumulative to a degree that insures a season of open-air concerts on the Charles River Esplanade after the Fourth of July. This latter series of concerts is free, and is played by the same orchestra.

The conductor of the "Pops" this season, as last, is Arthur Fiedler, a product of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and with a personnel of eighty-five members of that musical body he has been enabled to present his programs with an effectiveness that has made these concerts as much a Boston institution almost as any of its historical shrines. With the added incentive of a reduced scale of prices of admission, and the usual sale of near-beer and soft drinks with the privilege of smoking on the auditorium floor, the possibility of self-maintenance for the Summer season of music is exceedingly bright.

When the programs offer symphonic music it is in the form of one movement from one of the symphonies, but otherwise the selections are of the lighter and immediately popular numbers, and Mr. Fiedler is as generous in encores as he is catholic in his program-making. Such a method of concert-giving is naturally provocative of requests for certain compositions, but instead of spreading these over his regular programs, Mr. Fiedler sets aside a night when the concert is devoted wholly to request numbers. A specimen program of this nature is this one played on the night of June 16:

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Peer Gynt, suite	Grieg
Overture, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Largo	Handel
Bolero	Ravel
Blue Danube, waltz	Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin

The last number with Jesús María Sanromá as piano soloist was sensational in its riotous applause.

of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was drafted from a retirement that had made him almost a legendary personage, and he conducted a composition he had favored in those "Pops" of the nineties.

On the program of "The Gay Nineties" the soloist was Sanromá, and the young señor entered heartily into the spirit of the affair. His appearance was made with all the savoir-faire of a gay blade of the end of the century, dark coat of extreme cutaway fashion, light trousers and white gloves that insisted on cleaving to the fingers when he was ready to play. Whereupon he sat down at the piano, and with them played "The Maiden's Prayer" with all the solemnity and flourish that any young lady's academy might have taught.

There was some question among the younger element as to the authenticity of many of the costumes worn at "The Gay Nineties"; youth would not be satisfied that Time so little removed could furnish so great a divergence in the character of dress and its accessories. But an incident revealed in one particular case (names withheld) confirms the assurance of strict periodicity. The gowns worn by one large party of young ladies came from the same wardrobe. One of these on being removed gave out a peculiar rustle, and an examination of the pocket oh, yes, the ladies wore pockets in the back of their dresses in those days recovered a program of a Harvard commencement in 1899 and a ticket for the affair. The story of that particular gown as revealed by inquiry was this: The dress had been worn at the commencement exercises by the original owner, whose son was one of the graduates. On reaching home that night a telegram was received telling of another son's grave illness in Texas, and asking for the presence of the parents. The dress was hurriedly removed and thrown upon the bed, and a traveling costume donned for the journey, the dress later being hung in the wardrobe with similar wearing apparel, there to remain until "The Gay Nineties" called it forth for the delight of a new generation.

A matter of comment at the Boston "Pops" is the great number of young people who have been attracted to the music without the incentive of strong drink. As is usual at concerts of this kind, certain compositions appeal strongly to the popular taste and are called for again and again during a season. The work that has struck the most responsive chord in the hearts of this Summer's audiences at the "Pops" is Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing." In this Presidential election year this might be significant.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UTICA, N. Y.
PRESS

2 1932

MUSICIANS' FORUM

The stay-at-homes are having an opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its ~~pop~~ concerts during the month of June, by way of the National Broadcasting Company, which presents the final section of the "pop" direct from Symphony Hall, Boston. This popular concert program, which is a great favorite with Bostonians, may be heard from 9:15 to 10 p. m., D.S.T., over a nationwide WEAF network, on Saturday, June 25 and July 2.

Do you know that Boston is the only city this side of Europe that is privileged to enjoy this kind of "European evening?" Entering, you find Symphony Hall decorated in cool green, the usual orchestra chairs replaced by tables, many of which have been reserved by the club or organization sponsoring the evening's concert. Attractively attired waitresses stand at the sides ready to serve soft drinks, coffee and sandwiches. Imagine yourselves seated with friends about a table listening to Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, Tschaikowsky, as well as those of the modern school. No noise is permitted during the rendition of numbers. The orchestra is liberal in the matter of encores, and the large, enthusiastic, cultured audience watches eagerly for the appearing of the large card announcing the title of the encore.

We quote from the Christian Science Monitor:

"The Pop Concert Orchestra is composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, son of a former conductor and an excellent musician in his own right. A native-born conductor, Mr. Fiedler, in his third season, has been very successful in gauging musical feeling. Whether it be such a trifle as Schubert's 'Traumerei,' Tchaikovsky's 'Fourth Symphony,' Ravel's 'Bolero,' the extremely noisy 'Soviet Iron Foundry,' or music from 'The Cat and the Fiddle,' Mr. Fiedler's concert schedule has been pliable enough to meet all demands.

"Arthur F. Edes, program director and announcer of WEEI, will provide the program notes and announce for the radio audience."

226

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEADER
Rockville, Conn
JUN 3 1932

"Masquerade" by Carl McKinley, was heard over the radio on Thurs. day evening played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, at one of their popular concerts. Mr. McKinley who was in the audience was called to the stage by continued applause. This composition is being played by all leading orchestras here, and in Germany.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
JUN 8 1932

Boston Orchestra Tonight In Notable Program

Choice excerpts from the operatic works of the popular neo-Russians, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Mendelssohn's great violine concerto form important elements in the second Boston Pop Concert to be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup tonight from Symphony Hall. Scored for an orchestra of 85 musicians, comprising nearly four-fifths of the full membership of Boston Symphony, this evening's brilliant program offerings will be heard over an NBC-WEAF network at 10 to 10:45 p. m. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or," a fascinating work by Rimsky-Korsakov, will open the third and broadcast section of the Pops program. Distinguished for its originality and finished workmanship, "Le Coq d'Or" is the best known of his operas in this country.

A striking divertissement this evening will be the Finale of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn in the performance of which the entire first violin section of the Pops Orchestra will play the solo part. Light, swift, masterly in theme and treatment, this bit from the only violin concerto Mendelssohn ever wrote, will be the tour de force of the broadcast. Critics hold it as one of the few great works in its class.

The third offering is an old Dutch hymn "Prayer of Thanksgiving" arranged for symphonic performance by Kremser. As its final number the Pop Orchestra will essay the capricious rhythms of the majestic Overture Solennelle "1812" by Tchaikovsky. Its music is among the most brilliant and individual of recent times, this Russian composer being regarded as a master of orchestral color.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JUN 8 1932

BOSTON 'POPS' HEARD ON WWJ

Arthur Fiedler Directs 85 Musicians in Light Summer Music.

By ROBERT KELLY.

The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again are well into their early summer popular music season. This is a fact now known to the entire nation since one of these delightful light programs already has been broadcast from Symphony Hall in the Hub. Here is the setting which WWJ listeners may visualize as they hear tonight's program at 9:15 o'clock. The vast cool reaches of Symphony Hall with the orchestra chairs removed and replaced by tables. The decorations in green. Yellow-attired waitresses moving about among the tables serving soft drinks and sandwiches. Eighty-five musicians, directed by Arthur Fiedler, playing the more melodious classics, a modern trifle now and then, or something from musical comedy. An effort has been made to create the atmosphere of a "European evening."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JUN 12 1932

POP CONCERTS TO CHANGE SCHEDULE

Will Broadcast Saturday Nights For Final Three Programs—Hour Altered, Too

Availing itself of a preferential broadcast period made available by the National Broadcasting company, the Symphony Hall management of the Boston Pop concerts has announced a change in schedule for the last three programs. The Pops, which have been heard on Wednesday evenings at 10 to 10.45 over an NBC-WEAF network, will hereafter be broadcast on Saturday evenings at 9.15 to 10 over the same network.

The first program under the new schedule will be next Saturday evening the Pops series concluding with the broadcast on July 2. No further change will be made in the schedule it was stated. The remaining programs will be under the conductorship of Arthur Fiedler and will be announced, as in the past, by Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI.

While broadcasting of Pops is a comparatively recent innovation at Symphony hall, the concerts themselves date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only ~~four years~~ old. The project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season was then started. They were modeled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables installed, so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a Strauss waltz or a march by Sousa.

The experiment was an immediate success. The "Promenade Concerts" soon came to be called "Pops"—whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks, no one has ever determined. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved to its own splendid auditorium, Symphony hall, then just completed.

Many conductors have come and gone, among them Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski, Andre Maquarre, Gustave Strube. The last three Pops conductors have been Agide Jacchia, who stressed the musical side; Alfred Sasella, the distinguished Italian composer-conductor-pianist, and Mr Fiedler, under whom the Pops have taken on a new and youthful vitality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUN 12 1932

FIEDLER CONDUCTS HUB POP CONCERTS

Modern, Classical Works Played Over Radio by Symphony

Modern and classical compositions share importance in the June radio series of Boston Pop Concerts which began last Wednesday night from Symphony hall. The broadcasts, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, are heard at 10 o'clock over WTAG. Arthur F. Edes of Station WEEI is the announcer.

M. Feidler, most popular of Pops conductors, will have under his baton for each of the five Wednesday night broadcasts an orchestra of 85 musicians drawn from the rangs of the Boston Symphony.

The ~~Pop~~ concerts, now in the 47th season, are a Summer version of the Boston Symphony concerts, and are likewise given at Symphony hall—the chestra's special home. They follow the European custom, otherwise scarcely known in this county, of combining a symphonic program with refreshments and a general air of sociability, the floor of the auditorium being covered with tables where one may drink, smoke or converse with one's friends while listening to music. The orchestra of 85 symphony players is considered one of the finest to be heard in the country at this season of the year.

Arthur Fiedler, in his third season as Pops conductor, has raised these concerts to a new height of popularity. Mr. Fiedler is a "son" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having been born in Boston of Emanuel Fiedler, the German musician who came here to play in Boston's orchestra many years ago, and who was one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
POST
JUN 15 1932

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "POPS."

The radio last week served to demonstrate that the Boston Symphony orchestra "Pops" are still flourishing in full vigor. Not only concerts delightful in themselves, but recalling to countless numbers scattered over the entire land the joys and days gone by.

For more than forty years these "Pops" have been an essential feature of summer life in Boston. And what national catacylsms have they not survived?

When the U. S. A. went on the water waggon the wise ones shook their mournful heads saying, "It is all over with the 'Pops.' Cannot run such concerts without beer and pretzels."

Nobody would dispute that beer and pretzels form a joyful addition to the pleasures of summer concerts. But, nevertheless, Boston continued to make the grade though serving only soft drinks.

Even this present so-called depression has not overwhelmed them in its universal disaster. Over forty years of age—and still going strong despite no beer and no money.

Can be done in effete and tottering east, but, seemingly, not in the young and lusty west. Now, Watson, what would you make of that?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, OHIO
TIMES-PRESS
JUN 18 1932

SYMPHONY ON AIR TONIGHT

Pop Concert is Scheduled From Boston

By MARTIN STOVER

POP concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra become a Saturday feature beginning today.

Tonight's program, WTAM, 8:15-9, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler, widely known conductor, and relayed from Symphony Hall, Boston. Heretofore, the pop programs have been heard on Wednesday.

A second program to look out for is the address by Charles Francis Coe, author-newspaperman, WGAR at 9, on "The Next Heavyweight Champion—Sharkey or Schmeling." As an added attraction a German sports authority will be heard from Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JUN 24 1932

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA "POPS."

(Chicago Post.)

The radio last week served to demonstrate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra "Pops" are still flourishing in full vigor. Not only concerts delightful in themselves, but recalling to countless numbers scattered over the entire land the joys and days gone by.

For more than forty years these "Pops" have been an essential feature of summer life in Boston. And what national cataclysms have they not survived?

When the U. S. A. went on the water wagon the wise ones shook their mournful heads, saying, "it is all over with the 'Pops.' Cannot run such concerts without beer and pretzels."

Nobody would dispute that beer and pretzels form a joyful addition to the pleasures of summer concerts. But nevertheless Boston continued to make the grade though serving only soft drinks.

Even this present so-called depression has not overwhelmed them in its universal disaster. Over forty years of age—and still going strong despite no beer and no money.

Can be done in effete and tottering East, but seemingly not in the young and dusty West. Now, Watson, what would you make of that?

---

position, "On a Trans-Atlantic at a "Pop" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on June

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JUN 26 1932

BOSTON'S "POP" CONCERTS

BOSTON, June 22, 1932.

DESPITE the depression, the Boston "Pops" have been astonishingly successful this season, out houses being an almost tly circumstance. It has been omary to begin the "Pops" sea- at the end of May, but this year, he hope of stimulating thought y from business distress, the ing concert took place in the dle of May, and interest in the rams has been cumulative to a ee that insures a season of open- concerts on the Charles River anade after the Fourth of July. latter series of concerts is free, is played by the same orchestra. e conductor of the "Pops" this on, as last, is Arthur Fiedler, a uct of the Boston Symphony Or- ra, and with a personnel of y-five members of that musical he has been enabled to present rograms with an effectiveness has made these concerts as a Boston institution almost as f its historical shrines. With dded incentive of a reduced of prices of admission, and the sale of near-beer and soft s with the privilege of smoking the auditorium floor, the possi- ty of self-maintenance for the mmer season of music is exceedingly bright.

When the programs offer symphonic music it is in the form of one movement from one of the symphonies, but otherwise the selections are of the lighter and immediately popular numbers, and Mr. Fiedler is as generous in encores as he is catholic in his program-making. Such a method of concert-giving is naturally provocative of requests for certain compositions, but instead of spreading these over his regular programs, Mr. Fiedler sets aside a night when the concert is devoted wholly to request numbers. A specimen program of this nature is this one played on the night of June 16:

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Peer Gynt, suite	Grieg
Overture, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Largo	Handel
Bolero	Ravel
Blue Danube, waltz	Strauss
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin

The last number with Jesús María Sanromá as piano soloist was sensational in its riotous applause.

Novelties are a feature of these "Pops," and one that evoked tremendous enthusiasm and had to be repeated was called "The Gay Nineties." For this occasion ancient wardrobes were overhauled, discarded vehicles were brought out of hidden recesses, and even a horse-car was sought as a conveyance for one party. But a ban on the horse-car was laid only because the last one of Boston's had been disposed of to some far-away enterprising community. The program for the event was in character, and Timothee Adamowsky, a former violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was drafted from a retirement that had made him almost a legendary personage, and he conducted a composition he had favored in those "Pops" of the nineties.

On the program of "The Gay Nineties" the soloist was Sanromá, and the young señor entered heartily into the spirit of the affair. His appearance was made with all the savoir-faire of a gay blade of the end of the century, dark coat of extreme cut-away fashion, light trousers and white gloves that insisted on cleaving to the fingers when he was ready to play. Whereupon he sat down at the piano, and with them played "The Maiden's Prayer" with all the solemnity and flourish that any young lady's academy might have taught.

There was some question among the younger element as to the authenticity of many of the costumes worn at "The Gay Nineties"; youth would not be satisfied that Time so little removed could furnish so great a divergence in the character of dress and its accessories. But an incident revealed in one particular case (names withheld) confirms the assurance of strict periodicity. The gowns worn by one large party of young ladies came from the same wardrobe. One of these on being removed gave out a peculiar rustle, and an examination of the pocket oh, yes, the ladies wore pockets in the back of their dresses in those days recovered a program of a Harvard commencement in 1899 and a ticket for the affair. The story of that particular gown as revealed by inquiry was this: The dress had been worn at the commencement exercises by the original owner, whose son was one of the graduates. On reaching home that night a telegram was received telling of another son's grave illness in Texas, and asking for the presence of the parents. The dress was hurriedly removed and thrown upon the bed, and a traveling costume donned for the journey, the dress later being hung in the wardrobe with similar wearing apparel, there to remain until "The Gay Nineties" called it forth for the delight of a new generation.

A matter of comment at the Boston "Pops" is the great number of young people who have been attracted to the music without the incentive of strong drink. As is usual at concerts of this kind, certain compositions appeal strongly to the popular taste and are called for again and again during a season. The work that has struck the most responsive chord in the hearts of this Summer's audiences at the "Pops" is Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing." In this Presidential election year this might be significant.

TRUCK FAILS TO MAKE TURN

---

and sandwiches. Imagine yourselves seated with friends about a table listening to Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, Tschaikowsky, as well as those of the modern school. No noise is permitted during the rendition of numbers. The orchestra is liberal in the matter of encores, and the large, enthusiastic, cultured audience watches eagerly for the appearing of the large card announcing the title of the encore.

We quote from the Christian Science Monitor:

"The Pop Concert Orchestra is composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, son of a former conductor and an excellent musician in his own right. A native-born conductor, Mr. Fiedler, in his third season, has been very successful in gauging musical feeling. Whether it be such a trifle as Schubert's 'Traumerei,' Tchaikovsky's 'Fourth Symphony,' Ravel's 'Bolero,' the extremely noisy 'Soviet Iron Foundry,' or music from 'The Cat and the Fiddle,' Mr. Fiedler's concert schedule has been pliable enough to meet all demands.

"Arthur F. Edes, program director and announcer of WEEI, will provide the program notes and announce for the radio audience."

THE WEEK

CHIEFLY PERSONAL

By PHILIP HALE Herald May 5

A curiosity of modern music, Alexander Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry," will be introduced to Boston at the Pops by Arthur Fiedler tonight.

Alexander Wassiliewitsch Mossolov was born in Kiev, Aug. 10, 1900. Having studied in the Moscow Conservatory under Gliere and Miaskovsky, he now dwells in soviet Russia an avowed exponent of "constructive or stylized music." Mossolov has composed an opera, "The Hero," a cantata, "The Sphinx," and music in smaller forms. "Soviet Iron Foundry," or "Music for Machines," describes the sounds and dynamic impressions of a steel mill, while the players may at times be asked to make noises intended to reproduce the sound of whirling dynamos, buzzing saws, rivet guns, and the like, there is nothing to indicate that their actions be mechanically controlled as in the method of Antheil in his Ballet "Mechanique." According to the score, the horn players must stand up and point the bells of their instruments toward the audience. In another place, vibrating steel plates are used. "Soviet Iron Foundry" was performed by the Cleveland orchestra in Cleveland on Nov. 6, 1930, and in New York on Dec. 1 of the same year. It had its first European performances in the same season. Mr. Stokowski introduced th work in Philadelphia in the season just passed.

Herald May 8

PHILIP HALE ET AL.

When, a few years ago, Roxy distinguished the hitherto undistinguished radio with orchestral concerts in the best tradition, he used to bedazzle his listeners-in with erudite prefaces to the works to be played—a few historical comments on a Beethoven symphony or a sensitive interpretation of a Strauss tone-poem. One could not help wondering where this movie-impresario got his material. Occupied all of his waking hours with his theatrical and broadcasting enterprises, he presumably had little time for research. Even a competent secretary did not seem an adequate explanation. Finally one day he disclosed his secret by remarking, "As Philip Hale says in his Boston Symphony program notes—." So that was the answer!

But Mr. Hale, whose thoughts have added lustre to the pages of The Herald for many years, is not only "the most learned of American music critics," as the judges of the Sigma Delta Chi honorary scholarships said, but he is also the custodian and graceful dispenser of information concerning the lives and letters of a thousand and one delightful saints and sinners. On the foundation of a classical training of a more leisurely day, he has built a knowledge of the humanities—history, literature, music, drama, and the other arts—that is continually amazing in its virtuosity. But all this might be pedantry, were it not leavened by a Yankee wit that pierces precedents and explodes pomposity. When most men of his years are contentedly conservative, Philip Hale remains an incurable mugwump. It is that quality, perhaps above all else, that accounts for his unfailing spontaneity and liveliness of spirit. To wager on what Philip Hale will say in response to a question is as dangerous as betting on New England weather!

The other five journalists selected for these new awards are of the same high standing—men who honor the profession to which they belong. F. P. A. of the New York Herald-Tribune, in particular, deserves official notice for the way in which he has kept his "Conning Tower" an ever-refreshing exhibition of good taste, fine humor, and literary preciseness.

MORE LETTERS
in the
DEBATE OVER
DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S
PROGRAMS WILL BE PRINTED
in
THIS DEPARTMENT
TOMORROW

Trans May 17

Boston Symphony at Carnegie.

The final evening concert in the current series of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall took place last night. Before bidding his New York patrons "au revoir" Maestro Koussevitzky felt it incumbent upon himself to allow them to share with the audiences of other large symphonic organizations the delight of hearing a work of Ernst Foch, who is now a visitor in this country. For this purpose he chose the "Bunte Suite" ("bunte" designating "varied") in which

---

AT SYMPHONY HALL

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Your issue of May 2 carried a review, under the caption, "Exemplary Adieux for Koussevitzky," of the last concert of the current season at Symphony Hall. In the concluding paragraph the senior of your staff of music critics undertakes to dispose once for all of the "weak and elderly" opposition which at the end of every season lifts its protesting voice against Dr. Koussevitzky's courses as a program-maker.

After signalizing his approval of the policy of encouraging the youthful composers of Europe and America in the interests of "an art that must experiment to live," the writer proceeds to castigate the "stubborn conservatism . . . that would send the Symphony concerts back into traditional routine," and leaps to the amazing non sequitur that "the clapping, the stamping, the shouting for Dr. Koussevitzky on Saturday seem the sufficient and decisive answer."

As a long-standing patron of these concerts, who happens to share the convictions of those subscribers who deplore the conductor's eccentric lack of balance as a program-maker, I heartily resent the invidious question-begging involved in this use of the stock phrase, "traditional routine." The position of the dissenting minority is, briefly, this: While admitting the desirability, in the interest of historical perspective, of including typical specimens of modernistic experimentation, they contend, not unreasonably, that the programs should, during the course of five or ten years, afford a tolerable acquaintance with the outstanding masterpieces of musical literature. During Dr. Koussevitzky's régime, although the works of such modernists and near-modernists as Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Honegger, Skriabin, Copland, Bloch, Hindemith, Goossens, Debussy, Ravel and Respighi have been featured repeatedly, with innumerable repetitions of certain of their scores, the conductor has apparently never heard of such composers as, for instance, Smetana, Goldmark, Grieg, Bizet, Massenet, MacDowell, Max Bruch or Wieniawski. Again, many of the illustrious composers whom he has deigned, on occasion, to recognize—for example, Saint-Saens, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Dvorak and Elgar—have figured so inconspicuously that the audience has been left in complete ignorance of the greater part of their most significant scores, with the result that Bostonians intent on a well rounded acquaintance with the high lights of the musical repertory have been obliged, despite the deplorable mechanical deficiencies involved, to rely on radio broadcasts of such concerts as those of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and of Walter Damrosch.

If this attitude of the nonconformist minority, cherished in an age of notorious sterility in the field of the fine arts, savor of slavish regard for "traditional routine," one may as well make a tabula rasa of the creative achievements of the past and insist on the sole authenticity of the most recent Broadway hit or of Aaron Copland's latest pianoforte concerto (reassuringly labeled "First performance in America").

As to the second point, the reviewer's refutation of dissenting criticism on the ground that the clapping, stamping and shouting of the audience constitute "the sufficient and decisive answer," I believe that no reader of the Transcript is likely to be seriously impressed by an appeal to the silly doctrine, "Vox populi, vox Dei," particularly in a society distinguished pre-eminently by its predilection for novelty, noise and sensationalism.

KENNETH G. DARLING

Cambridge, May 8.

Trans May

Basil Cameron, the English conductor, lately visited Sibelius at Helsingfors He reports the composer as committed to a journey to the United States next autumn to conduct at Seattle. If he does come, the Boston Orchestra may hardly overlook him, or he it. Under Dr. Koussevitzky it plays Sibelius's symphonies oftener than any other orchestra in America. To it he has promised his new Eighth Symphony for first performance. What if it were produced at Symphony Hall in the presence of the composer or with Sibelius himself conducting?

Transcript

Y, MAY 28, 1932

The Changes New Times Surely Bring

It Is Composers in Decline That Koussevitzky Keeps From His Programs

TWO letters have recently appeared in The Transcript "deploring" an alleged "lack of balance" in Dr. Koussevitzky's programs and repertory. Such allegations are so contrary to fact that one is tempted to dismiss them with a shrug and a smile, did one not reflect that an ounce of error, plausibly and persuasively put, can cause more mischief than a pound of fact. But it is only fact that can refute irresponsible assertions. Let the facts be known.

Three years ago, at the end of Dr. Koussevitzky's fifth year in Boston, I made a careful study of the repertories of Muck, Fiedler, Monteux, Koussevitzky. That study showed that of the entire number of works performed by Fiedler (each repetition counting as a separate performance) 22 per cent were novelties; by Muck, 18 per cent novelties; by Monteux, 40 per cent novelties; by Koussevitzky, 34 per cent novelties. A similar study of the season lately ended shows it to have contained 32 per cent of novelties. But that does not quite tell the story. Anyone who will take the trouble to consult the complete lists in the back of the program-books will find that Koussevitzky's "novelties" are far more broadly chosen than those of any of his predecessors. If from the past season's so-called novelties one excludes those by composers long since dead, or by composers well advanced in middle age (Mozart, Mahler, Debussy, Ravel, Rakhmaninov) and the three novelties of Holst, which are not by any process of argumentation chargeable to Dr. Koussevitzky, the proportion of the remaining novelties to the entire season's performances is 22 per cent. If one counts only the pieces in the "modernistic" idiom, which are the ones the writers of these letters so thoroughly hate (probably the real point of the letters rather than any charge of "lack of balance"), by a generous interpretation of the term, the percentage of such pieces is between fifteen and sixteen. It is thus evident that the proportioning of the present conductor's repertory is in no way different than that of his three predecessors. To reduce it further would be to destroy all semblance of "balance." One cannot overcome the suspicion that what these writers want is not a well-balanced repertory but the complete suppression of the work of living composers.

Mr. Kenneth G. Darling, for example, gives a list of composers whom (he writes) Dr. Koussevitzky "has apparently never heard of." Let us see how Koussevitzky's practice squared in his first five years with that of his three predecessors. (The record of the last three seasons will not differ materially.) Of Bizet's works only the Suite from the music to "L'Arlesienne" survived as late as the days of Fiedler, who gave it one performance. Muck gave it two. Neither Monteux nor Koussevitzky have played it. Bruch is next in Mr. Darling's list. Solo performances aside (and Bruch's Concertos have passed out of the artists' repertory and into students' repertory) only one work of Bruch ever survived more than a single performance in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the last performance of that one work dates from 1883. Grieg: three performances under Fiedler, two under Muck, one under Monteux. The piano-concerto and the "Peer Gynt Suite" aside, none of his works have survived more than three performances in the orchestra's repertory. Goldmark was frequently played by Muck, less so by Monteux, still less by Fiedler, not at all by Koussevitzky. Much the same can be said of MacDowell, who received four performances from Muck, two from Monteux, one from Fiedler. But is not Koussevitzky's treatment of MacDowell symptomatic of the age rather than of personal "eccentricity"? Massenet has been played neither by Fiedler, Muck or Koushevitzky; Monteux gave him two performances. Smetana received four performances from Fiedler, nine from Muck, four from Monteux, one from Koussevitzky. Wieniawski—needless to say—has not been played by any of the four conductors.

The significance of this list is that Koussevitzky has come upon the scene at a time when the stars of most of these composers are definitely setting. This process of non-survival had definitely begun before his advent. It is evident when one adds to the above figures the fact that Bizet received ten performances before the coming of Fiedler, three after; Bruch (non-solo works) three before, none after; Goldmark forty-four—fourteen; MacDowell, fifteen—seven; Massenet, twelve—two; Smetana, twenty-one—eighteen; (It is noteworthy and significant of Koussevitzky's acumen that the one composer who should come near to holding his own in the two periods under comparison, would also be the one composer out of the entire group to whom Koussevitzky has given place on his lists.

It is historic fact that most composers of less than first rank do drop out of the repertory. Had Mr. Darling been an elderly man when the B. S. O. was young he probably would have been "deploring" the fact that the naughty Gericke, Nikisch, Paur were giving badly balanced programs by the omission of such sterling composers as Stamitz, Gossec, Wagenseil, Pleyel, Schenck, Kreutzer, Gyrowetz, none of whose names appears at all in the lists. There always will be some composers dropping out of the repertory. It is the process whereby only Bach and Handel survive out of their very active period, only Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven out of theirs. It would be incredibly naive to assume that they were the only composers alive in their day. The process which has selected them is a process which all the resistance in the world cannot stop. It continues today.

A study of Mr. Darling's other list—Dvoràk, Elgar, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saëns, Schumann, who he says "have figured so inconspicuously" that the audience has been left in complete ignorance of the greater part of their most significant scores—is also revealing. Elgar was not played at all by either Muck or Monteux; Koussevitzky has given him two performances. With Dvoràk the case is about the same as with Goldmark and Smetana of the previous group; many performances by Muck, fewer by Fiedler and Monteux, still fewer by Koussevitzky. But any observer will tell Mr. Darling that Dvoràk belongs to the group whose stars are definitely setting. A study of last performances of Dvoràk's works is plain on this point. It reveals that the trend away from Dvoràk dates from long before Koussevitzky's day. Of the twenty-four works that have ever been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, six never went further than a first performance. The two which Koussevitzky has played were previously played not later than 1915 and 1920. The rest were abandoned in '90, '95, '02 (3 works), '04, '05, '14, '15, '17, (2), '19, '20, '23. Surely the list of a declining composer.

As to Liszt, it appears to me to be particularly ungracious to reproach the conductor close upon the heels of the magnificent performance of the "Faust Symphony." In any case Koussevitzky has nine Liszt performances to his credit against Fiedler's ten, Monteux's fourteen, Muck's sixteen. Hardly sufficient difference to warrant any considerable reproach. Much the same can be said of Mendelssohn, to whom Koussevitzky has given five performances. The charge of infrequent performances holds in the case of Saint-Saëns ,to whom the conductor has allotted two hearings; it would be interesting to know whether there is more than negligible demand for more. To Schumann Koussevitzky has given fourteen performances against Fiedler's twelve, Monteux's twelve, Muck's thirteen—actually more than any of the three previous conductors. It would seem that such facts hardly bear out Mr. Darling's charge.

This plain preference of the public Mr. Darling condemns by calling the present an age of a "society distinguished pre-eminently by its predilection for novelty, noise and sensationalism." Mr. Darling wishes to do a good job. Not content with condemning the conductor, he condemns also the age of which the conductor is able and eloquent mouthpiece, probably entirely unaware that it is the most potent historical forces which he is condemning. This public to which Mr. Darling thus pays his respects has made its selection of a few great ones out of a mass of lesser ones in every period. It may be trusted to do so again. Indeed it is doing so and will continue to do so whether it is thus trusted or not.

Mr. Darling may be reminded that there never has been a conductor in America so revered and respected as Theodore Thomas. Mr. Thomas fought the same fight that Koussevitzky is fighting now; but his efforts were in the interests of Wagner, Liszt, Brahms, and toward the end of his life, Strauss. His defiant statement "If they don't like it, I'll play it until they do," is historic. No account of the life of Thomas does other than refer to it as the brightest jewel in the crown of the conductor's achievement. It was directed at the Kenneth Darlings of his day.

ALFRED H. MEYER

Concerts Next Week

The Pops—The new week will be a week of "nights" at The Pops. On Monday, the program marks a national holiday. On Tuesday, "Lovers' Night," Mr. Fiedler will prove his ingenuity in the arrangeing of a program that celebrates the "great lovers" in tones and assembles other numbers of amorous tenor. On Wednesday, the New England Conservatory has its annual evening. On Thursday, the Longy School at Cambridge is newcomer to those rites. On Saturday, the Institute of Technology celebrates—usually the liveliest evening of the season. Sunday week will bring the third of the Sunday Pops with Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" and Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of Animals" for conspicuous number.

More particularly, that amusing trifle, Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo of "The Bee," will return to the repertory on Monday. Tuesday runs to "The Lovers'" program already printed in these columns. Numbers from Walton's amusing "Facade," unheard since the opening concert; Mr. Converse's tone-poem, "California"; Mr. McKinley's American rhapsody, "Masquerade," all have place on Wednesday. Mr. Converse and Mr. McKinley are teachers at the New England Conservatory. On the same evening, Lucille Monaghan, one of its abler pianists, will play the first movement of Rakhmaninov's Concerto in F-sharp minor.

On Thursday, Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony and the "selection" from Mr. Schwartz's music for "The Band Wagon" return; while Mme. Longy-Miquelle and Mr. Sanromá will join hands to play Mozart's Concerto in E-flat major for two pianos. On Friday is room for a travel-picture, "On A Transatlantic Liner," by Theodore Cella, once harpist at Symphony Hall, now serving the Philharmonic Society in New York. On Saturday, Ravel's stately "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and the songful slow movement from Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony diversify a programs bound to contain Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and the march that brings John P. Wintergreen nearer to the residency.

2258

FROM TRANSCRIPT
BOSTON, MASS.

4/23/32

Concert Of Symphonic Opposites

A New Concerto from Ravel, Bruckner "In Entirety," Spring Afternoon

FIRST to write just praises of Mr. Sanromá in complement to the applause heaped on him, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, before and after he had played the piano-part in Ravel's new Concerto. No orchestra in the United States, perhaps none in Europe, has at command and in residence so able and willing a pianist. Mr. Sanromá can be soloist of the day, as he was on Friday, as he has been within memory in Stravinsky's "Caprice" or Toch's Concerto. He can assist with equal zest in symphonic pieces in which the piano is used obbligato, as in de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" and Lambert's "The Rio Grande." Or he can play as one more virtuoso in an orchestra of virtuosi when the piano is only an added instrument. No composer, however exacting his modernisms, has yet exhausted Mr. Sanromá's readiness and resource. Whatever the task a given piece has set for him, he has brought to it a keen musical and pianistic mind, a sympathetic spirit, a lively will to accomplish accordingly. Be it large or small, he has never slighted preparation of performed carelessly.

Mr. Sanromá has excelled conspicuously in music of our immediate day inviting his clear, bright, penetrating tone, his range of rhythmic energy, his sense of plastic phrase and counterpoint, his command of scintillant bravura, his alertness to the percussive piano. He can be as dry, hard, incisive as the most objective and dogmatic modernist; keep pace with the composer's caprice, feel his driving impetus. Yet seldom has he fallen short when his piano must pretend to be singing instrument or join with the orchestra in polished, subtilized euphonies. The Symphony Orchestra, the present conductor, have no more loyal and tireless coadjutor. Mr. Sanromá shares ably and with good will in the chamber concerts of the town. None is readier to aid in the introduction of novel, questionable, perilous music. Boston schooled him; gave him opportunity; has, so far, kept him—exception to the rule that it no longer breeds notable musicians; or, if it does, that they take flight to New York. Once more, yesterday, the public of the Symphony Concerts testified, with new reason, to its pride and pleasure in Sanromá.

Re-Enter Martelli

The first two numbers on Dr. Koussevitzky's program were of a sort to which many in the elder generation find it hard to accustom themselves—unless some illustrious name, like Ravel's, beguiles them along a more or less unwilling course. Long habit, ingrained predilection, the background of a nineteenth century that associated music with morals and philosophies, doctrines, preachments, and many another unrelated matter, that bade it be uplifting, ennobling, consoling and all that, make them mistrustful of music written and existing "merely" to entertain. (Yet Bach himself, and the Italians before him, were writing it two and three centuries ago). The romantic and the German tradition, too much assimilated discourse about "appreciation" and "spirituality," keep them equally wary of music that is its own excuse, however slight, for being.

Modernisms aside, hence the indifference or the distaste with which such listeners hear such a piece as Martelli's Concerto for Orchestra with which the concert began. It returns to an ancient form; adapts it elastically to present uses; fills it ingeniously with exercises in the current fashions of keys, dissonance, counterpoint, harmonies, timbres; prefers a full-voiced fugue (as in Martelli's finale) or a clean-cut canon to lyric or introspective dalliance; runs alert and cerebral, crisp and vital, with next to never a hint of sentiment — bravura here, wit or impertinence there. In these qualities we listeners are to find our interest and take our pleasure. Martelli's Concerto, piece and performance, yielded both plentifully and engagingly. But the unaccustomed, and therefore mistrustful, "cut it cold." Outside Stravinsky and, may be, Hindemith, whom the matinée audience has at last accepted, it prefers—for the present—not to go.

Ravel Renewed

But when Ravel, become at the end of his fifties almost a modern classic, conjures; when Mr. Sanromá takes his place at the piano; when Dr. Koussevitzky is plainly in happy vein over a new "première," how willingly and responsively that same audience goes along. Yet the new Piano-Concerto discloses not a connotation or an implication outside itself; has its being in its own virtuosity; exists primarily and persistently to interest and entertain. In the kind, within the self-imposed limitations, what a perfect piece of composition it is! In the designing, writing and adjusting of the piano-part, it is as though Ravel had re-assembled acquired experience, practised instinct, ripened invention and adroit resource from the days of the early "Miroirs" and "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," through "Le Tombeau de Couperin" to the more recent chamber-pieces—re-assembled, re-animated and refined. Not a note is spared or wasted. Everything falls into just place. Nothing fails of its purpose.

To the virtuoso, modernist, and sympathetic pianist, as indeed Mr. Sanromá's performance suggested, the piano-part must be pleasure to play, exactions included. Born of a light and fecund theme, it is alert, elastic, eager, radiant, at the beginning. Sentiment touches it with grace before the first movement ends in a sparkling foam of ornament. The slow movement, through the longer half virtually a piano-solo over a subdued and gently sustaining bass, is a simple, transparent, long-curved, undulating melody outspringing from the end of middle age, wistful, remembering, soft-spoken. A still, clear, autumn light unhardened plays over it. Gradually, the English horn summarizes, the orchestra severally and collectively joins in the song; the piano spins a lace-work of musing embroidery. Through the racing, outflinging, bedeviled finale, the piano runs a gamut of rhythmic agilities, kaleidoscopic ornament, thrusts and counter-thrusts with the orchestra; so to a fanfare-ish close. Hardly once does invention or exhilaration flag.

The orchestral part is companion-piece to the piano-part in economy and precision, in lightness, brightness and winged motion. Through the first division, it is usually vivacious and ornamental. Through the slow movement it is often softened into delicate and adroit euphonies, into a tender echoing of the melody while the piano twines it with fantasy. Through the finale hints of jazz recur, now in syncopated rhythms, again in momentary stunts, like the glissandi for trombones, in a "blues" quality that haunts the underlying melody. But all that is jazz assimilated, Ravelized, minding its Parisian P's and Q's. Writing for orchestra, Ravel maintains throughout his quick and life-long sensibility to individual timbres, his imagination with patterned sonorities, his ability to suffuse the pattern with light, so vitalize it. In such an orchestral part Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were as virtuosi excelling themselves for a composer and a music that stimulated such prowess. Once more, the conductor was, par excellence, the conductor for Ravel. With reason the composer originally intended the Concerto for initial production in Boston.

Uncut Bruckner

These experiences, interesting as they were, filled less than half the concert. One hour and a quarter of it fell to the performance of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony (in C minor) note for note from beginning unto the distant end. Asked to restore a cut in the slow movement where the composer's imagination rises high, clear, ecstatic, Dr. Koussevitzky took the Brucknerites at their word; "closed" every cut—allegro, scherzo and finale—from Mr. Fiedler's and Dr. Muck's day to his own. These restorations lengthened the performance by fifteen minutes; but it is doubtful whether a quarter hour less would have held those who cannot "abide Bruckner," either for matter or manner. On the other hand, the avowed Brucknerites were gratified at this unusual consideration for "the master" in one of his longest symphonies; while the major part of the listeners who held firm to the end and who asked only that Bruckner engross and stir them, seemed content. True, there were numerous departures; but once upon a time in Vienna only ten heard to the last note one of his earlier symphonies. True again, he is repetitious; but to reiterate was an impulse of his temperament and remains a part of his quality.

For those who are still studious of Bruckner, who would hear him without prejudice, who find pleasure from him increasing at each new occasion, this full performance of the Eighth Symphony brought better understanding and new sympathy. The finale fared least fortunately. There Bruckner would ascend to sonorous solemnities; sustain and intensify them. To him they connoted the churchly ceremonies that he had known at the great and rich abbey of St. Florian, the stately ecclesiastic pageants in which he had shared, under "his 'Cardinal,'" in the cathedral at the neighboring Linz. When he would transfuse such solemnities into symphonic music, he seems to be haunted by the organ that he played in them as well as by his Baireuth-like trumpets, trombones and tubas. He fails to free himself from churchly accent and suggestion; so attain to the heighth and breadth of universal vision. Perhaps, for that reason, this finale of the Eighth Symphony seemed persistently striving, mannered, impotent. Though Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra urged him manfully, only in the upswelling and long held sonorities toward the end—the four themes of the Symphony upon one another piled—did Bruckner draw near his goal.

Profit and Loss

On the other hand, the Scherzo gained by completeness. Though full performance disclosed only the more clearly Bruckner's inability or indifference with varied or contrasted rhythms, it also evoked and sustained an atmosphere. Doubtless by subconscious impulse t Scherzo sounds from the upper Aust where Bruckner was born and lived lo —a smiling, sun-brightened, undulatin persistently rustic countryside, wher trees line the roads, where at the end o a vista a great abbey may break the hor zon, where the folk are a peasantry sim ple-minded, good-hearted, tranquil, pious on occasion gay. The quiet melody o this Scherzo in the Eighth Symphon sings for them. The rhythm beats t their steps. Though he finally dwelt an worked in Vienna, Bruckner wrot scherzi of the countryside that he remem bered. In urban America it is hard fo us to feel this atmosphere. Dr. Koussevitzky, as romantic at heart as Bruckner with such recollection, divined an spun it.

The first movement gained likewise by complete performance. There if the hearer looks and listens for them, he may descry most of the shortcomings repeated to weariness against Bruckner: prolixity and platitudes; sequences and inversions until they become mannerisms; grandiose vesture for shrunken matter; musical paragraphs innocent of transition; indifference to choice; disdain of self-discipline; so forth through a list dressed already a hundred times. On the other hand out of this music "in entirety" rise more than one of his distinctions—the fervor with which he wrote to kindle an equal fervor in performers and listeners; the faith he kept in his own forms and procedures, his upswelling ascents and leaping descents, his rests and resumptions; the simplicity of his musical ideas as from a mind and spirit unsuspectingly naive; the complexities in which he arrayed them as though that same mind and spirit had absorbed the baroque luxuriance of the church at St. Florian's; in sonorities, the richness of his woodwinds and horns, the heroical voice of his plangent brass, the glowing depths of his strings; above all the intensifying of his music, reiteration upon reiteration, until it rises to vision, ecstasy and illumination. It is Dr. Koussevitzky's sense of this tonal texture and intensive process, these fervors, exaltations and momentary sublimities that make him, above most conductors, discerning and eloquent with Bruckner.

In the slow movement of the Eighth Symphony this aspiration ascends to attainment. Through page upon page the long adagio coils and uncoils, ultimately and ever mounting heavenward. Four themes engender it into hymn-like instrumental song; reiteration enforces it deeper and deeper sonorities enrich it, or a more shimmering texture gilds it as with an halo. Presently the heavens open and Bruckner—the mysticism of the Roman church pulsing within him—beholds and sounds the joys of Paradise. A thousand times at St. Florian's or in Linz Cathedral he has played the Sanctus upon his organ. Now the hos of the redeemed are singing it apocalypti cally. Of a sudden the hymn stays and stills. And God said: "Let there b peace." And there was peace. . . . It by his deepest fervors, his spellbou visions, his celestial felicities, and th music he made of them, that Bruckn should be judged—to stand unique, th far, among the diviners who have wr ten black notes upon white paper ru in staves.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

APR 22 1932

Exciting News From Boston Symphony

DIVISIONS of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio are now starting out to sell the series for next season. Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the club, received the following wire from Boston a day or two ago which gives the news from the famous symphony of that city, led by Koussevitzky, which is one of the orchestras that the club is to present again next season:

"Boston Symphony orchestra," reads the telegram from J. N. Burk, Symphony hall, "will culminate remarkable season next week, Friday and Saturday, in Boston with Brahms' First Symphony. New York series brilliantly closed with Liszts' choral "Faust" symphony. Ravel's new piano concerto has first American performance this Friday, Philadelphia performance coming later on same day. Koussevitzky sails for Europe on Ile de France, May 4. Will be guest conductor of famous Vienna Philharmonic in Vienna next June

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 15 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SUCCESSFUL SEASON

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was artistically one of the most successful in the orchestra's history, says the Boston Globe in a survey of the recently closed series of concerts. Only under Dr. Muck, it continues in part, has a higher standard of performance consistently been maintained. Never has the enthusiasm of the audiences been greater. Never have the programs ranged more widely through music old and new.

The only really serious difficulty is the size of the deficit, estimated at $100,000; of which $37,000 had not been subscribed at the close of the season. No doubt the trustees will make a determined effort to reduce expenses next year. It is encouraging to all concerned that the 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays were sold out for the season just ended, and the two short series on Mondays and Tuesdays were very well attended. Symphony concerts, if a luxury, are evidently not one with which their frequenters willingly dispense.

◆ ◆ ◆

FROM
HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.

4/22/32

$3963 VERDICT AGAINST BOSTON SYMPHONY

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

LOWELL, April 21—A Middlesex superior court jury this afternoon returned a verdict of $3963 against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. The award was in favor of Mrs. James H. Shrigley of Lowell, who sued both the orchestra and the New Boston Music hall as a result of injuries she received in a fall in Symphony hall, Boston, June 10, 1930.

Judge Greenhalge ordered a directed verdict for the New Boston Music hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

MAY 1 1932

AN AMERICAN SONG OF FAITH

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT IS a curious fact, not easily to be explained, that patriotism, one of the most deep-seated and urgent of human emotions, should have yielded so little music of first-rate quality. Love of God, love of Woman—these have been transmuted by composers into music that is among the greatest that we possess. But love of country has stirred men to no such profundities and ecstasies of song. It should, perhaps, be remarked that the late Vincent d'Indy, a penetrating student of musical art, regarded the C minor Symphony of Beethoven as a patriotic utterance. But this opinion seems to have been peculiar to Monsieur d'Indy; and most qualified musicians would probably agree that love of country awaits expression in music comparable for eloquence to that in which Bach and Beethoven avowed their love of God and that in which Wagner avowed his love of Woman.

* * *

George Washington and Mr. Carpenter

IT IS not likely that Mr. John Alden Carpenter, a creative artist whose sensibility and fervor are guided by an intelligence that is delectably humorous and poised, had any idea of challenging the high gods of tone when he composed his "Song of Faith." Yet the result that he achieved is in several ways remarkable, and it has had less recognition than it deserves.

This American "Song of Faith," intended for a four-part chorus of children's (or women's) and men's voices, orchestra, and a Narrator, was written for the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, and was intended for performance in the nation-wide celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of Washington. Mr. Carpenter completed the work last autumn. It was performed at a Boston Symphony concert February 23, and by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra two days later. New York, in its usual dilatory and negligent fashion where new music is concerned, has yet to acknowledge the existence of a notable new work by one of the most distinguished of American composers; though Mr. Walter Damrosch, enterprising as usual, conducted a broadcast performance of the piece in February.

Those who note the course of musical events from the watchtowers of the gramophone laboratories have also been admirably alert; and the "Song of Faith" appears among the current issues of the RCA Victor Company, recorded on two ten-inch disks (Nos. 1559-'60) by the Chicago a Capella Choir, directed by Noble Cain, "with symphony orchestra and organ" (the name of the Narrator is not given). The recording is, in the main, satisfactory, so far as the transference of the music is concerned; but the enunciation of the singers is poor. As for the Narrator who speaks the words of Washington that Mr. Carpenter has quoted in the latter part of the work, it must, alas! be said that if anything or any one could impair one's reverence for that immortal Shade, this anonymous declaimer, with his uncultivated voice and diction, would be an almost certain means to that end. It is a thousand pities that the First President's stirring words could not have been intrusted to a speaker more suitably equipped to deal with this striking and impressive feature of Mr. Carpenter's conception.

* * *

A Priceless Inheritance

"IN THE writing of this work," says the composer, "I have come to a new realization of the priceless inheritance that has come down to us from George Washington. I have felt, more than ever before, that the enduring value of this inheritance is based not primarily on his military genius, or his contribution to the arts of government, but on the selfless integrity of his character.

"It is from that character that we inherit the Great American Dream—the dream which has sustained us through our storms and trials, and which at this very moment we must strive in deepest sincerity to recapture. For the whole world is beset by a dangerous psychology of defeat which for us is but the modern counterpart of the snows of Valley Forge. And it is for our country now to raise its eyes in the faith of its founders and lead the way out.

"And, therefore, if my 'Song of Faith' can succeed in lighting one single candle of reaffirmation, I shall be content."

Mr. Carpenter provided his own words—with the posthumous assistance of the Father of his Country: for the lines given to the Narrator (who in concert performances is unseen) are extracted from Washington's writings, "so combined as to form a consecutive and self-contained address." With this exception, the text is Mr. Carpenter's. Here, in full, are the words that he has set to music:

CHILDREN AND MEN

Come now, hear our song!
Song of Freedom, comrades, swell the throng!
Hear that ancient story told again,
Of the father of our fathers!
Hear our song!
As a growing river flowing to the sea,
As the springing branches of a mighty tree,
So his faith abounds,
So his strong heart led us, made us free.
We, his children's children, raise our eyes,
To the hills and the mountains in the skies.

CHILDREN

Comes to town young Doodle dandy!
On his crown a feather fine!
Rides a pony, calls him Macaroni,
Macaroni, O!

MEN

Sounds the throb of the drum-beat,
Sound the cries of the red-man,
Through the years intervening,
As they rang in the days of our fathers!

CHILDREN AND MEN

Sounds a sweet lullaby,
Sounds an old song my mother knew.
Sound again, gentle cry,
Soothe a young heart, like falling dew
Bring to me rest again,
Sing to me low,
There where my head has lain,
Well do I know.

CHILDREN

Lead me to sleep where the still waters flow.
So sings my motherland,
So yields her love to light my day,
Guides me with gentle hand,
On to a bright and shining way to a shining day.

CHILDREN AND MEN

Oh, hear the band, the Yankee band!
From hill and plain, swing out again!
Oh, hear the call!
Come one, come all!
Now hear the word, his heart revealing!
Now hear the very voice of the father!

* * *

NARRATOR
[Washington's Words]

"I close this last solemn act of my life by commending the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God.
It is impossible to reason without arriving at a Supreme Being. I now make my earnest prayer that He would have you in His holy protection.
Let us labor to keep alive in our breasts that little spark of celestial fire called Conscience.
We must not despair, the game is yet in our own hands.
Let us have a government by which our lives and our liberties shall be secured.
I feel now as I conceive a wearied traveler must do;
I move gently down the stream of life until I sleep with my fathers. The work is done, the voice of mankind is with me. I am not afraid to go."

CHILDREN

Comes a bright and shining day,
By our Fathers' faith let us pray.

CHILDREN AND MEN

May the hand of God be our stay,
And our guiding star light our way.

* * *

"Divine, Magnetic Lands"

MR. CARPENTER'S score is prefaced by the famous and exultant lines in which Walt Whitman inclosed his radiant vision of an America as yet, perhaps, not quite completely realized:

"Come, I will make the continent indissoluble;
I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shone upon;
I will make divine magnetic lands;
With the love of comrades. . . .
I will plant companionship thick as trees along all the rivers of America, and along the shores of the great lakes, and all over the prairies;
I will make inseparable cities with their arms about each other's necks. . . .
For you! for you, I am trilling these songs,
In the love of comrades,
In the high-towering love of comrades."

* * *

It is significant of Mr. Carpenter's characteristics as an artist—his taste, his tact, his distinction of feeling and of thought, his choice and fine selectiveness—that he has not debased the moods and emotions implicit in his subject-matter by using them as a pretext for mere patriotic ballyhoo and jingoistic eagle-shrieking. There are no brass bands, no blatant stump-speakers, suggested in this music; no bombs burst in the air from which it takes its breath; and its most impressive moments are moments of an almost devotional quiet and absorption. Rhetoric is absent from its meditative and sober pages. For this is music of faith and love and elevation.

It should be said that the quality of the music is scarcely indicated by that of the verses with which it is consorted (one fancies that Le Bon Dieu intended Mr. Carpenter to devote his esthetic activities to music, undiverted by poetical excursions). One must look to the thought and feeling implied by the words if one would find the measure of the music's eloquence. These underlying emotional patterns are rich in tenderness, in exaltation; charged with a grave and quiet intensity of feeling. This is the finer grain of patriotism—a patriotism that is deeply sensitive and aware, even a little humorous (as in the allusions to "Yankee Doodle"); finding its most searching expression in the thought of the beloved and cradling land that is still, for some of us, a nurse of the spirit and the mother of incredible faiths.

228

FROM TRANSCRIPT
BOSTON, MASS.

4/23/32

Concert Of Symphonic Opposites

A New Concerto from Ravel, Bruckner "In Entirety," Spring Afternoon

FIRST to write just praises of Mr. Sanromá in complement to the applause heaped on him, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, before and after he had played the piano-part in Ravel's new Concerto. No orchestra in the United States, perhaps none in Europe, has at command and in residence so able and willing a pianist. Mr. Sanromá can be soloist of the day, as he was on Friday, as he has been within memory in Stravinsky's "Caprice" or Toch's Concerto. He can assist with equal zest in symphonic pieces in which the piano is used obbligato, as in de Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" and Lambert's "The Rio Grande." Or he can play as one more virtuoso in an orchestra of virtuosi when the piano is only an added instrument. No composer, however exacting his modernisms, has yet exhausted Mr. Sanromá's readiness and resource. Whatever the task a given piece has set for him, he has brought to it a keen musical and pianistic mind, a sympathetic spirit, a lively will to accomplish accordingly. Be it large or small, he has never slighted preparation of performed carelessly.

Mr. Sanromá has excelled conspicuously in music of our immediate day inviting his clear, bright, penetrating tone, his range of rhythmic energy, his sense of plastic phrase and counterpoint, his command of scintillant bravura, his alertness to the percussive piano. He can be as dry, hard, incisive as the most objective and dogmatic modernist; keep pace with the composer's caprice, feel his driving impetus. Yet seldom has he fallen short when his piano must pretend to be singing instrument or subjoin with the orchestra in polished, subtilized euphonies. The Symphony Orchestra, the present conductor, have no more loyal and tireless coadjutor. Mr. Sanromá shares ably and with good will in the chamber concerts of the town. None is readier to aid in the introduction of novel, questionable, perilous music. Boston schooled him; gave him opportunity; has, so far, kept him—exception to the rule that it no longer breeds notable musicians; or, if it does, that they take flight to New York. Once more, yesterday, the public of the Symphony Concerts testified, with new reason, to its pride and pleasure in Sanromá.

Re-Enter Martelli

The first two numbers on Dr. Koussevitzky's program were of a sort to which many in the elder generation find it hard to accustom themselves—unless some illustrious name, like Ravel's, beguiles them along a more or less unwilling course. Long habit, ingrained predilection, the background of a nineteenth century that associated music with morals and philosophies, doctrines, preachments, and many another unrelated matter, that bade it be uplifting, ennobling, consoling and all that, make them mistrustful of music written and existing "merely" to entertain. (Yet Bach himself, and the Italians before him, were writing it two and three centuries ago). The romantic and the German tradition, too much assimilated discourse about "appreciation" and "spirituality," keep them equally wary of music that is its own excuse, however slight, for being.

Modernisms aside, hence the indifference or the distaste with which such listeners hear such a piece as Martelli's Concerto for Orchestra with which the concert began. It returns to an ancient form; adapts it elastically to present uses; fills it ingeniously with exercises in the current fashions of keys, dissonance, counterpoint, harmonies, timbres; prefers a full-voiced fugue (as in Martelli's finale) or a clean-cut canon to lyric or introspective dalliance; runs alert and cerebral, crisp and vital, with next to never a hint of sentiment — bravura here, wit or impertinence there. In these qualities we listeners are to find our interest and take our pleasure. Martelli's Concerto, piece and performance, yielded both plentifully and engagingly. But the unaccustomed, and therefore mistrustful, "cut it cold." Outside Stravinsky and, may be, Hindemith, whom the matinée audience has at last accepted, it prefers—for the present—not to go.

Ravel Renewed

But when Ravel, become at the end of his fifties almost a modern classic, conjures; when Mr. Sanromá takes his place at the piano; when Dr. Koussevitzky is plainly in happy vein over a new "première," how willingly and responsively that same audience goes along. Yet the new Piano-Concerto discloses not a connotation or an implication outside itself; has its being in its own virtuosity; exists primarily and persistently to interest and entertain. In the kind, within the self-imposed limitations, what a perfect piece of composition it is! In the designing, writing and adjusting of the piano-part, it is as though Ravel had re-assembled acquired experience, practised instinct, ripened invention and adroit resource from the days of the early "Miroirs" and "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," through "Le Tombeau de Couperin" to the more recent chamber-pieces—re-assembled, re-animated and refined. Not a note is spared or wasted. Everything falls into just place. Nothing fails of its purpose.

To the virtuoso, modernist, and sympathetic pianist, as indeed Mr. Sanromá's performance suggested, the piano-part must be pleasure to play, exactions included. Born of a light and fecund theme, it is alert, elastic, eager, radiant, at the beginning. Sentiment touches it with grace before the first movement ends in a sparkling foam of ornament. The slow movement, through the longer half virtually a piano-solo over a subdued and gently sustaining bass, is a simple, transparent, long-curved, undulating melody outspringing from the end of middle age, wistful, remembering, soft-spoken. A still, clear, autumn light unhardened plays over it. Gradually, the English horn summarizes, the orchestra severally and collectively joins in the song; the piano spins a lace-work of musing embroidery. Through the racing, outflinging, bedeviled finale, the piano runs a gamut of rhythmic agilities, kaleidoscopic ornament, thrusts and counter-thrusts with the orchestra; so to a fanfare-ish close. Hardly once does invention or exhilaration flag.

The orchestral part is companion-piece to the piano-part in economy and precision, in lightness, brightness and winged motion. Through the first division, it is usually vivacious and ornamental. Through the slow movement it is often softened into delicate and adroit euphonies, into a tender echoing of the melody while the piano twines it with fantasy. Through the finale hints of jazz recur, now in syncopated rhythms, again in momentary stunts, like the glissandi for trombones, in a "blues" quality that haunts the underlying melody. But all that is jazz assimilated, Ravelized, minding its Parisian P's and Q's. Writing for orchestra, Ravel maintains throughout his quick and life-long sensibility to individual timbres, his imagination with patterned sonorities, his ability to suffuse the pattern with light, so vitalize it. In such an orchestral part Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were as virtuosi excelling themselves for a composer and a music that stimulated such prowess. Once more, the conductor was, par excellence, the conductor for Ravel. With reason the composer originally intended the Concerto for initial production in Boston.

Uncut Bruckner

These experiences, interesting as they were, filled less than half the concert. One hour and a quarter of it fell to the performance of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony (in C minor) note for note from beginning unto the distant end. Asked to restore a cut in the slow movement where the composer's imagination rises high, clear, ecstatic, Dr. Koussevitzky took the Brucknerites at their word; "closed" every cut—allegro, scherzo and finale—from Mr. Fiedler's and Dr. Muck's day to his own. These restorations lengthened the performance by fifteen minutes; but it is doubtful whether a quarter hour less would have held those who cannot "abide Bruckner," either for matter or manner. On the other hand, the avowed Brucknerites were gratified at this unusual consideration for "the master" in one of his longest symphonies; while the major part of the listeners who held firm to the end and who asked only that Bruckner engross and stir them, seemed content. True, there were numerous departures; but once upon a time in Vienna only ten heard to the last note one of his earlier symphonies. True again, he is repetitious; but to reiterate was an impulse of his temperament and remains a part of his quality.

For those who are still studious of Bruckner, who would hear him without prejudice, who find pleasure from him increasing at each new occasion, this full performance of the Eighth Symphony brought better understanding and new sympathy. The finale fared least fortunately. There Bruckner would ascend to sonorous solemnities; sustain and intensify them. To him they connoted the churchly ceremonies that he had known at the great and rich abbey of St. Florian, the stately ecclesiastic pageants in which he had shared, under "his 'Cardinal,'" in the cathedral at the neighboring Linz. When he would transfuse such solemnities into symphonic music, he seems to be haunted by the organ that he played in them as well as by his Baireuth-like trumpets, trombones and tubas. He fails to free himself from churchly accent and suggestion; so attain to the heighth and breadth of universal vision. Perhaps, for that reason, this finale of the Eighth Symphony seemed persistently striving, mannered, impotent. Though Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra urged him manfully, only in the upswelling and long held sonorities toward the end—the four themes of the Symphony upon one another piled—did Bruckner draw near his goal.

Profit and Loss

On the other hand, the Scherzo gained by completeness. Though full performance disclosed only the more clearly Bruckner's inability or indifference with varied or contrasted rhythms, it also evoked and sustained an atmosphere. Doubtless by subconscious impulse this Scherzo sounds from the upper Austria where Bruckner was born and lived lon —a smiling, sun-brightened, undulating persistently rustic countryside, wher trees line the roads, where at the end of a vista a great abbey may break the horizon, where the folk are a peasantry simple-minded, good-hearted, tranquil, pious, on occasion gay. The quiet melody of this Scherzo in the Eighth Symphony sings for them. The rhythm beats to their steps. Though he finally dwelt and worked in Vienna, Bruckner wrote scherzi of the countryside that he remembered. In urban America it is hard for us to feel this atmosphere. Dr. Koussevitzky, as romantic at heart as Bruckner with such recollection, divined and spun it.

The first movement gained likewise by complete performance. There if the hearer looks and listens for them, he may descry most of the shortcomings repeated to weariness against Bruckner: prolixity and platitudes; sequences and inversions until they become mannerisms; grandiose vesture for shrunken matter; musical paragraphs innocent of transition; indifference to choice; disdain of self-discipline; so forth through a list dressed already a hundred times. On the other hand out of this music "in entirety" rise more than one of his distinctions—the fervor with which he wrote to kindle an equal fervor in performers and listeners; the faith he kept in his own forms and procedures, his upswelling ascents and leaping descents, his rests and resumptions; the simplicity of his musical ideas as from a mind and spirit unsuspectingly naive; the complexities in which he arrayed them as though that same mind and spirit had absorbed the baroque luxuriance of the church at St. Florian's; in sonorities, the richness of his woodwinds and horns, the heroical voice of his plangent brass, the glowing depths of his strings; above all the intensifying of his music, reiteration upon reiteration, until it rises to vision ecstasy and illumination. It is Dr. Koussevitzky's sense of this tonal texture and intensive process, these fervors, exaltations and momentary sublimities that make him, above most conductors, discerning, and eloquent with Bruckner.

In the slow movement of the Eighth Symphony this aspiration ascends to attainment. Through page upon page the long adagio coils and uncoils, ultimately and ever mounting heavenward. Four themes engender it into hymn-like instrumental song; reiteration enforces it deeper and deeper sonorities enrich it, or a more shimmering texture gilds it as with an halo. Presently the heavens open and Bruckner—the mysticism of the Roman church pulsing within him—beholds and sounds the joys of Paradise. A thousand times at St. Florian's or in Linz Cathedral he has played the Sanctus upon his organ. Now the hos of the redeemed are singing it apocalypti cally. Of a sudden the hymn stays ,an stills. And God said: "Let there b peace." And there was peace. . . . It by his deepest fervors, his spellboun visions, his celestial felicities, and th music he made of them, that Bruckn should be judged—to stand unique, th far, among the diviners who have wr ten black notes upon white paper ru in staves.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

APR 22 1932

Exciting News From Boston Symphony

DIVISIONS of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio are now starting out to sell the series for next season. Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the club, received the following wire from Boston a day or two ago which gives the news from the famous symphony of that city, led by Koussevitzky, which is one of the orchestras that the club is to present again next season:

"Boston Symphony orchestra," reads the telegram from J. N. Burk, Symphony hall, "will culminate remarkable season next week, Friday and Saturday, in Boston with Brahms' First Symphony. New York series brilliantly closed with Liszts' choral "Faust" symphony. Ravel's new piano concerto has first American performance this Friday; Philadelphia performance coming later on same day. Koussevitzky sails for Europe on Ile de France, May 4. Will be guest conductor of famous Vienna Philharmonic in Vienna next June."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 15 1932

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SUCCESSFUL SEASON

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was artistically one of the most successful in the orchestra's history, says the Boston Globe in a survey of the recently closed series of concerts. Only under Dr. Muck, it continues in part, has a higher standard of performance consistently been maintained. Never has the enthusiasm of the audiences been greater. Never have the programs ranged more widely through music old and new.

The only really serious difficulty is the size of the deficit, estimated at $100,000; of which $37,000 had not been subscribed at the close of the season. No doubt the trustees will make a determined effort to reduce expenses next year. It is encouraging to all concerned that the 24 Fridays and 24 Saturdays were sold out for the season just ended, and the two short series on Mondays and Tuesdays were very well attended. Symphony concerts, if a luxury, are evidently not one with which their frequenters willingly dispense.

◆ ◆ ◆

RALD
N, MASS.

/22/32

$3965 . . DICT AGAINST BOSTON SYMPHONY

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

LOWELL, April 21—A Middlesex superior court jury this afternoon returned a verdict of $3963 against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. The award was in favor of Mrs. James H. Shrigley of Lowell, who sued both the orchestra and the New Boston Music hall as a result of injuries she received in a fall in Symphony hall, Boston, June 10. 1930.

Judge Greenhalge ordered a directed verdict for the New Boston Music hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

MAY 1 1932

AN AMERICAN SONG OF FAITH

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT IS a curious fact, not easily to be explained, that patriotism, one of the most deep-seated and urgent of human emotions, should have yielded so little music of first-rate quality. Love of God, love of Woman—these have been transmuted by composers into music that is among the greatest that we possess. But love of country has stirred men to no such profundities and ecstasies of song. It should, perhaps, be remarked that the late Vincent d'Indy, a penetrating student of musical art, regarded the C minor Symphony of Beethoven as a patriotic utterance. But this opinion seems to have been peculiar to Monsieur d'Indy; and most qualified musicians would probably agree that love of country awaits expression in music comparable for eloquence to that in which Bach and Beethoven avowed their love of God and that in which Wagner avowed his love of Woman.

* * *

George Washington and Mr. Carpenter

IT IS not likely that Mr. John Alden Carpenter, a creative artist whose sensibility and fervor are guided by an intelligence that is delectably humorous and poised, had any idea of challenging the high gods of tone when he composed his "Song of Faith." Yet the result that he achieved is in several ways remarkable, and it has had less recognition than it deserves.

This American "Song of Faith," intended for a four-part chorus of children's (or women's) and men's voices, orchestra, and a Narrator, was written for the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, and was intended for performance in the nation-wide celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of Washington. Mr. Carpenter completed the work last autumn. It was performed at a Boston Symphony concert February 23, and by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra two days later. New York, in its usual dilatory and negligent fashion where new music is concerned, has yet to acknowledge the existence of a notable new work by one of the most distinguished of American composers; though Mr. Walter Damrosch, enterprising as usual, conducted a broadcast performance of the piece in February.

Those who note the course of musical events from the watchtowers of the gramophone laboratories have also been admirably alert; and the "Song of Faith" appears among the current issues of the RCA Victor Company, recorded on two ten-inch disks (Nos. 1559-'60) by the Chicago a Capella Choir, directed by Noble Cain, "with symphony orchestra and organ" (the name of the Narrator is not given). The recording is, in the main, satisfactory, so far as the transference of the music is concerned; but the enunciation of the singers is poor. As for the Narrator who speaks the words of Washington that Mr. Carpenter has quoted in the latter part of the work, it must, alas! be said that if anything or any one could impair reverence for that immortal Shade, this anonymous declaimer, with ncultivated voice and diction, would be an almost certain means to end. It is a thousand pities that the First President's stirring words not have been intrusted to a speaker more suitably equipped to deal this striking and impressive feature of Mr. Carpenter's conception.

* * *

Priceless Inheritance

THE writing of this work," says the composer, "I have come to a new realization of the priceless inheritance that has come down to om George Washington. I have felt, more than ever before, that the ring value of this inheritance is based not primarily on his military s, or his contribution to the arts of government, but on the selfless rity of his character.

It is from that character that we inherit the Great American Dream dream which has sustained us through our storms and trials, which at this very moment we must strive in deepest sincerity to ure. For the whole world is beset by a dangerous psychology of which for us is but the modern counterpart of the snows of Valley Forge. And it is for our country now to raise its eyes in the faith of its founders and lead the way out.

"And, therefore, if my 'Song of Faith' can succeed in lighting one single candle of reaffirmation, I shall be content."

Mr. Carpenter provided his own words—with the posthumous assistance of the Father of his Country: for the lines given to the Narrator (who in concert performances is unseen) are extracted from Washington's writings, "so combined as to form a consecutive and self-contained address." With this exception, the text is Mr. Carpenter's. Here, in full, are the words that he has set to music:

CHILDREN AND MEN

Come now, hear our song!
Song of Freedom, comrades, swell the throng!
Hear that ancient story told again,
Of the father of our fathers!
Hear our song!
As a growing river flowing to the sea,
As the springing branches of a mighty tree,
So his faith abounds,
So his strong heart led us, made us free.
We, his children's children, raise our eyes,
To the hills and the mountains in the skies.

CHILDREN

Comes to town young Doodle dandy!
On his crown a feather fine!
Rides a pony, calls him Macaroni,
Macaroni, O!

MEN

Sounds the throb of the drum-beat,
Sound the cries of the red-man,
Through the years intervening,
As they rang in the days of our fathers!

CHILDREN AND MEN

Sounds a sweet lullaby,
Sounds an old song my mother knew.
Sound again, gentle cry,
Soothe a young heart, like falling dew
Bring to me rest again,
Sing to me low,
There where my head has lain,
Well do I know.

CHILDREN

Lead me to sleep where the still waters flow.
So sings my motherland,
So yields her love to light my day,
Guides me with gentle hand,
On to a bright and shining way to a shining day.

CHILDREN AND MEN

Oh, hear the band, the Yankee band!
From hill and plain, swing out again!
Oh, hear the call!
Come one, come all!
Now hear the word, his heart revealing!
Now hear the very voice of the father!

* * *

NARRATOR
[Washington's Words]

"I close this last solemn act of my life by commending the interests of our dearest country to the protection of Almighty God.
It is impossible to reason without arriving at a Supreme Being. I now make my earnest prayer that He would have you in His holy protection.
Let us labor to keep alive in our breasts that little spark of celestial fire called Conscience.
We must not despair, the game is yet in our own hands.
Let us have a government by which our lives and our liberties shall be secured.
I feel now as I conceive a wearied traveler must do;
I move gently down the stream of life until I sleep with my fathers. The work is done, the voice of mankind is with me. I am not afraid to go."

CHILDREN

Comes a bright and shining day,
By our Fathers' faith let us pray.

CHILDREN AND MEN

May the hand of God be our stay,
And our guiding star light our way.

* * *

"Divine, Magnetic Lands"

MR. CARPENTER'S score is prefaced by the famous and exultant lines in which Walt Whitman inclosed his radiant vision of an America as yet, perhaps, not quite completely realized:

"Come, I will make the continent indissoluble;
I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shone upon;
I will make divine magnetic lands;
With the love of comrades. . .
I will plant companionship thick as trees along all the rivers of America, and along the shores of the great lakes, and all over the prairies;
I will make inseparable cities with their arms about each other's necks. . . .
For you! for you, I am trilling these songs,
In the love of comrades,
In the high-towering love of comrades."

* * *

It is significant of Mr. Carpenter's characteristics as an artist—his taste, his tact, his distinction of feeling and of thought, his choice and fine selectiveness—that he has not debased the moods and emotions implicit in his subject-matter by using them as a pretext for mere patriotic ballyhoo and jingoistic eagle-shrieking. There are no brass bands, no blatant stump-speakers, suggested in this music; no bombs burst in the air from which it takes its breath; and its most impressive moments are moments of an almost devotional quiet and absorption. Rhetoric is absent from its meditative and sober pages. For this is music of faith and love and elevation.

It should be said that the quality of the music is scarcely indicated by that of the verses with which it is consorted (one fancies that Le Bon Dieu intended Mr. Carpenter to devote his esthetic activities to music, undiverted by poetical excursions). One must look to the thought and feeling implied by the words if one would find the measure of the music's eloquence. These underlying emotional patterns are rich in tenderness, in exaltation; charged with a grave and quiet intensity of feeling. This is the finer grain of patriotism—a patriotism that is deeply sensitive and aware, even a little humorous (as in the allusions to "Yankee Doodle"); finding its most searching expression in the thought of the beloved and cradling land that is still, for some of us, a nurse of the spirit and the mother of incredible faiths.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
MAY 8 - 1932

A Liaison With Music

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY and His Epoch. By Arthur Lourie. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring . . . New York: Alfred A. Knopf . . . $3.50.

Reviewed by PETER BOWDOIN

IT MAY be that Sergei Koussevitzky is more typical of his epoch than we had supposed. It may be that the Russian contrabassist and conductor will some day be recognized as the symbol of his time, like another Peter or Catherine. In any case, both himself and his epoch have been discussed interestingly by one of the prominent modernists among the younger Russian composers. If it is true that in the "biographical chronicle" M. Lourié omits matter that either Mr. Bradford or Mr. Strachey would be certain to include, it is no less true that what M. Lourié does recount, from the poor little village boy, rich in native gifts, to the great epochal world musician, is bathed in the transfiguring hues of a veritable paradise of roses. Mr. Koussevitzky, while still very much alive, is indeed fortunate to have so resonant a celebrant.

The first chapter of M. Lourié's opus is entitled "A Portrait," of which the first sentence reads as follows: "The whole of Sergei Koussevitzky's life bears the impress of one single passion—his ardent love for music—which consumes his being as with fire." But we must be on our guard against hasty inferences. Mr. Koussevitzky's "love" is by no means the humdrum affection of "every artist" who gives himself up entirely to some branch of art." It is "of an altogether different order." We are told that "his relations with music have never been of the legitimate, normally established, professional type; all his life he has been her infatuated and clandestine lover." In this is certainly food for thought, because we had supposed that Mr. Koussevitzky's liaison with his muse had been quite public and above-board. Furthermore, Mr. Lourié presently assures us that "Koussevitzky, the eternally youthful and insatiable lover of music, has become her lawful spouse—and in this is the key to the comprehension of himself and his activities." Just here is a curious reminder of the Roi Soleil and Mme. de Maintenon, or of Lord Ormond and his Aminta!

What follows is, however, to the mere outsider more recognizably Koussevitzky: "His art has been capricious and self-willed; it has not submitted to the established traditions and the rules of behavior laid down for conductors. It has often been, and at times still is, at variance with them, preferring to act on independent and individual lines." Indeed, to M. Lourié "his conduct as an artist is most interesting when it is at cross purposes with the normal and the usual, when it transgresses the bounds of the generally recognized and normalized decorum; far more so than when it complies with the conventions, joins the professional front and comes into line with the foremost conductors of the day, the men of outstanding merit, among whom he is by universal consent officially included."

Such, then, is Sergei Koussevitzky, Great Lover unto Music. And Mr. Lourié's enthusiastic, more or less paradoxical account of him takes him—with the omissions alluded to above—through his periods as virtuoso of the double-bass and as orchestral conductor; before the war, during the war and after the war; up to his present exalted station as conductor of the Boston Orchestra.

Let us not forget that M. Lourié is a modernist composer before he is biographer or apologist for any other musician. Consequently to the reviewer the musical criticism that crops up in this book is decidedly more interesting and important than the inexhaustible panegyrics pronounced upon Mr. Koussevitzky. When, for example, M. Lourié says: "The most characteristic feature in Debussy's music is that in it rhythm, and not metre, plays a predominant part," you stop and listen. Thus his pages devoted to Debussy, Richard Strauss, the Russian composers in general, and such younger modernists as Prokofieff, Hindemith and Honegger are of real value, at times of real illumination. And on the subject of American music few Europeans have written so sensibly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
MAY 25 1932

HOOSIER HOMESPUN

NOISE

We patronized a cafeteria the other day; discovered that, since our last visit, the whole place had been redecorated. Among other things, it had a new ceiling designed to alleviate the noise of the clattering dishes. Thirty-five years ago or so, all Boston rose to cheer Colonel Higginson's willingness to provide the old town with a symphony hall. Charles Follen McKim was appointed architect. Shrewdly suspecting that no amount of good architecture would compensate for an acoustic failure, he sent W. C. Sabine, alert Harvard professor of physics, to Leipsic to examine the old Gewandhaus, up to that time probably the most acoustically perfect room in the world. For a long time discerning musicians had known that an empty auditorium is one thing, an occupied auditorium, quite another; that Beethoven's Fifth symphony might give a good accounting before an audience of women attired in the fullness of the naughty-nineties, could fail miserably before an audience of masculine starched shirts; that curtains, cushions, crowds, in some strange way, made for success or failure. Sabine uncovered the mystery; discovered that the relative density of materials surrounding and occupying the room had everything to do with acoustics. He projected his observations into laws. The success of the Boston Symphony hall inspired several concerns to patent and fabricate wall and ceiling coverings in conformity with these laws. After Sabine's death, the University of Illinois continued the research, revised some of his formulæ. Future fact-finding historians will discover that these revisions synchronize with the advent of the saxophone and the cafeteria.

A. S.

• • •

When Classics Lock Arms With Popular in Music

By AMBROSE L. McLAUGHLIN

STICKLERS for musical propriety might, with some reason, frown upon such programs as are being offered nightly at the Pop concerts in Symphony hall, Boston. In fact it is reasonably safe to say that there are comparatively few of those individuals who would attend a Pop concert. But there are many other music-lovers, whose love for the art runs considerably deeper than the surface, who are not so punctilious and who are not grievously offended when Handel or Wagner are linked with Suppe and Sullivan, even with Cadman and Gershwin.

A program that we heard early in the week included selections as far apart in structure and substance as excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" to an instrumental arrangement of Cadman's song, "At Dawning." Other numbers were Dvorak's First Slavonic Dance, Suppe's "Light Cavalry" overture, Berceuse from Stravinsky's "The Firebird," Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," Spanish Dance from de Falla's "La Vida Breve," Strauss' "Artist's Life" waltz and the Aragonaise from Massenet's "Le Cid." There were some encores, among them being the Barcarolle from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman" and the rhapsodic Gershwin march, "Wintergreen for President," from the musical satire, "Of Thee I Sing."

To be sure, there is no musical cohesion or symmetry in such a program. On the other hand, none is intended. The accepted meaning of the term "Pops" is popular concerts, even though considerable of the music played is regarded as distinctly classic. The Sunday programs are much more stately than those given during the week, and next Sunday's reads much like a conventional symphony program, comprising Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, Beethoven's "The Battle of Vittoria," Weber's concert piece in F-minor for piano and orchestra, and Ravel's "Bolero." After the regular symphony season, during which there is a more or less rigid adherence to the "static" and "movable" symphonic forms, the two months' session of the Pops affords an opportunity of hearing many worth-while selections not heard nowadays in the concert halls devoted to the more serious and pretentious types of instrumental music.

Particularly ingratiating was the manner in which the hackneyed "Light Cavalry" overture was rendered by the 85 skilled players under Arthur Fiedler's direction. This old thriller, which has been torn and quartered by every nondescript band and xylophonist the world over, was lifted from the ruck of the commonplace. It also takes on an element of real greatness when played by an orchestra of true symphonic proportions and resources. For those ready and willing to test their appreciative capabilities of modern tonalities, there were the atmospheric Berceuse from Stravinsky's "The Fire Bird" and de Falla's Spanish Dance from "LaVida Breve." For those with well defined leanings towards the purely mellifluous, there were the Strauss waltz, the Cadman lyric, "At Dawning," a string arrangement of the old English song, "Sally In Our Alley" and a few of the encores. While for those with humorous proclivities there was the raucous splurge from "Of Thee I Sing."

Finally, for those who feel that a body of 85 musicians, well schooled in the highest forms of symphonic music, should give tangible—or is music intangible?—evidence of its powers, there were the colorful and exotic Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' Biblical work, "Samson and Delilah," and the excerpts from Wagner's great opera, "Die Meistersinger." The bacchanale, so effective in actual stage presentations, is an unusually engrossing number even in concert dress with its bizarre rhythms, orgiastic suggestions and lyric splendors.

It is the fate of most composers to have their works "dated"—representative of a certain period or perhaps ephemeral or outmoded form of writing. It is also the "thing" in certain quarters nowadays, to refer to Wagner and other titans as "old hat," while extolling such exponents of modernism as Schonberg, Stravinsky, Hindemith, Honegger, Bartok, Bloch, Pizzetti and others. Already some of those mentioned appear to have gone into partial if not total eclipse, whereas the Wagner of "Tristan" und "Meistersinger" and the Ring Cycle, remains as modern as tomorrow's dawn. Referring to the modernistic groups, the erudite Lawrence Gilman once remarked: "And then, some day, we hear again, perhaps after a lapse of years, 'Tristan,' or 'Die Walkure' or 'Gotterdammerung,' and we know that we have fooled ourselves—that we have been consorting after all, with the half-gods of music, impressive and potent and glamorous though they may be, while the sovereign of them all, the incomparable master, is still secure upon his throne, half hidden in the swirling mists about his footstoll, waiting for us to turn to him again." The "Meistersinger" excerpts on the Pops program dwarfed everything else, not from the angle of technical execution, but from that of revealing the musical super-structure, the marvellous symphonic web, the apparently ceaseless melodic flow that has been the model and the despair of innumerable lesser lights.

Symphony Orchestra Restored to the Big Roxy Theatre.

After a four months' interim, the Roxy theatre management has decided to restore its symphony orchestra, reduced to 80 players. Hugo Riesenfeld, well-known conductor, has been engaged to conduct the organization and assumed his duties on May 13, according to a recent announcement by Harry G. Kosch, president of the Roxy theatres corporation. This change marks a return to the policy which was inaugurated by S. L. Rothafel when this imposing theatre at Seventh avenue and 50th street, was opened, but which was abandoned recently in favor of lighter entertainment. The step was decided upon after the Roxy Theatres corporation recently took over the operation of the house from the Fox Theatres. Mr. Riesenfeld was long active in New York as managing director of the Rialto, Rivoli and Criterion theatres.

Short Sketches of Various Instruments

THE VIOLONCELLO AND THE DOUBLE BASS.

The violoncello is one of the finest of all instruments. Owing to its rich beautiful tone and its great technical possibilities its importance as a solo instrument and in chamber and orchestral compositions cannot be over-estimated.

In the orchestra the violoncello is usually assigned the bass part, in which it is re-enforced by the double basses. Because of its expressive qualities, however, it is often given solo passages.

The double bass is the largest and the lowest in pitch of all the string instruments. It not only re-enforces the bass of the string section, but it is the deep foundation upon which rests the entire orchestra. It is essentially an orchestral and not a solo instrument—in the virtuoso sense of that term. Though especially effective in pizzicato passages, the double bass is most frequently used in unison with the 'cellos.

NOTED CRITIC DISCLAIMS JAZZ AS SOLUTION OF OUR MUSIC PROBLEM

Is jazz the ultimate solution of the American problem in music? Does it express great American ideas any better or any worse than the idioms of modernist music? Is the southern negro any more capable of becoming the exponent of the thoughts, feelings, temper, aspirations of our people than Stravinsky? Do these later evangelists give us a better gospel than Reinecke and Jadassohn were giving the composers of the earlier generation? The negro music is more congenial to us than the imported style because it grew from our own soil. But it does not and cannot meet all the artistic needs of the well-known melting pot.

—W. J. Henderson.

PERHAPS THAT'S SOMETHING TO BRAG ABOUT!

I was too young to appreciate my grandfather's achievements. I went to the opera once, a matinee performance of "Rigoletto." I was 10, and I was bored stiff. Now I am 36—and I'm still bored stiff by grand opera.

- Oscar Hammerstein, II.

LATE FRENCH COMPOSER'S EPITOME OF ART

Art is a microcosm which passes like the world itself through successive periods of youth, maturity and age; which never perishes, but continually renews itself, it is not a closed circle, but a spiral assending and progressing.

—Vincent D'Indy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
STATE JOURNAL

JUN 3 - 1932

Bowen's Comments

By A. L BOWEN

A Saturday night at a Boston Symphony orchestra concert; ~~the huge~~ hall crowded, largely with college and university students; the program says, "Wheaton college has reserved one section;" the music is from the lighter compositions of Brahms, Grieg, Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," Delibes and Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing."

A. L. BOWEN.

* * *

The main floor of the beautiful hall is seated for groups of four, each group about a small table.

Two young students share my table; one long and lean with a supercilious air and a cynical attitude; the other, short and stout and more substantial; they speak English, French and one tongue I could not identify; the little fellow, glancing over his program, exclaims in suppressed glee, "Handel's 'Largo' with violin, organ and harp solo; that will be great."

* * *

All through the concert they listen, comment and draw sketches in ink on waste paper of buildings; they must be students in architecture; they show each other their work with a sort of hopeless smile. As the last selection starts, they leave and I pocket their sketches; some day one may be a great architect but the chances are that back home they'll be drawing the bungalows of their community and enjoying what music they can extract from a box in the corner of a living room.

* * *

On my left, two, a boy and girl, desperately in love—also students of good old Boston extraction. They are here because music and romance are eternity's superb gift to lovers. They, too, comment and listen, the while, heads close together, they work a puzzle with paper and pencil which requires one to make a sign after the other until the game comes either to solution or an impasse.

* * *

In front of me a party of four, two married couples—probably with no more understanding of music than I possess, but appreciative of what little they can understand. One of the men gives me a thrill. When the orchestra follows "Of Thee I Sing" with "Wintegreen for President," he laughs out loud and shakes with pleasure; what happiness is in his face when the audience demands a repetition and Director Fiedler responds. He has gotten his money's worth. Why should not music make us laugh? It stimulates all other emotions.

* * *

"Of Thee I Sing" is favorite of the evening. The applause is inspiring and fresh. It is youth's sympathy with the success of a living composer. Of all that crowd, nearly all face the supreme struggle. They shall not succeed if the world keeps its eyes upon the ideals and products of past generations, the so-called classics.

Why shouldn't this audience of students applaud what a man of this day and years has done to attract the notice of this orchestra? A superb demonstration, indeed, of class—youth consciousness.

* * *

Also, I must note, Gershwin's frothy, discordant composition becomes a classic when the Boston Symphonic orchestra plays it. We do nothing alone in this world. With this orchestra putting his music on its program, Gershwin will live. Bernie and King and the rest of the hoofers' bands will kill him.

* * *

So I walked away with mixed emotions, envying youth who are advancing to the combat lines and almost happy that I have about passed through.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RADIO GUIDE

JUN 5 1932

"SUMMER SYMPHONIES"

HERE we are in the month of June! The musical season has died a natural death and is almost forgotten even by those most closely related to it. Pleasant memories remain of the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Symphony series, the twenty-five broadcasts from the "Met," and the many notable recitals. We look forward with anticipation to a full season's program from each of the above organizations, though the opera will curtail its activities next winter to sixteen weeks, beginning November twenty-first.

In the interim, mixed with the baseball season, we are to have two series of "pop" concerts. Already the eighty-five musicians of the Boston Symphony who comprise the "Pop" orchestra, have started their summer series and have transformed that most sedate part of Boston, known as Symphony Hall, into a Bavarian musical festival (minus the beer). Arthur Fiedler, one of the few native-born American conductors, directed the first broadcast this past week and will continue in the same capacity during the four that are to be heard on successive Wednesday evenings. This is his third season. Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony's ~~regular~~ conductor, is supposedly having his vacation in Europe; but announcements from Vienna tell that he is leading the Philharmonic there this week. Once I was told that the Boston Symphony—being non-union—was unavailable for broadcasts. Evidently that untrue,

hall hear ts from twenty-ner sea-except

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

7 1932

DOWNES ON RADIO LAUDS POLES' MUSIC

Critic's Broadcast in Warsaw on Modern Composers Is Heard Here.

RECOUNTS VISIT TO OPERA

Nation's Creative Art Said to Be Developing as a Result of Political Freedom.

The work and aims of modern European composers and musicians was the topic of an international broadcast yesterday afternoon by Olin Downes, music critic of THE NEW YORK TIMES, who spoke before a microphone at Warsaw, Poland. Transoceanic radio conditions were especially kind for the occasion and Mr. Downes's voice was heard here with remarkable clarity.

The critic spoke of the Warsaw operatic performance he had attended the night before. He told of the beauty of the surrounding foothills of the Carpathian Mountains, to which he had journeyed to visit the composer Carroll Schumanofsky at his country home, discovering, he said, that the composer was busily engaged in collecting and studying Polish folk music and that Americans next season were to be treated to a hearing of his new "Fourth Symphony," perhaps with the composer at the piano.

Mr. Downes spoke also of another Polish composer, Markovitch, whose works, played specially for his hearing, are to be performed next season for the first time in the United States by the Boston, Philadelphia and Los Angeles symphony orchestras under the respective leadership of Koussevitzky, Stokowski and Rod~~zinski.~~ The music critic called the Polish composer a man "probably destined to fashion a new sort of musical language," who speaks musically in terms "so daring and so completely original."

The music critic from America dwelt not solely on the music of Poland, but also told of his musical experiences in other European capitals, including Berlin. The next stopover in his itinerary will be Moscow, where he will deliver another broadcast. A third radio talk will be given from Paris. The address yesterday was carried from coast to coast in the United States and Canada over the WEAF network. It came to listeners here by way of Polski Radjo and wire to Berlin, where a short-wave station of the Reichs Rundfunk Gesellschaft transmitted it for reception at the Long Island depot of the National Broadcasting Company.

"I cannot understand why so little is known to the average American of Poland's people, of her music, of her utterly unworldly and romantic and poetic aspects, in which it seems that she remains absolutely unique," said Mr. Downes. "She has a group of young composers, who, since the political emancipation of the country and under the fatherly stimulus of the opera and the founder of the Warsaw Philharmonic Society, are more and more developing into a group."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

JUN 13 1932

* * *

Sly rumor has it that Phil Baker has been invited to be the accordion soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this summer. ~~This time,~~ however, without benefit of stooge. But the whisperers do not say whether Baker will drop his forthcoming musical revue plans in which Lilyan Tashman has been mentioned as the feminine lead, in order to take up the offer.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG PRESS

JUN 14 1932

FORMER SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE DIES

Emil Paur, Noted Violinist, Succumbs in Paris

Word was received here today of the death in Paris of Emil Paur, noted violinist, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra from 1904 to 1910.

Born in Europe in 1855, Mr. Paur graduated from the Vienna Conservatory of Music in 1870. He began playing the violin and piano at the age of 8. He studied in Vienna with the famous conductors, Arthur Nikish and Eugene Gruenberg.

He was conductor of the Vienna Court Orchestra from 1870 to 1876; conductor of the Boston Symphony, succeeding his old ~~schoolmate~~, Nikish, 1883-1890; conductor of the New York Philharmonic, 1898-1902; director of Wagner productions at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, 1899-1900, and also director of the National Conservatory of Music in New York in the same years.

After leaving Pittsburgh in 1910, he went to the Berlin Opera, Germany. Among his original works are "In Der Natur," a symphony, and a number of violin and piano arrangements.

In late years Mr. Paur had made his home in Paris with his wife, Marie Burger, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

JUN 16 1932

Emil Paur.

MISTEK, Czechoslovakia, June 16 (A. P.).—Emil Paur, former symphony orchestra conductor in New York and other American cities, is dead here after a long illness. He was 76 years old.

Mr. Paur, who studied music in Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. While in New York he scored his greatest success in prewar days. After leaving Pittsburgh, where he conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, he lived quietly in this country town.

—

A violinist and a pianist before becoming a conductor at Kassel in 1876, Emil Paur succeeded Anton Seidel as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. He directed the orchestra until 1902, and in 1899 and 1900 he directed Wagnerian works at the Metropolitan Opera. At this time also he began a three-year directorship in the National Conservatory in New York. He conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony from 1904 until 1910.

Paur succeeded Karl Muck at the Royal Opera in Berlin when the latter joined the Boston Symphony in 1912. In Berlin he met with the displeasure of the German Emperor, who forced him to resign in January, 1913. The Emperor, who had previously objected to Paur's treatment of "Carmen," asked, as head of the Royal Opera, that another conductor be substituted a few hours before the final production of "The Flying Dutchman."

Paur composed a symphony and also wrote many pieces for the piano. His wife, Mary Burger Paur, who died in 1889, was an accomplished pianist. They had several children.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JUN 16 1932

CONDUCTOR DEAD

EMIL PAUR

EMIL PAUR DIES, NOTED MUSICIAN

Former Director of Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic Succumbs at 76

FAMOUS AS WAGNERIAN

Mistex, Czechoslovakia, June 16—(AP)—Emil Paur, former conductor of the Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic orchestra, is dead here after a long illness. He was 76 years old.

Emil Paur had a wide and deserved popularity in America for nearly 20 years, being a contemporary of Artur Nikisch, Anton Seidl and other great conductors of the period between 1890 and 1910.

He came to America in 1893 to succeed Nikisch at the Boston Symphony, remaining there for five years. Then, on the death of Seidl, Paur was brought to New York to take the baton of the Philharmonic, and also to direct many of the Wagnerian operas at the Metropolitan.

He returned to Europe in 1900, conducting in London and Madrid and in Germany, and came to America again in 1904 to take charge of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. He remained with that organization until it was dissolved in 1910.

Returning to Germany he became conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin, where he participated several years later in one of the many squabbles between the opera musicians and the Kaiser, just as Dr. Karl Muck had done. The Kaiser, displeased by a performance of "Carmen," directed by Paur, ordered Leo Blech to conduct the next performance. It was "The Flying Dutchman," which Paur had rehearsed. Paur immediately resigned.

After that Paur did some desultory musical work and finally retired. He had been living quietly in Czechoslovakia for a number of years.

Paur was born in Austria in 1855 and was a violinist and pianist before he became a director of music. He was dynamic on the conductor's stand, above middle height and with a strongly knit frame and a massive head with a mass of light, fair hair and with a beard.

As a Wagnerian interpreter he ranked with the greatest. He conducted the Boston Symphony concerts in this city during the five seasons he was with that organization, from 1893 to 1898, and during the next few years appeared here with the Philharmonic and the Metropolitan Opera Company, conducting its local productions of German opera.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

JUN 16 1932

EMIL PAUR

Was Former Conductor of Pittsburgh and Boston Orchestras

Mistek, Czecho-Slovakia, June 16.—(AP)—Emil Paur, former conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, is dead here after a long illness. He was 76 years old.

Paur, who studied music at Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also conducted in New York, where he scored his greatest success in prewar days. After leaving Pittsburgh he lived quietly in this country town.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
STATE JOURNAL

JUN 3 - 1932

Bowen's Comments

By A. L. BOWEN

A. L. BOWEN.

A Saturday night at a Boston Symphony orchestra concert; ~~the huge~~ hall crowded, largely with college and university students; the program says, "Wheaton college has reserved one section;" the music is from the lighter compositions of Brahms, Grieg, Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," Delibes and Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing."

* * *

The main floor of the beautiful hall is seated for groups of four, each group about a small table.

Two young students share my table; one long and lean with a supercilious air and a cynical attitude; the other, short and stout and more substantial; they speak English, French and one tongue I could not identify; the little fellow, glancing over his program, exclaims in suppressed glee, "Handel's 'Largo' with violin, organ and harp solo; that will be great."

* * *

All through the concert they listen, comment and draw sketches in ink on waste paper of buildings; they must be students in architecture; they show each other their work with a sort of hopeless smile. As the last selection starts, they leave and I pocket their sketches; some day one may be a great architect but the chances are that back home they'll be drawing the bungalows of their community and enjoying what music they can extract from a box in the corner of a living room.

* * *

On my left, two, a boy and girl, desperately in love—also students of good old Boston extraction. They are here because music and romance are eternity's superb gift to lovers. They, too, comment and listen, the while heads close together, they work a puzzle with paper and pencil which requires one to make a sign after the other until the game comes either to solution or an impasse.

* * *

In front of me a party of four, two married couples—probably with no more understanding of music than I possess, but appreciative of what little they can understand. One of the men gives me a thrill. When the orchestra follows "Of Thee I Sing" with "Wintegreen for President," he laughs out loud and shakes with pleasure; what happiness is in his face when the audience demands a repetition and Director Fiedler responds. He has gotten his money's worth. Why should not music make us laugh? It stimulates all other emotions.

* * *

"Of Thee I Sing" is favorite of the evening. The applause is inspiring and fresh. It is youth's sympathy with the success of a living composer. Of all that crowd, nearly all face the supreme struggle. They shall not succeed if the world keeps its eyes upon the ideals and products of past generations, the so-called classics.

Why shouldn't this audience of students applaud what a man of this day and years has done to attract the notice of this orchestra? A superb demonstration, indeed, of class—youth consciousness.

* * *

Also, I must note, Gershwin's frothy, discordant composition becomes a classic when the Boston Symphonic orchestra plays it. We do nothing alone in this world. With this orchestra putting his music on its program, Gershwin will live. Bernie and King and the rest of the hoofers' bands will kill him.

* * *

So I walked away with mixed emotions, envying youth who are advancing to the combat lines and almost happy that I have about passed through.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RADIO GUIDE

JUN 5 1932

"SUMMER SYMPHONIES"

HERE we are in the month of June! The musical season has died a natural death and is almost forgotten even by those most closely related to it. Pleasant memories remain of the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Symphony series, the twenty-five broadcasts from the "Met," and the many notable recitals. We look forward with anticipation to a full season's program from each of the above organizations, though the opera will curtail its activities next winter to sixteen weeks, beginning November twenty-first.

In the interim, mixed with the baseball season, we are to have two series of "pop" concerts. Already the eighty-five musicians of the Boston Symphony who comprise the "Pop" orchestra, have started their summer series and have transformed that most sedate part of Boston, known as Symphony Hall, into a Bavarian musical festival (minus the beer). Arthur Fiedler, one of the few native-born American conductors, directed the first broadcast this past week and will continue in the same capacity during the four that are to be heard on successive Wednesday evenings. This is his third season. Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony's ~~regular~~ conductor, is supposedly having his vacation in Europe; but announcements from Vienna tell that he is leading the Philharmonic there this week. Once I was told that the Boston Symphony — being non-union — was unavailable for broadcasts. Evidently that report is untrue, at least during the Summer.

Before the end of the month we shall hear the New York Philharmonic concerts from the Lewisohn Stadium. On June twenty-eighth that orchestra begins its summer season of eight weeks, playing nightly except when rain falls.

The work and aims of modern European composers and musicians was the topic of an international broadcast yesterday afternoon by Olin Downes, music critic of THE NEW YORK TIMES, who spoke before a microphone at Warsaw, Poland. Transoceanic radio conditions were especially kind for the occasion and Mr. Downes's voice was heard here with remarkable clarity.

The critic spoke of the Warsaw operatic performance he had attended the night before. He told of the beauty of the surrounding foothills of the Carpathian Mountains, to which he had journeyed to visit the composer Carroll Schumanofsky at his country home, discovering, he said, that the composer was busily engaged in collecting and studying Polish folk music and that Americans next season were to be treated to a hearing of his new "Fourth Symphony," perhaps with the composer at the piano.

Mr. Downes spoke also of another Polish composer, Markovitch, whose works, played specially for his hearing, are to be performed next season for the first time in the United States by the Boston, Philadelphia and Los Angeles symphony orchestras under the respective leadership of Keussevitzky, Stokowski and Rod~~zinski.~~ The music critic called the Polish composer a man "probably destined to fashion a new sort of musical language," who speaks musically in terms "so daring and so completely original."

The music critic from America dwelt not solely on the music of Poland, but also told of his musical experiences in other European capitals, including Berlin. The next stopover in his itinerary will be Moscow, where he will deliver another broadcast. A third radio talk will be given from Paris. The address yesterday was carried from coast to coast in the United States and Canada over the WEAF network. It came to listeners here by way of Polski Radjo and wire to Berlin, where a shortwave station of the Reichs Rundfunk Gesellschaft transmitted it for reception at the Long Island depot of the National Broadcasting Company.

"I cannot understand why so little is known to the average American of Poland's people, of her music, of her utterly unworldly and romantic and poetic aspects, in which it seems that she remains absolutely unique," said Mr. Downes. "She has a group of young composers, who, since the political emancipation of the country and under the fatherly stimulus of the opera and the founder of the Warsaw Philharmonic Society, are more and more developing into a group."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

JUN 13 1932

* * *

Sly rumor has it that Phil Baker has been invited to be the accordion soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this summer. ~~This time~~, however, without benefit of stooge. But the whisperers do not say whether Baker will drop his forthcoming musical revue plans in which Lilyan Tashman has been mentioned as the feminine lead, in order to take up the offer.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG PRESS

JUN 14 1932

FORMER SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE DIES

Emil Paur, Noted Violinist, Succumbs in Paris

Word was received here today of the death in Paris of Emil Paur, noted violinist, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra from 1904 to 1910.

Born in Europe in 1855, Mr. Paur graduated from the Vienna Conservatory of Music in 1870. He began playing the violin and piano at the age of 8. He studied in Vienna with the famous conductors, Arthur Nikish and Eugene Gruenberg.

He was conductor of the Vienna Court Orchestra from 1870 to 1876; conductor of the Boston Symphony, succeeding his old ~~schoolmate~~, Nikish, 1883-1890; conductor of the New York Philharmonic, 1898-1902; director of Wagner productions at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, 1899-1900, and also director of the National Conservatory of Music in New York in the same years.

After leaving Pittsburgh in 1910, he went to the Berlin Opera, Germany. Among his original works are "In Der Natur," a symphony, and a number of violin and piano arrangements.

In late years Mr. Paur had made his home in Paris with his wife, Marie Burger, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

JUN 16 1932

Emil Paur.

MISTEK, Czechoslovakia, June 16 (A. P.).—Emil Paur, former symphony orchestra conductor in New York and other American cities, is dead here after a long illness. He was 76 years old.

Mr. Paur, who studied music in Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. While in New York he scored his greatest success in prewar days. After leaving Pittsburgh, where he conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, he lived quietly in this country town.

A violinist and a pianist before becoming a conductor at Kassel in 1876, Emil Paur succeeded Anton Seidel as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. He directed the orchestra until 1902, and in 1899 and 1900 he directed Wagnerian works at the Metropolitan Opera. At this time also he began a three-year directorship in the National Conservatory in New York. He conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony from 1904 until 1910.

Paur succeeded Karl Muck at the Royal Opera in Berlin when the latter joined the Boston Symphony in 1912. In Berlin he met with the displeasure of the German Emperor, who forced him to resign in January, 1913. The Emperor, who had previously objected to Paur's treatment of "Carmen," asked, as head of th3 Royal Opera, that another conductor be substituted a few hours before the final production of "The Flying Dutchman."

Paur composed a symphony and also wrote many pieces for the piano. His wife, Mary Burger Paur, who died in 1889, was an accomplished pianist. They had several children.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JUN 16 1932

CONDUCTOR DEAD

EMIL PAUR

EMIL PAUR DIES, NOTED MUSICIAN

Former Director of Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic Succumbs at 76

FAMOUS AS WAGNERIAN

Mistex, Czechoslovakia, June 16—(AP)—Emil Paur, former conductor of the Boston Symphony and New York Philharmonic orchestra, is dead here after a long illness. He was 76 years old.

Emil Paur had a wide and deserved popularity in America for nearly 20 years, being a contemporary of Artur Nikisch, Anton Seidl and other great conductors of the period between 1890 and 1910.

He came to America in 1893 to succeed Nikisch at the Boston Symphony, remaining there for five years. Then, on the death of Seidl, Paur was brought to New York to take the baton of the Philharmonic, and also to direct many of the Wagnerian operas at the Metropolitan.

He returned to Europe in 1900, conducting in London and Madrid and in Germany, and came to America again in 1904 to take charge of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. He remained with that organization until it was dissolved in 1910.

Returning to Germany he became conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin, where he participated several years later in one of the many squabbles between the opera musicians and the Kaiser, just as Dr. Karl Muck had done. The Kaiser, displeased by a performance of "Carmen," directed by Paur, ordered Leo Blech to conduct the next performance. It was "The Flying Dutchman," which Paur had rehearsed. Paur immediately resigned.

After that Paur did some desultory musical work and finally retired. He had been living quietly in Czechoslovakia for a number of years.

Paur was born in Austria in 1855 and was a violinist and pianist before he became a director of music. He was dynamic on the conductor's stand, above middle height and with a strongly knit frame and a massive head with a mass of light, fair hair and with a beard.

As a Wagnerian interpreter he ranked with the greatest. He conducted the Boston Symphony concerts in this city during the five seasons he was with that organization, from 1893 to 1898, and during the next few years appeared here with the Philharmonic and the Metropolitan Opera Company, conducting its local productions of German opera.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

JUN 16 1932

EMIL PAUR

Was Former Conductor of Pittsburgh and Boston Orchestras

Mistek, Czecho-Slovakia, June 16.—(AP)—Emil Paur, former conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, is dead here after a long illness. He was 76 years old.

Paur, who studied music at Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also conducted in New York, where he scored his greatest success in prewar days. After leaving Pittsburgh he lived quietly in this country town.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUN 16 1932

EMIL PAUR DIES AT 76; LED BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mistek, Czechoslovakia, June 16.—(AP)—Emil Paur, 76, former conductor of the Pittsburgh symphony orchestra, is dead here after a long illness.

Mr. Paur, who studied music at Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra and also conducted in New York where he scored his greatest success in pre-war days. After leaving Pittsburgh, he lived quietly in this country town.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

JUN 16 1932

EMIL PAUR

Orchestra Conductor Well Known Here Dies in Czechoslovakia

MISTEK, Czechoslovakia, June 16 (AP).—Emil Paur, former symphony orchestra conductor in New York and other American cities, is dead here after a long illness. He was seventy-six years old.

Mr. Paur, who studied music in Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. While in New York he scored his greatest success in pre-war days. After leaving Pittsburgh, where he conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, he lived quietly in this country town.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUN 16 1932

Musician is Dead

MISTEK, Czechoslovakia, June 15 (AP)—Emil Paur, former conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony orchestra, is dead here after a long illness. He was 76 years old. Paur, who studied music at Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and also conducted in New York, where he scored his greatest success in pre-war days. After leaving Pittsburgh he lived quietly in this country town.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

JUN 16 1932

Emil Paur, Symphony Conductor, Dies at 76

Directed Philharmonic Here, Also Pittsburgh Orchestra

MISTEK, Czechoslovakia, June 15 (AP).—Emil Paur, former conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, is dead here after a long illness. He was seventy-six years old. He succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony and also conducted in New York. After leaving Pittsburgh he lived quietly in this country town.

Directed at Metropolitan

Emil Paur was conductor of the New York Philharmonic from 1898 to 1902 succeeding Anton Seidl. He directed Wagnerian works at the Metropolitan Opera in 1899-1900, at which time he also began a three-year directorship of the National Conservatory in New York, where his predecessor was Antonin Dvorak.

Trained by his father and at the Vienna Conservatory, Paur became violinist of the Court Orchestra in Vienna in 1870. Six years later he became a conductor, leading orchestras at Cassel, Konigsberg and Mannheim, and then, for two years before going to Boston in 1893, he led the Leipzig Opera. He directed the Boston Symphony until 1898.

From 1902 to 1904 he conducted at various cities in Europe and next took over the leadership of the Pittsburgh Orchestra, with which he remained until 1910. Since then he had done almost no conducting of large orchestras, except for a season in Berlin twenty years ago.

Paur was the composer of a symphony and he had written many pieces for the piano and violin. His wife, Mary Burger Paur, who died in 1899, was an accomplished pianiste.

CINGALESE PRINCE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

JUN 16 1932

Music Notes

By PITTS SANBORN.

THE performance of "Il Trovatore" scheduled for this evening at Chanin's 46th St. Theatre has been postponed, it was announced late today. It was to have been given under the auspices of "The Order of the Rose of the Union of American Noblesse under the Badge of State Flowers."

* * *

Florence Wickham, one-time Metropolitan contralto and later a star of light opera, has added to her growing fame as a song writer with "Because of You."

* * *

Theodore Cella, first harpist of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, recently conducted his own composition "On A Transatlantic Liner" at a "Pop" concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. The work had its first performance anywhere at a local Stadium Concert last summer.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 17 1932

Emil Paur, who has died at his home in Mistek, Czecho-Slovakia, at the age of 76, was well known in the United States as the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra after Arthur Nikisch, and then as the conductor of the Pittsburg Symphony orchestra. Although not rated with Nikisch, Dr Muck, or Koussevitsky as an interpreter, he was a sound musician and a conductor of considerable force. He received his musical training in Vienna. Since he left the United States he had been living quietly in the small town of Mistek, and for a long time before his death he had been incapacitated by illness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

JUN 16 1932

Paur, Symphony Conductor, Dies

MISTEK, Czechoslovakia, June 15 (AP).—Emil Paur, former conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, is dead here after a long illness. He was seventy-six years old.

Paur, who studied music at Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also conducted in New York, where he scored his greatest success in pre-war days.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JUN 19 1932

THE YOUTHFUL IGOR MARKEVITCH

An Enormous Talent at 19—His American Premieres by Stokowski, Koussevitzky and Rodzinski Next Season

By OLIN DOWNES.

PARIS, June 11. 1932.

THE music of Igor Markevitch, aged 19, will figure on the programs of at least three of the leading orchestras of America next season. The composer, a Russian born in Kiev July 19, 1912, heard the music of Mussorgsky at the age of 7 and, as he told us, was impressed. At 15 he composed a symphony to please himself, and the score was shown to Serge Diaghileff. Diaghileff ordered of Markevitch a piano concerto. This work was played, in an interval of the performances of the Ballet Russe, with the composer as pianist, at Covent Garden, London, July 16, 1929. Somewhere around this time, or even previously, Markevitch, according to his own statement, studied composition for two weeks with Nadia Boulanger, who then dismissed him, explaining that she could teach him nothing.

In June, 1930, Markevitch's Cantata, scored for solo female voice and male chorus, with text by Jean Cocteau, was performed in Paris, with conspicuous success. At this point in the narrative a question was interjected. What was the title of the cantata? There was no title. It was merely "Cantata." But what was the subject of Cocteau's sketch? There was no subject, was the sublime reply. The Cantata was "poetic." The text of Cocteau meant nothing—a fact which Mr. Markevitch's audience absorbed without surprise. In fact, this text was written after the work was composed. Apparently it was fitted to some "Ahs" or other meaningless syllables given the voices. This, at least, was our understanding of Mr. Markevitch's French. It was an abstract text. It proposed by sonorous and psychological association to intensify the meaning of the music.

* * *

Igor Markevitch is a slight, glossy young man of delicate features, dark coloring, and very clear young eyes, with shoulders built up by the tailor, and a modest and even shy bearing—and nobody's fool. His Cantata he regarded as his first really personal conception. Did he admire Cocteau? Formerly, yes, he replied, when he was young. (That is to say, three years ago, aged 16.) The piano concerto, he continued, though well received, was not a good work. And why? Well, it was immature. (At 15.) It was not integrated. It was derivative. This was the authoritative opinion of the composer.

Then appeared, materialized, in succession, Markevitch's "Concerto grosso" for forty-five musicians, played by the Orchestre Symphonique of Paris, under the direction of Desormiers, on the 30th of December, 1931. This work will be played next season for the first time in America by Artur Rodzinski and the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra. The "Concerto grosso" was followed by the "Partita" for piano and orchestra, also performed in Paris, under Desormiers, on the 19th of May of this year. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra will give this score its American première next season. Then came the suite, originally intended for a ballet, later developed as a symphonic suite, called "Rebus." Markevitch conducted this work himself at the first performance last December. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will give "Rebus" its first American performances. Undoubtedly other performances will follow, for this piece, which Markevitch, after having provided an orchestral score for his visitors, played on the piano, is unquestionably a work of enormous talent.

* * *

It is a work in some half dozen movements, one or two with titles, such as "Vices," which mean nothing in particular, unless they had originally an application to the proposed ballet. Certainly it is fortunate that the ballet idea disappeared, for no ballet suite could have been written with the formal architecture and close logic of development which characterize this child's music. These remarks are made after the piano performance and glances at an orchestral score which is very economical and close knit, and probably brilliant in its sonorities. There are resounding climaxes, and other passages of shrewdest contrast. The work stands as a piece of pure music, an amazing testimony to an exceptional creative impulse and to the manner in which the language of music is changing in the mouths of the children of the century.

* * *

In character with the present-day movement the nature of Markevitch's score is formal and rhythmical rather than melodic, and it is this insistence—one would say this absorption—in the rhythmic and formal elements, with the absence of the melodic feature, which indicates a certain present limitation: the lack of the lyrical substance, which is a little ominous. After all, there has been no great music without melodic characteristics, unless Stravinsky is the exception—Stravinsky, who is certainly going dry. Nor need it be claimed that Markevitch's art is without any indebtedness to contemporary tendencies. If so, it would be outside the order of nature. He has absorbed some modern idioms which he does not imitate but uses as parts of speech.

For the rest, his music is full of energy, youth, health and unquestionable creative power. Before he commenced playing it Markevitch made a single and very casual remark, one that might apply to any great composition. He said, "You see, I wanted to make this music—grow"—he put his hands together and pulled them slowly apart, with a gesture of stretching something. Then he played, as much as one could play such music on the piano.

The work begins with what might be called a simple rhythmic proposition, not in itself unique. There is of course a melodic figure—not a melody but a motive. The introductory piece, so entitled in the score, is short. When it was finished this observer, recalling extravagant reports of Markevitch's talent, wondered, like the Westerner in the story, what all the shooting was about. Then the thing began to develop. It developed rhythmically, the original rhythmical germ beginning to sprout and evolute in many different rhythmical shapes, and it developed contrapuntally, with astonishing boldness, certainty and resource.

And as to the tonal "language" of Markevitch, previously referred to: this "language" is clearly a modern tongue, which at times employs terms of polytonality and polyharmony, as naturally as one uses words of three syllables. And these polytonal and polyharmonic relations never mean forgetfulness or negation of tonality.

That is a very important point. The atonalists, Schönberg et Cie., deny the necessity and dispense with the presence of key relationship. The polytonalists, composing in more than one key at the same time, too often lose their way in the new land where every key belongs to everybody and the sense of foundation in music disappears. You have then merely a lack of harmonic form and a confusion of keys.

* * *

But with this young gentleman of 19 there is not the suggestion of confusion, uncertainty or experiment. The experiments of the moderns have become for him useful technical material. The idioms are the servants of the composer and not his master. Writing at times in combined keys, Markevitch retains invariably the sense of foundation and direction. The feet of the music are firm on the earth. There is a central point about which everything revolves. There is an exuberant counterpoint of keys and chords, as well as melodic figures. What happens in the course of a development carried forward cumulatively from movement to movement, with growing richness of material, is the fulfillment of the original proposition.

How explain this tonal "language" in which dissonance is in no sense disturbing or less than exciting and stimulating to the sense of hearing? The music traverses by short cuts forbidden harmonic territory. The ear—or let us be conservative and say one pair of ears—was constantly led on by curiosities and fulfillments which in turn created a fresh curiosity as to what was to follow. In other words, there was organic, propulsive life in the rhythmical combinations, in the clash of note against note, chord against chord, key against key. Markevitch made a notable comment when he was asked, following the performance of "Rebus," what he thought of dissonance.

"I don't believe in dissonances," he said. "They are arbitrary. I believe in new consonances."

And, upon the editorial word, he seems to have gone very far toward achieving that consummation. New consonances. New but convincingly natural tonal conceptions which have the logic and acceptability of consonances. It is apparently natural for a young man on the verge of his twenties to write in this way, with self-possession, spontaneity, and the confidence of one who speaks his native tongue. Markevitch states that he has his music completely in his head, including the orchestration, before he puts it on paper.

* * *

Markevitch has the appearance of one rather frail, unassertive and delicately reared. A moment after the music the dancer Lifar, for whom the composer is writing a ballet, came into the room, and the contrast was positively laughable. Lifar is a dark, sleek, happy young animal. He may not be the Nijinsky of Paris, but he is at least the most brilliant male dancer of the day hereabout, and the talk of moment. He is successful and fêted. He condescended to us, and with joyous abandon invited many more people than his box could contain to his performance at the Opéra that evening. Lifar's sleek eyes, full lips and rich, dark complexion; Markevitch's slightness, almost frailty and delicate poise. A body and a brain confronted each other.

Markevitch knows what he is about, and always made good replies to the questions he was plied with. He admired Beethoven more than any other composer. Then Mozart, then Bach. And Chopin. What did he think of Stravinsky? A discreet and suggestive pause. Then—"he is a 'grand maitre.'" Mussorgsky was greatest of all Russians. How about his young contemporaries? "I could not speak of them with intelligence," Markevitch answered, "You see, I can only understand what I myself am trying to do in music. I cannot understand those who have other creative directions, because these are not mine, and—I am not a critic."

Lipnitzki, Paris.

Igor Markevitch, the Youthful Composer Whose Works Will Be Performed Here Next Season by Some of Our Leading Orchestras.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
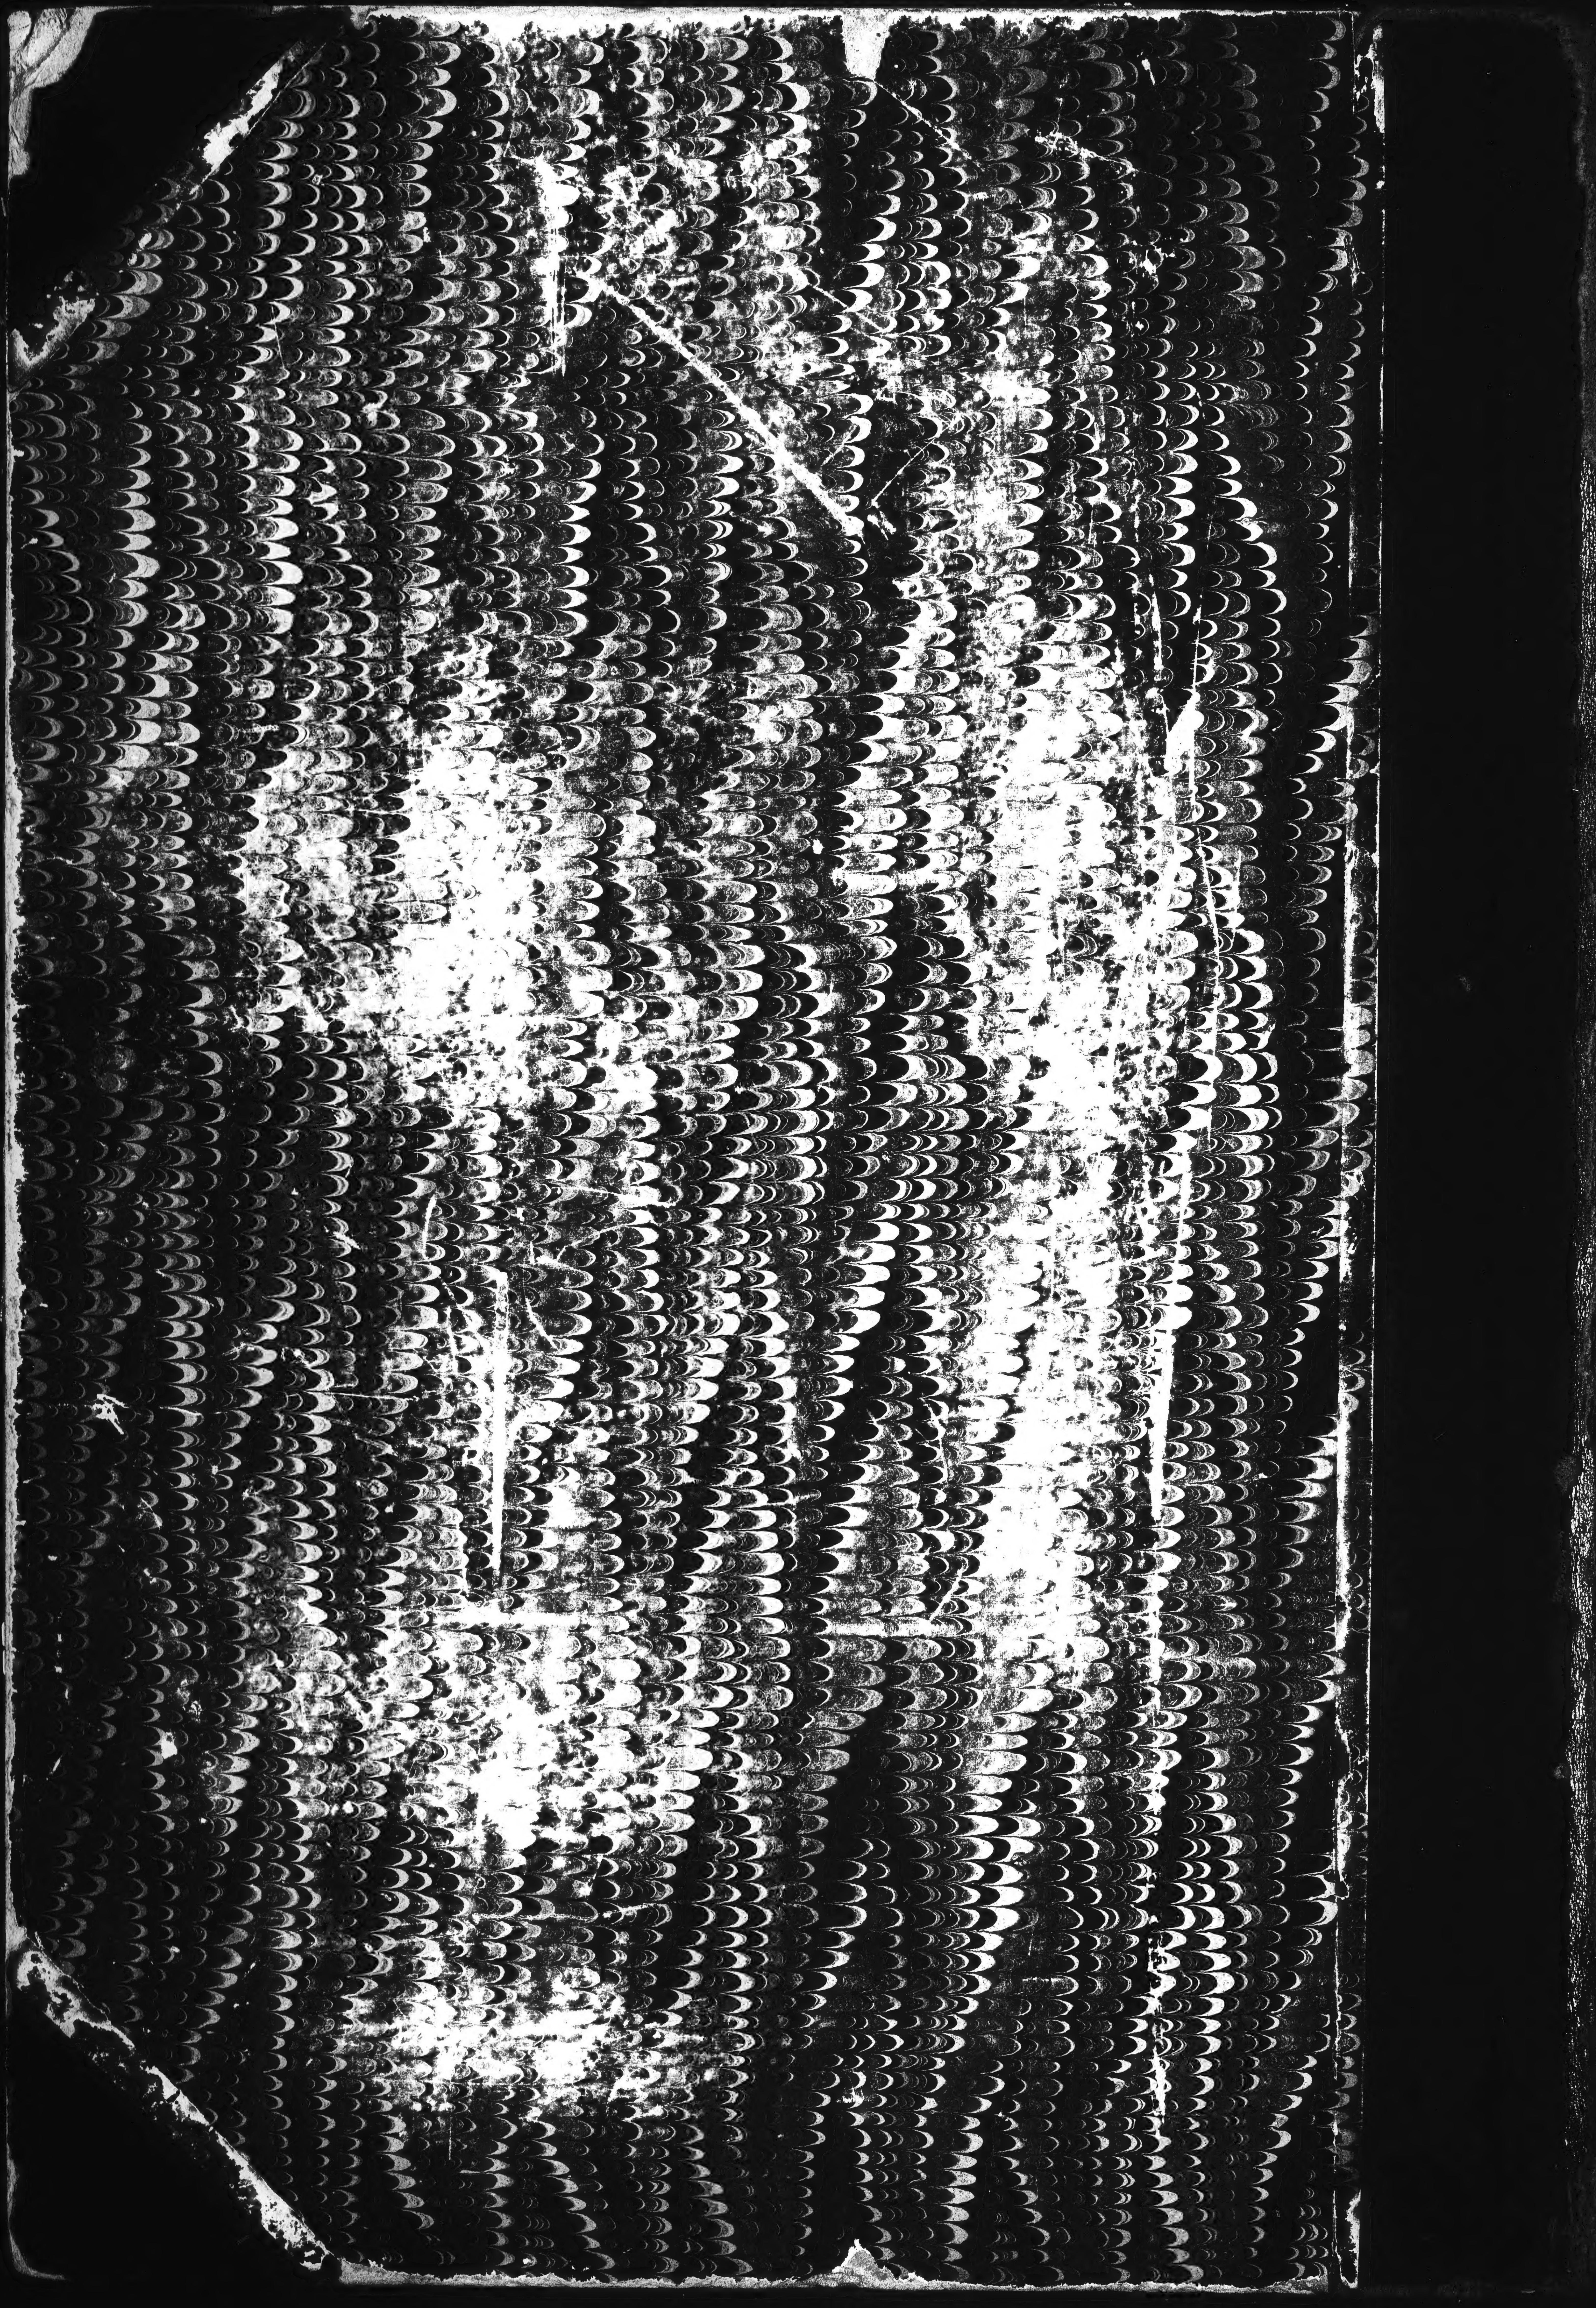
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE
REWIND